

88966
4952
Lot K
L-C
70

HISTORY OF KERN COUNTY
CALIFORNIA

WITH BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES
OF

The Leading Men and Women of the County Who Have Been Identified With Its Growth and Development From the Early Days to the Present

HISTORY BY
WALLACE M. MORGAN

ILLUSTRATED
COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME

HISTORIC RECORD COMPANY
LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA
1914

HISTORY OF
KERN COUNTY

F868

K3M8

229446
16

16-6472

CONTENTS

INTRODUCTORY .....	17
Kern County of Vast Size—Great Natural Wealth—Rapid Increase in Valuations—Necessity of Large Capital—Early Indians Within Borders of County—Clash Between White and Red—First Mining in 1851—Yellow Aster Mine—Land Patents and Water Rights—First Oil Developed in 1899—The High Point in the County History.
CHAPTER I.
A DESCRIPTION OF KERN COUNTY.....	20
Area of County—Boundaries—North Line 136 Miles in Length—South Line 102 Miles Long—View of the Kern Valley—The West Side Oil Fields—Buena Vista Gas Belt—Recent Activity in the Oil Fields—Reclaimed Swamp Land—Miller & Lux Alfalfa Fields—Irrigation Canals Radiate from Bakersfield—Broad Belt of Irrigated Land—Citrus Mesa Skirts the Sierras—Beginnings of Orange Culture—Water for Pumping Abundant—Cheap Power Available—Pumping Plants in Other Sections—Great Land Holdings—Kern River Oil Field—The Mountain Sections—Early Mining Country—Mountain Farming Districts—Rancho El Tejon—The Desert Triangle Again—Bakersfield the Commercial Center.
CHAPTER II.
INDIANS AND THE TEJON RANCH.....	29
Remains of a Prehistoric Village—Early Indian Tribes—The Yokut Indians—Living the Simple Life—Specimens of Indian Handicraft—Elaborate Ceremonials of the Race—Tribal Names and Characteristics—Distribution of Tribes—Civilizing the Indians—Plans of Lieutenant Beale to Protect and Prosper Indians—Renegade Indians—Serranos—The Tejon Ranch—Sold to Southern California Syndicate.
CHAPTER III.
GOLD MINING FROM 1851 TO 1875.....	35
Rush in 1851 to Kern River—Quartz Mining at Keysville in 1852—Mining the Kern River Placers in 1853—Discovery of the Keys Mine in 1854—The First Quartz Mill Hauled from San Francisco—Keys and Mammoth Mines—Town of Keysville—The Fort—Big Blue Mine and Whiskey Flat—Growth of Kernville—Founding of Havilah—Its Most Productive Mine—Fondness of Early Miners for Gambling—Other Mining Districts.
CHAPTER IV.
BEGINNINGS OF AGRICULTURE AND STOCK-RAISING.....	43
First Comers were Sojourners Only—Trip Made by Audubon in 1849—The South Fork Pioneers—Dangers of Early Days—The Mason & Henry Gang—South Fork Valley—Early Settlers on the Kern Delta—The Immigrant Road of the '50s—Site of Bakersfield in 1859—Beginnings of the County's Cattle Industry—Some of the Very Old Timers—Beginning of the Sheep Industry—The Mexican Settlement—Catching Wild Horses as a Business—Stories of the Outlaw Vasquez—The Barnes Settlement.
CHAPTER V.
FLOODS AND SWAMP RECLAMATION.....	54
Act of 1857 for Reclamation of Swamp Land—The First San Joaquin Valley Canal Project—The First State Highway—Attempts to Interest Capitalists—How a River in Flood Reclaimed a Swamp—Then the Drought Helped, Too—Baker Gets His Patent—Montgomery Patent Annulled—The State Did Not Get the Land—Beginnings of Bakersfield—First Settlers—First Cotton Crop—First Schools—Freight Hauled from Los Angeles—Architecture in 1863—The Flood of 1867-68—Avalanches from Lakes—Flood Reaches Bakersfield—Reclamation Work Completed—Patent Granted to Colonel Baker.

CHAPTER VI.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COUNTY.....	61
County Created from Tulare and Los Angeles—First County Seat at Havilah—First County Officials—First Court House—First Election Precincts—First Election in the County—The Vote for Governor—Officers Elected—First Swamp Land District Organized—Agreement with Colonel Baker—Changes in the Swamp Land Laws—A Sheep Worth More Than an Acre of Land—The First Mountain Roads—Ferry Charges—Purchase of Toll Roads by the County.

CHAPTER VII.

THE COMING OF THE CAPITALISTS.....	66
Era of Large Enterprise Begins—Bakersfield as it Was in 1870—Sources of Ready Cash—Early Captains of Industry—Cotton Growers' Association Formed—Livermore and Redington Interests Sold—Kern County News of 1871-73—Havilah Residents Move to Bakersfield—Death of Colonel Baker in 1872.

CHAPTER VIII.

BAKERSFIELD BECOMES THE COUNTY METROPOLIS.....	72
History of Bakersfield a Story of Hope Deferred—Yet Always the City was Full of Life—Contest for County Seat Assumed Final Form in 1873—Contest over Election—Bakersfield Made County Seat in 1874 by 22 Votes—Contract for Court House—First Incorporation of Town—First Officers—The First Hope Deferred—Delano Founded—The Story of Johnson's Ox-Team—News Notes of 1873-75—Bakersfield Disincorporated in 1876—The Town Marshal Then Retired.

CHAPTER IX.

THE CONTESTS OVER WATER RIGHTS BEGIN.....	80
Large Negotiations by Capitalists—Withdrawal of Redington—Decline of Livermore and Chester—The Largest Plow Ever Built—Fertile Causes of Litigation—First Great Fight Over Water Rights—Purposes of Haggin and Carr—Carr's Dealing with the Ditch Companies—Plans to Gather in the Desert Lands—Enter Miller and Lux at Rear of Stage.

CHAPTER X.

A COLLECTION OF DISCONNECTED STORIES.....	89
The Drought of 1877—Disastrous in Its Effects—The Town of Tehachapi—Its Pioneers—Moving of Old Town to Railroad—First Apple Trees Planted About 1880—Delano Making Progress—The Last of Old Clubfoot—Lynching of an Outlaw Gang—The Tehachapi Train Wreck—Importation of the Negroes—News Notes of 1886-93.

CHAPTER XI.

THE GREAT LUX-HAGGIN WATER SUIT.....	98
Involving Some Picturesque Characters, a Supreme Court Decision, Two State Irrigation Conventions, a Special Session of the State Legislature and an Historic Agreement—Some of Miller's Chief Lieutenants—Leaders of the Carr and Haggin Forces—Heads of the Rival Literary Bureaus—Julius Chester and Richard Hudnut—The Kern County Echo—The Great Water Suit—Kern River Plays Another Prank—Supreme Court Decides for Riparianists—Irrigators Everywhere Protested—Governor Calls Legislative Session—State Senate Deadlocks on Water Bills—The Miller-Haggin Agreement Ends Litigation.

CHAPTER XII.

FIRST ATTEMPT AT COLONIZATION.....	110
Haggin Decides to Colonize—Carr Gives Place to Fergusson—Many Plans for Progress—Fire Wipes out Business Section—Bakersfield Quickly Rebuilds—Colonization on a Large Scale—Scions of Nobility Make Things Hum—An International Romance—Journalistic Exigencies Aid Cupid—Causes for Dissatisfaction in Rosedale Colony—Another Swamp Land Contest—The Jastro Administration.

CHAPTER XIII.

IMPORTANT EVENTS OF A DECADE, 1890-1900.....117

Desert Mining Booms—Traces of Early Prospectors—Discovery of the Yellow Aster—Other Famous Desert Mines—The Town of Randsburg—Discovery of Tungsten Mines—The Amalie District—Other Important Events—Gas and Electric Plants—First Street Railway—The First Levee Canal—The Great Railway Strike—Coxey's Army Comes and Goes—Twin Towns Incorporate—Company G Responds to Duty—News Notes 1895-1900.

CHAPTER XIV.

DEVELOPMENT OF OIL FIELDS.....126

Discovery of Great Oil Fields That Have Made the County Famous—Early Development at McKittrick—First Drilling Unsuccessful—Operators Move to Sunset—Refinery Established in 1891—McKittrick Railroad Built—Oil Boom Strikes West Side—Discovery of the Kern River Field—The Elwoods To be Credited with Discovery—The Great Boom—Sunset Railroad Built—Building of Pipe Lines Begun—Associated Oil Company Formed—Independent Agency Organized—A Democratic Concern—Varying Prices for Oil—Gushers Swamp the Market—The Boom of 1910—Developments at the Marketing End—More Pipe Lines Built—Getting the Markets Organized—Efforts to Check Over-Production—Oil Land Withdrawals—The Pickett Bill—The Yard Decision—Smith Remedial Bill—Asphaltum and Oil Refining—Natural Gas Production—Natural Gas in Bakersfield—Making Gasoline from Gas—Some of the County's Famous Oil Gushers—Gushers Start Boom of 1910—Lakeview Comes In—Product Swamps Pipe Line—The Consolidated Midway—A Procession of Gushers—North Midway Gushers—Effect on the Oil Game—The Lost Hills Field—The Discovery Well.

CHAPTER XV.

PROGRESS OF THE COUNTY FROM 1900 TO 1913.....148

Development of Pump Irrigation—Experiments at Wasco and McFarland—Development of the Citrus Belt—Pumping Plant Extension in 1912—Planting Apples at Tehachapi—Status of Fruit Growing in 1913—Bakersfield in 1904—Good Times Return—Building Boom of 1909-10—Activity in Home-Building—Raising the Civic Standards—Consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern—Bakersfield Paves Her Streets—Bonds for County Roads—Public Buildings of 1900-1913—Church Building—Progress of Schools—The Rescue of Lindsay B. Hicks—News Notes 1899 to 1910.

CHAPTER XVI.

BRIEF HISTORIES OF KERN COUNTY TOWNS.....173

Bakersfield in 1859—Coming of Colonel Baker—Kern County Created—Bakersfield Formally Laid Out—Bakersfield Wins the County Seat—Bakersfield is Incorporated then Disincorporated—Another Era of Progress—The Big Fire—Colonization of Rosedale—Public Utilities in 1889-90—Kern River Oil Boom—Present Prospects—West Side Oil Field Towns—Maricopa—Taft—Fellows—McKittrick—Lost Hills—Towns of the Valley Farming District—Delano—Wasco—Famosa—McFarland—Rio Bravo—Buttonwillow—Shafter—Rosedale—Edison—Towns of the Mountain Section—Tehachapi—Glennville—Woody—Kernville—Isabella—Weldon—Onyx—Havilah—Caliente—Towns of the Desert—Randsburg—Johannesburg—Mojave—Rosa-mond.

INDEX

A

Abels, Fred	1506
Ackerley, C. H.	1111
Adams, G. F.	1505
Adams, James S.	1260
Adams, Verne L.	1518
Albrecht, Albert W.	1418
Aldrich, G. J.	1363
Alexander, Calvin B.	596
Alexander, Ford	1299
Alexander, James	1085
Allardt, Hugo F.	472
Allen, Charles E.	1319
Allen, Louis	921
Amour, Augustine	1223
Amourig, August	1202
Andersen, Barney A.	764
Anderson, C. V.	232
Anderson, Frank	1476
Andre, Andre	992
Andre, Cyrille	494
Annette, James L.	1326
Ansolabehere, Michel	1460
Ansolabehere, Michel	1139
Apalatea, Francisco	1377
Applegarth, Clark	1276
Ardizzi, Benedetto	1435
Argy, Michael	1538
Armstrong, William E.	1368
Arp, James H.	446
Ashe, Elliott M.	1530
Atkinson, Benjamin M.	1377
Atkinson, Thomas W.	1376
Atwell, Joe M.	798
Augsburger, John H.	1332
Avila, Mrs. Mary J.	861

B

Bach, Philip	1323
Bailey, E. W.	1398
Bailey, John E.	857
Bailey, Joseph L.	857
Baker, James L.	1380
Baker, Lynn W.	1344
Baker, R. T.	872
Baker, Col. Thomas	722
Baker, Thomas A.	460
Bakersfield Brewing Co.	1282
Bakersfield Ice Delivery	472
Baldwin, Frank H.	1460
Ball, Herbert G.	663
Ballagh, C. E.	748
Ballagh, E. E.	1093
Ballagh, Herbert A.	730
Bandettini, Almando	1508
Bangsberg, O. C.	1063
Banks, Henry F.	1504
Baptista, Christian and Margaret	763
Barker, E. J.	1405
Barker, Vining E.	1262
Barlow, Hon. Charles A.	207

Barnett, Floyd H.	1305
Barr, James A.	1280
Barrett, Parker	1285
Bates, J. W.	1085
Bates, Luther A.	1551
Batz, John B.	231
Bauman, Jacob	865
Baumgartner, Joseph	1282
Beardsley, Lewis A.	1232
Beck, Charles G.	1392
Becker, H. E.	674
Bemus, Erskine	1225
Benjamin, Ernest V.	1243
Bennett, A. V.	1374
Bennett, Charles F.	506
Bennett, J. A.	1399
Bennett, John F.	1312
Bennett, Hon. Paul W.	634
Benson, Clarence D.	738
Benson, Millard D.	1365
Berges, Alexander	868
Bergsten, Albion R.	1451
Beringer, Milton D.	629
Bernard, Francois	1432
Bertrand, Jean E.	944
Bess, R. W.	582
Bewley, R. L.	1434
Bidart, John	801
Bimat, Bernard	901
Bimat, Leon	741
Birchard, S. C.	1385
Blacker, Ezra N.	537
Blacker, Robert E.	1417
Blackhall, Alexander R. M.	1021
Blaettler, Peter	1378
Blair, Frank E.	1060
Blanc, Eli	1475
Blanck, Ernest L.	867
Blankenship, Phil	1418
Blodget, Hugh A.	883
Blood, Daniel H.	1003
Blood, E. K.	1224
Boese, Rev. John H.	1494
Boggs, William S.	360
Boggs, Willis W.	270
Bohna, Henry	388
Bolstad, Fred P.	747
Borda, Domingo	812
Borel, Jean	1235
Borgwardt, Henry L.	772
Bostaph, C. A.	1371
Bowles, P. E., Jr.	1123
Bowman, Charles	1379
Bramham, Virginia	1025
Brandt, Henry J.	1388
Bratt, Frank O.	857
Bresson, Joseph	1297
Breuch, William	642
Brinkman, John J.	677
Brite, Charles R.	1335
Brite, Jesse D.	1361
Brite, John B.	1331

Brite, Lucas F.....	281
Brittan, Edward F.....	1225
Britz, Nick.....	1333
Brockman, Fred C.....	702
Brooks, Thomas A.....	283
Broom, Mrs. Margaret M.....	1524
Brower, Celsus.....	1037
Brown, Andrew.....	213
Brown, Edward S.....	1097
Brown, Granville L.....	320
Brown, H. H.....	1205
Brown, James F.....	1385
Brown, L. T.....	1491
Brown, Newell J., M.D.....	1257
Brown, Thomas W.....	751
Browning, William J.....	1106
Bruce, James L.....	897
Brundage, Hon. Benjamin.....	1012
Brundage, Benjamin L.....	1245
Buchanan, Lewis R.....	955
Buckreis, Franz.....	330
Bumgarner, G. M., M.D.....	1018
Burge, E. D.....	1448
Burke, Daniel.....	722
Burke, Walter J.....	560
Burkett, George E.....	1539
Burnes, Andrew A.....	1235
Burnham, E. L.....	1371
Burns, F. J.....	1364
Burton, Robert.....	996
Burubeltz, Jean.....	1335
Busby, Harry C.....	1305
Bush, Jonathan M.....	1485
Byrns, Frank A.....	1211

C

Caldwell, George O.....	1347
Caldwell, James R.....	809
Caldwell, John E.....	809
Calhoun, George.....	1237
Call, George W.....	1308
Campbell, E. B.....	985
Canaday, John W.....	1441
Canfield, W.....	1454
Cannell, Thomas A.....	577
Capdeville, Jean B.....	1195
Carlock, Francis M.....	645
Carlock, Howard W.....	1429
Carlton, Eugene R.....	995
Carroll, J. P.....	1193
Carter, David.....	931
Carter, J. B.....	729
Carver, Alexander.....	1435
Carver, Mrs. Louisa J.....	1251
Cassady, Forrest A.....	1462
Castro, Albert H.....	879
Castro, Domitilo.....	737
Castro, Emilio C.....	1341
Castro, Epifanio P.....	853
Castro, Leonides.....	1168
Castro, Perfecto C.....	1550
Castro, Thomas C.....	1202
Cattani, Peter.....	1544
Cayori, Chris.....	1304
Chadwick, Chessman J.....	633
Chastan, Octave.....	846
Chatom, Paul.....	756
Chauvin, Alphonse.....	1279
Chavez, Gabriel.....	1467
Chinette, John P.....	918

Chittenden, James E.....	760
Christensen, Claus P.....	668
Clafin, Hon. Charles L.....	1250
Clar, Miss Anna.....	1477
Clark, Fred C.....	1446
Clark, James A.....	1021
Clark, Orville L.....	216
Clark, Samuel R.....	1236
Clayman, John H.....	256
Clegg, William F.....	1471
Clement, Fred.....	1378
Clickard, John.....	1466
Cline, Christian W.....	1338
Clotfelter, Less.....	1341
Cochran, Joseph A.....	1542
Coffee, Dave.....	927
Coffee, George W.....	1105
Colby, C. B.....	342
Coleman, Harry L.....	1477
Colm, W. W.....	743
Colton, Francis G.....	1545
Condict, Henry F.....	694
Cook, D. B.....	1180
Cook, F. S.....	1435
Cook, L. R.....	1471
Cook, W. H., M.D.....	294
Coolbaugh, Mrs. Elizabeth.....	865
Coombs, Leslie D.....	926
Cooney, Joseph P.....	1521
Cooper, Charles E.....	705
Coppin, Thomas C.....	1311
Cornish, Thomas J.....	948
Corsett, Frank H.....	1543
Corti, Paul.....	1157
Coulter, Joel W.....	687
Coulter, L. D.....	1363
Cowan, Marshall R.....	973
Coyne, Martin.....	1324
Craghill, Edward W.....	430
Craig, Fred W.....	1143
Craig, J. N.....	1463
Crain, Mrs. Alice A.....	1390
Crawford, Clinton B.....	1343
Crawford, James R.....	1533
Crichton, Dave.....	482
Crippen, Fred N.....	1412
Crippen, S. G.....	1423
Crites, Angus J.....	336
Crites, Angus M.....	1045
Crites, Arthur S.....	1244
Crites, Mrs. Louesa M.....	1046
Croft, J. H.....	655
Cromwell, Alexander H.....	603
Cross, Asa A.....	1300
Cross, John.....	1370
Crow, Lewis B.....	793
Cuda, Joseph.....	1345
Cuddeback, John P.....	353
Cuddeback, William N.....	347
Cummings, Clarence C.....	1531
Cummings, Edward G.....	1531
Cummins, Thomas L.....	659
Cuneo, P. J., M.D.....	1075
Cunningham, W. L.....	341
Curran, James.....	407
Curtzwiler, Charles W.....	1246

D

Daggett, Charles E.....	1552
Dailey, Charles A.....	1301

† Dalton, Archibald E.....	1306
Daly, Charles .....	1413
Darnul, John J.....	767
✓ David, Edward A.....	1467
Davis, Elonzo P.....	609
✧ Davis, George .....	1516
Davis, Ira B.....	896
Davis, Philip M.....	1511
Davis, Walter E.....	1303
Dawley, C. H.....	743
Day, Charles E.....	420
Dearborn, Judge Elias M.....	816
Delfino, George .....	1157
◊ Demsey, Cyrus F., M.D.....	1047
Denio, John B.....	315
Dennen, LeRoy A.....	1513
Derby, George W.....	1433
✓ Deuel, J. J., Sr.....	1214
Deuel, J. J., Jr.....	501
Devenney, Henry F.....	1220
✧ Dickey, C. L.....	1425
Dickinson, Charles .....	1278
Dickinson, James E.....	482
Dixon, Archie H.....	828
✓ Dixon, Ola G.....	836
Dodge, R. M.....	1386
Doherty, William J.....	887
Dooley, Joseph P.....	1368
Doran, Peter .....	1510
Dougherty, Dixon .....	324
Dover, H. J.....	1553
Dowd, Adolphus .....	1447
Drader, Charles .....	356
Duhart, Pierre .....	965
Dumble, Herman S.....	1184
Duncan, Eugene B.....	350
Duncan, M. A.....	434
Dunlap, Henry C.....	1261
Dunlop, Samuel J.....	1312
† Dunn, John M.....	1307
Dunne, Cornelius .....	1139
Durnal, J. A.....	1527
Duschak, Simon .....	1528

E

Eardley, W. A.....	244
Echenique, Miguel .....	944
Echenique, Tomas .....	827
Echols, A. B.....	1516
Eckert, Mrs. Belle C.....	1394
Eckhoff, Frederick J.....	1253
Edmonds, Reuben A.....	367
Edwards, E. T.....	252
Edwards, George B.....	403
Edwards, J. G.....	1328
Ehlers, Fredrick .....	1381
Eiland, Edward F.....	858
Ellis, Katharyn W., M.D.....	344
Elwood, Harry M., M.D.....	956
Emerson, Charles .....	1369
Emmons, E. Carroll.....	1398
Emmons, Hon. E. J.....	1500
Enas, John .....	529
Endert, Joseph F.....	811
Engelke, W. A.....	1454
Engle, William H.....	1374
Erb, E. J.....	1315
Erickson, Henry .....	1322
Espitallier, Joseph .....	1548
Espitallier, Marius M.....	1372

Estribou, Jean B.....	1214
Etcheverry, Fernando .....	1191
Etcheverry, Peter .....	842
Etzweiler, Harry A.....	1194
Evans, Joseph L.....	563
Eyraud, August P.....	589
Eyraud, Jean .....	1549
Eyraud, Joseph .....	921

F

Fairchild, Charles H.....	521
Fairchild, Margaret H.....	522
Farmer, Milton T.....	891
Farris, Hamilton .....	418
Fechtner, Paul R.....	1537
Fenneman, Henry H.....	850
Ferguson, Andrew .....	1124
Ferguson, W. A.....	803
Fergusson, Reginald A., M.D.....	338
Fether, Frank A.....	1026
Fether, Harry D.....	1072
Filben, Arthur B.....	1274
First National Bank of Taft.....	450
Fishell, Roland R.....	1489
Flournoy, George .....	581
Fogarty, Thomas H.....	1357
Fogg, E. S., M.D.....	1224
Follansbee, William G.....	706
Forbes, A. D.....	348
Forker, William N.....	1094
Forsyth, Donald H.....	1420
Foster, Edwin L.....	1249
Foust, Andrew J.....	1457
Foust, Levi E.....	651
Fox, C. A.....	957
Fox, J. Frank.....	778
Frazier, William W.....	1523
Freear, Charles H.....	906
Freear, Henry T.....	683
Freear, Horace R.....	475
Freear, James A.....	214
Freear, John A.....	209
Freear, Joseph P.....	498
Freeman, Albert W.....	277
Freeman, Hon. James W.....	1212
Freligh, Andrew .....	433
Fry, Charles H.....	1384
Fry, John A.....	1000
Fry, Joseph B.....	752
Fuller, Rev. Edgar R.....	969
Fultz, Thomas S.....	1542

G

Galbraith, G. H.....	961
Gallman, John J.....	366
Galloway, Ralph E.....	262
Galtes, Paul .....	307
Gardette, Peter .....	197
Gardner, John A.....	368
Gardner, J. E.....	1048
Gates, N. M.....	1367
Geddes, Charles E.....	1426
Geiger, Felix .....	1487
General Hospital of Taft.....	373
Getchell, C. E.....	718
Giboney, C. L.....	1325
Gilfillan, Adam W.....	417
Gill, John L.....	810
Gillespie, J. E.....	819

Gillespie, Patrick .....	1056
Gillette, Edward D.....	623
Gilli, Peter .....	541
Girard, Joseph .....	777
Girard, Jules .....	1539
Giraud, Cyrille .....	1524
Gist, Jabez R.....	981
Glanville, Oscar .....	565
Glenn, Mrs. Sarah.....	1330
Goode, Albert S.....	489
Goode, O. P.....	1416
Goodman, H. S.....	1277
Gormley, F. B.....	673
Gould, Bert E.....	1353
Graham, James T.....	1404
Grant, James C.....	1431
Gray, Jonathan E. ....	453
Green, A. B.....	1339
Green, Bernard G.....	1372
Green, Bert .....	1041
Green Brothers .....	1041
Green, Clarence S.....	678
Green, John L.....	1041
Green, John T.....	429
Greer, Jefferson M.....	1483
Gribble, Fred L.....	1450
Grimaud, Stanislaus .....	1269
Grogg, E. A.....	1326
Guiberson, Lorraine P.....	463
Gunderson, Robert .....	1445
Gundlach, Max, Jr.....	1554
Gunn, William W.....	1541

H

Haberfelde, George C.....	1167
Haberkern, Charles F.....	374
Haese, Otto .....	1011
Haimes, Reginald F.....	1150
Hall, Hon. Fred H.....	219
Halloran, John .....	1465
Halter, Joseph J.....	1273
Hamilton, E. M.....	999
Hamilton, John E.....	278
Hamilton, Truman W.....	1497
Hamlin, Francis A., M.D.....	313
Hanning, Cecil H.....	1215
Harbaugh, Isaac W.....	1176
Harding, Jack .....	1119
Hardisty, Charles .....	1407
Hare, Frederick E.....	1445
Harman, Lane S.....	269
Harmon, William .....	1052
Harrington, Albert L.....	578
Harris, Witten W.....	868
Hart, Charles M.....	1356
Hart, John O.....	1175
Harvey, John H.....	1428
Harvey, Thomas N.....	234
Hastings, George .....	1045
Hatfield, George W.....	1346
Hath, H. J.....	1329
Hay, George .....	225
Hayden, James M.....	756
Hayes, Emmett L.....	1147
Heard, J. W.....	1500
Heasley, William E.....	1470
Heck, E. P.....	341
Heck, O. C.....	341
Heldman, Charles H.....	1078
Helm, Lesrey G.....	1440

Helm, Thaddeus W.....	733
Henderson, George D.....	1278
Henderson, Lawrence .....	1526
Henderson, William L.....	1534
Hendrickson, John J.....	842
Hern, J. J.....	1416
Herod, Clarence L.....	1247
Herod, James .....	744
Hickey, John .....	637
Hicks, J. W.....	1459
Hiemforth, Peter .....	1188
Higley, E. D.....	1320
Hill, Fred A.....	718
Hill, F. F.....	349
Hill, Paul C.....	1011
Hill, Roland G.....	510
Hill, William H.....	207
Hilliard, Wesley W.....	1210
Hillman, Earl .....	1527
Hirsch, L. A.....	1334
Hitchcock, Charles D.....	1064
Hoagland, Arthur E.....	1427
Hochheimer, Ira .....	1165
Hoenshell, David L.....	1266
Holden, Rev. John P.....	566
Holland, W. J.....	569
Holmes, Calvin H.....	1336
Holmes, Fred S.....	1488
Holmes, Myron .....	268
Holson, Dell J.....	1213
Holtby, Robert M.....	564
Holthe, Oscar A.....	1396
Hopkins, Harry A.....	355
Hopper, Leonard .....	748
Hopper, Thomas .....	797
Hornung, Paul .....	1051
Hosking, Henry .....	1201
Hougham, Edward L.....	438
Houser, William M.....	377
Howell, William A.....	293
Hubbard, John E.....	875
Hudson, Hon. R. J.....	295
Hughes, H. Guy.....	763
Hughes, R. C.....	1388
Hunt, R. R.....	1529
Hunter, Alva .....	1325
Hurst, Willis E.....	1528
Hutchins, V. G.....	837
Hydron, James F.....	380

I

Illingworth, Carlos G.....	862
Irwin, Hon. Rowen.....	263

J

Jackson, Charles W.....	446
Jackson, David A.....	1120
Jacobs, A. Neal.....	1415
Jacoby, Abraham .....	973
James, J. B.....	1495
James, Walter .....	394
Jameson, John M.....	476
Jasper, Mrs. Harriet.....	693
Jastro, Harry A.....	1230
Jastro, Henry A.....	195
Jensen, H. P.....	1215
Jessup, John R.....	507
Jewett, Mrs. Catherine A.....	1296
Jewett, Frank C.....	1314

Jewett, Philo L.....	222
Jewett, Solomon .....	1292
Jewett, S. Wright.....	1059
Johndrow, Louis F.....	1015
Johnson, Charles F.....	812
Johnson, Charles W.....	922
Johnson, John .....	595
Johnson, John P.....	1042
Johnson, J. Thomas, M.D.....	424
Johnson, Mrs. Melvina.....	1505
Johnson, Richard A.....	1517
Johnston, Charles N.....	545
Johnston, George K.....	837
Johnston, H. D.....	1056
Johnston, Lucius .....	689
Jones, J. A.....	1554
Jones, Joseph G.....	1410
Jones, Paul R.....	1390
Jordan, Judson H.....	467
Jorgensen, George .....	1532
Joughin, William D.....	1133
Judd, Frank S.....	709

K

Kaar, Charles H.....	1161
Kaar, Jacob F.....	1162
Kaar, John .....	777
Kammerer, George .....	672
Kamprath, Otto R.....	514
Karns, Ernest .....	1097
Kaye, W. W.....	203
Kean, Michael T.....	1116
Keene, Arthur M.....	1483
Keester, Lloyd P.....	1048
Keleher, T. P.....	1456
Kellermeyer, Edward C.....	872
Kelley, Franklin C.....	1318
Kelley, George C.....	1317
Kelley, Jesse L.....	1082
Kelly, John W.....	1495
Kelly, W. W.....	789
Kerr, Charles .....	1075
Kersey, Joe D.....	1530
Kersey, Mrs. Lizzie.....	1467
Kidd, A. M.....	1313
Kimball-Stone Drug Store.....	233
King, George W.....	1384
King, Layton J.....	674
Kingston, Thomas S.....	1376
Kinton, Miss Ella B.....	1459
Kirsten, A. C. Julius.....	891
Kitchen, Charles E.....	1071
Kizziar, William L.....	902
Klingenberg, August .....	1477
Klipstein, Henry W.....	385
Klipstein, Thomas E.....	909
Knight, Harry S.....	958
Knoke, J. C.....	1425
Knowlton, Kent S.....	962
Koch, John .....	1438
Kosel, Peter .....	1550
Kramer, Otto .....	1409
Kratzmer, August .....	978
Kueffner, Rev. Louis.....	550
Kuehn, George W.....	1268

L

Lafont, Valentin .....	1339
Laird, Rollin .....	1253
Laird, William H., M.D.....	569

LaMarsna, Gerard C.....	1515
Lamb, Patrick .....	1284
Lambert, Peter .....	771
Lapsley, James T.....	1529
Larsen, Christian P.....	1289
Larson, Lewis H.....	1140
Lavers, Frederick .....	768
Lavers, William A.....	755
Leake, W. R.....	419
LeGar, Keith B.....	1401
Leieritz, E. H.....	781
Lewis, Edwin T.....	797
Lichtenstein, M. M.....	1081
Lieb, Edwin P.....	1473
Lierly, W. S.....	308
Lightner, Abia T.....	227
Lindberg, M. A.....	1442
Lindgren, Charles J.....	1231
Lindgren, Otto P.....	1302
Little, C. C.....	987
Little, Lindsey B.....	1301
Lock, J. R.....	1333
Long, E. R.....	1282
Long, Samuel C.....	570
Lonstrom, Axel .....	1456
Lopez, Jose J.....	880
Lorentzen, Paul .....	288
Lovejoy, George W.....	1525
Lowell, Alexis F.....	619
Lowell, William H.....	660
Lowell, Wilmot .....	1243
Lueschen, Alvin G., M.D.....	296
Luffkin, Harry R.....	210
Lugo, Jose M.....	1412
Lutz, Emil T.....	1348

M

McCaffrey, James O.....	1400
McCaffrey, John .....	1541
McCall, L. A.....	1370
McCarthy, Jeremiah .....	943
McCarthy, William J.....	1125
McCausland, George W.....	1440
McClimans, John J.....	1449
McClintock, H. H.....	690
McClure, William H.....	1475
McCombs, Albert J.....	1101
McCoy, Charles H.....	895
McCullough, Benjamin F.....	1239
McCullough, Harvey N.....	876
McCutchen, Edmund W.....	267
McCutchen, George W.....	261
McCutchen, James B.....	249
McCutchen, Preston S.....	243
McCutchen, P. J.....	1300
McCutchen, Robert L.....	275
McCutchen, V. D.....	1107
McCutchen, W. C.....	255
McDonald, Dan .....	1332
McDonald, J. C.....	1034
McFarland, James B.....	442
McFarlane, Peter J.....	1501
McGill, R. W.....	1453
McGovern, Thomas H.....	505
McGuire, Robert R.....	1041
McKamy, James .....	671
McKee, Milo G.....	684
McKenzie, M. K., M.D.....	314
McKinnie, Carle T.....	555
McLean, George A.....	888

McMahon, Edward T.....	656
McManus, Terence B.....	372
McMillen, John H.....	549
McMurtry, H. A.....	1452
McNamara, Thaddeus M., M.D.....	546
McNamara, Thaddeus M.....	221
McNew, Hugh L.....	342
Maddux, David W.....	1078
Maddux, William A.....	1089
Maguire, James T.....	1196
Mahon, Hon. Jack W.....	319
Maio, John F.....	1479
Mannel, Frederick E.....	1327
Mansfield, James H.....	1380
Marek, Joseph F.....	1345
Marion, Albert W.....	555
Marley, John C.....	706
Marsh, Fred J.....	910
Marsh, Judson D.....	1209
Marshall, Joseph J.....	433
Martin, David E.....	1029
Martin, Miles R., Jr.....	1206
Martin, Richard J.....	781
Martin, S. H.....	1321
Martinto, Jean P.....	1350
Massa, Harry G.....	1474
Mathews, Sarshel V.....	1429
Matlack, William V.....	238
Mattly, Christian.....	335
Mattly, Peter.....	1365
Mattson, Frank S.....	574
Maurel, August.....	1086
May, Mrs. Amelia H.....	1112
May, Charles A.....	1342
May, George S.....	1264
Mayou, Pierre.....	1501
Maze, Frederick S.....	697
Means, Thomas A.....	371
Menzel, William.....	490
Mercy Hospital.....	895
Metcalf, Thomas A.....	437
Meudell, A. Y.....	533
Mier, Jose.....	1410
Mikesell, Mrs. W. M.....	698
Miles, J. A. C.....	1323
Millard, Edward F.....	1166
Millard, Stephen W.....	1383
Miller, Daniel R.....	1478
Milliff, Frank A.....	1405
Minor, Theodore H.....	413
Molidor, George.....	428
Mon, Vincent.....	1535
Monroe, W. P.....	573
Montgomery, James.....	738
Montgomery, Richard D.....	1480
Moore, Raleigh A.....	802
Mora, Frank J.....	1401
Morgan, Alvin E.....	1258
Morgan, Rev. Edward.....	1436
Morgan, James A.....	1295
Morgan, Wallace M.....	614
Morley, Joseph V.....	1395
Morris, Clark D.....	1205
Morris, John F.....	1387
Morris, Myron W.....	1503
Morris, R. R.....	1555
Morrison, Charles V.....	1419
Mortenson, Capt. Paul.....	1408
Morton, A. S.....	1101
Mosher, Herbert C.....	329

Moss, A. L.....	1535
Moss, H. G.....	849
Moynier, Jean.....	901
Mull, P.....	1350
Mull, Robert J.....	1366
Munzer, Francis G.....	316
Murdock, Harry F.....	624
Myers, Jasper.....	1422

N

Neff, J. R.....	526
Neill, John.....	1381
Neill, Robert.....	502
Nelson, Christian.....	1352
Nelson, David W.....	1240
Newell, Daniel B.....	630
Newsom, Edward F.....	1443
Newton, Frank H.....	1469
Nicolas, Maurice.....	1270
Nicoll, John.....	1524
Niederaur, Jacob.....	251
Nighbert, George T.....	1297
Nixon, Andrew.....	1369
Noel, Fritz C.....	1255
Noriega, Faustino M.....	1286
Norris, Edward G.....	258
Norris, James N.....	296
Norris, Robert T.....	820
Northrop, Earl.....	1055
Nunez, Max.....	1093

O

O'Boyle, Thomas J.....	337
O'Donnell, Mary.....	832
O'Hare, Peter.....	534
O'Meara, P. J.....	1444
Ochs, Oscar R.....	1298
Odeman, Gus.....	1216
Off, Charles F.....	397
Ogden, James A.....	441
Olson, Anthony B.....	293
Orcier, Romulus.....	374
Orr, Frank.....	1465
Osborn, Walter.....	240
Oswald, John S.....	537
Overall, Joseph W.....	1511
Owen, Erwin W.....	1230
Owen, Josiah.....	1234
Owen, Ray.....	1464
Owens, Thomas E.....	1546
Owens, Troy M.....	1484

P

Palmer, Robert.....	1198
Palmer, Walter.....	1038
Parish, George W.....	530
Parker, James H.....	1242
Parsons, Horace G.....	626
Pascoe, M. W., M.D.....	215
Pauly, Leo G.....	379
Payne, J. C.....	701
Payne, Mahlon.....	1406
Peacock, Harrison R.....	479
Peairs, Howard A.....	853
Pearl, M. J.....	1323
Pearson, Mordecai F.....	1537
Peck, William B.....	542
Pemberton, George N.....	815
Pensinger, James H.....	742

Pensinger, William W.....	1120
Perry, William C.....	1348
Pesante, Mrs. Adeline.....	1362
Petersen, Niels P.....	497
Petersen, Peter.....	1176
Petray, Mrs. Pauline D.....	656
Petroleum Club, The.....	1437
Pettus, Martin N.....	1358
Petz, George J.....	1105
Peyton, L.....	1391
Pfost, Joseph F.....	925
Phelan, Harry B.....	1130
Philipp, Jean.....	1549
Philipp, Jean L.....	1378
Pickle, John A.....	1226
Pierce, Charles C.....	1209
Pinnell, Thomas W.....	1296
Pippitt, George H.....	1359
Plaughter, John P.....	1153
Polhemus, A. B.....	1421
Posch, Gustav.....	468
Pourroy, Jean.....	1496
Pourroy, Seraphim.....	486
Powell, Francis M.....	1319
Powell, H. G.....	1392
Powers, Sidney.....	1077
Preble, Mrs. Margaret H.....	1192
Premo, George W.....	1154
Prendville, Rev. J. J.....	1165
Prouty, Herbert V., M.D.....	309

Q

Qualls, Oliver.....	1411
Quincy, Charles H.....	457
Quinn, Harry.....	327
Quinn, Margaret.....	832

R

Ragesdale, J. W.....	838
Raine, Arthur E.....	982
Rambo, Harry C.....	1108
Ramsey, John C.....	591
Randolph, E. W.....	1274
Randolph, E. W.....	1532
Raney, James A.....	1487
Rankin, LeRoy.....	1315
Rankin, Walker.....	1473
Ranous, R. E.....	1498
Ratliff, William T.....	1008
Raymond, Jean B.....	1393
Raymond, John A.....	1303
Real, C. E.....	836
Rechnagel, Charles.....	977
Redlick, Joseph.....	1067
Rees, R. B., M.D.....	525
Rench, Arthur W.....	1129
Rhea, E. S.....	1397
Richard, George J.....	1553
Richart, Joy J.....	1493
Rinaldi, Otto F.....	835
Ripley, John.....	458
Ripple, Jacob N.....	1497
Ritzman, Conrad.....	957
Roberts, Col. E. M.....	201
Roberts, James C.....	310
Roberts, James E.....	1464
Roberts, John E.....	1187
Robinson, Alonzo B.....	741
Robinson, J.....	583
Robinson, Percy L.....	1211

Rodgers, Warren.....	932
Rodoni, A.....	1340
Rogers, Jesse R.....	1144
Rooks, William J.....	1149
Ross, Harvey L.....	1126
Ross, Lyman C.....	1349
Rowlee, Charles W.....	928
Ruby, Mrs. Amanda.....	600
Ruedy, Christian.....	365
Rufener, Jules.....	392
Rupp, Alfred.....	350
Rupp, J. G.....	1191
Russell, J. Kelly.....	951
Russell, William P.....	590

S

Sabichi, George C., M.D.....	1217
Saffell, J. M.....	1259
Said, Bellamy K.....	652
Salis, Peter.....	1133
Sallee, George H.....	1208
Samuelson, John P.....	1098
Sanguinetti, Henry.....	1331
San Joaquin Hospital.....	832
San Joaquin Light & Power Corp.....	1402
Sanzberro, Agustin.....	1180
Sartiat, Pierre.....	651
Savoie, Adlore.....	1492
Schaffnit, Henry R.....	509
Schamblin, Gustavus.....	359
Schiefferle, Charles.....	529
Schneider, E. J.....	1422
Schneider, Karl.....	1004
Schultz, William J.....	613
Schutz, Herman H.....	1015
Scofield, Fred N.....	1298
Scott, Marion J.....	599
Scott, M. P.....	1277
Scott, Robert L.....	608
Scott & Goodman.....	1277
Seager, Carey L.....	257
Sears, Charles H.....	1220
Sears, Charles N.....	284
Sedwell, George W.....	1550
Seibert, Benjamin F.....	1187
Seinturier, Hippolyte.....	373
Sellers, C. H.....	574
Seran, Joseph.....	1004
Seymour, W. S.....	1514
Shackelford, Dick.....	1540
Shackelford, Rowzee F.....	1018
Shaffer, George W.....	1284
Shannon, Phares H.....	1513
Shearer, George W.....	1256
Sheedy, David.....	1397
Sheffler, H. Roy.....	1430
Sherman, Charles H.....	684
Sherwood, Edgar E.....	1509
Sherwood, Fred C.....	1455
Shields, Jeremiah.....	1086
Shively, Delbert A.....	583
Shurban, Charles H.....	1461
Siemon, Alfred.....	1223
Silber, William G.....	1396
Sill, B. H.....	898
Silver, Andrew C.....	378
Simpson, R. N.....	1439
Simpson, Hon. William E.....	1229
Sloan, A. A.....	591
Smartt, Samuel G.....	538

Smetzer, Charles C.	687
Smith, Bedell	393
Smith, Charles D.	1450
Smith, Charles H.	481
Smith, E. C.	1316
Smith, Frederick	1025
Smith, Fred L.	1366
Smith, Henry E.	966
Smith, Mateo	1263
Smith, Mel P.	1022
Smith, Hon. Sylvester C.	299
Smith, Thomas H.	620
Smith, Thomas S.	939
Snider, George L.	1033
Snow, Francis M.	1375
Sola, Jose	1221
Sowash, Charles	846
Spach, Thomas M.	1503
Spears, H. H.	1352
Spencer, James A.	1544
Sproule, George C.	638
Sproule, William A.	1017
Stahl, John G.	943
Stapp, Mary E. M.	1433
Star Soda Works	1339
Stark, Jesse	1295
Stephenson, W. W.	510
Stevens, James M.	910
Stevenson, J. H.	289
Stier, Joseph P.	1341
St. Lawrence Oil Co.	706
Stockton, Isaac D., M.D.	1290
Stockton, Robert L.	287
Stone, James E.	233
Stroble, G. F.	1183
Stutsman, Grant	1414
Suiter, Benjamin F. and Mayme B.	803
Sullivan, Timothy P.	471
Sumner, Hon. Joseph W.	237
Sweitzer, Samuel	1547
Swett, John L.	1373
Swofford, Alfred	1171
Sybrandt, Mrs. Emeretta C.	1247

T

Talbot, William G.	871
Tam, Hon. Joseph H.	245
Taussig, Nathan W.	607
Taylor, Albert M.	936
Taylor, Charles C.	1382
Taylor, Charles L.	1207
Taylor, Charles S.	1457
Taylor, George E.	1424
Taylor, John T.	427
Taylor, Orrin R.	838
Taylor, Walter C.	1555
Taylor, William H. D.	1309
Teague, J. J.	1508
Templeton, Charles, Jr.	824
Templeton & Co.	824
Thomas, Burt	1452
Thomas, Marcus B.	1512
Thomas, William H.	1241
Thomas, W. O.	1468
Thompson, E. J.	1310
Thompson, L. T.	734
Thompson, Ralph H.	1275
Thompson, W. N.	1030
Thomson, David E.	1281
Thorand, Anton	610

Thornber, James H.	710
Thornburgh, George P.	1463
Tibbet, Mrs. Rebecca	1076
Tibbetts, Charles B.	1474
Tibbetts, Frank C.	917
Timmons, William B.	1228
Todd, George H.	349
Tomaier, Charles	1522
Tough, Frederick B.	1294
Tracy, Mrs. Ellen M.	785
Tracy, Ferdinand A.	667
Tracy, William	517
Tracy, Mrs. William	518
True, Henry B.	987
Truesdell, Edward M.	914
Tryon, S. G.	1543
Tschurr, Nicklas	1034
Tuculet, Peter	1362
Tyler, William	786
Tyrer, John	1355

U

Underwood, Vernon L.	717
Underwood, William E.	641
Union Ice Company	472
Upton, John V.	1261
Upton, William	713
Urie, George W.	1458

V

Vaccaro, Joseph	1361
Vandaveer, Mrs. Emma L.	1161
Van Epps, Franklin L.	1470
Van Meter, William E.	1415
Van Norman, Harvey A.	454
Van Orman, Mrs. Harriet	246
Vaughn, Benjamin C.	559
Vaughn, Fred B.	1337
Verdier, Eugene	1304
Vieux, Andre	1067
Villard, Amoise	786
Villard, Pierre	1268
Vrooman, Charles M.	759

W

Wagy, J. I.	827
Waldon, Pinkney J.	1227
Walford, Herbert W.	1272
Wallace, William	1148
Wallen, Frank W.	1196
Waller, George	668
Walser Brothers	906
Walser, Daniel W.	940
Walter, Jacob	782
Walters, E. W.	1172
Walters, Raymond I.	1520
Wangenheim, Albert L.	1351
Wanner, Rev. Joseph	592
Warren, Amos E.	408
Warren, Arthur R.	1521
Wasson, John L.	646
Watkins, Francis M.	1391
Watson, Gordon W.	423
Weaber, Arthur	1238
Weaver, A. M.	1337
Weaver, William H.	404
Weedall, Albert	1358
Weferling, Herman A.	1334
Weichelt, Christian	823

Weichelt, Gaudenz .....	1360
Weichelt, John .....	831
Weit, Edward .....	1375
Weitzel, M. L. ....	1134
Wells, Hyman B. ....	1090
Weringer, Joseph .....	913
West, Henry D. ....	947
West, Rev. James S. ....	714
Whaley, J. H. ....	1038
Whelan, Roger .....	939
Whitaker, Charles .....	1519
Whitaker, E. H. ....	584
Whitaker, George E. ....	1267
Whitaker, William F. ....	1055
White, C. LeRoy .....	1472
White, James M. ....	1481
White, Richard E. ....	1449
White, William G. ....	551
Whittier, Charles G. ....	599
Whyte, J. M. ....	1507
Wible, Simon W. ....	323
Wilhelm, W. S. ....	198
Wilhite, Richard T. ....	603
Wilkes, W. Perry .....	1354
Wilkins, George M. ....	1007
Wilkinson, Nathaniel R. ....	1502
Williams, E. S. ....	1492
Williams, Hibbard S. ....	1221
Williams, John R. ....	1287
Williams, Nicholas J. ....	935

Williams, Percy A. ....	365
Williams, Samuel A. ....	552
Williams, William A. ....	556
Willis, Frank T. ....	955
Willow, E. L. ....	387
Wilson, Mark .....	1394
Wilton, John .....	1514
Winney, E. E. ....	832
Winser, Philip .....	1271
Wirth, Christian A. ....	1490
Wirth, Wilhelm A. ....	1384
Wiseman, Thomas B. ....	793
Withington, Robert W. ....	1294
Women's Improvement Club .....	688
Woodson, Daniel B. ....	1536
Woody, Elmer H. ....	485
Woody, Stonewall A. ....	401
Worley, J. S. ....	1112
Worthington, Frank M. ....	988
Worthington, Lewis C. ....	1248
Wright, Fred .....	445
Wright, Mrs. Walter .....	372
Wynn, Charles H. ....	1530

Y

Yancey, George A. ....	1179
Yancey, Joseph E. ....	729
Yarbrough, Ernest E. ....	824
Young, Thomas M. ....	493

Wallace M. Morgan

HISTORICAL

INTRODUCTION

To read Kern County's history aright, to understand its motive forces, to get in harmony with the spirit of its people and to know why certain otherwise inexplicable events and conditions came to pass, it is necessary to keep in mind several things. First of all, there always has been some big thing doing in Kern County. It is a county of vast size, and its treasures of natural wealth are wonderful in their richness and tremendous in their variety, range and magnitude. Think of 200,000 acres of swamp land, worth from $50 to $100 per acre now and soon to be worth twice these amounts, selling within the memory of men now living for fifty cents to a dollar per acre and to be acquired from an easy-going state for even less than this. Think of the great expanse of desert lands almost as cheap and almost as valuable. Think of great oil wells flowing from ten thousand to twenty thousand barrels of oil per day and leagues on leagues of oil lands to be had for the going and taking. Think of such manifest richness as this and understand what dreams the pioneers indulged in, what cupidity and greed of gain were fostered, what clashes of strong, aggressive, resourceful men the scramble to possess these bounties of nature brought about.

Remember, then, that all these riches, lying about with such apparent abandon, were chained fast and locked tight with locks that golden keys alone could open. A penniless man could squat on a piece of government land, but it would cost several hundred or possibly several thousand dollars even to provide water for irrigating it and otherwise bring it to a point where the homesteader could make a living from it. A man with $30 or $40 could locate an oil claim, but it might cost from $10,000 to $50,000 to get enough oil to prove the land and secure a patent.

Add to these reflections an appreciation of the pioneer's character—the daring, the resource, the gift of prophecy that enables him to see in faith the things that may not be realized for generations to come, the lack of perspective that deceives him into reaching out his hand to grasp these things that are a century beyond his time; the genial hospitality, the never-failing sense of humor, and the buoyant optimism that covers every loss and every defeat with a hope and assurance of better success next time. Understand and remember all these things while I touch, first the high places, the epoch-making events, in the history of Kern county, and then recount the tale with greater circumstance.

The Story in Outline

Long before either the American or the Spanish occupation, the territory now comprised within the borders of Kern county was the home of many Indians of different tribes. They were not of a high order of intelligence, even for savages, and they left few traces save their rude weapons and utensils and their bones, lying in shallow graves or strewn whitening on the plain where some pestilence had descended upon a village and left none with strength or heart to bury the dead.

The early Spaniards established no missions in Kern county, but expeditions sent out by the padres in search of savage souls to save crossed the mountains and carried back with them numbers of the younger braves to the chapels, farms and workshops where they got some inkling of the forms of religion, learned a little of how the white man works, came to know and practice some of the white man's vices, and found out that there were better things to eat than acorns and grass seed pounded in a mortar. So when the white man came, these young Indians, having returned to their tribes, knew how to work for him and how to steal from him and how to kill and eat his cattle.

When the inevitable clash between the whites and the red men came, Lieutenant Beale, placed in charge of Indian affairs in the state by the Washington authorities, gathered the tribes at El Tejon under a patriarchal form of government patterned in part after the methods of the mission fathers and in part after the customs and practices of the United States army.

The first white men who sojourned in the county were hunters, trappers, small stockmen and farmers who lingered beside the old immigrant trail and raised a crop of corn on the rich Kern delta or sought out the fat mountain meadows for their herds. But the fame of what is now Kern county did not spread abroad until the eager, restless swarms of gold hunters had worked their way down the Sierras from the north and found the first shining, yellow lumps that the Kern river placers yielded up. This was in 1851. The great rush to Kern river was in 1853-4. In the latter year Richard Keys discovered the Keys mine, and Keysville became one of the foremost goals of the fortune hunters. In 1860 Lovely Rogers chipped a chunk of ore from the Big Blue ledge and started the stampede that developed the roaring mining camp of Whisky Flat where the pleasant town of Kernville now stands.

Havilah's wealth was uncovered in July, 1864, and within ten or a dozen years thereabout—before and after—Long Tom, Greenhorn, Sageland, Piute, Claraville, Tehachapi, White river, Woody and a score of lesser names became familiar in the lexicon of the gold miners, and every gulch and cañon from White river to Tejon had been searched out by burros and bearded men with picks and pans and packs of beans and bacon. Since those years mining in Kern county has seen its ups and downs, but always it has been going on, and always there has been the lure of possible sudden wealth down to the day when F. M. Mooers woke from a deep and heavy slumber in a desert gulch to see a myriad of tiny yellow eyes winking down at him, (as he lay there drowsily on his back) from the ledge that afterward made him a millionaire and made millionaires, also, of his partners, Burchard and Singleton of the world-famous Yellow Aster. Then came the tungsten mines, the silver mines of Amalie, the copper ledges barely touched, and all the other later mines of the mountains and the desert.

Even before 1857 far-sighted men had seen that the great, enduring wealth of Kern county lay in its magnificent agricultural and horticultural possibilities, and in that year the legislature passed an act providing for the reclamation of all the swamp and overflowed land within the county's present borders and extending north beyond Tulare lake, half a million acres, or so, all told. W. F. Montgomery, Joseph Montgomery, A. J. Downes and F. W. Sampson were given the franchise to reclaim all this land, but their rights were acquired by Col. Thomas Baker, founder of Bakersfield, and Harvey S. Brown. Baker was the active member of the partnership, and inaugurated the reclamation and irrigation enterprises that later engaged the efforts of some of the largest and most powerful corporations in the west and brought on a legal battle over water rights that focused the attention of the entire state.

Floods and droughts combined to help Colonel Baker in his tremendous task of reclamation, and he got patent to 89,120 acres of the choicest land in the state. Later the patent was annulled by the district court, and new patents were issued to others who had bought lands from Baker and passed through the forms, at least, of reclaiming them. Livermore and Chester succeeded Colonel Baker as the dominant factor in the county's development, taking over his projects and enterprises as the fact developed that Baker had not the financial resources with which to carry out his plans. By the same inexorable law of the survival of the financially best fitted, Livermore & Chester gave way to Redington & Livermore, and Redington & Livermore retreated before the superior financial strength of Haggin & Carr.

Then came the battle royal between Haggin & Carr (really Haggin, Tevis & Carr) and Miller & Lux; a contest that involved a supreme court decision on the subject of riparian rights, called two great state conventions of irrigators and water appropriators, occasioned a special session of the legislature, and finally ended in an historic compromise that left the honors even between the two giants and paralyzed for unknown years the efforts to give the state laws that would fix and determine the ownership and control of irrigating waters for all time to come.

Running through the story of the contest over the disposition of the waters of Kern river is the story of the acquisition of the desert lands included in the county, and the acquisition by the same parties of many thousands of acres of railroad and other land, all of which were included in the present magnificent holdings of the Kern County Land Company. The water contests settled, there was launched the great plan of colonization of the Haggin lands, a project the path of which was strewn with wrecked hopes and general failure, not on account of the land, not on account of the water, not on account of the colonists or the colonizers, but because of a thousand incidental errors and difficulties, and most of all because all the necessary ingredients of success, abundantly present, got improperly mixed. With an expensive lesson to reflect on and with complaints and accusations sounding everywhere in their ears, Haggin and his associates retired from the colonization job as far as they could get, and made an immense grain, alfalfa and stock farm out of the principality that some day (together with the other principality that is held in similar fashion by Miller & Lux) will furnish homes for tens of thousands of people and make Kern county an agricultural empire, the superior of which has never flourished.

Then came the development of the great Kern county oil fields. Prospected in a tentative, ineffectual manner since the days of the Civil war, the real exploration and exploitation of the oil fields did not begin until after the country at large had recovered from the financial panic of 1893 and had looked about with new courage and eagerness for new outlets for its returning energy and vigor. Development began in other fields of the state, but soon spread to the west side of Kern county, where the oldest drillings in the San Joaquin valley had been made. Then, in 1899 the Elwoods dug the little shaft that uncovered the great oil measures of the Kern river field, and started the first great oil excitement in the history of the west. The only rival of the rush to the Kern river field in 1899-1900 was the rush to the west side fields in 1910. The development of the Kern river field made Kern county the center of the oil industry of the Pacific coast; the development of the west side fields, spreading now over a territory seventy-five miles in length and containing some of the greatest gushers that the world ever saw, furnishes an ample guarantee that no other section ever will wrest the honor from her.

These are the high points, the landmarks in the history of Kern county.

Woven all through the story are the incidents of county and community life, the development of towns, of society and of homes, the building up of enterprises, the making of individual fortunes—the things that are common to all histories. But in the large the history of Kern county so far has been the story of the staking out of the land, the marking of nature's treasure houses for future exploration. In no sense and in no particular is the county developed. The rough plans have been drawn, prospect holes have been sunk, the oil measures have been tapped here and there, experiments of a thousand kinds have been made, but so far as development and use are concerned, as these terms are understood in older countries, Kern county is a virgin field. Perhaps there will be less romance in the county's history in the future, but there will be more profit and less labor and hardship for the men who take up the work at the present point and carry this fair empire forward to the glorious future that awaits it.

---

CHAPTER I

A Description of Kern County

One of the several differences between history and romance is that whereas romance may be the more entertaining by reason of a pleasurable suspense and anxiety concerning the final fate of the hero, history is best read with a full knowledge of the ultimate issue of the events recorded. Believing that all the pages that come hereafter will thereby be fuller of meaning and that all the incidents in the narrative they contain will range themselves in a truer perspective, I am giving in this initial chapter of the history of Kern county as clear and comprehensive a picture as I may of what the county is today and of what the people of the county are looking forward to in the development of the next few years.

A map of the county shows at a glance its general geographical form and character, an area of 5,184,000 acres, in form a rectangular parallelogram with the southwest corner hacked off by a jagged line which conforms roughly to the crest of the Coast range mountains that separate Kern from its neighbor, San Luis Obispo, on the west. The north line of the county, one hundred and thirty-six miles in length, stretches due east and west nearly half the distance across the state and forms the southern boundaries of Kings and Tulare counties and a little more than twenty miles of the southern boundary of Inyo county. This same line projected to the east constitutes the boundary between Inyo and San Bernardino counties, and to the west constitutes the boundary between San Luis Obispo and Monterey. It is practically identical with the sixth standard parallel line south, and moreover it forms the only straight line of political subdivision across the map of California. For the latter reason this line marks the place where the advocates of separate statehood for Southern California would draw the knife were they given permission to carve the Golden State in twain—an event of which the small prospects of realization are not likely to be increased by the sentiment of the present population of Kern county.

The south line of Kern county, lying sixty-six miles south of and parallel to the north line, is one hundred and two miles in length, and forms the northern boundaries of Ventura and Los Angeles counties. The county's east line cuts north and south through dry salt lakes, dead, forgotten ranges of hills, and great wastes of level, barren sands, slicing off from San Bernardino county for the benefit of Kern a great triangle from the western edge of the Mojave desert with its lonesome wildernesses, its bewildering mirages, its mocking, brackish waters, its great beds of coarser chemicals, and its recklessly strewn treasures of gold and tungsten. The base and altitude of this triangle, which fits into the southeastern corner of the county, are approximately sixty miles each. Its hypotenuse is roughly marked by the eastern slopes of the Sierras, where the great range near its southern end curves westward toward the sea. In the history of Kern county this desert triangle was the last and least to be appreciated, therefore we get its description first out of the way.

CATTLE IN A KERN COUNTY ALFALFA PASTURE

A View of the Kern Valley

For our view of the valley portion of the county—the place where the oil fields and alfalfa pastures are and where the orchards and vineyards and groves of oranges and olives are coming to be—let us take ourselves to one of the round-topped treeless, grass-carpeted mountains that form the eastern sentinels of the Coast range. From such a point—near the middle of the western line of the county—spreading out before us we would see a great sweep of valley, open at the north but closed in by the Coast range on the west, by the Sierras on the east and on the south by a cross range that meets and joins the two great ranges and forms a mighty horse shoe of mountains that walls in the intervening plains and mesas and protects them from winds and storms and gives them the warm and equable climate that the vegetable kingdom loves.

From the point where the west side mesa begins to slope down to the floor of the valley to the point where the east side mesa melts into the foothills of the Sierras, the distance is close to fifty miles, and from the upper edge of the mesa that lies along the northern side of the cross range northwest through the center of the valley to the north county line it is approximately sixty miles. From the great area thus enclosed, an area every foot of which will one day be watered and tilled, or made productive through the extraction therefrom of oil or other valuable minerals, a new state like Delaware could be carved out, and of the scraps left over a new Rhode Island might be pieced together.

In reality the haze of dust and distance covers all this land as one might see it on a summer day from the summit of the Coast range hills, and even in the clearer air of winter little of the prospect could be seen except the nearby mesas, a great sea of light hiding the valley beyond, and far away, floating in the thinner strata of the upper air, the rugged, snow-capped peaks of the high Sierras rising, as Mrs. Mary Austin says, "like the very front and battlements of heaven."

But let us suppose the dust and haze are swept away and our eyes can search out the objects in the valley. Then something like this great panorama of industry and natural wealth would be laid before our view.

The West Side Oil Fields

Down below us in the foreground is the great sweep of the west side oil fields, beginning near the San Emidio ranch in the southwestern corner of the county and following northwest with the trend of the hills through Sunset. Midway, McKittrick, Temblor, the great, problematic reaches of the Lost Hills and Devils Den districts to the northwestern corner of the county and on thence to Coalinga. The whole distance prospected with more or less profit or promise is not far from seventy miles within the county. Wildcat drilling, as yet without result, extends eastward of San Emidio fifteen miles farther. In width the proven or prospected strip varies from two to fifteen miles.

Only the merest fraction of this vast territory is as yet commercially productive—a thin line, a mile and a half to three miles in width drawn diagonally across five congressional townships represents it. Yet out of this small fraction of the county's west side oil territory were taken in the year 1910 not less than 24,680,000 barrels of oil, equal in fuel value to between eight and nine million tons of good coal. Two branch railroads and four pipe lines connecting with tide water have been built to furnish an outlet for this oil, and a great electric transmission line has been completed to furnish current for light and other purposes for which it may be needed in the fields. Three towns, large enough and permanent enough to aspire to incorporations—Maricopa, Taft and McKittrick—are the fruits of the local business activity of these oil fields, and three or four other towns are in process of building with varying reasons to hope for the future.

The Buena Vista Gas Belt

Just beyond the line of the producing oil fields lies the great gas belt of the Buena Vista hills, where wells estimated to produce from ten to fifty million cubic feet per twenty-four hours have been brought in within the past two years. Already this gas is piped to Bakersfield and to the different parts of the west side oil fields for cooking and lighting and for use in furnaces, and a great trunk line is now carrying it over the mountains to Los Angeles and other Southern California towns. In addition to this use an extensive plant recently has been installed for extracting gasoline from the natural gas by means of compression and cooling after a process similar in many respects to the making of liquid air.

If we search the fields from our hypothetical point of vantage we may see, perhaps, anywhere from one to half a dozen great oil wells spouting their inky fountains of oil and gas from two hundred to four hundred feet in the air. Great pillars of smoke rise from where waste oil and refuse are burned from the sump holes, and if it were night and the chance served we might see the towering torch of some burning gasser lighting the sands and sage brush on the surrounding dunes.

Recent Activity in the Oil Fields

The past few years have witnessed a tremendous activity on the west side. The older fields of Sunset and McKittrick have been widened and extended, the greatest oil gusher in the history of the industry being brought in in the former field, and Midway, lying between Sunset and McKittrick, sprang from the least to one of the largest of the oil fields of the valley. The Buena Vista gas fields were first tapped in 1909. At the present time prospectors are drilling with tireless energy in the northward extension of the McKittrick field, and all over the Lost Hills district that extends from McKittrick to the north county line, wild-catters are hopefully working, and occasionally a productive well of light gravity oil is brought in at the marvelously shallow depth of 500 to 1000 feet.

In Devils Den, close to the hills in the northwestern corner of the county, a few drills are dropping, and strung along the foothills from Devils Den southeast to Temblor are a few prospectors' derricks, miles apart and accomplishing little as yet save to demonstrate the faith of their owners that the oil measures lie beneath in an unbroken belt.

For the rest the foreground is filled with low, rolling hills and gently sloping mesas, covered in spring with short grass and bright wild flowers, but dry and brown throughout the summer and fall, with only the wandering dust pillars of the whirlwinds, the heat shimmer, the straggling growth of dwarf sage brush, the lonesome derrick of the wildcatter and the lonesomer cabin of the lease herder to vary their desolate monotony.

Reclaimed Swamp Land

These rolling hills and sloping mesas (all of which may some day be oil- or gas-bearing) fill a strip of country at the base of the Coast range from ten to twenty miles in width. Then comes the western edge of the county's agricultural land, its limit clearly defined by the line of the ancient swamp that filled the trough of the valley with a width of two to a dozen miles before the waters of Kern river that fed it were diverted into a great irrigation system, that waters 250,000 acres of land.

Just to the east of the Midway oil fields is Buena Vista lake reservoir, a body of water covering thirty-six square miles, formerly a natural depression in the swamp and now enlarged by means of levees on the east and north for the purpose of storing the waters of the river for irrigating the reclaimed swamp lands to the north. From this lake extending northwest along the western edge of the former swamp is a canal, one hundred and fifty feet in width, built for the combined purpose of distributing irrigation water and carrying away any excess of water that may come down the river in time of flood. This great ditch, known as the Kern Valley Water Company's canal, runs through lands now belonging to Miller & Lux, and that corporation is now extending it northward, by means of the largest steam dredger ever brought to the interior of the state, with the ultimate purpose of completing an artificial water way from Buena Vista to Tulare lake. The canal will be of a size to serve as a means of transportation, but whether it is used for such a purpose remains to be determined by the demand, the disposition of the owners and the availability of the water at all times to fill it.

Lying along this canal to the east, in the bed of the ancient swamp, fed by the deep, black tule lands, are the fat alfalfa pastures of Miller & Lux, the first expanse of perennial green that greets the eye as we look eastward from our perch on the Coast range mountain. The Miller & Lux alfalfa and grain fields reach to the northward from Buena Vista lake for something more than twenty-five miles. Beyond that the old swamp, dry except in unusually wet years, extends to the northern limit of the county untilled and unpeopled.

Irrigation Canals Radiate From Bakersfield

Twenty miles northeast of Buena Vista lake is Bakersfield, at the eastern edge of a great, nearly level plain that extends from the old swamp to the point where the land begins to rise again in an upward slope to meet the foothills of the Sierras. Just northeast of Bakersfield Kern river leaves a deep furrow of a mile and a half in width which it has plowed for itself through the hills and mesas to the eastward, and enters the flat, alluvial lands of the valley. From Bakersfield the channel of the river runs in an approximately direct line to Buena Vista lake, but the river waters are taken out in a series of canals, heading above and below Bakersfield and spreading fanwise to the northwest, west, south and southeast.

This system of ditches covers roughly a territory twenty miles wide and forty miles long, beginning at the southern end of the valley where the mesas slope up to Tejon and San Emidio, and extending northwest within twelve or fifteen miles of the north county line. Only the circumstance that the water is all used on nearer lands prevents the irrigation system reaching the northern boundary of the county, but the shortcoming of the canal system is supplemented by the presence of an artesian belt in the north part of the county, bordering on the eastern edge of the swamp, where flowing wells are obtained at a depth of 500 to 1000 feet, and by the existence of abundant water strata at depths varying from twelve to forty feet in depth from which water may be pumped for irrigation.

These facilities for irrigation make of the middle distance of this vast panorama spread out before us, a belt of country twenty miles in width (exclusive of the swamp land heretofore described) and fifty-five miles or so in length, every foot of which can be irrigated, either from canals, from artesian wells or from shallow pumping wells. Close to Bakersfield this land is tilled to fruit, alfalfa and dairy pastures. Farther south and northwest it is utilized for great grain fields or pastures for beef cattle. All of it is suitable for similar purposes.

Beyond this belt of cheaply irrigated land lies the great mesa that skirts the western foothills of the Sierras. In width and length it is only a little less than the great belt of land just described, and along its lower edge the cost of pump irrigation is but a little greater than on the lower valley lands. This mesa forms the county's citrus belt—as yet, for the main part, potential. But while the county's orange and lemon production is yet in the future, so far as any great commercial results are concerned, the capacity of the soil, the abundance of the water and the perfect adaptability of the climate have been demonstrated past all doubt. Oranges grown on the San Emidio ranch, already referred to in the description of the west side oil fields, have made a name and fame for themselves in the most critical markets of the state. At Tejon, in the hills some twenty miles east of San Emidio, oranges of equal size and flavor are grown, and scattered all along the mesa north-westward to the north county line are smaller groves that prove the whole of the great thermal belt.

Beginning of Orange Culture

At the present time near Edison, eight miles east of Bakersfield, the Edison Land & Water Company is beginning the cultivation of orange groves on a considerable scale, and is making all its improvements in the thorough-going fashion that promises the fullest success. Smaller ventures in citrus culture have been launched in the wide stretch of mesa land that reaches south from Edison and other centers of development have been established at Delano, McFarland and Jasmine, in the northern part of the county. The development around the latter places is really the southern extension of the orange districts of Tulare county. The great success of citrus culture around Porterville has tempted the planting of similar lands farther and farther to the south, and the result is expected to be the gradual closing of the gaps between Ducor and Jasmine and Edison and between Edison and Tejon.

Under all this mesa land water for pump irrigation is found at depths that vary almost directly as the height of the surface above sea level. Along the lower parts of the thermal belt water may be found at a depth of forty feet or less, while near the hills the depth may run above two hundred feet. There is an immense body of land, however, on which water is to be had in abundant quantities with a lift of less than one hundred feet.

In addition to the possibilities of the mesa lands for the growing of oranges and lemons, they are famous for their early fruits of the deciduous kinds and for vegetables. The mesa soil for the most part is an admixture of sand, gravel and clay that is easily tilled, very fertile and sufficiently porous to insure the best results from irrigation. In places the thermal belt is almost frostless, and tomato plants live the year round. This means that it is possible to have strawberries and a great range of vegetables at Christmas time, and grapes, apricots, melons and other delicacies that capture the high prices of the early markets may be supplied in great quantity and perfect quality.

Cheap Power Available

For the further development of the mesa lands great things are expected because of the abundance of cheap fuel for the generation of power. In addition to the power that may be developed from steam plants run by crude oil or from gas and gasoline used direct in engines, the San Joaquin Light & Power Company, which has recently entered the field with electric power and which has now completed a transmission line circling the valley portion of the county, announces that it will encourage the use of electricity in pumping water by extending its service lines where there is any hope for a market. The Lerdo Land & Water Company, which is a kindred corporation to the San Joaquin Light & Power Company, is preparing to lead the way in the use of water pumped by electricity by sinking wells and installing pumps on a tract of several thousand acres which it has purchased recently and which lies along the Southern Pacific railroad beginning about seven miles northwest of Bakersfield.

At Wasco is established another center of pumping plant irrigation, and the practicability of raising deciduous fruits and raisins by this means is being fully demonstrated. At Rio Bravo, south and west of Wasco and nearly due west of Bakersfield, farmers are proving that it pays to pump water on the lower land for alfalfa and grain. At Semitropic, due west of Wasco and thirty-five miles northwest of Bakersfield, a combination of pumping plants and artesian wells is solving the problem of irrigation for general farming and dairying. Just at the eastern edge of the swamp land in what is known as the Goose Lake slough country is a thriving settlement that depends wholly on artesian wells to mature its crops.

Beside the ventures in orange culture around Delano, Jasmine and McFarland, many pumping plants have been installed in the northern part of the county for the growing of deciduous trees and vines, and for growing alfalfa for dairy cows. North of Delano, along the county line, pump irrigators have been especially active. At McFarland within the past three years a rose nursery of one hundred and sixty acres has been established for the growing of rose bushes for the New York market.

Along the foothills and out on the mesa as far as Delano dry wheat farming has been the main industry from the time of the settlement of the country until the present time, but it is considered now but a matter of a few years before the pumping plant will make the land too valuable to be longer farmed to grain.

Great Land Holdings

As for the great area of country under the irrigation system already referred to, the bulk of it is held by the Kern County Land Company, a corporation that figures largely in the story of the county. Scattered among the company's holdings are many small farms, where all kinds of fruits, alfalfa, corn, vegetables and the usual agricultural crops are raised and where dairying is carried on with handsome profit. The Land Company's great fields are devoted to wheat and barley or are fenced into huge alfalfa pastures for the fattening of beef cattle raised in the mountains or shipped in from other parts of California or from other states. Whole townships of the finest garden soil are farmed in immense wheat fields or form rough pastures for Arizona steers. The almost equal Miller & Lux holdings, equally desirable, are farmed in about the same manner.

If we were sitting on the top of the Coast range in reality instead of metaphorically we could see that the county's agricultural possibilities have not yet approached the stage of realization. But a thorough knowledge of the facts and the possibilities is necessary to gain any conception of how far short of realization the present falls. There is no finer body of land in the state than this great valley, and there are few so well watered. With the breaking up of the large holdings of land and the coming of small farmers in numbers adequate to till the soil in thorough fashion, Kern county will become one of the chief sources of food supply in the west. At the present time agriculture is so far overshadowed by the oil industry that a greater number of farm products are shipped into the county than are shipped out.

The Kern River Oil Field

Before we leave the valley for a brief survey of the mountains we must take note of the Kern river oil field, averaging throughout its history the greatest single producing field of the state, although Coalinga, Midway and Sunset have each, at different times forged past it. Thirty miles from the nearest of the other oil fields, on the other side of the valley and with no apparent connection with the west side oil measures, Kern river holds a place alone and needs a wholly separate description. The field lies across Kern river to the north of Bakersfield, sloping from the water's edge up to the top of the mesa. It covers approximately eleven sections of land, under all of which the drill has found a great pool of oil. First drilled in 1899 and pumped ever since to the limit of the market demand, in 1910 the field produced 13,700,000 barrels of oil, and a large part of the proven territory is yet untouched.

It was the Kern river field that gave the county its first oil boom, and made the people of the county forget for the time their long demand for agricultural expansion. The field has been the best dividend-payer in the state, despite the fact that none of the spectacular gushers which have given fame to the Midway and Sunset fields have had a parallel in Kern river. The drilling has been easy and certain, the percentage of loss has been small, and even the limits of the field were established so early that little money has been spent in fruitless prospecting about its borders. That the field may not be extended in the future is not assumed. In fact, recent drilling to the north and northwest has met encouraging indications, and many people believe that some day oil derricks will be scattered along the east side mesas as they now are scattered along the Coast range. Prospect holes are now being drilled due south of the Kern river field about twenty-four miles, and due north of the field almost an equal distance. Both these new prospective districts are near the Sierra foothills, but the results of their exploration must remain for a later writing.

The Mountain Sections

The description of the mountains is quickly written, although one might live there many years and wonder at the freshness of their charm and interest. It is because of the impossible task of a full description that little can be said. The Sierras fill in between the desert and the valley a great barrier, thirty to fifty miles in width, built out of lofty peaks, rugged, pine-clad ridges and shoulders of earth, timbered slopes, fertile valleys, streams that tumble down rocky cascades and flow gently along level reaches, great ledges that carry treasures of gold, silver, copper, and lesser minerals of many sorts.

Suppose we desert our Coast range mountain top for an airship, preferably a dirigible, and sail slowly over the tops of the Sierras from the north county line southward. On the western slope of the range in the northern tier of townships is Woody, named for one of the county pioneers and not for the big oak trees that cover the hills and fill the little valleys. A little farther east and a little higher up is Glennville, in the fertile Linn's valley, named for William Lynn, but spelled with an "i" in later years. Cedar creek and a number of other little streams water the country hereabout and while stock-raising is the chief industry all down the western slope of the range, not a little general farming and some fruit raising is carried on in the little valleys and fertile meadows about Glennville. To the south of Glennville are Granite station and Poso Flat, both small centers of stock-raising.

Over the Greenhorn mountains from Glennville and Linn's valley is Kern river flowing at times through narrow cañons, and elsewhere through wider valleys where the stream is bordered by fertile bottom lands. It was along Kern river, at Keysville, about eleven miles south of the north county line, that the first important mining camp in the county was established. Keysville was about three miles below the junction of the north and south forks of Kern river. Whiskey Flat (now Kernville) is about the same distance above the junction, on the north or main branch.

Above the junction the South Fork flows through the South Fork valley, a fertile strip of bottom land that forms the most important of the mountain farming districts. All this valley, about twenty miles in length, is irrigated and farmed to alfalfa. Weldon and Onyx on the South Fork, Isabella at the junction, Palmer and Vaughn a little to the south from Isabella, form the centers of the sparse population of the northern mountain section. Havilah, lying in a little valley, hardly more than a gulch, a little farther still, was once the metropolis and county seat of Kern, but its glory and greatness long since have faded.

The mountains over which we have sailed so far are rugged and beautiful, stretching away in purple vistas, clad on their summits with pines and cedars and on their lower slopes with oaks, madrones and chaparral. To the south of Havilah, forming the water-shed between Kern river on the north and Caliente creek on the south, is Mount Breckenridge, a handsome, broad-topped mountain, rich in lumber pine that in earlier days was sawed and hauled to Bakersfield. The mill is still there but it has not been operated for some years.

At the southern foot of Mount Breckenridge is Walker's basin, another of the cradles of Kern county's early civilized life, and farther on is Piute mountain, the scene of some of the earlier placer mining; Amalie and Paris on Caliente creek, centers of a later and more permanent mining development; Tehachapi creek, up which the Southern Pacific winds its difficult and tortuous passage; Bear mountain, rising to the west some seven thousand feet, one of the most conspicuous of the landmarks to be seen from the valley about Bakersfield; the pleasant and fertile mountain valleys that bear the names of Bear, Brites, Cummings and Tehachapi; then the saddle at the crest, the crow's nest, in which the town of Tehachapi sits.

On the western slope of Bear mountain is the Rancho El Tejon, one of the early Spanish grants, woven closely with the history of the Indians in this part of the state, and forming now, with the Alamos, Castac and La Liebre grants a magnificent mountain and valley stock range—the third large land holding in the county—soon, it is hoped, to be subdivided for more intensive use.

Beyond Tehachapi and the Tejon ranch is a great procession of broken, tumbled and unappreciated hills which lead the traveler at last to the wonderful southland where even a sand dune with a cactus growing on it is a paradise of health and beauty and greatly to be desired at so much per square foot.

The Desert Triangle Again

Before we bring our airship down let us sail again over the great triangle of desert with which this description of the county began. Skirting the base of the hills at its western edge is the Los Angeles aqueduct, a great tube of concrete through which the people of the southern city hope to lead the waters of Owens river to fill their faucets, sprinkle their lawns and irrigate some thousands of acres of garden land in what are now the suburbs, but which undoubtedly the city will soon annex. The Southern Pacific, the Santa Fe and the Nevada and California railroads all cross this triangle of desert in different directions, all meeting at Mojave, which is both a mining and a railroad town. To the northeast are Randsburg, Garlock, Goler and Johannesburg, all of which figure in the history of the desert mines, and still farther north, Indian Wells and Salt Wells valley, where venturesome prospectors would find still another oil field, and Inyokern, a new settlement of farmers in the northeast corner of the county.

Bakersfield, the Commercial Center

The center of all Kern county's commercial activity and the point around which the greater part of the county's history revolves, is Bakersfield. Located where Kern river enters its delta; the spot whence the irrigating canals diverge; the place where the railroads add the helper engines for the heavy haul up the mountain; the place whence the branch railroads lead to the west side oil fields; at the door of the great Kern river field, where the citrus mesa meets the lower valley land, Bakersfield is in close and constant touch with all the greater resources and activities of the county. Even the roads from the mountain mines converge here. Only the mines of the desert are far removed by distance and association, from the county seat.

The federal census of 1910 gave Bakersfield a population of 12,727, as against 4836 ten years before. The county census for 1910 was 37,715, and for 1900, 16,480. The great gain was mainly due to the development of the oil fields, although a slow but steady gain in the valley farming sections was evident, and this gain also assisted the growth of Bakersfield. The five banks of Bakersfield on December 31, 1910, showed a total of deposits amounting to $5,679,000, a gain of more than two million dollars in the twenty months just previous to that date. The postal receipts for the city in 1910 were over sixty thousand dollars. Close to a million and a half dollars was spent in building in Bakersfield in 1910, and the cost of the new residences constructed in that period ranged up to seventeen thousand dollars each. The assessed valuation of Kern county in 1910 was over fifty-three million, making a per capita wealth according to the very low estimates of the assessor of $1350 for every man, woman and child within the county's borders.

BASKETS MADE BY KERN COUNTY INDIANS

These figures give some fair idea of the prosperity and financial stability of the city and county at the present time. The prospects for the future were never brighter.

---

CHAPTER II

Indians and the Tejon Ranch

On the top of Black mountain, northwest of Garlock, among the ranges of dead, forgotten hills that stand sentinel over the dead and forgotten wastes of desert in the far eastern part of the county, were found in the '80s the remains of a prehistoric village which may have been occupied many centuries ago by the same race of men that built the extinct and buried cities of Arizona and Mexico.

In a hollow between two ridges of the mountain are the ruins of two parallel walls, two hundred-feet in length, with shorter walls extending from them at right angles. From the size and form of the building to which the walls seem to have belonged it is doubtless permissible to assume that it may have been a temple, a fort or some other public building. Down a little way on the northern slope of the mountain stand the ruins of what appears to have been a dwelling. What is left of the walls, standing two or three feet in height, form almost a perfect circle. On the east was a door, and carved on the inside of the walls are hieroglyphics identical with those found on the famous Poston butte near Florence, Arizona. The rocks, also, are very similar to those of the Poston carvings. One of the characters is described as not unlike the astronomical sign for the planet Mars. The evident size of the work and the character of the carving indicate that the ruins are not those of a building erected by any of the more recent Indian tribes, and the decay and discoloration of the rock show that the carving was done centuries ago.

A circumstance that gives these ruins still greater interest to the visitor is the old, dead aspect of all the country around. The dead, barren hills, the gray reaches of desert, the dry wind, the solemn, cloudless sky, the blazing, unobscured sun, the ineffable silence brooding everywhere, all remind one, the travellers say, of the Holy Land, and of the old cradles of dead races in Asia and Egypt.

There is not a little in Kern county for the archeologist to unearth, but even of our immediate predecessors, the Indians who possessed the land before the white men came, we know comparatively little. There is reason to suppose that at somewhat earlier dates California was peopled by a more heroic race of redmen than was found here when the first gold seekers began to explore the Sierras for placer mines. The descriptions of the Indians left by the first historians disagree widely as to the size, appearance and general character of the tribes that inhabited the state and there seems to be an equal discrepancy in the measurements of the bones exhumed from the Indian burying places. When Kit Carson first visited California in 1829 he found the valleys swarming with large and prosperous tribes. About that date it was roughly estimated that the number of Indians in the state was upward of 100,000. In 1859 Carson again visited the valley and found that the tribes he had known on his former tour had wholly disappeared and that the people living here at that time had never heard of them. In 1863 the Department of the Interior counted 29,300 Indians in the state.

Between Goose lake in Kern county and Tulare lake was found, years ago, the remains of an old Indian village with the ground about it strewn with skulls and bleaching bones as though some pestilence had descended upon the tribe and mowed it down so swiftly and relentlessly that none were left with strength to bury the dead. Early records tell also of epidemics of smallpox and other diseases that decimated the Indian tribes.

In his researches into the history and habits of the Indians, E. L. McLeod, who gathered one of the finest collections of Indian baskets in the state, fell upon an interesting clue to the origin of the Kern county tribes who were known quite generally by the name Yokut. Spending a day in Hanford, Mr. McLeod saw a number of Indians squatting along the curb of one of the streets, and as was his custom when the opportunity served, he went to talk with them. Presently down the street came a runaway team, and thereafter the usual crowd of people gathered.

"Yokut! Yokut!" exclaimed one of the Indian women, pointing toward the sudden assemblage.

Mr. McLeod scented the clue and at once inquired what the women meant by the exclamation.

"They come everywhere," was the explanation forthcoming, and combining this new knowledge with what he had formerly known of the Yokut Indians, Mr. McLeod reached the conclusion that the name did not indicate an homogenous tribe but that the Yokuts came from everywhere.

The average Indian found here by the earliest settlers was not a particularly noble specimen of manhood. He reared no temples and built no monuments. For a dwelling he hollowed out a little circle in the earth, raised above it a cone-shaped framework of poles or brush and thatched it with bark, grass or rushes. As late as 1874 many of the old men wore no clothes save a breech clout, summer or winter. In cold weather they huddled in their huts, scurrying out into the wet or snow, stark naked, when need required, to gather a little wood for the fire that smouldered in the center of their dingy, smoky homes. Meat formed but a very small part of the diet of the Kern county Indians of the earlier times. Those who lived by the valley lakes caught clams, and squirrels and smaller game fell victims to their arrows. But the main staples of their larder were acorns, juniper berries, piñons, the few wild fruits and nuts, the edible roots and seeds of wild grasses that grew along the foothills before the foxtail usurped their place.

Through the mountains everywhere are found in broad, flat rocks the clusters of hollowed holes where the village women gathered to pound the acorns and grass seeds into the dough from which they baked their bread.

In the valleys are found the portable stone mortars and pestles, which the squaws had to carry about with them because no native stones were to be found by the valley villages. These mortars and pestles, sinkers which were cleverly fashioned from granite for the fishermen, the spear and arrow heads which were chipped out by touching the heated stones with a piece of wet wood, and the handsome and artistically woven baskets which served a multitude of purposes, are practically the only specimens of the handicraft of the Indians that remain.

Anthropologists, particularly Dr. C. Hart Merriam of Washington, D. C., have been fairly successful in gathering information concerning the customs, religion and language of the Indians of this part of the state, and Prof. George H. Taylor, now of Fresno, but for many years a resident of Bakersfield, after months of effort got one of the remaining tribal singers to sing into a phonograph one of the more elaborate ceremonials of her race. Into the very striking music of the ceremonial is woven all the pathos, all the mystery, all the fear and all the struggling hopefulness that this childlike people gained from the great Mother Nature of whom they understood so little and with whom they lived in such daily, intimate contact. The music of the ceremonial has not yet been transcribed. It will be a pity, indeed, if it is not reduced to some enduring form, for it is one of the few legacies of a fast-dying people that later races may profitably preserve.

In some of the Indian mounds in the valley between Buena Vista and Tulare lakes the bodies of the dead seem to have been buried in a sitting posture, but inquiry does not develop that this was always the case. Many of the burying grounds in the lower lands have been disturbed by floods, however, and the bones and whatever articles may have been buried with the bodies have been scattered and recovered with deeper or shallower washings of mud and sand. Some of the remains in the valley mounds had been wrapped in blankets or cloth of some coarse texture, and quite recently J. W. Stockton dug up and forwarded to the Smithsonian Institution the bones of an Indian that had been buried in a sitting posture in the bank of Kern river not far from the Kern river oil field. This body had been covered with reeds in the form of a coarse basket.

Tribal Names and Characteristics

From C. Hart Merriam's "Distribution of Indian Tribes in the Southern Sierra and Adjacent Parts of the San Joaquin Valley, California," the following is condensed:

"South of the Muwa, and ranging from Fresno creek to Kern lake and Tehachapi basin, are tribes of two widely different linguistic families—the Yokut and Paiute. These tribes are arranged, in the main, in parallel belts, the Yokuts occupying the lower and more westerly country, the Paiutes the higher and more easterly. But there is this important difference: The Yokut tribes are more numerous, and until the confiscation of their lands by the whites their distribution was continuous, while the Paiute tribes are few and their distribution is, and always was, interrupted by broad intervals. Powers recognized the general facts that the Indians of this part of California belonged in the main to the Yokut and Paiute stocks; that the Yokut tribes were a peaceful people and were the earlier occupants of the region; and that the Paiute tribes were more powerful and warlike and entered at a later period. He states that bands of Paiutes, leaving their desert homes east of the mountains, had pushed through the passes of the Sierras, invaded certain valleys of the western slope, and driven out the Yokut people.

"Tribes of other linguistic families inhabited the hot Tulare-Kern basin and the region to the west and southwest, but they do not come within the scope of the present paper. In the area south of Fresno creek I have obtained vocabularies of eighteen tribes, of which nine are of Yokut origin and nine of supposed Paiute or Shoshonian origin."

Of the nine Yokut tribes which Dr. Merriam enumerates, the Taches lived around Tulare lake in the lower Sonoran zone, and the Yowelmannes inhabited the Bakersfield plain and thence to Kern lake. But a few of either tribe remain. Of the Paiute tribes the Pakanepul are found on the South Fork of Kern river, and the Newooah center about Paiute mountain. Dr. Merriam states that the languages of the two tribes last mentioned differ so greatly from each other and from the supposed common Paiute stock as represented by the Owens Valley Paiutes that if they really are of Paiute origin they must have crossed the mountains at a very remote date. The chief and almost only resemblance in the languages is in the numerals, and Dr. Merriam says that this may have arisen through contact rather than through common heredity.

The word Yokut, Dr. Merriam says, means "the people," as also does the tribal name Newooah, and a number of other family and tribal names by which the Indians referred to themselves.

The Paiute tribes inhabited the cooler Ponderosa pine belt of the mountains, while the Yokuts lived in the hot San Joaquin valley and rarely pushed their way so high as the Digger pine belt.

Civilizing the Indian

While no Spanish missions were established in the territory now comprised in Kern county, the Indians found here had been to some extent influenced by the civilization of the padres through the fact that many of the young braves from the different tribes were taken to the missions and kept there under the teaching of the fathers for longer or shorter periods, and also because tribes that had been driven from the older parts of the state by the encroachments of the whites migrated to this end of the San Joaquin valley or to the mountains round about.

There were no Indian wars worthy the name in the history of the state, but in 1850 the Indians from White river to Kern lake made an apparently concerted attack on the white miners and settlers, and the fear of danger more than the actual harm the Indians inflicted prompted the President in 1850 to appoint a peace commission consisting of Redick McKee, G. W. Barbour and O. M. Wozencraft, Indian agents, to make peace with the tribes. These emissaries decided that the Indians had been forced to steal from the white men and had been justly angered into attacking them by having been driven from their ancient hunting and fishing grounds to the less hospitable mountains and desert plains. The peace commission recommended that the Indians be made allowances of food and given reservations on the plains. On June 10, 1851, it is recorded, treaties were made with eleven tribes around Kern lake.

But after the apparent habit of Indian agencies, jealousies interfered with the smooth working of the plans of the peace commission, and the three commissioners soon divided the territory into three jurisdictions, Barbour taking charge of the San Joaquin valley. About the same time charges of graft and mismanagement reached Washington, and in the spring of 1852 Lieut. E. F. Beale was made superintendent of Indian affairs in California.

ST. FRANCIS' CHURCH, BAKERSFIELD

Beale had very well formed ideas concerning Indian management and he proceeded to put them into effect, concentrating his main energies at Tejon. In brief his scheme was a mixture and adaptation of the methods of the army and the missions. He adopted the plan of communal farming, provided instruction under the supervision of resident agents, and established forts with garrisons of soldiers both to protect the Indians and to keep them within bounds and under proper discipline. The plan was working admirably, but the government authorities thought that the expenditures were out of proportion to the number of the wards of the nation provided for, and Beale was replaced by Col. T. J. Henley.

Henley established three other reservations at once, and later increased that number, the reservation on Tule river being one. In addition many farms and branch reservations were equipped. Soldiers from the forts and visitors to the reservations carried word to Washington that too much graft was going on under cover of aid to the California Indians, and G. Bailey was sent to make an investigation. Further changes followed, the allowance for Indian agencies was reduced, the Fresno and Kings river farms were abandoned, and in 1863 Tejon was given up and the Indians in this part of the state were concentrated on the Tule river farm. In 1873 the Tule farm was abandoned, and the Indians were moved to the reservation on the south fork of Tule river, back in the mountains.

Such is a bare outline of a very interesting chapter in the history of the nation's dealings with the aboriginal tribes. J. J. Lopez, for many years in charge of sheep and cattle at the Tejon ranch, supplies from memory and tradition something of the local color and interest. Many years ago, Lopez relates, the mountains around Tejon were a harbor for renegade Indians from the coast and southern missions. An Indian that had been taken to the missions, baptized, taught the taste of meat and the pains of hard labor and who had gone wild again was a worse Indian than one who had remained in his savage and ignorant state, and when the original Spanish grantors of the land now included in the Tejon ranch came to take possession they found the Indians so troublesome and the bears so numerous and aggressive that they relinquished their plans.

Next to the renegade Indians, who were specially adept at stealing, the most troublesome of the savages were the Serranos, who in the '50s had their hunting grounds in Inyo county and the Monache meadows and drove off cattle wherever they could find them through the mountains from Tulare to Los Angeles county, and the Tecuyas, a tribe of warlike Indians that migrated from the coast and took up their abode a little to the west of the mouth of Tejon cañon. It happened that the hills between Tejon cañon and San Emidio had long been the hunting grounds of the Pescaderos, who had their village on the border of Kern lake, and the result was perennial warfare between the new comers and the old.

The Serranos, the Pescaderos and the Tecuyas together with the peaceable Tehachapis and other tribes from the mountain valleys, all were gathered at Tejon, and they seem to have gotten along fairly well under the restraint of the soldiers and the influence of Lieutenant Beale's patriarchal government. But when the tribes were moved north the Tecuyas and Castacs elected to return to the coast, not caring to associate with the other clans. A large number remained at Tejon, and after Beale had bought the grants and established his farming and stock-raising industries there he gave such of the Indians as cared to stay tracts of four or five acres each to farm for themselves and employed them as herders, shearers and farm laborers. About one hundred and fifty Indians, mostly Serranos, now live on the Tejon ranch, and their presence there links the Tejon of the present with the primitive days before the white man came, as no other part of the county is linked.

The Tejon Ranch

What is generally known by the name of the Tejon ranch includes the rancho el Tejon (the ranch of the badger), rancho Castac (the lake ranch), rancho Los Alamos y Augua Caliente (the ranch of the cottonwoods and the warm water), and rancho la Liebre (the ranch of the jack-rabbit), comprising in all upward of 150,000 acres of mountain, valley and mesa land along the western slope of the Sierras reaching from the middle of the county to its southern border.

General Beale bought the old Spanish grants which the different ranches represent from the original owners, who were unable or indisposed to do anything with them, and following the removal of the Indians he made the great sweep of fairly well watered land into a magnificent stock ranch. In the very early days Colonel Vineyard ran sheep on the ranch, selling out his flock to Solomon and Philo Jewett when the latter first came to the county in 1860. The drought of 1864 was the indirect cause of the formation of the partnership of Beale & Baker, which figured as the owner of great flocks in the early days of the county's history. Baker had been in the sheep business near what is now Burbank, in Los Angeles county, but the shortage of feed drove him north into the mountains, and he entered into a partnership with General Beale. For about seven years the partnership continued, the flocks of sheep growing meantime to 100,000 or 125,000 head. Indian herders and shearers were employed then as at later dates in the history of the ranch. In 1874 W. J. Hill, Dave Rivers, and State Senator John Boggs, comprising the firm of Hill, Rivers & Co., leased the ranch. About that time the stock kept there included 60,000 head of sheep, 10,000 head of cattle and 200 horses. Hill, Rivers & Co.'s lease expired in 1880, when General Beale bought the stock. J. J. Lopez, who was in charge of the sheep under the Hill, Rivers & Co. regime, recalls that they used to get fifteen to thirty cents for the wool in those days, delivered at Los Angeles, and it took about ten days to haul it there in wagons. Wethers were worth from $2.50 to $3 per head, very much more than an acre of land. The dry year of 1877 and the termination of the lease to Hill, Rivers & Co. determined the policy of reducing the number of sheep on the Tejon ranch, and in 1879 Lopez was sent to Montana with 16,000 head of sheep. The drive consumed six months, led through mountains, over deserts, by long trails where the way was unknown and the water bad and far to find, and where treacherous Indian tribes demanded all the diplomacy to which Don Jose's Castilian blood had made him heir. The long drive is famous in the annals of the Kern county sheepmen, few of whom are strangers to the long trail, and as a reward for his efficiency, when Lopez returned he was placed in charge of both sheep and cattle. For about eighteen years R. M. Pogson was general superintendent of Tejon ranch, J. G. Stitt following him.

Truxtun Beale followed the methods of his father in the treatment of the Indians at Tejon, and the great ranch with its unsurveyed acres, irregular lines, Indian homes beside the ranch house and the patriarchal air that broods over the place continued until 1912 to furnish a picturesque and romantic reminder of another age in the midst of a state and a county that are rapidly becoming the most aggressively modern in the world. But Truxtun Beale, shortly before the closing of these pages, sold the Tejon ranch to a Southern California syndicate that now is engaged in testing the water supplies with the ultimate intention of irrigating so much of the land as possible and devoting it to more productive cultivation.

---

CHAPTER III

Gold Mining From 1851 to 1875

Authentic records of mining in what is now Kern county date back to 1851. In the early '60s a shaft opened in the Tehachapi valley showed evidences that the ground had been worked over many years before, and in 1870 J. C. Crocker, then a cattleman with headquarters at Temblor, reported to the Kern County Courier the finding of a tunnel driven in solid rock in the Coast range west of Bakersfield which was proven by a tree growing in its mouth to have been dug long before the country came into the possession of the Americans. Nothing remained in either case, however, to show by whose hands the work had been done, except that in the case of the tunnel, marks of a pick or other steel instrument seemed to furnish conclusive evidence that it was driven by civilized men.

In 1851 occurred the first rush to the Kern river placers. Indians carried vague reports of golden sands to the placer miners in the mountains farther north, and the surging tide of fortune seekers that swept over all the state in the days of '49 sent a little stream of prospectors to search out the new field. They found little, however, and little record was left of their adventures. The statement is made by early chroniclers, also, that some quartz mining was going on in 1852 at what was later Keysville.

But the real history of mining in Kern county dates from 1853; when a lump of gold, said to have weighed forty-two ounces, was dug out of the sands in one of the gulches between Keysville and Kernville. Word of the find spread rapidly through the camps of Mariposa and throughout the state, and Kern river took a foremost place among the numerous El Dorados that attracted the feverish crowds of gold seekers. Running out from the main bodies of ore farther back in the hills were little stringer veins from which the free gold washed down with the sands into French gulch, Rich gulch and all the other gulches and cañons leading into Kern river between Keysville and Kernville. Into these gulches the stream of prospectors poured. The placers were easy to work, and there was plenty of water. Very soon Kern river was one of the best known camps in the state, although but a little while before it was wholly unknown save to the few trappers, explorers and stockmen who had wandered through Walker's Pass and over Greenhorn mountain.

In 1854 Richard Keys discovered the Keys mine, and the working of the quartz ledges began. The road to Kern river, so far as there was a road, lay through Visalia, and during the year no less than 600 miners passed the Tulare county capital on the way to Kern river. In this year

A. T. Lightner, Sr., came to Keyssville from San Jose, and his son, A. T. Lightner, Jr., gives a graphic account of the latter part of the journey, after all semblance of a wagon road had been left behind. Such wagons as were brought into the new district followed the gulches or the backbones of the ridges, the teamsters clearing the way with axes when necessary, sometimes using as many as fourteen horses to haul one wagon up an especially steep place, and trailing felled trees behind the wagons to assist the brakes in going down hill.

For the most part, however, the first miners brought their outfits and supplies by pack animals. Even the first quartz mill machinery was packed in, and nowhere in the mountains did the fine art of balancing heavy and bulky loads on mule and burro back reach a higher degree of perfection. When Lightner hauled, or rather lowered, his first wagon down the mountain side into Keyssville, the route he had by chance selected took him directly over the Keys mine.

The First Quartz Mill

Lightner brought the first quartz mill to Keyssville in 1856, hauling it from San Francisco, via San Jose and Visalia, by wagon. He set it up by the banks of Kern river a short distance below Keyssville, where the gulch that ran through the camp met the stream, and built a flume to carry water to his wheel. Meantime he had engaged in mining, and was the owner of the Garnishee mine, later known as the Mammoth, which, with the Keys mine, yielded the best and largest part of the gold produced from quartz in the district. The Lightner mill crushed rock for the Keys mine, also, and Lightner, the younger, although he was a small boy at the time, says he clearly remembers the old tin bucket in which Richard Keys used to carry his round balls of bullion back from the mill.

The vein of ore tapped by the Keys and Mammoth was traced for over two miles, and many lesser mines were opened into it. A legend noted by Stephen Barton, one of the later pioneers of the upper Kern river country, says that Richard Keys went back to his old home in 1861 with the laudable intention of making all his relatives rich, and when he came back he found his mine caved in and full of water—hopelessly out of commission. Years later Stavert Brothers ran a drainage tunnel at a level of 350 feet below the old Keys tunnel, and the rehabilitated mine yielded some $65,000 in gold.

Stephen Barton describes an old Chilean quartz mill he saw in the Keyssville district as consisting of "two large wheels hewn from solid granite, seven or eight feet in diameter and a foot and a half thick, each weighing three or four tons," and both in good repair as late as 1888. The worn-out stamps which had carried wooden stems, and the cast-iron slabs that had lined a wooden battery box, continues Mr. Barton, were modelled after those used by Lord Sterling (General Alexander), north of Morristown in the reduction of iron ore in preparing solid shot for Washington's army.

For years the washing of the sands in the placers went on side by side with the quartz mining. At first the more fortunate of the placer miners made as high as $16 to $60 per day and more, but a larger number had to be content with $5 to $8, and many others panned out much less than this. Finally, when the white men had gleaned the gulches of their richest treasure, the Chinamen came, and these little men, content with small wages, shovelled and washed the sands over and over till they were clean and white to the bedrock. For the Chinamen, the aftermath of the Kern river placers contained fabulous wealth.

The Town of Keyville

The placers began to lose their charm for the white miners about 1857, and at that time the quartz mines of Keyville probably were at their height. Between the discovery in 1854 and 1857 or '58 the town of Keyville had no apologies to offer to any mining camp in all the length of the Sierra Nevada mines. The town lay in a little cove where the southern slope of Greenhorn mountain melts into a flat at the edge of a short, rocky gulch. There were no streets. Marsh & Kennedy's store, the blacksmith shop and the office of Gen. J. W. Freeman, then justice of the peace and later district attorney of Kern county, stood near the center of the little semicircular flat. A little way up the slope of the hill to the west of the flat were the residences, grouped informally, as houses may well be where all travel is by foot or horseback.

The size of the townsite is well illustrated by a story told by Mr. Lightner. General Freeman slept in his office, which, as stated, was near the center of the flat, or "business section," and took his meals with the Lightners, who lived in the semi-circle of residences on the hillside. That was before the days of the handy alarm clock, and it was one of the early morning duties of Mr. Lightner's older brother to step out in the front yard and heave a small rock down on the roof of the courthouse to waken the slumbering justice to his breakfast.

But if Keyville was small in the amount of space it covered its gamblers could pile as many gold pieces on the table as those of many larger places, and no man's costume was complete without two Colt's revolvers and a bowie knife strapped about him. After four or five years when the town grew older and more conservative, the knife and guns were worn more as an ornament than otherwise, but up to the time of the Civil war no well dressed man, after he had shaved and put on his clean shirt on Sunday morning, forgot to buckle the big, and fully loaded, fire arms about his waist.

William Weldon and J. V. Roberts, among the first settlers in Walker's basin, supplied the Keyville miners with beef, but the bulk of the other supplies were brought in from Los Angeles by pack animals. This lasted up to 1857 or '58, when the pack trains began to be succeeded by ox-team freighters. In the days of the pack train its arrival in camp or the sight of it winding over the hills in the distance was the signal for universal rejoicing, for it nearly always happened that the stocks of provisions were getting low before the new supplies arrived.

The Keyville Fort

Rumor of an impending attack from the Indians caused the Keyville miners in 1855 or 1856 to erect the fort which still stands on the point of a ridge running out to the gulch just below the town. The point of this ridge is higher than the backbone that joins it to Greenhorn mountain, so that a garrison occupying it could look down upon an enemy approaching from any quarter. The fort, which was built of brush gathered from the chaparral and covered with dirt from the hollowed-out center, was shoulder high and large enough to accommodate 200 persons. As the Indians of those days were armed only with arrows the fort was considered almost as impregnable as Gibraltar, and its location on the gulch leading from the river to the camp was almost as good from a strategic standpoint. W. R. Bower, afterward sheriff of the county, and Frank Warren were among the leaders in the building of the fort, but it proved that their labors were but an excess of caution, for the Indian war of 1856, exciting enough in Tulare county and farther north, never reached so far back in the mountains as Keysville. Some sixty of the Keysville miners were summoned by John W. Williams of Visalia and William Lynn of Linn's valley to assist the settlers along White and Tule river in the Tule river war. This war, or so much of it as has anything to do with Kern county, is dealt with in connection with the gathering up of the Indian tribes from the valley and foothills and their concentration at the Tejon and other reservations.

Meantime the early gold seekers began to search the other hills and ranges both above and below Keysville. General Freeman and others mined on Greenhorn mountain in 1855 or a little later. In 1856 Major Erskine had a stamp mill on what is now the Palmer ranch in the lower end of the Hot Springs valley, and was crushing ore for many miners thereabout. Later Major Erskine moved away, but his sons Thomas and M. E., remained, and Erskine creek was named in their honor.

The Big Blue Mine and Whiskey Flat

One day in 1860, it is related, the mule of "Lovely" Rogers, a Keysville miner, wandered away and "Lovely," being a true prospector, when he had picked up the trail and found that it led off up the river, tucked his pick under his arm and followed. Whether he recovered the mule or not, is a matter to be only presumed. What is more important, he brought back a piece of rock from the place where the Big Blue mine is now located. That was the beginning of Kernville, first known as Whiskey Flat.

Rogers' sample assayed well, and he returned to the place where his wandering mule had led him and began to uncover the ledge. Shortly after he sold his mine to J. W. Sumner. Sumner moved to the new camp, followed by many others, among the first being Adam Hamilton, who stood two barrels of whiskey on end, laid a plank across the top, and began to dispense the stimulant necessary to the proper development of a new mining camp. But Hamilton's bar was in too close proximity to the residences of Sumner and Caldwell, and he was ordered to move his whiskey down on the flat, a mile below, a circumstance which may or may not have suggested the name for the new town.

Hamilton opened a store as well as a bar. Kittridge & Company were among the early merchants in Whiskey Flat, and Lewis Clark was another of the pioneer saloon keepers. The Sumner mine, also the property of J. W. Sumner, the Jeff Davis, the Beauregard, the Nellie Dent, named for the wife of General Grant by William Ferguson, its owner, the Lady Belle and the Sarah Jane were among the early Kernville mines, and most of them were on the same ledge with the Big Blue and were later consolidated under that name by Senator John P. Jones, the bonanza king, and E. R. Burke. In 1867 Kern county was considered the most important of the mining counties in the southern part of the state, and Kernville was the most important mining town in the county. There were upward of a dozen important quartz mines, within a length of a couple of miles, and several extensive mills were in operation. At that time the entire county contained some seventeen quartz mills, and about 1200 people engaged in mining.

Senator Jones took over the Big Blue mine from Sumner in 1875, and at once increased the activity of the Kernville district. Burke was the manager, and under his direction the most efficient mining methods of the time were employed. He imported a large number of Cornish miners, employing about 200 miners all told. The mine was equipped with an 80-stamp mill, and about 100 tons of ore were taken out and crushed daily.

In 1870 there had been but little doing in Kernville, and there were less than a score of people in the town. In 1876 there were six or seven stores, four saloons, a brewery, three hotels, a livery stable, and other business and private establishments in proportion.

The operations in the Big Blue went on swimmingly until 1879, when the bottom dropped out of certain of Senator Jones' Nevada mining stocks, and he ordered the work at Kernville shut down. Ed Cushman, who had been book-keeper for Jones, secured a lease on the Big Blue, and worked it for about a year. Then Jacoby and Michaels leased it, ran a drainage tunnel under the mine at the river level, and took out a large amount of very profitable ore. They carried their workings down to the level of their drainage tunnel and quit.

Founding of Havilah

Long before the glory of Whiskey Flat began to fade, the restless advance guard of prospectors had passed on and was exploring all the gulches and hillsides for many miles to the south and east. One of the prospecting parties about the last week in June or the first week in July, 1864, went down Kern river and up Clear creek and found the first color of gold at Havilah, the third famous mining camp of Kern county, and a little later, when the county was organized out of portions of Tulare and Los Angeles counties, the first county seat.

It is recorded that Benjamin T. Mitchel, Alexander Reid, George McKay and Dr. C. De La Borde, the "French Doctor," composed the discovering party, but to a man by name of Harpinding goes the honor of giving the new camp its name. Harpinding was one of the few early miners who seem to have carried Bibles in their kits, or his memory served him well with recollections of his boyhood days in a more pious land, for he turned to the second chapter of Genesis and found it written in the tenth, eleventh and twelfth verses that "A river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it parted, and became into four heads. The name of the first is Pison; that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold. And the gold of that land is good; there is bdellium and the onyx stone."

The first camp of the prospectors was in a gulch just below the spot where the town was afterward located. A month later the Clear creek mining district was organized, with Havilah as its focal point, and the latest diggings rapidly assumed first rank in interest if not in importance among the county's mining towns.

The first company of prospectors called their mines the Havilah, and organized the Havilah Mining Company. They were prospectors rather than miners, however, and soon dissolved their partnership and continued to search for new leads on their individual accounts. Dr. La Borde and August Gouglat located some thirty-six claims in the Clear Creek district, among them being the Dijon Nos. 1 and 2, the Cape Horn, the Alma Nos. 1 and 2, the Rhone, Eagle, Rochefort, Navarre, Nièvre, Lyon and Marengo. A little later, in October, La Borde and Gouglat sold their claims for $50,000.

The most productive mine in the district was the Delphi, located by H. McKeadney and known also as the McKeadney mine. The Tyrone and Lexington also were McKeadney's property. Nicewander (or Nyswander), Park & Co. were among the early locators.

The first mill in the Clear Creek or Havilah district was brought by Joseph H. Thomas, from the Coso district, where it had been operated by the Willow Springs Mining and Milling Company, and the first rock crushed was from the Dijon mine. It yielded $37 per ton. In January, 1865, Gen. J. W. Freeman moved his 4-stamp mill to Havilah from his mine on Greenhorn mountain. The first rock he put through the mill was from the mines of Nicewander, Park & Co., and out of twenty-seven tons of ore $5000 in gold was saved directly from the battery. The same week rock from the Rochefort ledge yielded $230 per ton, and a run of Delphi ore netted $180 per ton.

These fabulous returns, considering the crude facilities at hand for extracting the gold, served to fan the interest in the Havilah mines to a fever heat, and the little gulch was soon resounding by day to the sound of blasting powder and stamp mills, and by night to the golden clink of coin on the gambling tables. According to the graphic account of a woman whose home in those days stood on the hillside just below one of the gambling resorts, the sound was as though someone were continually pouring twenty-dollar gold pieces out of a tin pan. By day the interest in the gambling tables was only a little less absorbing. A man who had occasion to search the county records some years later said he always had to wait till a poker game was finished before he could drag an unwilling official away long enough to unlock the archives and give him access to the few and fragmentary documents on file.

The Relief mine, or the Rand, as it was also known, was the property of Col. Arnold A. Rand, who bought out the locations of Nicewander, Park & Co. The prospectors generally were succeeded by men of larger capital who began the development of the mines, and when the county was organized in 1866 there was no settlement in all the territory embraced that could put forward a rival claim against Havilah for the county seat.

A writer in 1867 states that there were at that time thirty stamp mills in Kern and Tulare counties, twenty-five of them being in Kern county and a majority of the latter number being in the Clear Creek district. Throughout this district were found many veins of ore ranging from two to six feet in thickness, and most of them were worked with marked success. Speaking generally of the quartz mines of the county, the same writer says that above the line of permanent water the ores carried mostly free gold and the early miners extracted it readily. When they reached the sulphureted ores, however, so much difficulty was experienced that in 1865 and 1867 not more than one-quarter of the mills were in operation, and the production of bullion had decreased proportionately.

Other Mining Districts

So early as 1861 prospectors had drifted over the hills fifty miles southeast of Havilah and twenty miles from Walker's pass and opened the Milligan mine in El Poso district. They had sunk a shaft to the depth of 175 feet and penetrated a ledge that yielded from $57 to $150 per ton.

In 1868, according to the Havilah Courier, the Sageland district was attracting so much attention as to make things a little dull at Kernville. The Sageland district is on the eastern slope of Piute mountain, skirting the desert and is filled with broken ranges of dry, cactus-covered hills. The St. John, Hortensia, Burning Moscow and other quartz mines scattered through these hills yielded good quantities and qualities of ore, and justified, in the belief of the discoverers of the district, the pleasing name of the New Eldorado. Tom Bridger was one of the pioneers of the Sageland district.

In the early sixties, also, Henry and Deitrich Bahten were exploring the free gold ledges and placers on Piute mountain. The old Piute and Big Indian mines were among the best known producers in this district. Robert Palmer and Wade Hampton Williams discovered some very rich placers on Piute, and the thriving camp of Claraville was the result.

Some years later, about 1876, the Bull Run silver mine, located on Bull run about five miles above Kernville, was credited by contemporary writers with being one of the richest silver mines in the world.

In October, 1870, a Kernville letter to the Kern County Courier stated that forty men were employed about the Kernville mines, mostly working on shares and doing well. Three men in one month cleaned up $500. Ore from the Big Blue was paying about $25 per ton.

About the same time it was reported that Burdett and Tucker had struck a new lead in the Long Tom mine, the scene later of one of the memorable tragedies in Kern county history.

An optimistic correspondent of the Courier in 1870 wrote that the Joe Walker mine in Walker's basin was doing better than ever since new pumping machinery, recently installed, had enabled the miners to reach the lower ores. But water trouble finally caused the abandonment of the mine. Stephen Barton states that the last effort on the Joe Walker was made by Judge Colby with a Cornish pump that was warranted to throw 100 miners' inches of water 400 feet high. When the lift had reached 290 feet the pump was laboring very hard, and there was more than 100 inches of water to be handled. "A week of strain terminated the life of the pump, and the mine was permanently closed."

A report from the Kern river mines to the Courier by C. Schofield, June 3, 1871, said that the Big Blue was in steady operation and keeping a 16-stamp mill going. The mine had been worked with an open cut to a depth of thirty or forty feet and about seventy feet in width across the vein. A drift had been run about thirty-six feet in the direction of the hanging wall, but neither wall had yet been seen. The ore was running $17.50 to the ton. About two years before there were thousands of tons of dump rock, but all of it had then been worked. A shaft was sunk sixty feet below the bottom of the cut, and a drift run, but the water was so troublesome that work had to be abandoned on the lower level. The Sumner ledge, the northeasterly half of the Big Blue, was then owned chiefly by A. Staples & Co. From the bottom of an 80-foot shaft, ore running as high as $75 to the ton had been taken out, together with immense quantities of a lower grade. The hanging wall had been barely touched, and the foot wall had never yet been seen. A black, massive, sulphuret rock was the best producing ore, but with the facilities at hand a large part of the sulphurets were lost.

Next in importance to the Big Blue at this time was the Bull Run, which had been worked to a depth of 200 to 300 feet with an engine and hoist, and from which several hundred thousand dollars had been extracted. Only two small companies, working on shares, were taking out ore at the time, and these were working near the east end of the ledge on a vein about two feet in width which yielded ore running about $20 to the ton.

The Beauregard, which had paid well at the surface, was not worked at that time. Two small companies were taking ore from a narrow but very rich ledge, the rock paying $75 to $100 per ton. All these mines had been involved in litigation which interfered seriously with their development.

In 1873 a Tehachapi note in the Courier says that Green & Henderson had just cleaned up $1438 in their hydraulic mine near that place.

For some time past the Owens river mines had been an indirect means of revenue to Kern county, most of their freighting being via Tehachapi and Bakersfield to the end of the Southern Pacific railroad, then being built down the valley. On November 9, 1872, A. Cross arrived in Bakersfield with three teams bringing 335 bars or 30,000 pounds of bullion from the foot of Owens lake, to which point it had been brought by steamer from the furnaces on the opposite side. It took ten days to make the trip from the lake to Bakersfield. The trip from the lake to Los Angeles consumed considerably more time, and as a result the railroad officials were hopeful of getting all the Owens river trade via teams to the end of the track, then nearing Tipton.

In 1873 mention is made of the fact that Temple, Boushey & Weston were about to begin work on their mine near San Emidio, and expected to ship about 500 tons of ore per month over the railroad to San Francisco for treatment—provided it paid to do so, as apparently it did not.

During the eight days ending June 7, 1873, 1000 bars, or 45 tons of base bullion passed through Bakersfield from the Cerro Gordo mines in Inyo county to the railroad terminus, and the traffic to and from the mines appeared to be increasing. The next month the Kern & Inyo Forwarding Company was advertising for fifty mule teams to haul between Owens lake and Tipton, and was guaranteeing full loads both ways.

A letter from the Panamint mountains in November, 1873, tells of a little ball of silver being taken from the Dolly Varden lode by Edward Hall. The ledge was three feet in thickness and looked good to the prospectors. R. C. Jacobs is mentioned as one of the discoverers of the Panamint mines. About a year later the Panamint excitement was at its height.

In December, 1874, E. R. Burke, who was managing the Big Blue for himself and Senator Jones, is quoted as saying that the average run of the ore paid $15 and cost $5 to handle. The season was an active one in the Long Tom mines.

In 1875 a newspaper note said that the Kernville ledges had been explored for twenty-five miles.

CHAPTER IV

The Beginning of Agriculture and Stock-Raising

When the first farmers arrived in Kern county is more a matter of tradition than of history. In the early '40s an old immigrant trail came through Tejon cañon from the south, skirted the hills below Bear mountain, wound over the mesa northward, crossing the present line of the Southern Pacific between Bakersfield and Edison and forded Kern river, or Rio Bravo, as it was then known, a short distance above the present bridge between the China grade and the Kern river oil fields. There is reason to believe that sons of men who pioneered the virgin forests and prairies of Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas and Texas, driven westward and westward by the hereditary wanderlust, paused on their way to the older sections of the state to feed their stock and let their children stretch their legs among the trees and grassy hills around Tejon and along the fertile banks of Kern river where Bakersfield now stands. Back in the Tejon hills in the earliest days were gaunt mountaineers of the Tennessee stock, and the first known settlers on Kern Island tell of predecessors or signs of predecessors.

These first comers, however, or those, at least, who paused in the valley, were sojourners only. At most they may have hunted and fished for a season and replenished their stores of corn with a crop grown on the quickly responding soil of the Kern delta where it was necessary only to drop the seed and cover it with a little earth scraped up with the foot. Then they passed on, and the next flood or the next sand storm wiped out all trace of their habitation.

John Woodhouse Audubon, in his Western Journal, says that when he passed through what is now Kern county he saw one party of settlers preparing to make permanent homes. Audubon came up from Los Angeles through Tejon cañon in the latter part of November, 1849, with ten men and forty-six mules. Coming through the pass they had to wade knee deep in a torrent of water that poured down the trail. The mountain tops about were covered with snow, and when they emerged on the plain they were greeted with a blast of hail in their faces, swept on by a wind that uprooted cottonwood trees at the cañon's mouth. The plain was wet and boggy, and the party skirted the hills and made long detours to keep on fairly solid ground. Audubon also saw an Indian village and many scattered huts where the natives were grinding acorns and fanning grass seeds for their winter larder. The Indians, he says, were friendly, but he does not undertake to fix the location either of the Indian village or of the settlement of whites. A Lewis woodpecker, Stellar's jay and a new hawk with a white tail were objects that fixed Audubon's attention to quite as great a degree as did the beginning of civilization upon the Kern delta—if that is where the settlers he mentions were pitching their tents.

The first settlers who came and stayed were those of the South Fork, Walker's basin, and other mountain districts contiguous to the early mines. Mr. Seibert is said to have first located in South Fork Valley in 1846. Frank Barrows about 1857 established a claim on the South Fork on the site of the present home of P. T. Brady. John Nicoll came about the same time. William Scodie and Thomas H. Smith settled in the upper end of South Fork valley in 1861-62, and the latter resides there to this day. In 1857 William Weldon settled in Walker's basin, moving thence to the South Fork. Weldon and J. V. Roberts in connection with their stock ranch, ran a butcher business and supplied most of the beef consumed by the Keysville miners. In 1858 A. T. Lightner, Sr., sold his mining and milling interests at Keysville and bought a settler's claim in Walker's basin for $1600. With the claim went certain farming implements and a band of 100 to 150 head of Spanish cattle, little and lean and wild.

Other settlers of the South Fork valley were William W. Landers; George Clancy, who came in 1861; and J. L. Mack, who arrived about 1864. John McCray, who had lived with his parents for a few years on Kern Island about 1859-60 and later around Visalia, went to the South Fork as a boy in August, 1870, and worked for W. W. Landers until he had acquired cattle and land of his own. Landers was one of the largest stock men of the mountain section, running about 2000 head in the early days and as high as 10,000 head in the '90s.

The raising of hay, vegetables and beef constituted the chief occupation of the early mountain farmers, and all their produce found a ready market in the mining camps. Lightner sold hay at Keysville for $40 to $50 per ton, and a little later hay delivered to the soldiers at Fort Tejon brought, sometimes, as high as $60 per ton. It was while hauling hay to Havilah in 1867 that Lightner lost his life. The morning was cold and frosty, and while going down a hill his foot slipped from the brake and he was thrown forward under the wagon wheels.

Farming in the mountains in these early days was not without other than purely pastoral interest. In the very earliest times there was more or less danger from Indians and bear as well as white marauders and renegades, and on the breaking out of the Civil war the division of sentiment in the state between Union and Confederate was made the excuse for the organization of guerrilla bands, the real object of which was only theft and pillage. Neither the organized bands nor the individual marauders appear to have inflicted any serious harm on the settlers, but they helped to keep their nerves at tension by not infrequent visits. The three Kelso brothers, for example, often demanded the hospitality of the Lightner home, and always, of course, were entertained. They slept on the floor with their clothes all on, their feet toward the hearthstone and their heads on a pile of murderous guns. A. T. Lightner, Jr., had a toy revolver made of the barrel of an abandoned gun with a handle whittled out of wood and thrust into the breech. One of the Kelso brothers, seeing this one night, secured it and while his youngest brother slept, stealthily placed it under his head and drew away one of the small cannon that comprised the desperado's armament. The youthful owner of the toy was a fearful witness of the prank, and his opinion of the desperate character of the youngest Kelso was not changed when the latter awoke and cursed and glowered for hours over the trick that had been played upon him.

The Mason and Henry gang was one of the bands of murderers and horse thieves organized under the cloak of patriotism. About the time the war broke out Mason and Henry called a meeting on Cottonwood creek a short distance south of the mouth of Kern river cañon, for the stated purpose of organizing a company of men to join the Confederate army. A large number of Confederate sympathizers, among them W. R. Bower, afterward sheriff of the county, responded, but the real character of the gang soon becoming known, Bower and many others withdrew. Later Bower saddled his horse, rode it through to Missouri and served four years under the southern flag, returning to Kern county after a wound in his ankle had put him out of the fight.

The outlaw gang, either before or after the meeting mentioned, built a stone corral or fort, as they called it, on the banks of Cottonwood creek, where remains of it are to be seen to this day. Mason and Henry formerly were employes of the stage line at Elkhorn station and started on their career of crime by stealing so many of the stage animals as they thought they needed. They acted a notable part in the drama of outlawry played out in the San Joaquin valley in the early days of its history.

The South Fork Valley

The South Fork valley is about twenty miles in length and from one to three miles in width. Despite its elevation and the stream that flows through it, it was practically a desert when the first settlers arrived. The ground, very fertile when water was applied, was covered in its virgin state with high sage brush and was suitable for nothing but a rough range for cattle. The very earliest of the settlers cleared about ten acres each about their homes and devoted their energies to herding their cattle up and down the river. From 1861 to 1881 the construction of irrigation ditches to carry water over the valley progressed with more or less industry until finally the whole of the level land was watered and the valley became one of the most productive areas of the state.

John A. Benson surveyed the valley in 1875, charging the settlers at the rate of $150 per quarter section, and such an artistic and satisfactory job did he do, it is said, that hardly a settler was obliged to move more than a few rods of the fences built on section lines run out by instinct and the polar star.

The distribution of the water occasioned a little more difficulty. A number of suits were brought between settlers to determine their respective rights, but few were carried to a conclusion, and to this day there has not been a court decision covering the South Fork irrigation rights generally. About 1899, however, owners of the different ditches drew up and signed an agreement, setting aside to each quarter section 150 miner's inches of water and establishing the right of precedence according to priority of location.

In 1885 South Fork failed fully to supply the irrigation ditches, and the waters of Whitney creek were diverted from the North Fork to the South Fork through a tunnel six feet high and six feet wide, driven 350 feet through a hill. The tunnel caved in, and Jeff Gillum was given a contract to make the tunnel an open cut for $1000. He failed to get the cut down to grade, and in the suit over the settlement expert witnesses said that the job could not be done under $3500. The farmers paid the bill, and put a dam across the creek to force the water through the unfinished cut.

In 1895 Miller & Lux and the Kern County Land Company with their affiliated canal companies filed a suit asking for an order of the court enjoining the farmers of the South Fork from using the water they had appropriated, claiming a prior right to all the waters of Kern river and its affluents. The suit was never pressed to a trial, however, and a similar suit filed by the same parties some six years later followed a similar course. In 1908 a third suit was filed and is still pending in the early stages. It is stated that the plaintiffs have no expectation of depriving the South Fork irrigators of their water, but desire a court decision fixing the amount they are entitled to divert.

Very recently a government agent made a careful inspection of the South Fork irrigation system and gathered data regarding the suits that had been filed, but the purpose was not given out, and no further developments as yet have indicated what action, if any, the government may have in view.

The height of the cattle business in the South Fork valley was in 1890 to 1899. From then on the restrictions of the Federal Forest Reserve have curtailed the free range which the stockmen previously enjoyed, and the herds accordingly have been reduced to what may be kept on the owners' lands and pastured to the extent permitted within the limits of the reserve.

The revival of activity in the Big Blue mine in 1875 gave farming in the South Fork valley its first great stimulus, and beside the cattle, large quantities of hogs, grain, vegetables and other products were delivered to the mines. In 1872 the culture of alfalfa was begun in the valley by an Englishman named Jack Waterworth on the present home ranch of William Landers. Gradually the growing of alfalfa took the place of wheat raising, and now alfalfa is the principal farm product of the South Fork.

Early Settlers on the Kern Delta

John McCray, now a resident of Bakersfield but best known over the county as a large stock raiser and rancher of the South Fork valley, carries the story of farming on the Kern river delta back a little farther than anyone else the writer has been able thus far to find. John McCray, Sr., with a party of west-bound pioneers under the leadership of Capt. Johnny Roberts, drove a band of 1000 Durham cattle across the plains from Missouri in the early '50s, and John McCray, Jr., was born on the journey, somewhere near Donner lake. The family settled first in Tuolumne county, and went from there to Centerville, on Kings river. At the latter place they were troubled so much with malaria that in 1859 they came to the Kern delta, establishing themselves about three miles south of the present boundaries of Bakersfield. In passing it is to be mentioned that from then until 1864, when the McCrays moved to Visalia to give their children the benefit of schools, not one of the family had a chill.

In 1859 the overland or immigrant road entered the valley through Tejon pass, going from the fort east of Adobe and then drifting westward and northward and crossing the old south fork about eight miles south of what was later the Poindexter place. From there it followed about the course of the present Kern Island road to what was then the Walker Shirley place and what is now the Lowell addition to Bakersfield. The road ran through the present townsite and crossed the river about where the old Jewett avenue bridge formerly stood. From the other side of the river the road followed the present road to Poso creek, past Mon's place and Willow Springs, crossed White river at Irish John's place, and thence past Fountain springs to Porterville and Tulare.

The old Butterfield stage road followed the same route from Visalia to a point near the Kern river oil fields, where it headed down a cañon to a point just above the present China grade bridge, where a ferry was operated by Major Gordon between 1861 and 1864, and previously, according to some accounts, by a man named Gale. Major Gordon had an adobe house by his ferry, and a pile of dirt remains to this day to mark the spot. From the ferry the stage road turned east along the flat between the river and the bluffs and sought an easy place to scale the latter some distance up the stream from the bottom of the present China grade. The old road is still in use to some extent, about a mile and a half above the bridge. Out east of the Southern Pacific round house a few miles was the first stage station south of the river. Twelve miles farther south there was another, and at Rose station there was another. They changed teams every twelve miles on the entire route, 2888 miles from some place back in Texas through New Mexico and Arizona close to the present route of the Southern Pacific railroad, through Yuma to Los Angeles, thence via Fort Tejon, Kern river, Visalia, Pacheco pass and Gilroy to San Francisco. Between stations the horses went at a gallop, dragging the lumbering Concord stage with its twelve passengers (and more if the traffic demanded) and the United States mails. They got letters through to San Francisco from St. Louis via El Paso in twenty-four days, and the government paid the company $600,000 a year subsidy. The cancelled stamps amounted to about $27,000. On the breaking out of the war this mail route was discontinued, and transcontinental letters came via the northern route only.

In 1858 the Pacific and Atlantic Telegraph Company started stringing its wires along this stage route, and in 1860 the line was completed to Los Angeles, where the work, planned to continue east, was halted. Later the Western Union consolidated all the telegraph lines of the coast.

Site of Bakersfield in 1859

The present site of Bakersfield was not, as some reports would make it seem, in the least like a swamp in the '50s. The main channel of the river was down what later came to be known as Panama slough, leaving the present river channel a little way west of the point of Panorama heights and crossing the present intersection of Nineteenth and B streets. It was not a deep channel, although occasional deep holes were bored out of the soft, alluvial bed by the swirling current.

The south fork, flowing a little way west of the present course of the Kern Island canal, was the second largest of the channels that divided the waters of Kern river. It was narrower than the Panama channel, and the banks were steep in most places, making it necessary to choose a place down which a horse could be ridden and often to swim the animal down stream to find a place where he could scramble out on the other side. Lesser sloughs and channels of that day were unimportant except as they encouraged the growth of willows on their banks and tules in their beds and helped the process of sub-irrigation which caused sunflowers, cockleburrs, tumble weed and other riotous wild vegetation to grow to fabulous heights over all the intervening land.

Beginning of the County's Cattle Industry

The McCrays brought their Durham cattle, between 150 and 200 head, to their new home, and are entitled to the distinction of bringing the first blooded stock to Kern county. About the only other cattleman in this end of the valley at that time was Don David Alexander, who had his headquarters at San Emidio about 1861, and whose 20,000 or 25,000 head of wild, Spanish cattle ranged all over the San Emidio hills and around Kern and Buena Vista lake and the lower reaches of Kern river. Alexander bought all of McCray's bull calves and gradually built up the quality of his herd. Cattle were marketed then in San Francisco, and the herds of beeves were driven up the valley to the bay with as little concern for the long journey as many a farmer feels now in driving his stock to the nearest railroad station, six or a dozen miles away.

It was later on that the Crockers, J. C. and Ed, established themselves at Temblor and went into the cattle business on a large scale in connection with Henry Miller. J. C. Crocker was an important figure in the stock business for a score of years following his arrival at Temblor. He acted as Miller's agent in the purchase of both cattle and land, and helped to build up the immense property of Miller & Lux in the San Joaquin valley. It is reported that at the end of twenty years of loose, indefinite partnership with Miller, Crocker asked for an accounting. Miller discouraged the idea and wanted to know what was the use, but Crocker insisted that he was getting on in years and would like to know how much money he was worth. Finally Miller sent him to the book-keepers at the San Francisco office, where Crocker was informed, after due search of the ledgers, that he owed the firm a hundred thousand dollars. Despite these discouraging figures, however, Crocker soon became the owner of one of the finest of the Miller ranches in the Kern delta, long known as the Crocker ranch, and later as the Balfour-Guthrie ranch near Panama. In addition to his renown as a cattle man, Jim Crocker was known throughout the length of the valley as a hunter of outlaws. He was one of the leaders in the successful expedition against Joaquin Murietta, and helped also to mete out summary justice to other evil doers of less unenviable fame.

By 1868 there were many cattlemen and many herds both in the valley and in the mountains and hills. In 1870 John Funk had succeeded Alexander at San Emidio, and was the possessor of great herds.

Meantime the cattlemen were well established in the valleys about Tehachapi, in Walker's basin, in the South Fork valley, around Poso Flat and Granite and in Linn's valley, where Staniford & Dunlap made their headquarters and ranged their herds all through the mountains and foothills from Porterville to Tehachapi. Meantime, also, the Jewett Brothers had launched the sheep industry of the county from the Rio Bravo ranch on Kern river, midway between the Kern river oil fields and the mouth of the cañon.

Some of the Very Old Timers

Getting back to the Kern delta in 1860-61, the settlers besides the McCrays included the Shirleys, the Wickers, the Daughertys, the Gilberts, and a little farther south and west toward Buena Vista lake, Tom Barnes and Jim and Jeff Harris. Where Walker Shirley lived (where the Lowell addition is now) was a large thicket of willows growing along the banks of the south fork. Similar thickets were scattered about in the low places where the water frequently overflowed, and the general landscape, viewed from the present center of Bakersfield, was dotted with large cottonwood trees, a considerable number of which still remain, not so very much larger than they were fifty years ago. John Shirley lived close to where the Chinese burying ground south of D street is now located. R. M. Gilbert lived where the old race track was built later, at the north end of Chester avenue.

Quite a number of Indian families lived about the present townsite, hunting the deer and antelope and other wild game that abounded, and fishing for the trout that swam in lower Kern river at that time. Also they farmed a little and worked, on occasion, for the whites. Mrs. Van Orman, who was formerly Mrs. Gilbert, says the Indians used to jab a sharp stick into the earth, drop a few kernels of corn therein and close the opening with their heels. Later on they harvested the crop, doing little meantime save fish and hunt. The white settlers farmed little more thoroughly, for the crops grew anyway, and what was the use? The Indians built their abodes almost wholly of tules. The whites used willow poles for the frames of their buildings and thatched both sides and roof with tules and flags. When they got to feeling more settled, they built walls of tules and mud, reinforced with willow poles stuck in the earth outside and inside at intervals to keep them from falling over. The most pretentious residences were built of adobes. The floors were invariably of the native earth, raised a little for drainage. There was no lumber, and not even the making of good puncheons. The Gilberts had a well some six or eight feet deep with earthen steps leading down an incline to the water. They walked down and dipped it up instead of using a rope and windlass.

Nobody bothered about titles to land then. They squatted where they pleased, and if their first location did not suit them moved next week or next year as their fancy dictated. People who were not in the cattle business exclusively like the McCrays and Alexander, kept a few cows, a few hogs and maybe a few chickens. It was the easiest place in the world in which to make a living, says Mrs. Van Orman. Bill Daugherty was the pioneer hog raiser of the county, and many tales are told of his ability and prowess not only as a handler of tame swine but with the wild ones that flourished in droves about Buena Vista and Kern lakes. Among his other accomplishments it is stated that Daugherty could grunt so alluringly that the infant porkers would leave their mother's side and run squealing to his outstretched hands. Not only Daugherty but many others of the early settlers used to hunt wild hogs around the lakes. Dogs were specially trained to trail the swine and hold them at bay by barking and nipping their heels until the hunters arrived. No number of dogs, it is said, could kill a large wild boar. Sometimes they chewed his ears to rags, but in the end when the dogs were tired out the hog would rip great gashes in them with his tusks. An unverified legend is to the effect that some of the wild hog hunters, having corralled a bunch of the beasts, would sew up their eyes and using tame hogs as pilots, would drive them to the mountain mines. As a general thing, however, the Buena Vista porkers were better handled in the form of hams and bacon.

Wild cattle and wild horses added to the resources available to the early settlers in the Kern delta. In dry seasons when the early cattle raisers on the coast had not enough feed to keep their stock from starving, they used to drive a portion of their herds over a range into this valley and leave them to shift for themselves until the next rains replenished the home pastures. Before their owners returned to seek them, many of these cattle had wandered too far to be gathered together.

Beginning of the Sheep Industry

Conspicuous figures in the history of the sheep industry of Kern county are the Jewett brothers, Solomon and Philo D., who, as related in a former chapter, bought out the flocks of Colonel Vineyard at Tejon; Gustav Sanger; the Troys; Harry Quinn, pioneer of the northern Kern foothills whose camp at Rag gulch was known as a landmark and a hospitable watering place since the early '70s; Peter Lambert of Long Tom; A. Pauly of Tehachapi; L. C. Flores, who kept a store and shearing camp at San Emidio in the '70s when there was Mexican settlement at that place and many sheep in the hills thereabout; the Borgwardts, who ran sheep on Poso creek; Jesse Stark, who was out at Tejon in the early days, and later on Ardizzi-Olcese Company, who were headquarters and outfitters for the itinerant French sheep men; F. M. Noriega, M. Cesmat, J. B. Berges, A. P. Eyraud, all of whom made enough money in the sheep business to launch them in other ventures; Andre Vieux and Faure Brothers of Delano; Pierre Giraud, "Little Pete", and scores of men less famous who followed their bands to the mountains and the wide ranges beyond in summer and came back to Kern county's warm mesas for the February lambing and shearing time.

The Jewetts have been shepherds for three generations. Solomon W. Jewett, father of Solomon and Philo, the Kern county pioneers, was a sheep and wool grower of Vermont, and Philo Jewett, one of the sons of the second Solomon Jewett, is today one of the largest owners of flocks in Kern county. After they had purchased Colonel Vineyard's sheep in 1860, Solomon and Philo Jewett established themselves on the Rio Bravo ranch about a dozen miles up Kern river from Bakersfield. Later they acquired land adjoining the townsite of Bakersfield and west of Bakersfield in what is now the Rosedale country. On some of the latter land Philo Jewett now has his shearing camp, but the Indians who sheared the fleeces from his father's and uncle's sheep in the days before the Civil war have given place to men with shearing machines driven by a gasoline engine.

Next to the Jewetts in point of years and permanence of location is Harry Quinn, who first came to spy out the land in 1868 and came to settle permanently in 1874, bringing 8000 or 9000 sheep belonging in part to him and in part to Archibald Leach. A few years later Quinn bought out the band, and increased his flocks and his acres until he had eventually some 20,000 acres of land and one of the largest bands of sheep in the county. Quinn is now closing out his sheep and has sold part of his range for orange land and leased most of the remainder for possible oil land. Young & Riley and W. L. Smith on White river and Templeton on Rag Gulch are among the other pioneer sheep men of the northern part of the county.

While his varied career makes him hard to classify, Capt. John Barker figures quite prominently in the early sheep industry of the county, having run large bands on Kern river in the same vicinity as the scene of the Jewett's first ventures.

The setting apart of a very great area of mountain land as a federal forest reserve and the exclusion of the sheep men from the free ranges which they had formerly enjoyed therein, was the cause of curtailing to a considerable extent the sheep industry in the county, particularly affecting the wandering shepherds, the Frenchmen and Basques who own little or no land and depend on leasing cheap ranges and driving their flocks from section to section to meet the changes of the varying season.

Whether the total number of sheep in the county will again increase is doubtful. The cheap ranges are being put to more profitable purposes, and it will soon be a matter for the shepherds to decide whether or not it pays to raise sheep inside good pastures where beef cattle and dairy cows will thrive.

The Mexican Settlement

What was known in the early days as the Mexican settlement where Panama now is, was founded in 1865 or thereabout, by Dolores Montano, who settled on section 26, 30-27. Ventura Cuen came about the same time and settled on section 23, 30-27, both of which places were later a part of the Panama ranch of Miller & Lux. Montano went back to Sonora, Mexico, to die, but Cuen still lives a short distance south of the cemetery on Union avenue with his daughter, Mrs. Joseph Sunega. Tomas Castro, patriarch of the present Castro clan, came here in 1868 from Magdalena, Mexico, where he had been driven from his home by the floods of 1867-68, as severe in Mexico as they were in California. Castro located on the Montano place, later moving to section 12, 30-27, where he took up a homestead and reared his family of eight sons and one daughter.

Among the other early settlers at Panama were Encarnacion Padres, Averon Sierras, Guadeloupe Gonzoles, Tomas Noriega and Jesus Noriega, his son.

After Miller bought the land included in the Panama ranch, most of the settlers there moved to Saletral, about a mile and a half northwest of Panama, so named on account of a certain excess of alkali in the soil thereabout. The first store at Panama was kept by Lesser Hirshfeld, one of the family of pioneer merchants whose name figures conspicuously in the early trade of Bakersfield and Tehachapi as well. Panama was about five or six miles east of the old Barnes settlement. Just east of Panama, Howard Cross had a ranch in 1870 or thereabout, but farther east than that in the valley there was practically nothing up to something after that date.

Tomas Castro built the Castro ditch in 1870 and 1871, and both he and his neighbors engaged in general farming and stock-raising along the same line as the other pioneers. Dom Castro, son of Tomas, tells of catching and partially taming the wild Spanish cattle that used to roam the lowlands of the valley. They used to lie in wait for the cattle as they would come from the willows in what is now the Lowell Addition to Bakersfield, lasso and brand them and take them to fenced pastures where they were kept with other cattle until they grew tame enough to be herded or driven in bands. The Spanish cattle were small, light and very inferior as beef animals, but they were excellent runners, if that can be considered a virtue in a cow. An old Spanish cow would weigh perhaps 700 pounds—quite as often considerably less. As late as 1880 wild cattle and deer were seen about the Kern river oil fields, antelope were plentiful farther west, and elk roamed in the Elk hills and along the Coast range mesas.

About 1870 Francisco Martinez used to make a business of catching wild horses where the Lost Hills oil field is now located and all along the Coast range hills from Sunflower valley to Carneros springs. Martinez built corrals with wide extended wings and drove the wild horses therein, or built snares for them about their watering places. Sometimes he would get twenty-five or thirty of the mustangs in a corral at a drive, and he sold them, either broken or unbroken, for $2.50 to $5 per head. A mustang that had been lassoed and thrown down was broken, and one that would not throw itself over backward when a halter was put on it was a finished product. Tomas Castro used to trade Martinez a hair rope for a mustang, and one day Lee and Dom were sent to bring home a couple of fillies so acquired. But in crossing the river the colts, tied together by their halters, got dizzy and turned round and round until they fell down and drowned in the shallow stream, although the boys did their best to hold their heads above water. Of such value were the wild horses.

Stories of the Outlaw Vasquez

Some of the mustangs of the early day, however, were famous for their speed and endurance. One of these, Pico Blanco (white Bill), is the hero of sundry adventures. One morning before the light began to streak the sky above Bear mountain, Tomas Castro was called from his bed by a voice shouting his name from the road. He went out to find Tiburcio Vasquez, the famous outlaw, who said he wanted the best horse on the Castro ranch. Tomas brought out Pico Blanco, and Vasquez mounted him and dashed away—probably pursued by a posse in search of vengeance for some outrage. No more was heard or seen of Pico Blanco for many days, when one morning Vasquez was again heard calling from the road. When Castro appeared Vasquez tossed him $100 in gold and a rope, at the other end of which was a bony shadow of Pico Blanco, took his own horse, which had been kept at the ranch, and disappeared. Pico got back his flesh and his spirit, and in later years, Dom Castro says, Morris Jacoby, a merchant of early Bakersfield, used to ride him to Los Angeles, starting in the morning at 6 o'clock and arriving in the southern city by 7 or 8 in the evening.

Lesser Hirshfeld, who kept the first store in the Panama settlement, tells another story that illustrates the methods of the Vasquez gang. One day a Mexican friend stopped at the store and invited Hirshfeld, or Cristobol, as he was known by his patrons, to come with him to a dance at a road house a few miles down the road. Business was dull, and a part of the science of mercantile success is to maintain friendly relations with one's patrons, so Cristobol saddled his horse. Arriving at the dance, the merchant was impressed by the presence of a large number of strangers and a display of fire arms unusual even for a dance in the early days, and he was not long in deciding the character of his fellow guests. Hirshfeld took a perfunctory part in the festivities and did the proper thing by treating everyone including the outlaws to drinks and cigars, and then making some excuse about a business engagement, he took a circuitous route back to his store, gathered up his cash and galloped by another round-about way to town. He came back next day expecting to find his place robbed, but nothing had happened. This was Thursday, and that night the pioneer merchant again galloped to town with his day's receipts. The same process was repeated Friday and Saturday, and Hirshfeld had about exhausted his ingenuity in inventing reasons to give his clerk for passing the nights in town, but when he got home Sunday morning there was no need for further explanation. In the night Vasquez and his men appeared masked and held a parley in front of the store with some of Hirshfeld's neighbors. It developed later that the neighbors convinced the outlaws that Hirshfeld had gone to town and taken all his money with him. Thereupon the gang threw off the masks, entered the store, called for drinks and paid for them; called for another round and did not pay; called for a third round and paid, and disappeared on their horses in the darkness. Any discerning person will understand that Vasquez, with the courtesy for which he was noted, did the proper honors of the time and the occasion just as though the proprietor had been present, and the proprietor, when he returned, fully appreciated it.

Meantime a posse that left Bakersfield on Friday (taking every gun in the city, it is said) was scouring the hills from Caliente to Tejon cañon in search of the men who were dancing and feasting at Panama. It was the last visit of Vasquez to Kern county. From Panama he went to the San Fernando valley where he was captured, through the agency of a woman who played him false.

The Barnes Settlement

The Barnes settlement was named for Thomas Barnes, who was in the county in 1859, and who settled some six or eight miles west of Panama in the early '60s. Barnes lived on section 26, 30-26, near a big natural grove of cottonwoods that lay a half mile wide and about three miles long in the bed of an old slough. Jeff, Jim, Ed., Noland and Tony Harris, all brothers of Mrs. Barnes, had ranches there, but they were away teaming in the mountains a larger part of the time than they spent farming. By 1868, when P. J. Waldon took up a claim in the Barnes settlement, Bill Daugherty had lived there and gone, and some of the other earlier settlers were fading memories. Mr. Waldon does not recall the name of an Arkansas woman who planted an acre of peach trees on the place where Barnes lived in 1868, but the fruit was celebrated throughout the whole delta, where any kind of peaches probably tasted good in 1868. Barnes had about forty head of cattle, and ran hogs in the tules, and nearly all the other early settlers in the vicinity did the same. Waldon says the wild hogs were not very good eating, but tame hogs sold readily in Bakersfield at four and five cents per pound, and the hog-raisers made money. In the later '70s Waldon, Van Stoner, W. W. Frazier, Vining Barker and Jock Ellis ran their hogs in one herd for economy of management, and the raising of pork was a considerable industry about Old River, the Barnes settlement and Canfield (so called in honor of Wellington Canfield.)

Ellen M Tracy

Wellington Canfield and F. A. Tracy were first in the cattle business on Jerry slough, named for Jerry Bush, a cattleman who ran his herds there in 1866, but later they bought land near the Barnes settlement, and a little town was laid out and christened Canfield.

There is a tradition that the first alfalfa in the county was grown by Tom Barnes from seed sent him from South America by a traveler who had visited the delta and believed the clover would do well there. It did do well, and the fame of the Barnes alfalfa patch was spread all over the county in 1867 or '68.

The Buena Vista Canal Company was organized in 1870 by Barnes, Harris, Gillum, John Oleton, P. J. Waldon, Peter O'Hare, John Gordon, James Cole and others, and later, as in the case of nearly all the canal companies, the controlling interest was acquired by Haggin & Carr.

Throughout the whole of the great Kern delta in the early days everybody within a radius of twenty miles was everybody else's neighbor, ready to help dispose of a feast or nurse a stricken fellow settler through a fever with impartial alacrity. When Sis Daugherty was married to Corbin Wicker, old man Daugherty launched his tule boat on the South Fork and hitching his riata to the prow swam his horse across to fetch all the neighbors to the wedding supper. On Christmas day just before the great flood of 1861-62 that made history and geography both in Kern county, the Skileses, who lived somewhere south of Reeder lake, made a dinner for the whole neighborhood, and the Gilberts, returning just as the first swelling of Panama channel began to make the banks boggy, mired down in the foamy, brown water, and friendly Indians waded in and carried Mrs. Gilbert and her infant ashore.

But before I go on with the tale of the flood I must go back a little way and relate how all this peaceful Arcadia, where there was neither law nor present need of law was the subject of special acts of the state legislature and of plans and dreams of men so far-sighted that they lifted their feet to step over the threshold into a future, which to us, nearly a whole lifetime later, seems far away on the horizon.

CHAPTER V

Floods and Swamp Reclamation

Residents of the San Joaquin valley in the year 1913 look forward, in hours of faith and prophecy, to a time when the population of the valley shall be so large and the freight traffic so great throughout the length of it that it will be practicable and profitable to build and operate a transportation canal from Bakersfield to the bay. We know that it would be neither practicable nor profitable at the present time. But it is of the essence of the pioneer to see the ultimate destiny, to leap over, in fancy and undertaking, the intervening years or centuries—it makes little difference to the true pioneer—to set cheerfully at work to accomplish the impossible, and to make some shift or other in the face of the inevitable defeat.

It is necessary to keep all this in mind and to remember, also, that everybody in the state of California was a pioneer in 1857 when we read in the statutes that in that year was passed and approved an act giving W. F. Montgomery, Joseph Montgomery, A. J. Downes, F. W. Sampson and their associates and assigns the right to reclaim all the swamp land belonging to the state "lying between the San Joaquin river at a point known as Kings river slough, and Tulare lake, and also the swamp and overflowed lands bordering on Tulare, Buena Vista and Kern lakes, and between said lakes, and up to the line dividing the said swamp and overflowed lands from the lands belonging to the United States."

The First San Joaquin Valley Canal Project

Also they were given the right and privilege to construct and put in operation a canal, capable of carrying boats of 80-tons burden, all the way from Kings river slough on the San Joaquin river to Kern lake, or, if they chose, they could switch the course of the canal to intercept the main channel of Kern river instead of passing through Buena Vista and Kern lakes.

They were given a right of way 200 feet wide on each side of the proposed canal, and were to have the right to operate the waterway and to collect such tolls as the legislature might authorize for a period of twenty years, after which the ownership of the canal should revert to the state. Incidentally the grantees were to have all the odd sections in the tracts reclaimed, and for every odd section therein of which the state might theretofore have disposed, the grantees were to select in lieu four even sections.

Note particularly that work on the canal must begin within one year and the whole must be completed within three years from the passage of the act in order to comply with the provisions of the grant.

The First State Highway

In the spring of 1862 the act was amended, a provision being inserted to the effect that out of the 200 feet of right of way allowed on each side of the canal the public should be permitted the use of a highway. It also was provided that when the work was done the governor and the surveyor-general must certify to the reclamation of the land. The new act also extended the time limits to one year and three years, respectively, after the passage of the amended act. This date was April 10, 1862.

Meantime W. F. Montgomery, who was the principal in the scheme, had not succeeded in interesting capital in the canal project, and for a consideration of $10,000 he deeded to Thomas Baker and Harvey S. Brown (each an undivided one-half share) all his right, title and interest in the lands in question. For smaller sums Baker and Brown bought out the other owners.

Baker, who seems to have been the active member of the new partnership, set about finding capital to carry out the enterprise, but he was no more successful than Montgomery had been. But the legislature came to his aid most generously and again amended the act providing for the reclamation of the lands in question, releasing W. F. Montgomery, et al., their associates and assigns from all obligation to construct and put in operation for the purpose of navigation, the several canals referred to in the previous act, and providing that in consideration of the reclamation of the lands mentioned in the act they should be entitled to the same quantity of land and all other rights and privileges as if they had not been released from the obligation to construct the canal.

With somewhat greater verbosity than the foregoing, the legislature of 1863 dashed, for something more than half a century, at least, the hope of Bakersfield's standing at the head of navigation in the San Joaquin valley.

But while the open-hearted members of the legislature had generously relieved Colonel Baker of more than half his monumental undertaking he was still, so far as any human being had the slightest reason to suppose, in the position of a man, who, having discovered that he could not grasp the moon, would find himself elevated, suddenly, on legs ten thousand feet in height. The assistance would not be effective enough to be even genuinely tantalizing. As for the reasonableness of the action of the legislature, considering that body as the custodian of the public interest, let it be remembered that the flood of 1861-62 broke levees right and left in the Sacramento valley, doing damage upward of $3,000,000. The experience taught a new lesson to the state concerning the difficulty of handling floods and swamps. And the legislature had no means of knowing, it is to be supposed, what a merry prank Kern river had just played with Old Tom Barnes' irrigating ditch. Like as not many of the legislators honestly thought that a man who would reclaim a swamp ought to have the whole of it for his labor, not half.

As for Colonel Baker, he came to Kern county, hired thirty Indians from the Tejon reservation and set to work to reclaim a swamp of upward of 400,000 acres that wound for 150 miles through a raw, unsettled country and was replenished by the waters of two of the great rivers of the state and six or seven smaller streams. Try to compass the sublime audacity of it, and then see how Nature can bend her forces to help a sublimely audacious man—the kind of man, apparently, that Nature loves.

Look back a little now and see what old Kern river was doing while the legislature was revising its laws, and first Montgomery and then Colonel Baker were trying to interest capital—in Civil war times—in their mad and visionary undertaking.

How a River in Flood Reclaimed a Swamp

When the Gilberts went home from their Christmas dinner at the Skiles place as related in the previous chapter, they had to cross the first turbid forerunners of the flood, because they lived out at the old race track, and the river then was all this side. Their house of poles and tules stood in a thicket of willows, but a little way to the north was the open, sage brush country, through which Tom Barnes and the Harris brothers had begun to build an irrigation ditch to lead the water down to lands they had started to cultivate. For that day the ditch was an ambitious undertaking, both in width and in depth, and its construction had progressed for a mile and more.

The Gilberts had seen high water before, and they went to bed with little concern after they had been rescued from the river by the Indians. Along in the night, however, there arose a great squealing from the pen where some forty porkers fattened, and when Gilbert rolled out of bed to see what was the matter, he splashed to his knees in icy water.

By the time Gilbert and a couple of men who were stopping at the place could carry the children and the provisions to a little knoll of high ground farther north, the melted snow water was lapping around their waists. The hog pen and the corn crib floated down stream, and the tule house followed them next day as the water continued to rise. A little exploration to the north showed that the swollen current had found Tom Barnes' ditch and was scooping it deeper and wider at a faster rate than Barnes could have done had he been loaned all the horses and plows in the state of California. The virgin earth, unprotected by roots or vegetation, melted before the torrent like mounds of sand before the incoming tide. Not many days passed before the larger of the two streams was to the north of the Gilberts instead of to the south of them, and at frequent intervals a dozen tons or more of earth would cave from the bank of the new channel and fall into the brown and boiling flood with a roar that did not sound good to the damp and shivering refugees perched on their island knoll only a few rods away.

Fortunately, only a few days before the flood, Gilbert had returned with a four-horse load of provisions from Visalia, and a little while before that they had bought 700 pounds of flour from a man who had to take flour for a debt a Parajo valley rancher owed him and who was peddling it out through the length of the valley after the manner of the day. So the family made out through what seemed, not only to them but to many other flood-bound pioneers in the state, an interminable season of rain and freshet, and then they moved to Reeder hill, the highest and driest spot within the present townsite.

And so, when Colonel Baker came with his thirty Indians he put a head gate in what remained of the old south fork, and built the beginning of the Town ditch, and was able to report to the governor and surveyor-general in all truthfulness that a very considerable portion of the 400,000 acres had been reclaimed.

Then the Drought Helped, Too

Still Nature was kind to this generous, enthusiastic optimist who was not afraid to attempt great things that other people said were impossible. In the year 1864 was the worst drought since the American occupation. All over the state cattle and sheep died of starvation by the hundreds of thousands. Shepherds were glad to dispose of their flocks at a bit a head, and failing that they killed them mercifully and saved their pelts.

Colonel Baker, when he had built the head gate in the south fork, went down to the north end of Buena Vista lake and scraped the Baker dam, fragments of which are still to be found a little way north of the Cole levee. Then he took his family back to Visalia temporarily while he did further reclamation work north of Tulare lake.

Baker Gets His Patent

The Governor sent the surveyor-general and another engineer by name of Andrew Jackson to see if the lands had been reclaimed. By that time the drought had done what Baker could not do. The engineers found the land as dry as a bone, and so reported. There was some delay in the making out of the patent, but finally it was signed by Governor Frederick F. Low on November 11, 1867. It conveyed to W. F. Montgomery, et al., their associates and assigns, a total of 89,120 acres of land in Kern and Fresno counties—about half as much as the grantees originally were to receive.

The next great flood—the greatest in the history of the county, came between Christmas and New Years in the winter of 1867-8, and spread a vast lake of water over every acre of Colonel Baker's reclaimed land.

Montgomery Patent Annulled

Years later there fell upon the state a far-flung fore-shadow of the modern conservation movement, and the legislatures of 1857 and 1862 were sharply criticised for giving away so much land for so small an amount of improvement. The courts, as courts do now, sometimes, undertook to correct the follies of the lawmakers, and on September 17, 1878, in the case of People ex. rel. J. L. Love, attorney-general, versus John Center, et al., appellants and respondents, the district court of the twelfth judicial district—San Francisco—handed down a decree declaring the Montgomery patent null and void. In the opinion accompanying the decree the court pointed out that the governor and surveyor-general did not issue a certificate to the effect that the land had been reclaimed—as the law directed—and held that this omission was not cured by the fact that the governor signed the patent, and that the document also bore the signature of the secretary of state, who happened to be the surveyor-general as well. To a layman it might seem that this objection was purely technical. The second defect noted by the court—the fact that the land was not actually reclaimed—was not to be disputed by anyone.

But the decree mattered little to Colonel Baker. Six years before it was signed by the judge his remains had been carried to their last resting place in Union cemetery by the strong but gentle hands of other pioneers who knew and loved him. Moreover, long before his death Colonel Baker had sold his share of nearly all the immense tract the Montgomery patent conveyed. Some of it went for ten cents an acre. The highest price the smallest purchasers paid for farms was $1 and $1.50 per acre. Baker was no land monopolist.

Before the district court issued its decree the legislature got busy again, tempering justice with mercy. An act approved March 20, 1878, provided that all persons who had bought land covered by the Montgomery patent, subsequent to the issuance of such patent, should be entitled to a decree of the court directing that a patent issue to them for such lands, on their showing within sixty days after the passage of the act, that they had spent for taxes, improvements, fences and reclamation a total of not less than $1 per acre for all the lands so claimed by each.

All the purchasers were able easily to comply with these conditions, and so the story ends happily for all concerned.

Beginnings of Bakersfield

The flood of 1861-2 is a convenient mark in history from which to date the earliest beginnings of Bakersfield. As related in the preceding chapter, the flood moved the main channel out of the future townsite, leaving the land dryer and rather more suitable for the habitation of civilized men. It made it less desirable for the Indians. Prior to that time, as Mrs. Van Orman recalls, there was a considerable settlement of the aborigines somewhere about Chester Lane, and huts of individual savages were scattered about the willow groves everywhere. But the flood drowned the squirrels and other small game which the Indians used to kill and eat, swept away the fish they used to catch in the river, and incidentally the long season of rains when the freshet rose and fell day after day in apparently interminable succession made the place generally disagreeable even for the stoical redskins. About that time, also, the government was moving the larger part of the tribes from Tejon to the Tule river farm. So the Indians moved out. So did two families by name of Lovelace, and others of whom the names are not remembered. The settlers who remained sought the high spots that the waters had not covered.

The people who stayed and helped to form the new settlement were the Shirleys, the Gilberts, Harvey S. Skiles, the grandfather of Herman Dumble, the present city trustee of Bakersfield, and Lewis Reeder, who bought Gilbert's second place on Reeder hill and gave his name to that ancient landmark. The next year came Colonel Baker and his family, Edward Tibbet, who settled on the present Tibbet homestead just south of the city limits, and Allan Rose, who succeeded to the house on Reeder hill after Reeder and many of his family had died. Reeder, himself, died in the mountains whither he had gone for lung trouble, but others of his family who sickened and died there and later residents who turned their faces to the wall in the ill-fated house made a total of seven deaths on Reeder hill in the first few years of the settlement. Two others, accidentally shot, raised the total to nine, wherefrom grew the tale that the Reeder hill house was haunted.

Colonel Baker, of course, at once directed his energies toward the reclamation of the swamp lands covered by the Montgomery franchise. The others farmed the fertile townsite, raised cattle and hogs or hunted both in the swamps and out on the dry ranges. The soldiers at Fort Tejon paid $50 per ton for hay delivered, and both at the fort and in the mining camps were the best of markets for meat, potatoes, sweet potatoes, onions, and all other vegetables that the early settlers raised. In a letter written by Solomon Jewett in 1871 reference is made to the fact that Harvey S. Skiles raised a small patch of cotton in 1862.

The first genuine cotton culture, however, was in 1865, when the Jewett Brothers, who had interests in Bakersfield then in addition to their extensive sheep business at the Rio Bravo ranch, raised 130 acres of cotton which was harvested and sent to Oakland to be ginned and manufactured. Some of the cloth was shipped back to Bakersfield and sold in the first store built in the settlement. Mr. Jewett imported two tons of seed, one from Tennessee, and the other from Sonora, Mexico. He got the crop in rather late, but he declared that the experiment was a success, or would have been had it not been for the prohibitive cost of hauling the cotton to Oakland by team—probably ox-team.

Colonel Baker, Mr. Winfrey and A. R. Jackson were appointed school trustees in 1866, but they never organized. A man by name of Brooks taught a private school that year, and in 1863, for a short time, Mrs. Baker taught a few of the neighbor children at her home. They had no books, but Mrs. Baker cut letters out of paper, and resorted to other laborious shifts to help the youngsters up the hill of knowledge. The first active school board consisted of Messrs. Tibbet, Troy and Reeder, who were chosen in 1867. In that year Mrs. Ranney taught a three-months' term. In 1868 Miss L. A. Jackson taught a six-months' term. The first school house, which an old newspaper account says was a brick building 40x60 feet in size, was built in 1869 and in June of that year A. R. Jackson opened school in it. The next year there were two teachers, A. R. Jackson and Miss Callie Gilbert, and thirty-five pupils, whose surnames were Adams, Baker, Crawford, Lundy, Patria, Pettus, Ranney, Shelley, Shirley, Tibbet, Ward, Arujo, Collins, Contreras, Gilbert, McKenzie, Reeder, Troy and Verdugo.

For six years after Colonel Baker came to the Kern delta there was no postoffice here. Until the breaking out of the war, the removal of the garrison from Fort Tejon and the discontinuance of the Butterfield stage line from San Francisco to Los Angeles, the settlers here used to have their mail left at the fort. Later on it was addressed to Visalia, and the thoughtful postmaster at that place would forward mail for the whole settlement by anyone whom he knew was coming this way. Freight was hauled mostly from Los Angeles, and the charge was three cents per pound. Flour sometimes got as high as $10 per sack in the earliest days of Bakersfield, and when the freshets cut off travel to Visalia and snows blocked Tejon pass, corn and wheat ground in a hand mill and other home products had to eke out the larder. Mrs. Tracy (then Mrs. Baker) says she used to leech salt out of the earth to cure pork, and in other times of necessity made a pretty good article of soap with grease and alkali. Ordinarily they made their own candles, used honey in lieu of sugar, and baked sweet potatoes as a substitute for coffee. Meal ground in the old hand mill was not of the finest, but the pioneers sifted out the coarsest part and used it for hominy. Dave Willis of Visalia tried making salt from an old salt lick about sixteen miles south of Bakersfield, with indifferent success. In 1868 a saw mill was started in Tecuya valley near Fort Tejon, but the lumber, which was sawed from bull pine, was so prone to warp that it needed a ton of boulders on each end of a plank to hold it down, and then it would twist in the middle.

Prior to the days of the Tacuya mill adobes and poles or brush, tules and mud formed the building materials, as previously described. Colonel Baker's first house, the one the family was living in at the time of the great flood of 1867-8, was of adobe with a brush, tule and dirt roof. The first years of Colonel Baker's residence here were unusually dry, especially the great drought year of 1864, and a dirt roof was a very great protection from the sun in summer, and also was unobjectionable in winter, so long as the light rains were insufficient to wet it through and the intervening days of sunshine quite sufficient to dry it out again.

The Flood of 1867-68

The winter of 1867-68 was different. The heavens wept as though their sorrow never would be washed away, and after a while the rain drops began to filter through the bed of rich, alluvial soil on the roof until the shower inside was almost or quite as heavy as that outside. The chief difference was that the shower inside came a few minutes after the shower outside, and the tiny streams that trickled from the pendant tule ends were black as ink with the humus they extracted from the dirt on the roof. They hung umbrellas over the tables to protect the food, and sheltered the beds as best they might.

It rained, and rained, and then, very strange, as it seemed to the settlers along its banks, the river, for two days, went almost wholly dry. They knew nothing about it in the little village of Bakersfield, but up in the mountains where the lakes of upper Kern river now are, there had been a succession of avalanches that filled the bed of the river with rocks and earth and a whole forest of great pine trees.

A closer inquiry seems to develop the fact that popular tradition respecting the slip of earth that held back the waters of Kern river in the flood of 1867-8, instead of exaggerating it, as tradition is wont to do, falls far short of comprehending its tremendous magnitude. The lakes themselves, beautiful sheets of water far up toward the head of the river, are remnants of the great reservoirs that the avalanches made. Many years ago the old Jordan trail from Visalia to Inyo county used to pass through where the lakes now are. To this day, looking down through the clear waters, in the lake bottom may be seen trees that grew there before the flood overwhelmed them.

It must be that the thorough soaking of the mountain sides after a long period of drought caused whole sections of wooded slopes to plunge down into the river cañon. When the impounded waters finally broke away they came down the rocky gorges in a churning, thundering torrent, adding to the roar of the water itself the crash and shriek of thousands on thousands of trees. sixty and a hundred feet in length, and up to three or four feet in diameter, tumbled end over end in the narrower parts of the cañon and rolling and swirling with the current in the wider reaches of the stream. Kernville residents say that for three days the river flowed past that place a mile in width, and from the bank it looked as though a man could walk on logs dryshod from one side to the other.

Those who have seen the steep, narrow rock-walled gorge through which Kern river emerges from the mountains sixteen miles above Bakersfield can form some guess of their own concerning the steady, increasing, rolling thunder with which the coming flood heralded its approach to the sleeping citizens of infant Bakersfield.

Flood Reaches Bakersfield.

It was the flatness of Bakersfield and the great expanse of level country that opens, fanwise, west and south from the townsite that saved it from annihilation. Since the first flood people had sought out the knolls for their dwelling places, and there was a little time after the drift logs began to bob and crunch among the willows of the sloughs before the water was lapping at the thresholds.

Richard Hudnut, afterward the editor of the Kern County Courier, was living in an adobe house somewhere near G and Twenty-fourth street. The noise of the water wakened him, and he went out a little way from his house to see what was coming. He crossed a little swale dry-shod, and looked back a moment later to find it full of water, running like a mill race. He shouted a warning to his bride and the latter's sister, who remained in the house, and in a few seconds he was obliged to climb a tree to keep out of reach of the rising flood. The house was on a little higher ground, but presently the chilly stream—it was between Christmas and New Years—began to flow over the floor. Mrs. Hudnut and her sister perched themselves on their beds. But the water steadily rose, and what was equally appalling, the roof above their heads was slowly but steadily sinking down. Pretty soon they realized that the adobes at the bottom of the wall were melting in the flood. By the time the ridge pole had settled down on top of Mr. Hudnut's tall book case at the end of the room, the ladies mustered up their courage to wade outside. The roof by then was so low that they were able to scramble upon it, and there they sat shivering and shouting counsel back and forth with Mr. Hudnut, perched in his tree, until men with a boat came to their rescue.

Similar experiences happened in many places, but no lives were lost, and the pioneers, used to pranks of Nature and Fortune, took the experience philosophically, and with mutual helpfulness and optimism soon made new shifts and forgot their losses. The day after the flood came there was to have been a neighborhood feast at the Tibbet's home, and although the waters undermined a cupboard where the roast pig was stored and spilled it in the flood, it was rescued and re-garnished and a little later than the hour set the guests assembled and shared the slightly moistened viands and related their several experiences. The Hudnut story and the Tibbet feast are incidents of the flood most generally remembered, probably because of the humor they contain—and that fact furnishes the key to the temperament and disposition of the Kern county pioneer.

The Baker adobe was not overflowed. It was only wet and drizzling from the long continued rains, and there a dozen homeless neighbors gathered and were made as welcome as flowers in February.

The trees (live trees, not dead driftwood) which were washed down by the flood strewed a strip of country a mile wide through Kernville, and from the point of Panorama heights past Bakersfield they spread over the ground all the way to Bellevue and the old Barnes settlement, a distance of ten miles or more. Colonel Baker built a saw mill to cut the logs on the townsite into lumber, and Myron Harmon tried the same plan up in Kernville, but the logs there were so thickly imbedded with sand and broken chunks of rock (some of them as big as a man's fist) that sawing them was impracticable.

Meantime Colonel Baker had completed his reclamation of the swamp lands covered by the Montgomery franchise, had gotten his patent to 89,120 acres of land, and plans were forming in the minds of ambitious, enterprising men to make a great empire out of the rich lands through which the river plowed its devious and shifting channels, and incidentally to make some personal profit thereby.

---

CHAPTER VI

Organization of the County

The county of Kern was created by an act of the legislature approved April 2, 1866, out of territory formerly included in the counties of Tulare and Los Angeles, chiefly the former. The act fixed the county seat at Havilah; provided for a county judge to be appointed by the governor, ordered an election to be held on the second Thursday in July, 1866, to select a clerk who should be also a recorder, a sheriff who should be tax collector as well, a district attorney, an assessor and collector of poll taxes, treasurer, surveyor, coroner and public administrator, superintendent of schools and three supervisors. Michael H. Erskine, Eli Smith, Dan W. Walser, Thomas Baker and John Brite were named as a board of commissioners to appoint election officers and canvass the returns. The county was assigned to the fourth senatorial district of that day, and was attached to Tulare county for representative purposes. The supervisors were directed to name two commissioners to meet with other commissioners from Tulare and Los Angeles counties to settle upon Kern county's share of the bonded indebtedness of the other counties of which its territory had been a part.

First County Officials

Without special incident this program was carried out, the following officials being declared elected as the result of the first ballots cast in the new county: district attorney, E. E. Calhoun; sheriff, W. B. Ross; clerk, recorder and auditor, H. D. Bequette; treasurer, D. A. Sinclair; assessor, R. B. Sagely; coroner and public administrator, Joseph Lively; superintendent of schools, J. R. Riley; surveyor, Thomas Baker; supervisors, Henry Hammell, S. A. Bishop and J. J. Rhymes.

The governor appointed Theron Reed as county judge. J. W. Freeman was already state senator, having been elected while Kern county was a part of Tulare, and I. C. Brown was similarly in possession of the office of assemblyman.

At their first two meetings, held August 1st and 2nd, the supervisors established three judicial townships in the county, fixed the tax rate at a total of $2.61 for state and county, and called for bids for building a jail. At the next meeting the bid of T. B. Stuart for the construction of the jail for $1600 was accepted, and for $800 a site was bought for a courthouse. The latter building served until the county seat was moved to Bakersfield, when it was taken down and the lumber sold to P. T. Colby, who put it together again in the form of a residence just south of the Kern Valley bank on Chester avenue in Bakersfield. The first courthouse was built by T. H. Binnex for the modest sum of $2200.

Each judicial (or magistrate's) township was made a school district as follows: township No. 1, Havilah district; township No. 2, Linn's valley district; township No. 3, Kelso district; township No. 4, Tejon district.

It is worthy of note that Bakersfield and the Kern delta do not appear in the list, but in February, 1867, Lower Kern River district was formed from the Linn's Valley district. Also, each magistrate's township was made a road district.

First Election Precincts

The first election districts were established by the supervisors May 25, 1867, as follows:

Havilah—vote at court house. Claraville—vote at Bodfish's old store. South Fork—vote at John Nicoll's blacksmith shop. Kernville—vote at old Cove house. Keysville—vote at Marsh & Kennedy's old store. Alpine—vote at Eugene Caillard's store. Summit Mill—vote at Knox house, summit. Linn's Valley—vote at Myers' store. Long Tom—vote at Yoakum's store. Kern Island—vote at Chester's store, Bakersfield. Reservation—vote at Tejon reservation buildings. Tehachapi—vote at school house. Walker's Basin—vote at Dr. Adams' store. Augua Caliente—vote at Wolfskill house. Cross's Mill—vote at Cross' mill. Delonega—vote at Williams & Martin's camp.

First Election in the County

Before the election was held on September 4th, Sageland voting district was established and Sanderson & Asher's store on Kelso creek was named as the polling place.

In the list above the word "old" wherever used, is quoted from the supervisors' record. After forty-four years its use gives some idea of relative antiquity. As an index to the relative population of the districts and also to show the political complexion of the new county the vote for governor in the several precincts in the first election after the county was established is given herewith:

Havilah—Haight, 147; Gorham, 60.
Kernville—Haight, 38; Gorham, 43.
South Fork—Haight, 10; Gorham, nothing.
Walker's Basin—Haight, 32; Gorham, 13.
Alpine—Haight, 11; Gorham, 3.
Summit Hill—Haight, 18; Gorham, 5.
Linn's Valley—Haight, 22; Gorham, 6.
Long Tom—Haight, 20; Gorham, nothing.
Kern River Island—Haight, 21; Gorham, 11.
Reservation—Haight, 4; Gorham, 2.
Tehachapi—Haight, 25; Gorham, 3.
Sageland—Haight, 21; Gorham, 11.
Augua Caliente—Haight, 3; Gorham, nothing.
Claraville—Haight, 13; Gorham, 7.
Totals—Haight, 385; Gorham, 164.
Haight's majority, 221.

The election throughout the state gave the following totals for governor: Henry H. Haight, Democrat, 49,905; George C. Gorham, Union, 40,359; Caleb T. Fay, Union-Republican, 2,088.

At the same election the following county officers were chosen: Sheriff, R. B. Sagely; clerk, H. D. Bequette; district attorney, Thomas Laspeyre; treasurer, D. A. Sinclair; assessor, James R. Watson; surveyor, Thomas Baker; coroner, A. D. Jones; superintendent of schools, E. W. Doss; supervisors, first district, D. W. Walser; second district, J. J. Rhymes; third district, John M. Brite; constables, township No. 1, John B. Tungate and W. S. Gibson; township No. 2, J. Pascoe; township No. 3, Thomas F. Owens and Thomas McFarlane; township No. 4, Isaac Hart and James E. Williams; township No. 5, J. J. Yoakum and W. W. Shirley.

Roadmasters for the five townships were William F. Klaiber, C. T. White, J. M. Garrett, M. A. Tyler, and William Higgins, respectively.

At the judicial election held October 16th, P. T. Colby was elected county judge, and justices of the peace were chosen as follows: township 1, G. Martel and J. W. Venable; township 2, Thomas Despain; township 3, William S. Adams and Daniel Memekton; township 4, William P. Higgins and Grant P. Cuddeback; township 5, P. A. Stine.

First Swamp Land District Organized

Other matters which demanded a large share of the attention of the first boards of supervisors other than the political organization of the county and the calling of elections were the granting of permits for toll roads and ferries, the organization of reclamation districts and the adjustment of assessments. The first reclamation districts were formed on August 7, 1866, seven days after the first board organized. Under an act of the legislature approved April 2, 1866, the supervisors, whom the law made ex-officio swamp land commissioners for the territory included in the county, divided the swamp and overflowed land in Kern county into two districts. District No. 1 included all the swamp land in the county east of the range between ranges 26 and 27 east. District No. 2 included all the swamp land in the county west of this line, and all the even sections in both districts were set aside to defray the expense of carrying out a system of reclamation and irrigation provided in an agreement between the supervisors, acting in the capacity of swamp land commissioners, and Thomas Baker, his associates and assigns.

According to this agreement, Baker and his associates were to construct a good and permanent improvement to turn from Kern river into the south fork water sufficient to irrigate district No. 1, to remove all timber and driftwood from the slough so that it would carry water, to build a guard gate to afford passage for water across the levee already constructed across said slough for reclamation purposes and to keep said gateway and levee in good repair so as to allow enough water to pass for irrigation but at the same time to prevent a flood. Baker was to begin the work within two years after January 1, 1867, and was to be paid $6000 for the job, half of the amount as the work was finished, and the other half as afterward provided in the agreement.

Also, Baker was to build irrigating ditches and improve existing sloughs so that they would serve as channels to carry irrigation water, being paid therefor at the rate of 50 cents per yard for all dirt moved up to a total of $8000, half of the amount to be paid as the work was completed, which must be within four years from January 1, 1867. The payments were to be made in land scrip to be issued to Baker at the rate of $1 per acre in such denominations as Baker should elect. The agreement provided that Baker was not to be held liable for damage caused by any exceptional floods.

For the reclamation of district No. 2 Baker was to build a levee across Buena Vista slough in township 30-24 (a little north of Cole's levee of the present day) to improve the natural channels and build canals at the rate of 50 cents per cubic yard for the earth moved, up to a total of $26,000, payment to be made as in the case of district No. 1, in land scrip at the rate of $1 per acre, subject to location on even sections or fractions thereof, within the districts described. In the two districts the compensation would amount to $40,000 or 40,000 acres of land. The control of the water and distribution of the same for irrigation purposes was to remain in the hands of the supervisors.

The reader will recall that heretofore Baker and his associates had, under the Montgomery franchise, just completed the reclamation of all the swamp and overflowed lands in the two districts mentioned in the agreement and had put in their application for a patent for all the odd sections as compensation for their labors. At this time and a few years later there was no little protest against this action of the supervisors by people who pointed out that the state had given half the land for taking the water off, and now the county was giving the other half for putting the water back on the land. Against this contention, however, was presented the argument that while the swamps had been drained and now were as dry as tinder, they were no more suited to cultivation without water for irrigation than they had been when they were submerged. The argument was good, and prevailed.

Changes in Swamp Land Laws

Before Baker could complete his portion of the contract with the supervisors, the state legislature, which was having a large amount of trouble about that time in settling in its own mind what was the best policy to follow respecting the swamp lands, made another change in the law, in 1868, placing the swamp lands back in the trust of the state, instead of the counties, and removing all restrictions formerly in effect as to the amount of swamp land which any one person or corporation could acquire. The new law provided that purchasers of swamp land must deposit $1 per acre in the county treasury as a guarantee that the land would be reclaimed, or twenty per cent of the amount could be paid outright and the balance made up later. Each district was to make its own by-laws and regulations, but in the end, if the land was not reclaimed, the title remained in the state.

The change in the law made a change in the plans for reclamation, and under the new act, on December 24, 1870, Livermore & Chester, Thomas Baker, Julius Chester and Andrew R. Jackson filed with the supervisors a petition for the formation of a reclamation district including all the swamp and overflowed lands in townships 27-22, 28-22, 28-23, 29-22, 29-23, 29-24, 30-24, 31-25, 31-26, 32-26 and 32-27.

The story of the acquisition of the swamp lands forms a long and rather complicated chapter which would be of only casual interest to the average reader. What has been related so far gives a very good illustration of the manner in which all the swamp land in the county finally was acquired. The odd sections for the most part went to parties who had bought them from Baker or his assigns subsequent to the Montgomery patent, the purchasers being protected by a new act of the legislature when the Montgomery patent was annulled by the court in 1878. The even sections were purchased from the state for about the cost of completing their reclamation.

A Sheep Was Worth More Than an Acre of Land

Probably it will strike the present day reader that the moving of two cubic yards of earth from the center of a ditch to a ditch bank was a small amount of labor to give in exchange for an acre of the rich, Kern delta land, but the records of the supervisors, sitting as a board of equalization in the early days of the county throw an explanatory light on the subject of relative values. Nowadays nobody pays any attention to his assessments, whether they are high or low, but in the '60s and '70s the meetings of the equalizers were enlivened by a steady procession of taxpayers who wanted their assessments lowered or those of their neighbors raised. For example: In 1870 sheep were assessed at $2 per head, and the San Emidio grant was assessed at $1.25 per acre. The supervisors reduced sheep to $1.50 and the land in the grant to $1. In the same year the Western Union Telegraph Company's assessment was cut from $170.64 to $85.32. In 1868 three American horses belonging to Dave Lavers were raised from the assessor's figures to $300, and the next year the Joe Walker mine was chopped from $5000 to $500.

The First Mountain Roads

Nearly all the early roads through the mountains were built by private enterprise as toll roads. In the valley any traveller could lay out a new road for himself if he chose, and others who came after him soon wore it into a trail. But when he came to a stream he could not ford he had to pay tribute to the ferryman. J. M. Griffith, in 1868, built a toll road from Moore's station at the foot of Tehachapi mountain to Agua Caliente creek and was permitted to charge for its use, $2.50 for a wagon and twelve horses, $2.25 for a wagon and ten horses, $2 for a wagon and eight horses and down to seventy-five cents for a wagon and two horses, twenty-five cents for a horse and rider, five cents per head for loose cattle, two cents per head for sheep, and twenty-five cents for a pack animal.

Charges were fixed by the supervisors for the ferry operated in the same year by J. E. Stine at Telegraph crossing over Kern river near Bakersfield as follows: For a wagon and two horses, $2; for each extra span of horses, fifty cents; for a horse and rider, fifty cents; for loose animals of all kinds, twenty-five cents each; for footman, twenty-five cents.

Rates for other toll roads and ferries were not far from these figures.

In 1868 James Cross built a ferry below the junction of South Fork (in the mountains). Cross, Morton & Company were given a permit to maintain a toll road from Havilah via Walker's basin to their mill. J. W. Sumner was given a permit to build a toll bridge across Kern river near Hot Springs valley. Thomas Baker a little later built the famous Baker toll road up the mountains between Bakersfield and Havilah. Eight or ten years later the county began buying in these toll roads, and there were numerous and spicy charges of graft and extravagance in connection with the different purchases.

(Throughout this history it is necessary to distinguish between the South Fork of Kern river, which is one of the two chief branches of the stream toward its source in the mountains, and the south fork channel which ran through the eastern part of Bakersfield in the early days. For the purpose of lessening the confusion of the dual use of the name I have arbitrarily chosen to give the mountain stream and the valley that bears its name the dignity of capital initials.)

---

CHAPTER VII

Coming of the Capitalist

Dividing the history of Kern county into epochs from an industrial point of view, the years around 1870 mark the beginning of the influence of large capital in the county's development. Prior to 1860 the settlers in the valley were mainly small farmers or small stockmen, intent on getting what they could from the land and concerned but little or not at all in the permanent improvement or development of the country. In the mountains the placer miners and the first quartz miners were doing the same—getting money out of the ground, and putting little in. Following these came men like Colonel Baker, fully gifted with the ability and inclination to plan large developments and improvements for the future, but handicapped everywhere for want of money to carry out their plans. Nevertheless, Baker and others in the Kern delta began the construction of reclamation levees and irrigation ditches; in the mountain valleys the sturdy pioneers, full of energy if short of cash, were improving their farms and beginning to accumulate their flocks and herds, and in the mineral sections the quartz miners were delving deeper in the ledges and developing shafts and tunnels that properly were entitled to the name of mines as distinguished from placers and prospect holes.

All these enterprises were carried on by men of modest means and modest ambitions. But before 1868 General Beale had acquired the Tejon ranch, and Beale & Baker were building up flocks of sheep aggregating as high as 100,000 to 125,000 head. In 1868 J. C. Crocker established headquarters at the Temblor ranch and began buying the land and accumulating the herds that formed the nucleus of the immense Miller & Lux holdings. About the same time the Chesters were in Bakersfield, planning big enterprises with the money of H. P. Livermore, a wealthy druggist of San Francisco, to back them. In 1875 Senator Jones bought the Big Blue mine and gave a new character to the search for Kern county gold. In 1872 Walter James came to make a report on the Gates tract, a big body of land lying south and west of Bakersfield which Isaac E. Gates of New York had acquired from the railroad and which was later purchased by J. B. Haggin and became the nucleus of the Kern County Land Company holdings. In 1873 came the Southern Pacific railroad. It is pertinent, therefore, to take account, roughly, of the county's stock about the year 1870.

Havilah was the most important town in the county, although there were not lacking men who could foresee that Bakersfield was soon to outstrip it in the race for supremacy. A. D. Jones, editor of the Havilah Courier, was one of these, and on December 22, 1869, he had moved to Bakersfield, changed the name of his paper to the Kern County Courier, and had gotten out the first issue. In the issue of January 18, 1870, the Courier describes the town:

Bakersfield as It Was in 1870

Bakersfield, laid out about four months previous to that date, contained the stores of Livermore & Chester and Caswell & Ellis, one telegraph office, a printing office (the Courier) the blacksmith and carriage shop of Fred Macking, a harness shop belonging to Philip Reinstein, Littlefield & Phelan's livery stable, John B. Tungate's saloon, a carpenter shop, a school house with fifty pupils, and two boarding houses. The professions were represented by Dr. L. S. Rogers and Attorney C. H. Veeder. A hotel and grist mill were in contemplation. The Baker toll road was in operation between Bakersfield and the county-seat; there were good wagon roads to Visalia and Los Angeles, and a grade up the mountains to Tehachapi was in progress of building.

The town was protected from flood by a levee built by Colonel Baker, and the whole country was supplied with fuel for a long time to come by the logs washed down by the flood of 1867-8. The editor cheerfully assures the world that the action of the elements is such as to warrant that other floods would wash down more driftwood before the then present supply ran out.

Of the lands on lower Kern river 129,625.34 acres had been entered under the state laws, and 40,000 had been patented for reclamation purposed by individuals. No reclamation districts had been formed under the new law, which provided for the appropriation of $1 per acre for the reclamation of swamp lands. This would make a fund of $129,625.34 available for the reclamation of lands in Kern county, an amount believed to be sufficient to accomplish the task and make nearly 200,000 acres of fine land available for cultivation. There were still some 275,000 acres of government land open to homestead and pre-emption, beside some 50,000 acres of railroad land in the Kern delta which was offered to settlers at government prices.

All this land was considered among the potential assets of Bakersfield. The town was just recovering from an epidemic of fever during the summer previous, and the cause of the fever having been ascribed to drinking water from shallow wells and irrigating ditches, an agitation for deeper wells was under way. Residents of the new town were looking forward to the building of the projected railroad up the valley and were worrying about how they were going to feed the great number of people who would come with the laying of the tracks. They even went to the length of organizing the Kern County Agricultural Society for the promotion of agriculture, so that a plenty of food would be assured the newcomers.

In March of 1870 the town was re-surveyed, and it was announced that shade trees were to be planted at each lot corner. Colonel Baker was building his saw mill, a saw mill at San Emidio had just put in new planing machinery, and Livermore & Chester's saw mill in the Tecuya valley was about to resume work. In 1870 a bill passed the legislature to change the county seat from Havilah to Bakersfield, but Governor Haight did not sign it, and it failed to become a law.

In the county there were five postoffices, the following being the postmasters: At Bakersfield, George B. Chester; at Havilah, H. H. Denker; at Kernville, G. Martel; at Linn's valley, John C. Reid; at Tehachapi, P. D. Green.

The surveyor general's report for 1867, published in 1870 showed that Kern county on the former date had 5,000 acres of land fenced, 2,398 acres under cultivation, 550 acres in wheat which produced 16,500 bushels, 906 acres in barley, which produced 27,180 bushels, 4,000 grape vines. The value of the real estate was placed at $440,000; improvements, $40,000; personal property, $806,500; total, $1,346,500. The estimated population was 1,400, and the number of registered voters was 766.

The Buena Vista Petroleum Company was working hopefully but not profitably at McKittrick, known in early days as Asphalto, almost due west of Bakersfield at the end of the Santa Maria valley.

Sources of Ready Cash

The Courier summed up five sources from which money flowed in greater or less streams, into the channels of Bakersfield's trade. Travellers brought some; a few horses and mules were sold; lumber, posts, etc., from Greenhorn mountain brought in a little; the Jewett Brothers, the Troys, Gustav Sanger, Beale & Baker and others sent away sheep and wool and brought back large sums of gold. George Young, Launder, Tracy & Canfield and others sold beef cattle. Finally the mines, although not so profitable as formerly, were still worked with profit.

The whole population on the "Island" was estimated in 1870 at 600. Outside the town of Bakersfield and scattered ranches there was only the Barnes settlement and the Mexican settlement at what is now Panama. The remainder of the people were in the mountains. Old Tehachapi was a thriving little village, gaining its support from the stock men who were getting well established in the fertile valleys round about, and from the early placer miners, who were working over the gravels of China hill. About forty men were working about the Kernville mines, for the most part on shares; they were just putting in new pumping machinery in the Joe Walker mine; Burdette & Tucker had opened a new lead in Long Tom; Sageland, Clara-ville and other mining camps through the mountains were enjoying fair to medium prosperity; Havilah was passing its best days and looking forward to the time when it must fight for the retention of the county seat, which was coming to be almost as important to its existence as its mines.

The South Fork valley, Walker's basin, Linn's valley, Poso flat and less important valleys in the mountains were becoming centers of development and industry under the hands of the farmers and stockmen.

Early Captains of Industry

The new factors in the county's development took up the task with energy and enthusiasm. It is to be noted that in each instance the men who were supplying the capital for the carrying out of the resident managers' plans lived elsewhere, and except in the case of Henry Miller they appear to have given little personal attention to the details of their Kern county investments. In each case, however, the resident managers were capable of laying their own plans and of carrying them out, also, provided the money kept coming. Julius Chester was the active partner of the firm of Livermore & Chester. Livermore furnished the money, but he seldom came to Bakersfield. George Chester was less aggressive than his brother, and although he figured prominently in the early annals of the city, it was Julius that generally directed affairs in which the company was interested. Under his guidance Livermore & Chester branched out in all directions. They established the leading mercantile house in the county; as noted, they were active, in partnership with Colonel Baker and others, in the formation of reclamation districts and they began to acquire land in all available ways. They bought large tracts from Baker under the Montgomery patent, paying ridiculously small prices therefor. In June, 1870, Livermore & Chester were advertising 20,000 acres of farming land for sale at $2 to $10 per acre. In July, 1870, the Chesters, Livermore & Chester, Thomas Baker, A. R. Jackson, B. Brundage, C. G. Jackson, John Howlett, H. A. Cross, Solomon Jewett and L. G. Barnes filed a petition for the formation of a reclamation district comprising 28,000 acres in townships 29-27, 29-28, 30-28, 31-28 and 32-28, which include the townsite of Bakersfield and the country south to beyond Kern lake. The district previously described lay mostly to the north of Buena Vista lake. On March 11, 1871, the first Bakersfield Club was organized, with George Chester as president, John Howlett as vice president, J. Leopold as secretary and Julius Chester as treasurer. In July, 1871, the new livery stable of Livermore & Chester is described as one of the most imposing structures in the city. It was of adobe, 275 feet long, and 35 feet wide, and was used in connection with the long-distance teaming of those days, in which Livermore & Chester were largely interested directly.

Cotton Growers' Association Formed

In August, 1871, the California Cotton Growers' Association was organized with Julius Chester as president and James Dale as secretary. Dale wrote that "Our vast plantation will be divided into cotton parks of 50 to 100 acres each, surrounded by hedges of mulberry which will be clipped regularly. At intervals in the hedge rows different varieties of fruit trees will be planted to furnish fruit and shade."

A later and fuller prospectus states that the California Cotton Growers and Manufacturers' Association was composed of Californians and Englishmen; that after examining all the San Joaquin valley the association had selected the Kern River valley as the scene of its operations. It had purchased of Livermore & Chester 10,000 acres at $5 per acre and planned to plant 1000 acres of cotton the following spring. The sale from Livermore & Chester to the association also included, according to the statement, the townsite of Bakersfield, sixteen houses, a large brick store and warehouse, the motive power and privileges of the Kern Island Irrigation Company's canal, the new flour mill, the merchandising and transportation business of Livermore & Chester and an improved farm of 1000 acres with tools, teams, etc. The men composing the association were J. H. Redington, A. P. Brayton, C. J. Pillsbury, L. A. Bonestell, Horatio Stebbins, J. D. Johnson, H. C. Livermore and C. Maddux.

In May of 1872, the Livermore saw mill twenty-five miles east of Bakersfield began operations. A little later Julius Chester was on a trip over the mountains to promote a road to the Owens river. All this will indicate briefly, the extent, variety and general character of the activities which Julius Chester directed, and the place which Livermore & Chester and their associates occupied in the enterprise and development of Kern county during this period. During this time the association was spending money freely in the advertising of the county's attractions, and conducting a campaign of general promotion that would have been a credit and advantage to a much older community. It is painful to record that Julius Chester's plans did not materialize financially. It cost more to run the business than the business brought in, and eventually Celsus Brower and S. J. Lansing, who had come to Bakersfield to look after the affairs of Livermore & Chester and the Cotton Growers' Association, found the business in such a badly muddled and unpromising condition that they sent for Livermore and the result was a change of management and a transfer of the property involved to J. H. Redington, a partner of Livermore, in the drug business, as trustee, for adjustment. Celsus Brower remained in charge for some years, untangling the accounts, selling land and town lots, leasing some of the ranches and generally getting what returns he could from the large investments of Livermore's money. Finally the Livermore and Redington interests were sold to Haggin and Carr, and became a part of the principality of which the latter dreamed and for which the former paid.

Kern County News of 1871-3

Detached items of news from the papers printed in 1871-3 will serve as well as a more extended description to give the reader an idea of the plans and ambitions, sorrows and entertainments, dreams and accomplishments of the people of the Kern delta during this interesting period.

February 25, 1871—R. Van Orman's horse lost in a 440-yard race to a nag belonging to Antonio Barreras, and $1000 changed hands on the result. On the same day the Bakersfield sports paid over $500 that they had wagered on Bob Withington's sorrel against Arujo's bay.

May 13, 1871—Public spirited citizens here subscribed $3200 to build a town hall with a lodge room upstairs for the Masons and Odd Fellows.

June 3d—Mr. Lucas is getting ready to again supply Bakersfield with ice from Cross' mountain.

May 27th—The first section of the Kern Island ditch is finished and ready to irrigate (so the paper says) 75,000 acres of land.

An effort is being made to raise money for a church building, and an express office is soon to be opened.

Tiburcio Vasquez, Bartola Sepulveda, Procopio Murietta, Pancho Gollinda and Juan Doe Bacinos have held up the stage near San Jose again.

September 9, 1871—The surveyors for the Southern Pacific railroad are in Bakersfield and the citizens are awakening to the fact that the road is going to miss the main portion of the town.

The third Sunday in October there was a camp meeting on Kern Island.

Stage fare from San Francisco to Bakersfield is $30, and from Los Angeles to Bakersfield, $15. The latter stage is weekly and irregular.

Laborers get $40 to $60 per month, but save no money.

October, 1871—Bishop Amat and Father Dade call the Catholics together to discuss the subject of building a church and school. Julius Chester, Pablo Galtes and Alexis Godey are appointed a committee to raise the funds.

Alfalfa is proving a great success on the island.

Solomon Jewett is awarded a prize of $100 by the state agricultural society for the best paper on cotton growing based on actual experiment.

October, 1871—Havilah residents are beginning to come to Bakersfield, bringing their houses with them.

And the Santa Barbara Press was boosting for a railroad to Bakersfield just as cheerily as it is now (in 1911)—and with the same result.

The railroad is finished about to the Merced river, and farmers are still driving their turkeys from valley points to San Francisco for holiday market.

December 16, 1871—J. S. Brittain lands here to found a Democratic paper—the Southern Californian.

A petition is in circulation to move the county seat from Havilah to Bakersfield.

B. Brundage and E. H. Dumble move here from Havilah.

December, 1871—Surveyor Yates of the San Joaquin Valley Canal Company decides to wait until the weather is settled before continuing his plans for a great canal to start at Antioch, run south along the Coast range mesa to the head of the San Joaquin valley, circle the base of the San Emidio hills, turn north at Tejon, follow the Sierra Nevada mesa to the head of the Sacramento valley, and return on the west side of that valley to a point opposite Antioch. The purpose of the canal is to gather all the waters of all the streams of the interior into one great irrigation system that will water every foot of land in the two great valleys. (It is too bad the plan was never carried out!)

January, 1872—Freight by teams from Los Angeles to Bakersfield costs 4 cents per pound.

April, 1872—The legislature defeats a bill to repeal the fence law, and a meeting is called in the town hall to discuss means of protection from wild cattle. The fight over the fence law is between the farmers and the stockmen. The latter want a law which will practically compel the farmers to fence their lands or suffer damage from stock that may trespass upon them, while the farmers want the burden of herding the cattle or paying damages placed on the stockmen.

The same month—Surveyors are laying out the town of Fresno on the line of the new railroad.

May 22, 1872—The Hotel Association is selling stock, and plans to build a first class hotel.

June, 1872—Mechanics are leaving their work in town and flocking to the placer gravels along Kern river about nine miles above Bakersfield.

August, 1872—Drs. Baker of Visalia and Howard of San Francisco are here to look at new coal mines and petroleum deposits at the base of the Coast range west of Bakersfield. The San Francisco Gas Company is planning to make gas of crude oil.

The great register of the county for 1872 contains 785 names, divided among the several precincts as follows: Bakersfield, 245; Linn's valley, 140; Tehachapi, 90; Havilah, 85; Kernville, 60; South Fork, 40; Sageland, 35; Bear Valley, 30; Tejon, 25; Walker's Basin, 15; Long Tom, 10.

November, 1872—A. Cross arrives with three teams from Owen river with 335 bars of lead bullion, or 30,000 pounds. The bullion was hauled to the foot of the lake by steamers from the furnaces on the other side. It took ten days to make the trip by team from the lake to Bakersfield.

November, 1872—Colonel Baker makes the first successful attempt to burn a kiln of brick.

Sunday, November 24, 1872—At 1 p. m. Colonel Baker dies of typhoid pneumonia. His funeral is held from the town hall the following Tuesday, and the entire population of the town attends. The Masons conduct the service, and A. R. Jackson delivers the oration. The body was buried in Union cemetery, the ground for which was selected by Colonel Baker about a year before.

---

CHAPTER VIII

Bakersfield Becomes the County Metropolis

In the process of gathering the data for this history the author asked one of the men who have been intimately associated with its larger affairs during the last forty years to name over the chief events in the history of Bakersfield. He answered:

"The history of Bakersfield is a story of hope deferred, of promises unfulfilled. First we prayed for a railroad. We got it, but it did not unlock the door of our possibilities as we expected it would. Then we prayed for colonization. Everything was made ready to answer that prayer, when the contest over the water rights interfered and nothing could be done toward cutting up the land until that was settled. It took years to settle it. When it was out of the way and the colonization scheme was undertaken, just at the start, when everybody's hope was stimulated, the town burned up. We rebuilt on hope, and the colonization scheme went forward. Most of the colonists who came were not farmers, or if they knew how to farm in the east or in England they did not know how to farm here. The water was managed badly; some of the ground was waterlogged, the ditches broke, things dried out on the high ground and flooded out on the low ground. Just as the orchards and vineyards came into bearing the panic of 1893-4 broke. There was no local market, and fruit shipped east would hardly pay the freight; sometimes it did not pay the freight and they sent back a bill to the shipper. The seasons about that time were dry, but we could have managed that. The greatest handicap was transportation charges. Then we prayed for a competing railroad. The Valley road (the Santa Fe) was built, but it did not compete. There never was a thing happened in this county that really gave it any chance, that offered any opportunity to go ahead and do things until they began to develop the oil fields."

Understand that this is the speech of an optimist, not a pessimist. Through nearly all this period (this era of hopes deferred and promises unfulfilled) Bakersfield was counted by travellers and travelling salesmen as one of the "best towns" in the state. It was always full of life and interest, always there was something doing. Only to the men of intimate knowledge of the county's possibilities and of abounding faith in the county's future has the history of the past forty years been one of hopes deferred and promises unfulfilled.

Nevertheless, throughout these forty years the attitude of this optimist who speaks like a pessimist has been a typical one. Literally hundreds of people, looking about at the immense body of fertile land that fills the heart of the county, the great river that flows down from the mountains at exactly the most convenient spot for irrigating it, the warm, even climate and the tremendous treasures of oil and other mineral wealth that the hills and mountains contain, have been amazed, irritated and angered because circumstances have prevented Bakersfield from becoming the largest city in the interior of the state, as it justly deserves to be.

Understand, also, that it is only in the retrospect that the Bakersfield optimist has seen that the history of the town was a story of promises unfulfilled. For only brief periods during all these forty years has the town been lingering elsewhere than on the threshold of a great new boom. It was on the threshold of one of its booms when its founder, Colonel Baker, died. The fertility of the Kern delta was fully established, capitalists in the person of Livermore & Chester were promising great things, plans for getting the remaining portions of the public domain into private hands with the least possible effort and the speediest dispatch were going forward without a hitch worth mentioning, the example of Colonel Baker inspired the belief that so soon as these public lands were patented they would be offered for sale at modest prices, and the Southern Pacific railroad was headed down the valley with the long desired transportation facilities. Bakersfield was convinced of her future greatness, and was preparing to take her first steps forward by incorporating as a city and by wresting the county seat from Havilah.

Bakersfield Gets the County Seat

The contest for the removal of the county seat from Havilah to Bakersfield, preliminary skirmishes of which had been taking place occasionally for years before, assumed final, serious form in January, 1873, when, in response to a petition signed by upward of one-third of the registered voters of the county, the supervisors called an election for February 15th to determine the question.

F. W. Craig, who was one of the supervisors at the time and who fought hard for the retention of the county seat at Havilah, says that the Havilah partisans did not hope to keep the county seat permanently, but they objected to its going to Bakersfield because they considered the place unsuited on account of its low and swampy character. They believed that with the building of the railroad a new and more permanent town would be founded somewhere on higher ground than Bakersfield, and their fight was to keep the county offices at Havilah until the expected new town could develop and assert its claim to the seat of government.

The sincerity of the men who made the fight against Bakersfield on the ground of healthfulness is shown by subsequent action on the part of some of them, although a very few years sufficed to prove that their fears were ungrounded. Dr. L. Brown, the county physician in the days of Havilah's supremacy, declined to follow the court house to Bakersfield but gave up his practice and moved to a farm in Walker's basin where he would at least have the advantage of the mountain air. By the irony of fate the good doctor died a short time thereafter, while his widow, who some years later became the wife of General Freeman, came to Bakersfield, where she still lives in the best of health and possessed of an energy and activity that would do credit to a woman of half her years. Mr. Craig, who afterward was county clerk, came down to the valley perforce, but he took up his residence in Sumner (now East Bakersfield), and still maintains that there is more ozone in the air east of Union avenue than west of it.

Bakersfield people contented themselves with pointing to the mortality tables and making fun of the contention of Havilah that Bakersfield was not a "fit place for a gentleman to live," but to the complaint that it would cost the county a large sum of money to erect the necessary new buildings which a change in the county seat would entail, they presented a more material answer. Morris Jacoby gave a bond, with F. A. Tracy and Solomon Jewett as sureties, that he would build a brick jail and lease it to the county for five years free of cost if the election resulted in moving the county seat. Julius Chester signed a lease to the county at $1 per year for a one-story brick building to be used to house the county offices. On the same terms John Howlett and Julius Chester, as trustees, leased to the county the town hall for a court room. The lease was for five years.

Contest Over Election

First unofficial returns of the election gave a majority of twelve for Bakersfield, but when the vote was canvassed on February 24th, Supervisors Craig and John M. Brite, father of the present supervisor, voted to reject the returns of Hudson, Bear valley and Walker's basin precincts on account of irregularities on the part of the election officials. Solomon Jewett, the third supervisor, recently elected, voted to count the returns from the three precincts but was outweighed, and Havilah was declared to be the choice of the voters for the county seat by a vote of 328 to 318.

An application for a writ of mandamus compelling the supervisors to count the returns of the rejected precincts was thrown out of court by Judge Colby on a demurrer filed by Supervisors Craig and Brite. An appeal was then taken to the district court.

Meantime there was another county election, and John Narboe succeeded Brite as supervisor from the third district, and Andrew H. Denker was appointed to fill the unexpired term of Supervisor Craig, who had been elected county clerk. This changed the attitude of the majority of the board on the county seat removal, Supervisors Jewett and Narboe favoring Bakersfield while Denker, who was a merchant and hotel owner of Havilah, stood for his own town. Jewett was chairman of the board.

The case was entitled People of the State of California on the relation of A. R. Jackson, plaintiffs, against the Board of Supervisors of Kern County, defendants, and was heard before Judge Alec Deeming at Tulare. B. Brundage appeared as counsel for the plaintiff, and A. J. Atwell represented the board of supervisors as the defendant. An answer filed by Attorney A. C. Lawrence and verified by Supervisor Denker, was stricken out by the court on affidavit of Supervisors Jewett and Narboe that he did not represent the board. The case being submitted on the pleadings, Judge Deeming issued a peremptory writ of mandate requiring the supervisors to canvass the vote of the Hudson-Rosemyer and Bear Valley precincts. The returns as finally canvassed on January 26, 1874, gave Bakersfield a majority of twenty-two votes, and stood, according to precincts, as follows:

Havilah—Havilah, 97; Bakersfield, nothing.

South Fork—Havilah, 33; Bakersfield, 1.

Hudson-Rosemyer—Havilah, nothing; Bakersfield, 14.

Kern Island—Havilah, 5; Bakersfield, 265.

Long Tom—Havilah, nothing; Bakersfield, 10.

Tehachapi—Havilah, 40; Bakersfield, 18.

Bear Valley—Havilah, 4; Bakersfield, 22.

Sageland—Havilah, 22; Bakersfield, 1.

Linn's Valley—Havilah, 38; Bakersfield, 23.

Kernville—Havilah, 72; Bakersfield, nothing.

Claraville—Havilah, 21; Bakersfield, nothing.

Totals—Havilah, 332; Bakersfield, 354.

No election was held in Alpine precinct, and for some reason the vote of Walker's Basin was never included in the official count.

For a short time the seat of government was transferred to the town hall in Bakersfield, located on the present site of the Beale Memorial library. But preparations at once were made for more permanent quarters. An act of the legislature was secured authorizing the board of supervisors to bond the county for $25,000 for a court house and jail. In lieu of the offers of free rent for the county offices, George B. Chester tendered and the board accepted on September 1, 1874, a deed to the block of land just south of Truxtun avenue and west of Chester avenue. In those days the intersection of these avenues was considered the civic center of Bakersfield, and all streets were numbered with reference to that point. Seventeenth street was known as First street North, Eighteenth street was Second street North, and Nineteenth street was Third street North. I street was First street West, etc.

New Public Buildings

On October 5th, a contract was let to A. W. Burrell of the California Bridge and Building Company for the new court house at a price of $29,999, the work to be completed within a year. T. W. Goodale, who had succeeded Denker as supervisor, voted against the awarding of the contract for the reason that the price was in excess of the bond issue. The new court house which comprised the south wing of the building now in use, was accepted April 3, 1876, on the favorable report of a committee of inspectors composed of J. A. Riley, N. R. Wilkinson, E. H. Dumble and P. A. Stine. The court house was furnished for $3802. In the fall a contract was let to William McFarland to build a county hospital for $1400. For a time a branch hospital was maintained at Havilah, and later a branch was established at Hot Springs. In November, 1874, a branch jail was built at Kernville for $200, and in 1875 the old county jail at Havilah was presented to Caliente and moved to that place.

Bakersfield's First Incorporation

Meantime Bakersfield had launched on its first experiment as an incorporated town. Pursuant to a petition of the citizens, the county supervisors at their May meeting, 1873, declared the town incorporated and called an election of officers for May 24th. J. B. Tungate, E. H. Dumble and A. R. Jackson were appointed election officers. The town limits included all of section 30, 29-28; the east half of the southwest quarter and the east half of the northeast quarter of section 25, 29-27. The following were chosen for the first officers of the new municipality:

Trustees—W. S. Adams, president; L. S. Rogers, M. Jacoby, J. B. Tungate and R. W. Withington.

Recorder—A. R. Jackson.

Treasurer—J. Weill.

Assessor—William McFarland.

Marshal—Joseph Short.

Adams was a liveryman, Jacoby and Weill were merchants, Rogers was a physician, and Withington and Tungate were saloon keepers.

The new board fixed a license of $20 per year on saloons and general merchandise establishments; $10 per year on breweries, and lesser sums on other businesses. They made it a petit larceny offense to use water from an irrigating ditch without permission; required that all canals must be bridged to the full width of the streets; forbade bathing in the ditches, and fixed a limit of three cubic feet on the amount of litter that might be piled in either of the two chief business streets of the city.

The First Hope Deferred

Meantime, also, the long cherished hope of a railroad into Kern county had been realized at last. On July 21, 1873, the track had been completed to a point four miles south of the north county line, and there work was stopped, as the people of Bakersfield complained, "out in an open plain, thirty miles from wood or water, thirty miles from the nearest farm house, thirty miles from the nearest point where the transportation company could hope to get a single passenger or a single pound of freight." There was a wail of protest from residents of Bakersfield and Kern Island, who could not understand why the road had not been completed at least to the north bank of the river. Whether the railroad builders had run out of funds or were actuated by motives of purposeless, inscrutable malice were questions of common debate during the eight months or more that the grading and track-laying gangs were idle. The latter hypothesis, however, seems to have been the more popular. About this time the Courier refers editorially to the alleged fact that from its very beginning the railroad was the object of popular distrust. This aversion or hostility went even so far, the paper declared, that settlers were buying little railroad land, although it was offered at attractive prices and was generally of good quality and desirably located.

Delano Is Founded

But while the railroad halted and the people of Bakersfield fumed, the new town of Delano was founded and became a flourishing business center on a small but active scale. Merchandise that formerly was delivered to the Kern delta and all the mountain districts via Visalia, Walker's pass or Tejon cañon now came to Delano and was hauled thence by freight teams. All outgoing freight was delivered there, even to the great loads of bullion from the Cerro Gordo mines. The sheep shearing camps that had been scattered over the country from White river to Poso creek moved up toward Delano to shorten the haul by wagon. The stage from Los Angeles made that place its northern terminal, dry wheat farmers on the mesas between the railroad and the Sierras increased in number, and broke trails to the railroad, and generally Delano became a very lively and prosperous place.

The Story of Eph Johnson's Ox Team

Just how new and strange a thing a railroad was in the San Joaquin valley then is illustrated by the story of Eph Johnson, one of the best known of the teamsters who broke the trails from the mountains to the new shipping point. On one of his first trips to Delano Johnson got his first near view of a freight engine. He looked the thing over, and did not think much of it. Loyalty to the old methods of transportation and instinctive antagonism toward this new machine that threatened to put the teams and teamsters out of business got him into an argument with the trainmen, and finally Johnson bet his eight good oxen against the locomotive that he could drag the iron horse backward on the rails that had been laid with so much expense for it to run upon. Johnson stipulated that he should be allowed to tighten the chains before the engine was started, and he cracked his long bull whip and shouted to Baldy, the leader. Baldy stiffened his neck to the yoke, and all the eight great animals got their hoofs against the ties and sank their bellies low toward the soft, new roadbed in a perfect exhibition of bovine team-work. Then the engineer opened the throttle and jerked the finest eight-ox team in Kern county into a tangled mass of chains and cattle. The trainmen had no more use for Johnson's oxen than Johnson would have had for the engine, and so the bet was never paid, but it cost the teamster the value of at least one yoke of cattle before the thirst of the other teamsters, the railroad crews and all the population of Delano was assuaged.

News Notes of 1873-75

A few more news notes of the time will fill out the detail in this picture of the county in 1873-75:

June 22, 1873—At Tehachapi Brite & Bennington are building a steam saw mill with a capacity of 10,000 feet in twelve hours.

Tehachapi merchants are asking 100 per cent profit on grain sold to Owens river teamsters.

John Narboe & Co. are gathering salt from the salt lake near Tehachapi.

Green & Henderson clean up $1,438 in their hydraulic mine near Tehachapi.

The Kern & Inyo Forwarding Company advertises for fifty mule teams to haul between the end of the railroad and Owens lake, and guarantees a full load both ways.

Stage fare from Delano to Bakersfield (thirty-two miles) is $7; from Bakersfield to Los Angeles, $25; from San Francisco to Los Angeles, $25. The "long and short haul" problem is a cause of complaint.

August 2, 1873—Escalet's new hotel at the corner of Chester avenue and Third street (now Nineteenth) is completed.

August 23d—The affairs of the California Cotton Growers' Association and Livermore & Chester have been assigned to J. H. Redington.

August 23, 1873—Tiburcio Vasquez is reported overtaken in Rock cañon east of Los Angeles.

September 12, 1873—Montgomery and Burkhalter of Tulare are building a schooner-rigged boat fifty feet in length and of seventy tons burden for Atwell & Goldstein, who have an immense hog ranch on an island in Tulare lake.

November 22, 1873—J. C. Crocker and Miller & Lux are fencing a great tract of land between Buena Vista and Goose lakes with redwood posts and lumber shipped from Oregon. They will plant alfalfa.

Many stage robberies are reported from Visalia.

December 6, 1873—The Stine Irrigating Canal Company levies an assessment of $25 per share.

Farmers' Irrigating Canal Company is supplying water to a new district between Panama and Kern lake, which is fast settling up. A school is to be opened there in February, with Mrs. S. A. Burnap as teacher.

January 17, 1874—W. B. Carr, the "world renowned Billy Carr, political Napoleon of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company," is here looking over the country. He owns some land in Kern county and is anxious to get more. He has plans for the complete and thorough irrigation of the valley.

A bill is introduced in the legislature to form a new county out of a strip of territory cut from the north end of Kern and the south end of Tulare counties, Porterville to be the county seat and the name of the new county to be Monache. (The bill, of course, did not pass.)

March 7, 1874—Julius Chester, E. Tibbet, P. Tibbet and R. Trewin are raising funds to build a Methodist Episcopal church. The building is to be open for the use of all evangelical denominations.

The Pioneer canal is finished for a distance of eight miles.

W. G. Souther, who is building the Kern Island canal, is having constructed at Hollister a big plow with a mould board eleven feet long by nearly three feet deep which will cut a furrow five feet wide and two feet deep. The naked plow will weigh 1800 pounds, and eighty horses or forty yoke of oxen will be required to pull it.

The Kern Valley Bank, incorporated on February 24, 1874, with a capital of $50,000, will open for business in the Wells Fargo office about April 20th. Solomon Jewett is president; S. J. Lansing, secretary; F. A. Tracy, P. T. Colby and P. D. Jewett, directors.

April 6, 1874—Work on the extension of the Southern Pacific railroad south from Delano is resumed with 100 men and thirty-five teams.

Local option is the subject of agitation all over the state.

Rev. Thomas Fraser, Presbyterian missionary, preaches in the court house.

Citizens discuss a plan to build a water tank thirty or forty feet high near the flour mill to afford a gravity pressure for fire protection.

The two business streets of the town are sprinkled.

Mexicans are preparing for a bull and bear fight in the southern outskirts of the town.

Local option loses in Tulare township because the returns from a precinct giving an anti-license majority of twenty-seven votes were sealed up in the envelope marked "ballots" and so were not counted in the official canvass. The unofficial count gave a majority of one against the saloons.

August 1, 1874—Trains reach the north side of Kern river.

August 29, 1874—The Southern Pacific is grading for the depot (at the present site in East Bakersfield.) A large body of land in the vicinity has been covered with indemnity scrip, and the railroad probably will lay out a town.

October 10, 1874—The Bakersfield Fire Company meets to adopt a constitution. N. R. Wilkinson is foreman; W. McFarland, assistant foreman; A. T. Whitman, secretary; W. E. Houghton, treasurer. A fireman's ball is planned for November 6th.

December 19, 1874—Judge Brundage plants out eucalyptus trees about his residence (at the northwest corner of H and Eighteenth streets).

Mining excitement at Panamint.

January, 1875—The river is in flood and the only way to cross is by the railroad bridge. No damage.

February, 1875—Seven or eight Mexicans, supposed to have been led by Chavez, one of Vasquez' lieutenants, rob the store of William Scodie about five miles above Weldon on the South Fork. They tied Scodie, stole about $800, a new outfit of clothing and a horse apiece and left toward Indian Wells.

W. B. Carr expects to sow about 1500 acres of alfalfa this season. The Southern Pacific engineers are struggling with the grade up Tehachapi. The roadbed is built about fourteen miles east of Bakersfield.

February 27, 1875—The Bakersfield brass band holds its third anniversary ball. A revival is in progress at the Methodist church. The Good Templars organize Kern Island lodge. Murders and robberies are constantly reported throughout the county.

March, 1875—Much building is going on in Bakersfield. Lumber is $40 per thousand, and brick are $10. The great Kernville gold ledge has been traced for twenty-five miles. A thousand men are working on the railroad grade to Tehachapi.

Bakersfield Tires of Being a City and Disincorporates

On February 27, 1875, the Kern County Courier announced that the town government was a miserable failure. A large amount of money had been collected in the form of licenses, the editor declared, but there was little or nothing to show for it. If a beginning had been made toward building a sewer system or a municipal water works or if some other substantial public improvement were in evidence, the incorporation of the city might be justified, but there were none of these. This was the line of argument that appeared in the press. Pioneers who were active in public affairs at the time, however, say that the town was disincorporated to get rid of the marshal—Alex Mills.

Alex Mills was one of the thousand or more picturesque characters that have graced the history of Kern county and given it the pungent, preservative spice of human interest. He was an old man, by the time he became marshal of Bakersfield, and walked with a cane. But he was a Kentuckian, a handy man with a gun and not lacking in initiative and resource when the mood moved him. For example, once when he was given papers to serve in an attachment suit against the Southern Pacific railroad, Alex chained a log to the rails, sat down on it with his rifle in his hands and announced that he had attached the track, the roadbed, and the right of way and there would be nothing stirring over them until the judgment was satisfied. It was promptly satisfied.

But these exhibitions of energy on the part of the town's historic marshal seem not to have happened very often. Urged to relate what Alex did that the town should want to get rid of his services, pioneers, one after another declare, "Nothing. He just stumped around from one saloon to another and at the end of the month he drew his seventy-six dollars." But diligent research reveals the fact that Alex had a habit of telling the truth on unfelicitous occasions. Perhaps he would stump into the office or store of a prominent citizen and something like this conversation would ensue:

"Mr. Blank, suh, good morning."

"Good morning, Mr. Mills."

"Mr. Blank, suh, you're the pop-eyed progeny of a race of runts. Nature never marks her critters wrong, suh. A pop-eyed man will steal, a pop-eyed pup will suck eggs, and a pop-eyed woman will flirt with the hired help."

"Good morning, suh."

And the marshal would stump out.

Of course this is not what Marshal Mills really said. His language was apt to be too lurid and literal for the genteel purposes of print. But the paraphrase furnishes some faint idea of the historic marshal's frank and freehand offensiveness. Such means of recall as were then available were discussed by the good citizens, but they were assured by the undaunted Alex that "you may remove me from my office, suh, but my constituents will triumphantly elect me again," which everyone knew to be a fact.

And so the good citizens disguised the issue. They pleaded economy and everything else that might suggest itself as an argument for disincorporation. A petition was duly circulated, duly signed by more than three-fourths of the legal voters of the city, and the county supervisors, acting under the law as it then existed, on January 4, 1876, declared that Bakersfield was disincorporated. Samuel J. Lansing was appointed to close the municipality's financial affairs. On April 3, 1876, Lansing filed his report with the county board, and Bakersfield was free from all restraint, expense and contumely incident to city marshals until January 11, 1898, a respite of twenty-two years, during which period Bakersfield and Kern county passed through many experiences and were the scene of many stirring events, the story of which must now be recounted.

---

CHAPTER IX

The Contests Over Water Rights Begin

Referring back to the news items reproduced in the previous chapter it will be noted that on August 23, 1873, appeared a legal notice to the effect that the affairs of the California Cotton Growers' Association, and Livermore & Chester had been transferred to J. H. Redington; that in November of the same year J. C. Crocker and Miller & Lux were fencing in a great tract of land between Buena Vista and Goose lakes and preparing to sow alfalfa; that in January, 1874, "the world-renowned Billy Carr, political Napoleon for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company," was in Kern county looking over his possessions here and planning how to increase them.

About 1874 Dr. George F. Thornton was getting the Bellvue and McClung ranches established for J. B. Haggin. In the same year W. G. Souther was having the big plow built at Hollister for use in completing the reclamation of swamp land district No. 111, a task which had been taken over by the Kern Island Irrigation Canal Company, which was a Livermore & Chester enterprise, now assigned to J. H. Redington. In March, 1876, Livermore mortgaged to William Houston 5736 acres of land for $60,000. On October 1, 1877, Livermore mortgaged 9792.72 acres of Kern county land to Redington for $97,000. On the same date another mortgage was executed between the same parties involving 12,800 acres of land and $128,000. In the same year, which was one of exceptional drought, Livermore & Chester (as the concern continued to be known despite the transfers noted) are credited by newspaper report with having spent $20,000 in the construction of a dam of brush and gravel thrown across Kern river for the purpose of turning the water into the Kern Island canal. On July 2, 1877, the Kern Valley Water Company, of which J. H. Redington was president and H. P. Livermore was secretary, made an agreement with the trustees of swamp land district No. 116 or 121 (lying north of Buena Vista lake) to complete the work of reclamation which the trustees of the district had begun. In March, 1877, Congress passed the desert land act, and work was begun on the Calloway canal. In January, 1878, Livermore made another mortgage to Redington covering 4480 acres for a consideration of $44,800. In 1878 the Kern Valley Colony issued a prospectus offering seventeen sections of land under the Kern Island canal for sale at $25 per acre in tracts of forty to eighty acres at terms of one-fifth cash, with the balance in four annual payments; interest at nine per cent. For information apply to H. P. Livermore, San Francisco, or Celsus Brower, Bakersfield.

COL. THOMAS BAKER

In June, 1879, Livermore and Redington sold to J. B. Haggin the Cotton ranch, comprising 729.03 acres in what is now the northwestern part of the city of Bakersfield. The consideration was nothing. A previous deed had conveyed all the other Livermore and Redington holdings in Kern county to Haggin, and after the deal had been completed Redington threw in this remaining body of land—now selling in town lots at $20 to $200 per front foot—for good measure, and also, as there is good reason to suppose, because he did not care to keep any souvenir of his Kern county investments.

Add to the foregoing the record of suit after suit filed against Livermore & Chester, Livermore & Redington and the different parties individually by Haggin & Carr, all dismissed or compromised, and you will have a fairly complete syllabus of the complicated chapter in the history of Kern county which bridges over the period during which Haggin & Carr and Miller & Lux came to be the overshadowing factors in Kern county's development; during which Bakersfield's first hope of colonization came to naught, and most of the remaining sections of valuable farming land in the valley portion of the county were thoughtfully gathered up. The chapter includes, also, the first bitter contests over the control of the waters of Kern river, and the placing of the troops and batteries for the great battle that was to come later on between the appropriators represented by Haggin and the riparianists represented by Miller & Lux.

The Decline of Livermore & Chester

Livermore & Redington were wholesale druggists of San Francisco, men of large wealth outside of their drug business, and are referred to by their Kern county acquaintances as of most estimable character. From the start their Kern county land investments were a side venture, and commanded little of their personal attention. Livermore came to Bakersfield but seldom, and Redington almost never. Taking them on their face, nothing could have been more promising than the Kern county swamp land projects. The early reclamation contracts, as we have seen, were taken on the basis of an acre of land in return for moving two cubic yards of earth in the construction of canals and levees. Ten or a dozen years later E. M. Roberts and H. W. Broad took a contract to finish the Calloway canal at seven cents for moving ordinary earth and nine cents for hardpan, and they made big money. The haul is longer and heavier in building a big canal like the Calloway than in a smaller canal like the Kern Island, and the earth moved in the former averaged much heavier and harder to handle than was that in the latter. It would seem that under normal circumstances and management the men who participated with Colonel Baker in the original contract for the reclamation of district No. 111 should have secured their land at an outlay of ten or fifteen cents per acre.

But many things combined to overturn what seemed to be perfectly laid plans. Before the arrival of the railroad, materials of all kinds that had to be shipped in were exceedingly high in price, and after the railroad came the expected reductions in transportation charges were only partially realized. Labor was scarce and inefficient. Drinking water from shallow wells or irrigation ditches resulted in a liberal infection of workmen with the microbe of weariness, and efforts to drown the microbes in the bad liquors that unlimited saloons dispensed were not wholly successful from all points of view.

Then it was an era of large ideas. The big plow that Souther had built at Hollister was not his first nor largest invention of the kind. He built in the Livermore & Chester shops at Bakersfield a plow designed to cut a furrow five feet in width and three feet deep, whereas the Hollister plow cut a furrow three feet wide and two feet deep. The top of the mould board of the first plow was even with the head of a man on horseback. The depth of the cut was controlled by a screw operated from a platform high over the shear, and a long lever extending to the rear was used in keeping the furrow straight. With forty yoke of oxen hitched to it the plow would cut through a cottonwood root as thick as a fat man's arm and the shear and coulter shaved a clean path through the thickets of button willows that grew along the sloughs. The plow was perfectly designed and constructed, according to men who saw its try-out, but the oxen walked so slowly that the earth which the shear picked up was not carried out on the mould board but fell back in the furrow as in the case of a plow that does not "scour." When the bull whackers beat the cattle into a faster gait the plow made a clean furrow, but the faster gait could not be maintained, and at the end of a twelve-mile furrow it was evident that the big plow was almost as unsuited for ditch-building as it would be for a watch charm.

Then Souther had the "little" plow built at Hollister. This could be handled with forty head of mules, and the faster animals made the new plow a success. Many of the smaller ditches about the delta were made with the Hollister plow, but its use benefited chiefly the assigns of Livermore & Redington.

Fertile Causes of Litigation

In the early days of irrigation in Kern county it was the custom to build wing dams of sand or of sand and brush in times when the river was low to force the water into the canals. These wing dams would start just below the head of the canal and extend at an angle upward and across the river nearly to the farther bank. A freshet sufficient to raise the water above the top of these dams would speedily melt them away, scattering the brush to form impeding islands in the river bed, and the work would have to be repeated so soon as the river fell again. Before the Kern valley canal was finished the cost of these wing dams had reached so great an aggregate that the managers of the enterprise decided to move the intake higher up on the river. This was done, the new intake being finished in 1874. The old south fork channel, however, was still used in lieu of a canal, the water being turned into the old channel from the new intake. Still later the head of the Kern Island canal was moved still farther up the river, and an artificial canal substituted for the old natural channel south as far as the present mill. All these changes were made the excuse for a number of law suits over water rights, the questions involved turning on use, priority and the right of riparian owners to have a natural water course maintained. The suits and the questions involved were technical and of little interest to the average reader except to suggest the numberless good opportunities for litigation that arose while the waters of Kern river were being apportioned. Few such opportunities, it may be added, were allowed to pass unseized.

The agreement between the Kern Island Canal Company and the trustees of the irrigation district was that the company should construct the canal and necessary levees for $16,240, the company to own the canal and retain the right to the use of the water, provided that the owner of swamp land should be given one share of stock in the canal company for every fifty dollars which his land paid into the reclamation fund, and provided that the owners of swamp land in the district should have the preference right—or the exclusive right in case they demanded it—to purchase the water in the canal at rates which would net the canal company a return not to exceed ten per cent of its capital stock annually.

First Great Fight Over Water Rights

When the very dry year of 1877 came the former expedients to which the Kern Island Canal Company had resorted to draw the water into its ditch did not suffice, and the dam, which is alleged to have cost $20,000 was built across the river. Not only were brush and sand used, but wooden chutes were built against the shoulder of Panorama heights and gravel and boulders were chuted down to the river edge to serve as more enduring ballast. Heavy timbers also were used to stay the waters, and the dam took on so much the character of a permanent work that settlers and water users over the entire delta from Bakersfield to Buena Vista lake were up in vigorous protest against this alleged effort to monopolize the entire flow of the river.

It is profitless now, as well as difficult, to decide just where the right and justice lay. Those who were close to Livermore say that the dam was never intended to take all the water of the river and never did so. It was to act merely as the present weirs do, and it was only for the purpose of diverting into the Kern Island canal the amount of water which was due it by right of prior appropriation. This right, they point out, was later established and affirmed by the Miller-Haggin agreement and the Shaw decree, and to this day the canal is entitled to its quota of water whenever there is that much in the river and whether there is anything left for other canals or not.

Partisans of Livermore go on to say that much of the outcry against the Kern Island was raised by Carr, who had begun a systematic campaign to oust Livermore and Redington from their commanding position on the river and (like the astute and experienced politician that he was) sought to enlist popular sentiment as one of the chief means for carrying out his ends.

At any rate, it appears that about this time Carr was a prince of good fellows. He was suffering as much as any of the smaller water users, but he was willing to divide with everyone the little trickles that the monopolistic Kern Island people permitted to come down past their works. In fact Carr was the leader and ally of the anti-monopolists, and he was efficient and resourceful.

The men who relate the story from the other side say that no objection ever was made to the Kern Island company's dams so long as they built them of brush and sand as others did, and no complaint was made against the Kern Island taking all the water to which it was entitled and which the irrigators under it could use. The objectors, however, go on to affirm that so much water was forced into the Kern Island canal that it broke and the precious fluid ran to waste over untilled lands while settlers farther down the river had to stand by and see their crops perish for want of moisture. Out of this difference of opinion regarding right and equity and of understanding as to matters of fact, arose the first great contest over the waters of Kern river.

The contests between Haggin & Carr and Livermore & Chester were not so fierce nor on so large a scale as those that came later between Haggin & Carr and Miller & Lux, but they were fairly strenuous. On one occasion when Carr had secured from the court a restraining order to prevent Livermore & Chester from placing a dam across the river to force the water into the Kern Island canal, instructions were issued to the Livermore superintendents to proceed with the work on the assurance that the injunction would be lifted the following morning. From every camp the men and teams were started out at noon, each taking an independent course as though going about some ordinary work, but all of them arriving during the afternoon at the foot of Panorama heights where the Kern Island intake was. The hours until nightfall were spent in quietly filling bags with sand and piling them on the river's edge. When darkness fell, two hundred men under the direction of C. L. Connor and C. C. Stockton began building a wall of sand bags out into the stream.

Carr's scouts discovered what was going on about midnight, but nothing was done until morning, when Connor and Stockton were placed under arrest for contempt of court. There had been a hitch and the injunction was not lifted. The judge was furious, and Carr was insistent on the officers placing Connor and Stockton in jail, but J. C. Crocker interceded, and Crocker's influence in those days was potent, even with a judge whose dignity had been badly ruffled. The men did not go to jail, and both of them afterward were given good positions by Carr, who could recognize an efficient fighter no matter which side he happened to be on.

As to just what happened to Livermore & Chester's dams the testimony differs, but a notice published in a paper of a little later date offers a substantial reward for the arrest and conviction of the person or persons that dynamited them.

Colony Plan Is Nipped in the Tender Bud

Of course, with Haggin's millions and Carr's far-famed genius and generalship arrayed against them, Livermore and Redington did not fight as stubbornly as they might under more equal terms. No suit of importance seems to have been decided against them, and their contention respecting the paramount rights of the Kern Island canal was never overwhelmed. In 1878 they demonstrated their faith in their position by putting a magnificent body of land under the Kern Island canal on the market and printing a book and maps descriptive of the advantages of Kern county that would do high honor to any colonization agency of present days. At the rate of $1000 for a forty-acre farm and the best water right in the county, $200 down and $200 each year for four years, the seventeen sections which the Kern Valley Colony offered should have sold readily and Bakersfield's early colonization hopes should have been redeemed. But the sale to Haggin checked the colony plans before they got under way, and a long halt was called in the matter of inducing settlement, for Carr had drawn his plans on a much greater scale than any of the earlier land holders, and he was by no means ready to begin subdivision in the year 1879.

Purposes of Haggin & Carr

It would be a matter of much interest were it possible to ascertain with absolute certainty what were the ultimate plans that Carr had in mind for the vast estate which he helped to upbuild. Some of his old friends state with assurance that he intended (when he had gotten together all the land available in the county and had secured full control of the water) to launch a great colonization scheme and build a little empire of small land owners. Carr is quoted as having called attention to the fact that he was a younger man than either J. B. Haggin or Lloyd Tevis, the other and larger partners in the enterprise, and remarking that in the end he expected his plans to prevail. But the oldest of the three men survives alone, and years before his death Carr's policy was over-ridden and his interest in the Kern county lands purchased.

In a statement published in May, 1880, J. B. Haggin over his signature declared that his purpose was not to monopolize the lands he was acquiring in Kern county but that he intended to offer them for sale on liberal terms. In the early days, however, Haggin's trips to Kern county were very few and very brief. He came in his private car, was driven direct to Belle View, where he looked at the blooded racers that were bred for him there, returned to his car and was sped away. Lloyd Tevis was a banker of San Francisco, and while his financial interest in the Kern county venture dates from the beginning of operations here, his name was not connected with the firm, which for years was known locally as Haggin & Carr or Carr & Haggin, and which appeared in the chief legal documents as J. B. Haggin.

Carr's money contribution to the Kern county venture is variously estimated as high as $500,000 to $800,000. Others declare it was very much less. The Gates tract of approximately 52,000 acres, being the odd sections in townships 30-26, 30-27, 31-26, and 31-27, and comprising the heart of the Kern river delta, was the foundation of the Carr & Haggin holdings. This was a tract of railroad land which fell into the hands of Isaac Gates of New York shortly after the grant of the odd sections along the line of the proposed Atlantic & Pacific railway had been made by Congress. Carr's position as political manipulator for the Southern Pacific enabled him, without doubt, to secure other railroad lands on agreeable terms, and he took steps at once to share in the wealth of swamp land which was being so rapidly and cheaply acquired when he arrived in Kern county. All through the records of swamp land districts from 1875 to 1893 the names of Haggin, Carr and Hearst figure prominently.

Carr's Dealings With the Ditch Companies

Meantime, Carr, on his first arrival here, began taking steps to gain a controlling interest in the canal companies that had locations on Kern river. Few if any of these companies were incorporated and Carr early set himself to induce the owners to organize under the laws of the state. Different methods were pursued in different cases, but one by one the companies filed incorporation papers, and just as surely Haggin and Carr eventually got a controlling interest in the stock. To tell how this was done would require a separate chapter for every canal company, and in most cases they would be interesting chapters. In every case, however, Carr presented the advantages of co-operation, showed how much faster and more effectually the work of building canals and ditches could be prosecuted with the financial aid of his powerful firm, offered wages to the stockholders, management and authority to the directors and water to the patrons of the ditch, who usually were the stockholders themselves.

Testimony respecting the treatment of the minority stockholders after Carr & Haggin had acquired control of the canal companies differs according to the alliance and experience of the witness. Pioneers of unimpeachable character and unquestioned sincerity who were directors and officers of canal companies when Carr began his overtures and for a long time thereafter declare that the alliance was always to the benefit of the farmers. "We did not have money to build weirs and headgates, but Haggin did," says one of these pioneers. "Carr paid us wages for working on canals, his engineers ran out the lines so that we got the water in the right place, and it was my experience that when it came to dividing the water we always got our share. Carr said he did not care to manage the canals—that he would rather we did it. Carr used to come to the directors' meetings, but he let us run things as we pleased."

"Did you ever notice a big cow standing over a water trough when there was only a little stream running in from the pump? Did you ever notice how she gets all the water and the little cows have to stand back? And did you ever notice that when she gets all she wants to drink the big cow is in no hurry to move away and let the little cows have a chance? Well, that gives you an idea of the way Haggin and Carr and the little farmers handled the water in the early days." This is the statement in brief, of another pioneer of equal standing and reputation and with equal opportunity for information and observation. Between the two opinions the reader may make his guess, or he may let the puzzle go with the knowledge that Carr's control of the canals and the water in them finally became an accomplished fact.

But another factor entered into the method of Carr's acquisition of water rights and into all his dealings with the settlers. He clearly foresaw, as testimony abundantly verifies, the fierce contest that was coming over the use of the waters of Kern river, and he made it a matter of distinct and settled policy to ally his interests with the interests of the people wherever it was possible to do so. The wisdom of his course showed in the great suit of Lux against Haggin, and in the celebrated Miller-Haggin agreement Carr's policy was carried to its logical, ultimate application by making all present and future land owners within the reach of the river parties to the terms under which its waters should be disposed.

Plans to Gather In the Desert Lands

While they were gathering up the large and luscious remnants of swamp land which the earlier comers had overlooked and were buying railroad lands, homesteads and school lands and were getting a firm grasp on water rights, Haggin & Carr were by no means overlooking the desert lands. In March, 1877, just as Carr was getting well established in Kern county, Congress most opportunely passed the desert land act that is known by that date. Already, on May 4, 1875, water to the amount of 850 cubic feet per second had been appropriated under Carr's direction for the express purpose of irrigating desert land, and work on the great Calloway canal which was to carry the water to this desert land had been commenced. The first work on the canal was begun by Carr & Haggin's men and teams, but a little later a contract for excavation was given to Vining Barker. In 1877, the year the desert land act was passed, a contract to complete the canal a distance of about twenty-five miles was taken by Broad & Roberts.

The Calloway canal takes water from the north side of Kern river almost opposite the center of Bakersfield, bears west through the northeastern part of Rosedale and then swings to the northwest over a great territory that needed only water to transform it into the finest of fruit and farming land. Broad & Roberts took the contract to complete the canal at seven cents per cubic yard for dirt and nine cents per cubic yard for hardpan. Mr. Roberts says they found nothing that they could not plow with eight mules in all the length of the ditch. It took about a year to finish the job, and meantime Carr & Haggin were busy securing entrymen to take up the land.

In his statement published in 1880 Haggin describes his operations in Kern county with special reference to the desert lands, which at that time were the object of much discussion. He runs briefly over the subject of his first activities in the county, stating that the Belle View and McClung ranches were established under the direction of George F. Thornton. On account of the malaria bred by Buena Vista and Kern lakes Haggin bought them, and a large amount of swamp land around them with a view to reclaiming them. He proceeded to divert the water of the river from the lakes to land formerly considered worthless for agriculture. He then built Goose lake slough canal to carry off the excess water, but this was not sufficient to handle it all. In March, 1877, the statement continues, Congress passed the desert land act. Haggin bought large numbers of odd-numbered sections north of the river, and induced his friends to enter the even-numbered sections adjoining. He bought more water rights and built canals to irrigate a much larger area of land and to utilize all the surplus waters of the river. Haggin states that he desired the co-operation of the owners of even-numbered sections and desired to have them pay their share of the expense of constructing the irrigation system. In order to avoid conflict with strangers he got nearly all the even-numbered sections entered by friendly parties. Since the lands were entered, the statement continues, "invidious and designing persons have grossly misrepresented the facts touching the character of these lands," and efforts had been made to induce unusual rulings by the department of the interior to have the entries cancelled. Haggin had a government commission previously appointed visit the lands in question and make a report to the authorities. In conclusion he made the statement of policy already referred to, to the effect that he did not desire to monopolize lands, but intended to offer them for sale on liberal terms.

In some cases, it appears, agreements were made with parties to enter the desert lands giving the entrymen the alternative of paying a certain amount for having the water placed on the lands, or selling their equities to Haggin & Carr at a stipulated price. In other cases the entrymen's names seem to have been loaned gratis or for a small fee without the expectation that they would figure in the ownership of the land after it was reclaimed. In either event there were not lacking arguments to show that the bargain was fair and advantageous to all concerned. The lands could be irrigated by no other means known and practicable at the time than by canal from Kern river, and such a canal could be built only by the expenditure of large sums of money. The state or federal government might have taken up the task but aside from these methods there was no alternative that would not necessitate the bonding of individual entries to meet their share of the expense.

But the invidious and designing persons got the ear of the general land office authorities, and orders were issued suspending all action with regard to the entries. In February, 1891, the order of suspension was revoked, after something like 50,000 acres of land had been withheld from settlement and development for a little over thirteen years. Meantime the original entrymen, homesteaders and pre-emptors generally had become discouraged and abandoned their claims; some of the friends of Haggin who had allowed him to use their names were dead, others had moved away, and generally the plans for gathering in the desert lands were badly disarranged.

Enter Miller & Lux at Rear of Stage

During all of the busy and important scenes just described, Miller & Lux lingered at the back of the stage. Their lands lay mostly to the north of Buena Vista Lake, twenty miles or more west of Bakersfield, and about the same distance from the center of the contests between Carr and Livermore over the water rights. It must be borne in mind, however, that Miller's interest in the disposal of the waters of Kern river was quite as great as was that of Haggin, and it must be remembered, also, that his position on the river bore the same relation to that of Haggin as the position of Haggin bore to that of Livermore & Chester. When Livermore & Chester put a dam across the river to force the water into the Kern Island canal it left dry the canals in which Carr & Haggin had acquired the controlling interest. Later, when Carr & Haggin built the Calloway weir to force the water into the Calloway canal the result was to dry up Miller's newly-planted alfalfa fields, and the tule swamps where his herds gathered rough forage. The sloughs and natural water courses through which the remnants of Kern river had meandered leisurely through the broad, flat trough of the valley to Tulare lake changed from clear, though limpid and leisurely streams, to green and slimy sinks of stagnant water. Then they became nothing but streaks of mud in which the feet of the weakened cattle were held fast until the vaqueros came to drag the poor beasts out by riatas about their horns. A little later all the sloughs and swamps were parched as dry as the naked, gray expanses of alkali desert that bordered them, and where the waters had been, great cracks opened in the earth down which a walking stick could be thrust its entire length. Only in deep holes, puddled by the feet of many starving cattle and fouled by the carcasses of dead brutes, was any water left in all the fifty miles of swamp land between Buena Vista and Tulare lakes.

Of course such a state of affairs could lead but to vigorous defensive action on the part of Miller & Lux, and so the suit of Lux versus Haggin was filed, and after the usual delay was brought to trial on April 15, 1881, before B. Brundage, judge of the superior court of Kern county.

However, before I take up the story of this great contest of rival corporations, let me tell how lesser factors in the development of the county were faring, relate the stories of some disconnected incidents of importance, and show by transient items of interest something of the daily doings of the citizens of those days.

ST. MALACHY'S CATHOLIC CHURCH, TEHACHAPI

CHAPTER X

A Collection of Disconnected Stories

So long as the traditions of the pioneer stockmen of California remain, the drought of 1877 will be remembered as a period of ruin and disaster. Possibly the year was not so dry as 1864, but there were more stock in the state to suffer from hunger and starvation and more stockmen to wear out the days and nights with anxiety and frantic efforts to save the remnants of their flocks and herds. In Kern county the stock industry was better established than any other line of productive enterprise, and the heavy blows dealt the cattle and sheep men in the long, pitiless months when not a drop of moisture fell from the skies and not a green blade nor a dry and withered stem of grass was left to cover the absolute nakedness of the desert, left scars that were not effaced until many prosperous years were passed.

In 1877 Harry Quinn, starved out of his magnificent range on Rag gulch, drove 18,000 sheep to Nevada and brought back 2700; 15,000 of the flock perished in a great storm east of the Sierras that piled the snow waist deep on the level plain. Other sheep men of the county who had less resource and stayed at home, saw their flocks literally wiped out. The cattle men fared little better. While the river continued to flow down the swamps and there were tules to be eaten, the cattle survived, but finally there was no water save what was taken out in the irrigation ditches, the tule lands were dry, and the few remaining pools of water grew stagnant, black and poisonous.

A very few men, like the Jewetts, who had irrigated fields and could grow forage despite the failure of the rains, were able to buy cattle and sheep at almost nothing a head, and so profited as much as they lost by the long continued drought. But the irrigated fields were few in those days.

The next season the feed was good, and the next was dry again. It was then that Hill & Rivers sold out their interest in the stock at Tejon to General Beale, and Jose Lopez, to reduce the Tejon flocks, drove 16,000 sheep to Green River in Wyoming, whence they were shipped to Cheyenne. Lopez and his herders were six months on the trail, and established a record, not only for distance traveled, but for small percentage of loss and general success on the exceedingly difficult expedition. In 1880 General Beale bought out Boggs, the remaining partner in the firm of Hills, Rivers & Co. The sheep were gradually closed out on the Tejon ranches, and the herds of cattle were increased to a maximum of 29,000 head.

The Town of Tehachapi

The town of Tehachapi was founded in the summer of 1876, when the Southern Pacific railroad finally surmounted the difficulties of the grade up the mountains and reached the little valley at the summit. Prior to that time Old Tehachapi (or Old Town, as it soon came to be known) was a thriving and active little place of 200 or 300 inhabitants. Old Town drew its sustenance from the miners who washed gold from the sands and gravels of China hill and from the stockmen who had established themselves in the fertile Tehachapi, Brite's, Cummings and Bear valleys and were pasturing their herds on the meadows and mountain sides. J. J. Murphy and Hirshfeld Brothers were the pioneer merchants of Old Town, Spencer & Durnal kept a hotel, and four or five saloons dispensed liquid refreshments.

Among the early stockmen were the Brite and Cummings families (after each of which one of the valleys was named), the Cuddebacks, Matt Tyler, John Hickey, the Fickerts of Bear valley, Dan Davenport, Joe Kaiser, Henry Seegur, George Rand, and Antone Pauly, one of the few permanent settlers around the Tehachapi who raised sheep. There were traveling sheepmen in the Tehachapi country in the early day, and at Pauly's corral in fall and spring many sheep were shorn. The other shepherds, however, did not own land or maintain established headquarters there.

The placer mining around Tehachapi dates back to the early '60s. As elsewhere the white miners were followed by Chinamen, who worked over the abandoned placer sands with considerable profit.

The railroad missed Old Town by about three miles to the east, and a rival village was started about the station. Of course the new town got the business, but it was not until 1883 or thereabout that Old Town began to move over, bodily, to the railroad.

Lime burning began around Tehachapi a little before 1880, but not until the Union Lime Company of Santa Cruz established a branch at Tehachapi and built an up-to-date kiln in 1883 or 1884, was the lime industry any great success. From that time on, however, the great lime deposits in the Tehachapi mountains continued to grow in importance until they now constitute one of the large factors in the county's wealth.

Farming started actively in the Tehachapi country about 1885, and rich new ground and a succession of favorable years brought the mountain valleys rapidly to the front agriculturally. Moses Hale, about 1880, grew the first apple orchard around Tehachapi, and is entitled to the name of the father of the apple-growing industry, which now promises to give a new value to the Tehachapi lands.

Ben Kessing was the first postmaster of new Tehachapi, and was followed in that office by P. D. Green, manager of Baldy Hamilton's horse and cattle ranch, justice of the peace and friend and benefactor of everyone in the town who needed his help to draw up a deed, nurse the sick or lay out the dead. Among the first school teachers of Tehachapi were L. A. Beardsley, W. W. Frazier, Dr. Hoag, and R. L. Stockton.

Delano Making Progress

Meantime the town of Delano had ceased to be a railroad terminus, but it was one of the most important wool-shipping points in the state, and it was gradually coming to be a noted wheat-shipping center. The warm, sunny plains about Delano where feed starts earlier than almost anywhere else in the state, early attracted the itinerant sheep owners, and flocks were driven there from the mountains and desert and from over the range in Nevada for the lambing and shearing time. Grain farmers soon found that the same conditions that made the early grass were good for early wheat, and homesteaders dotted the mesa with their dwellings and began marking out the great fields that were distinctive of the wheat farming districts of the valley before the advent of the orchardists and the alfalfa growers.

By this time the South Fork valley, the Kernville country, Linn's valley, Woody, and all the other mountain districts were developing under the hands of stockmen and farmers into permanent and prosperous communities, able to weather droughts and other periods of adversity with less relative loss, perhaps, than any other portion of the county.

The Last of Old Clubfoot

In 1879 Old Clubfoot made his last trip north past Tejon and back to his principal haunts in the San Bernardino mountains. Since the days of the earliest settlements, Old Clubfoot was the hero of the principal bear stories of the pioneers. Big as an ox, and easily identified by sight or by his tracks from the fact that his right fore paw had been chewed off—probably by a trap in his infancy—the great beast used to make his pilgrimage into the mountains of Kern county every summer, always coming by one trail and returning by another. A party of twelve men met Old Clubfoot one day on the Alamos trail as they were going to Los Angeles from the Kern River mines. The bear did not offer to fight, nor did he exhibit the slightest disposition to retreat. He simply stood there, calm and statuesque, his big body filling the road from cliff to precipice—or at least leaving no clear space on either side down which the miners cared to venture. Clubfoot got the right of way. What became of him at last neither history nor tradition records. After 1879 the Tejon herders saw him no more, and no more is known of him.

The Lynching of an Outlaw Gang

It was while the long and ineffectual battle to save the life of the outlaw, Tiburcio Vasquez, was dragging in the courts and before the governor that a number of vaqueros and amateur horsethieves started out to emulate Tiburcio's notorious career. They stole a number of horses and saddles from livery stables in Bakersfield, went to Caliente, robbed the depot, shot up the town and were preparing a dastardly assault on a woman when the construction train with a gang of workmen came along and frightened them away.

Determined to nip this new outburst of lawlessness in the tender bud, cattlemen, ranchers and residents of Bakersfield took instantly to arms. Jim Young, a cattleman, saw the gang on its way to the Utah trail and gathered a small posse composed of himself, Sam Young, Bull Williams and perhaps one or two others. "Bull" Williams got his name from the fact (veraciously reported by his friends) that when he started in the cattle business as a tenderfoot the old timers sold him a hundred head of bull calves as a nucleus for his herd. A very few years later Williams sold twelve hundred cattle as the increase of his band, which indicates that he did not remain a tenderfoot all the rest of his life.

The Youngs and Bull Williams found the outlaws in a house near the Alamos ranch beyond Gorman station, and got between them and their guns. Five Mexicans and a young man named Elias were brought to the jail in Bakersfield, and then a meeting of the men who had been hunting them was held at the office of Justice of the Peace W. S. Adams. Adams was requested to retire, and an agreement was drafted and signed in which the men present pledged their support and loyalty to each other.

Then they went to the jail, where the jailor was easily overpowered, took the outlaws to the courtroom and organized a court by appointing a judge, jury and prosecuting attorney and attorney for the defense. Meantime, that there might be no delay in the workings of the wheels of justice, another man was appointed to put ropes to soak and lay a heavy timber between the crotches of two willow trees at the rear of the court house yard. He also placed a plank across two barrels underneath the heavy timber.

In the morning, very early, a great crowd gathered in the court house yard to see six bodies hanging stiffly by their necks. They were cut down and laid out side by side on the floor of the hall in the courthouse, and a coroner's jury promptly summoned promptly found that the deceased persons came to their death from being hanged by a person or persons to this jury unknown. At least the jury swore truly so far as its official cognizance was concerned, for no testimony touching the identity of the executioners was introduced at the inquest.

Not a few people condemned the hanging of the boy Elias, and a large number of Mexican citizens considered the affair an affront to their race. There was some talk of asking the Mexican consul to interfere, and a small fire starting in the alley back of the Arlington hotel gave rise to a report that an attempt had been made to burn the town in resentment of the lynching. Guards were sworn in and stationed about the streets for a night or two, but the excitement died out as the Mexicans were convinced that no discrimination between races had been intended or had been made.

This was the last organized gang of thieves and outlaws to ply their profession in Kern county.

The Tehachapi Train Wreck

On January 20, 1883, occurred the train wreck on the Tehachapi grade, still remembered with horror. The Southern Pacific passenger train reached Tehachapi at 2:30 a. m. with seven cars, a postal car, baggage car, express car, two sleepers, smoking car and day coach in the order named. The conductor, B. F. Reid, got off to register and get the train orders, the head brakeman, C. Maltby, went to turn the switch when the engines were disconnected and the helper engine was being detached, and the rear brakeman, John Patten, left his post to show a lady passenger the way to the depot. The night was very dark, and a strong and bitterly cold wind was blowing over the mountain from the south. The last man of the train crew had hardly left the cars before they began moving backward. The grade at the station was twenty feet to the mile, and rapidly grew steeper, and besides there was the wind to help give the runaway train velocity. The train was making furious headway before anyone inside noticed that anything was wrong. Then Eli Nabro, a passenger, set the hand brakes on the sleepers. This checked the forward part of the train so that the smoker and day coach broke loose and dashed on ahead. The hand brakes however, were insufficient to hold the cars on the steep grade, and new velocity was gained. Two miles and a half below the station, the sleepers left the track just after they had passed over a deep fill. The first was thrown against the wall of a cut and crushed to splinters, the second turned completely over in the air and landed on the bank. Both caught fire, and the first was completely consumed with everyone in it. From the other sleeper and from the postal, express and baggage cars, all of which rolled over the fill to the bottom of the gulch, eighteen or twenty persons escaped, all more or less seriously hurt. A Miss Squires, caught in the wreck unhurt, was burned to death before the eyes of other passengers who were powerless to help her. The smoker and day coach raced on a mile and a half farther, where the efforts of the passengers served to stop them. Just how many people were killed in the wreck was never accurately established. The testimony at the inquest tended to show that the brakes never were set at the station, though railroad officials maintained that the brakes were set, but that tramps released them with the intention of robbing the passengers. The body of one tramp was found in the wreck.

Importation of the Negroes

Haggin & Carr inherited from Livermore & Chester and the Cotton Growers' Association the idea that cotton growing should be one of the most profitable purposes to which the delta lands could be put, and as a means of securing suitable labor in the cotton fields Carr undertook the importation of negroes from the southern states. The St. Louis Chronicle of November 13, 1884, records that F. M. Ownbey was there on that date arranging to bring to Kern county 1100 negroes to work on the Haggin lands, and states that the immigrants were offered wages at the rate of $12 per month for men, $8 for women, and $6 for boys and girls.

Ownbey never brought so many negroes to the county as he planned, but three or four parties came at different times under contract to work for a year at the wages stated. In the last party were 130 families. Among them were M. Stevens and his wife, Will, Belton and Gideon Vessel; John, Henry and Joe Pinkney; A. W. Vessel, Mrs. Susie Hall, Francis Campbell, Henry Caldwell, Anderson Bowen, Mary Bowen, Pleasant Martin and Will Walker and his family, all members of the colored colony of Bakersfield today.

But from Carr's standpoint the bringing of the negroes was not a success. No sooner had they landed than the missionaries of discontent were among them, persuading them to disregard their contracts and showing them how much better wages they could secure elsewhere. The result was that the greater number of them never did enough work for Carr to pay their transportation. Some never did a stroke of work for him. Stevens and perhaps a dozen others stayed on the ranches about eleven months, and Tom Perryman, who was given a patch of ground to work for himself, stayed three years. The others found work in Bakersfield or scattered over the state. The importation of the negroes helped to increase the breach that was widening between Carr and a considerable portion of the people around Bakersfield, particularly working men and homesteaders who depended on their wages to finance them and who considered Carr's action an effort to cheapen the price of labor.

The non-success of the cheap labor scheme, on the other hand, put an end to the plan for raising cotton and hops, and helped, in all probability, to confirm the decision of Haggin and Tevis to dispose of their lands.

News Notes of 1886 to 1893

August, 1886—Billy Carr is undertaking to manage both the Democratic and Republican parties in Kern county. At the last general election 394 votes were cast—198 Republican and 196 Democratic. W. W. Drury ships his first crop of ramie—about 500 pounds—to Pittsburg, and the proceeds net him about 5 cents per pound.

September 11, 1886—The adjournment of the legislature without having passed the irrigation bills is heralded as a defeat for Haggin & Carr and a victory for Miller & Lux and their attorney-in-chief, R. E. Houghton.

October, 1886—Clashes are frequent between Carr and settlers on desert lands under the Calloway canal. Carr is accused of trying to prevent settlers from remaining on their claims by fencing the roads and otherwise, and settlers make trouble by cutting Carr's fences. Miss Conway, a school teacher who has filed on a desert homestead, chops down a locked gate while Carr's men look on. It is alleged that dead hogs were thrown in Miss Conway's well.

December 9, 1886—Haggin & Carr are making 400 to 1000 25-pound cheeses per month on the Mountain View and Kern Island ranches. From January 1st to September 26th 201,886 pounds of cheese were shipped to Los Angeles and San Francisco.

December 30, 1886—The people of Sumner are discussing the subject of a water supply for fire purposes. The Kern County Immigration Society is organized with H. Hirshfeld, president; A. C. Maude, secretary, and P. Galtes, W. H. Scribner, E. M. Roberts, W. E. Houghton and B. Ardizzi, directors. It is planned to keep a permanent exhibit in Los Angeles.

February 3, 1887—The Bakersfield water works has two eight-inch wells, seventy-five feet deep, and pumps about 133,000 gallons of water per day.

February 5, 1887—A big sandstorm from the east almost stops business in Bakersfield. Complaints are made concerning the large bills presented by the constables and justices.

March, 1887—The Wright irrigation bill becomes a law.

June 2, 1887—A news letter from Delano to the Echo describes that town as having four stores, two hotels, one lodging house, one restaurant, two livery stables, two meat markets, two blacksmith shops, one barber shop, three real estate offices, and a right smart sprinkling of saloons and dance houses—no church, no doctor, no drug store, no lawyer. The spring's shipments of wool amounted to 4600 bales.

June, 1887—Mr. Collins, agent of the general land office, concludes an investigation of the Haggin & Carr desert land claims.

June 23, 1887—The Tehachapi Lime Company has recently begun operations.

June 30, 1887—R. M. Pogson buys the old town hall and moves it to Tejon. The agitation begins for a $100,000 bond issue for building roads throughout the county and for the purchase of fair grounds.

July, 1887—In the election of a chief of the Bakersfield fire department, the Alerts and the Neptunes combine on L. F. Burr and defeat W. H. Ream, the candidate of the Eureka's, by a few votes. Other officers elected are: E. R. Jameson, assistant chief; J. W. Ahern, secretary; H. A. Blodget, treasurer.

Charles A. Maul's peach orchard is celebrated in the local press.

September, 1887—The Crocker ranch south of town, largely in alfalfa and with a good house on it sells for $32,000—$100 per acre.

September, 1887—The Southern Hotel Association incorporates.

September, 1887—L. P. St. Clair buys for $2400 a block of land southwest of the courthouse, afterward the site of the first St. Francis hospital at G and Fourteenth streets.

September, 1887—Articles of incorporation are filed in San Francisco by the San Francisco & San Joaquin Valley Railroad Company. A camp of workmen in Tejon cañon is doing work preliminary to grading—supposed to be for the Santa Fe. The Tejon lemon and orange trees are in bearing.

September 29, 1887—General Beale has given a right of way across his Tejon lands for a railroad from Mojave to Bakersfield. The road is to be completed to Bakersfield within three years.

November 1, 1887—Cornerstone of Masonic temple is laid.

December 26, 1887—Superintendent J. S. Hambleton, drilling on land owned by the Union Oil & Land Company, reports a strike at 720 feet on section 19, 30-22. The drill went through oil sandstone into a bed of gravel, and gas forced oil, sand, and gravel the size of walnuts thirty or forty feet in the air. The well flowed for some little time, and the gas was so suffocating that the workmen were driven back from the well. The Sunset Oil Company is daily expecting machinery from the east, when it will begin drilling. Hirshfeld Brothers and R. T. Norris will soon begin prospecting for oil eight or nine miles from Bakersfield in the direction of Kern river cañon at a point where gas is detected coming from the ground.

December 25, 1887—Fire Chief Burr brings to town the new Silsby fire engine, and the day being Sunday and Christmas, a great crowd gathers on the street to inspect the new acquisition. Alex Heyman is foreman of the Eureka engine company.

January 10, 1888—An immigrant car at the rear of a Southern Pacific passenger train, while coming down the grade from Tehachapi, breaks a wheel, is wrenched loose from the train, leaves the track, rolls over and over down a seventy-five-foot embankment, and is burned up by a fire which starts from the heating stove. All the passengers escape by crawling through the car windows, Charles Ankrum and his wife (colored) being the worst injured. Ankrum's shoulder was dislocated, and the fire burned a hole in the back of his coat just as he was getting through the window.

January 26, 1888—Clerks begin agitation for Sunday closing of stores in Bakersfield. Rabbit drives are frequent in the county. About 40,000 jack rabbits were killed in drives during January, February and March, 1888.

February 16, 1888—The Kern River Cañon Irrigation Company, which owns 25,000 acres of land east and north of Sumner, and which plans to take water out of the river near the cañon to irrigate lands east of Sumner and as far south as the Weed Patch, has bonded its lands and franchise to San Francisco people for thirty days. (Plans never materialized.)

March, 1888—Bakersfield Drum Corps organized at R. A. Edmonds' store.

May 10, 1888—The Porterville branch of the Southern Pacific is graded from Fresno to Porterville.

June 14, 1888—Work has been started on the Southern hotel.

July 12, 1888—The Woman's Relief Corps is organized.

July 19, 1888—Work begins on the new railroad shops at Sumner.

July 26, 1888—The details of the Miller-Haggin agreement are published. The only opposition appears to come from the owners of the McCord ditch. The immediate effect of the agreement is to advance the price of land around Bakersfield. Large land owners subscribe to a fund totaling between $3000 and $4000 for the purpose of advertising Kern county. Carr contributed $1500.

September, 1888—County supervisors give L. P. St. Clair a franchise for a gas and electric light system for Bakersfield. Work on the plant is to be commenced in six months and be completed within a year. Briggs, Ferguson & Co. announce a great auction sale of Haggin lands beginning Monday, December 17, 1888. In two hours ninety-two towns lots were sold. On Tuesday thirty purchasers bought nineteen colony lots of five acres each and 145 town lots. The grand jury recommends that the saloon licenses be raised from $25 to $75 per quarter.

January 24, 1889—J. S. Hambleton, superintendent of the Sunset Oil Company (Jewett & Blodget), has brought in on section 16, 11-23, at a depth of 110 feet, an oil well that flows five barrels per day. The county officials are suing the county for fees which they claim they needlessly paid into the county treasury.

March 14, 1889—H. A. Blodget, H. H. Fish and Jeff Packard get a franchise for a street railway down Chester avenue, past the site of the "new Southern Pacific depot" (which was never built) and out to the river bridge.

Same date—Another Haggin land sale is announced. The sales will be: First day, at the Cotton ranch; second day, in Bakersfield; third day, at the hop ranch. Barbecues first and third days. Baldwin and McAfee conduct the sale. Town lots sell at $142 to $640. Colony lots at $57 to $135 per acre.

April 4, 1889—Hirshfeld brothers, who have been in the mercantile business in the county continuously for twenty-five years, sell to Dinkelspiel brothers.

May 13, 1889—The county, by a vote of 852 to 281, elects to issue bonds in the sum of $250,000 to build a new jail, a county hospital, an addition to the court house and to improve highways.

Same date—Second sale of Haggin's irrigated lands begins under the direction of L. C. McAfee, who is now the manager, with C. Brower, of the land department of J. B. Haggin. McAfee announces that it is Haggin's policy to dispose of all his Kern county lands. McAfee and Brower have their first office where the Odd Fellows hall is now.

Same date—Plans of the Poso irrigation district are submitted.

July 7, 1889—The entire business section of Bakersfield is destroyed by fire. Soon after the great fire property owners in the business section began laying asphalt sidewalks.

August 31, 1890—Carr & Haggin are working 300 head of horses extending canals to the lands which they will colonize next winter. J. J. Mack is here from San Francisco to organize the Bank of Bakersfield.

September, 1890—The Kern County Land Company is incorporated in San Francisco. Report says that S. W. Ferguson is to be the resident manager. Lloyd Tevis is anxious to dispose of the Kern county lands, as he prefers other investments.

October 1, 1890—James Herrington is tarred and feathered by citizens who disapprove of his activity in jumping lands and filing contests against homesteaders.

October 27, 1890—Work begins on the Poso irrigation district canal. Engineers are here surveying for the valley railroad.

A bi-partisan committee is named by Republicans and Democrats to prevent "ward heelers and toughs" from dominating the coming election.

November 1, 1890—Milo McKee has both arms blown off while firing a salute with the old brass cannon in honor of Senator Stanford, who had just arrived in Bakersfield on a speaking tour. On the same day at Tulare, W. Baker had one arm blown off in almost the same manner, also while firing a salute to Senator Stanford, and the engine that hauled Senator Stanford's special train to Bakersfield, while returning light to Tulare ran over and killed Wallace and Ed Ray, two Delano boys who were riding a railroad bicycle to Alila to attend a dance. The headlight of the engine was broken and it was running dark.

January 1, 1891—Ten tons of asphalt in boxes are shipped east.

January, 1891—Judge Arick dies, and Governor Waterman appoints A. R. Conklin of Inyo county to succeed him on the superior bench.

Stores in Bakersfield agree to close on Sunday after March 1, 1891.

February, 1891—The ruling of the interior department of September 12, 1877, suspending desert land entries Nos. 1 to 337, inclusive, is revoked, and old applications to contest are recognized.

An amendment to the desert land act of 1877, just passed, validates assignments of desert entries, and permits Haggin to complete and present proof of reclamation of his hundreds of desert claims under the Calloway.

February, 1891—The bonds of the Kern and Tulare irrigation district are sold.

April 2, 1891—John Barker has developed a gas well on his ranch between Bakersfield and the Kern cañon and has piped it to his house for cooking and lighting.

April 30, 1891—President Harrison speaks from rear of train.

April, 1891—Colonization Agent Knewing of the Kern County Land Company arrives from England with thirty young English colonists.

July 17, 1891—At a meeting in Sumner, George C. Doherty and John Barker explain their plan for the Doherty canal, which would take over water rights to 30,000 miner's inches of water located by John Barker in 1878, build a canal down the river to a point opposite Sumner, run a tunnel under the hill to the mesa north and east of Sumner. The company was to be incorporated for $1,000,000, the promoters proposed to sell perpetual water rights for $11.25 per acre, and planned to irrigate 80,000 acres. (This plan was never carried out, of course, but it was believed at the time to have been partly responsible for the building of the East Side canal, which covers part of the territory which the Doherty canal was to water.)

The state legislature has placed a bounty on coyote scalps.

August 25, 1892—E. M. Roberts is given a contract to construct the East Side canal, which is to take a portion of the water allowed to the Kern Island canal under the Miller-Haggin agreement, and which is planned to irrigate 30,000 acres of land.

August, 1892—Construction trains are working on both ends of the McKittrick branch railroad.

November, 1892—A hot campaign and an election contest results in the election of H. A. Jastro as supervisor from the Fifth district, defeating H. F. Condict by three votes.

February 10, 1893—Kern river breaks its levee and floods the northern and western part of town. The water was a foot deep at I and Nineteenth street on Thursday, but by Friday noon it had disappeared everywhere in town except in very low places.

February 23, 1893—Celsus Brower is chosen to go to the world's fair at Chicago in charge of the Kern county exhibit.

March 6, 1893—Rosedale colonists meet to discuss water rates and resolve that "no individual or corporation should have the right to fix the rates at which a necessity of life shall be sold." (The Land Company was offering the colonists for signature an agreement fixing the rate for irrigation water at $1.50 per acre per year, the contract to be perpetual and the charge for water to become a lien on the land if not paid.)

February 4, 1893—President Cleveland signs the proclamation creating the Sierra forest reserve, including a great territory in the mountains of Kern county.

The people of Delano are discussing the possibility of getting water from the Calloway and Beardsley canals.

May 25, 1893—Company G, National Guard, is mustered in with Captain, W. H. Cook; first lieutenant, H. A. Blodget; second lieutenant, H. P. Bender.

August, 1893—At an anti-Chinese meeting in Kern City, is drafted a letter to the United States district attorney stating that there are 1500 Chinese in Kern county who are not registered under the Geary law. It is proposed to remove the Chinese, but by peaceable methods only.

September 21, 1893—Fruit shippers catch seven men stealing fruit from cars, and haul them out to a quiet place and spank them on the bare skin. Fresh peaches are bringing $1 for a twenty-pound box in Chicago. The freight is sixty-five cents per box, leaving the shipper thirty-five cents.

---

CHAPTER XI

The Great Lux-Haggin Water Suit

While the short but interesting preliminary between Carr & Haggin and Livermore & Chester was being fought to a finish, Miller and Lux were getting established in Kern county and gathering about them able leaders and captains, of whom J. C. Crocker, S. W. Wible and Capt. John Barker were types. Long before this time Miller & Lux had acquired great ranches and ranges around Gilroy, along the San Joaquin river and far up along the northern coast. In 1872, in conjunction with W. S. Chapman, owner of the Chowchilla ranch, Miller & Lux as owners of the Columbia ranch had begun a canal, the largest and longest in the state, which took water from the San Joaquin river at the mouth of Fresno slough and extended for seventy-five miles across Fresno and Merced and a part of Stanislaus counties.

Miller's activities in Kern county (Miller was the active member of the firm) were an extension of the operations along the San Joaquin. It is not unlikely that Miller at some time had pleasant visions of a great cattle and sheep ranch extending in an unbroken sweep through the rich, black tule lands from Stockton to Bakersfield. During his fight with Haggin & Carr, Miller is commonly reported as assuring them that he would make them "pack their blankets out of Kern county," and there were not lacking admirers of the doughty and vigorous old German who fully expected to see him make his threat good.

Jim Crocker had been in Miller's employ on the San Joaquin and was sent to Kern county to lay the foundations for the Miller occupancy here. Crocker was the sort of a man Miller would be expected to choose for the job. A quiet, self-contained man, but a good mixer in spite of his reserve and a man of native force and personality that made him a natural leader. He was bred to get up in the morning at 4 o'clock and go out on hard jaunts with the vaqueros. Chasing down and breaking up organized bands of horse and cattle thieves appears to have been his favorite pastime. If a friend or fellow stockman was in trouble, financial or otherwise, Crocker was ready to go on his bail to the extent of his possessions. Men rallied to the standard of Crocker because of their friendship and confidence and because they liked to fight with a fighter. The men who fought under Carr's colors did so more usually because they believed their personal interest lay in that direction. It was Carr's strong point of strategy, as we have seen, to make the personal interest of many people lie in the same direction as his own.

S. W. Wible, who figures prominently among the Miller forces in the Miller-Haggin contest, was a pioneer of 1852, beginning his western experience as a miner and constructor of miners' canals and sluices and later undertaking the management of larger water engineering enterprises. He came to Kern county in 1874 and built a number of the early canals from Kern river. When the Kern Valley Water Company was formed by Livermore, Redington and others to undertake the reclamation of swamp land district No. 121, Wible was placed in charge as engineer. Celsus Brower had charge of the business affairs of the company. Wible built the great Kern Valley Water Company's canal which extended north from Buena Vista lake for a distance of some twenty-six miles, when first constructed, but which has since been carried much further down the swamp and ultimately is to be built through to Tulare lake. The canal follows the western edge of the swamp and overflowed district, and was 125 feet wide on the bottom and calculated to carry a stream seven feet in depth. It was designed to carry all the waters of Kern river that might flow so far, and also was to serve as the feeder for irrigation ditches that would cover 100,000 or more acres of land. When Miller & Lux acquired the Kern Valley Water Company's interests Wible went to the new management, as most of the men who were prominent in the operation of Livermore & Redington's Kern Island projects went over to Haggin & Carr when the latter came into possession of those properties. Wible afterward became the general superintendent for Miller & Lux. He was noted as one of the few men who stood in no awe of Miller when the latter flew into his celebrated fits of passion. It is related that on an occasion when Miller had made the discovery that one of his warehouses had leaked and wet a great quantity of wool and was dividing his time between furiously chopping hole after hole in the wall of the structure and as furiously jumping on his hat when he found new evidences of destruction, Wible followed his employer along the warehouse wall and jumped on the hat while Miller chopped the holes until the ludicrousness of the performance finally appealed to the cattle king and appeased his wrath. In his old age Wible lived true to his pioneer instinct. He was one of the first to respond to the Alaskan mining boom, and summer after summer he donned the great fur overcoat that identified him for years to strangers and new comers, and sailed for the north to meet the melting of the snows above his frozen placers.

Capt. John Barker got into the Miller-Haggin fight partly because he was a riparian owner, although his lands were higher up on the river than the intake of any of the irrigation canals, and partly because, like an old war horse, he could not remain inactive when his nostrils caught the scent of battle. Born in England and bred to the sea, he came to California on the news of the first gold excitement, explored the upper San Joaquin valley on horseback in 1854, fought in the Indian wars of Tulare county in 1856, served in a troop of volunteer cavalry during war times, and came to Kern county in the early '70s. He was a bluff, out-spoken man, a vitriolic writer when his righteous wrath was stirred, and an off-hand orator, the sarcasm of whose phrases was dulled only by the sledge-hammer method of their delivery. Captain Barker would roast his victim alive, pour carbolic acid over his withered remains and end by quoting a few pages of Shakespeare, Byron or Bobby Burns to give a classic flavor to his philippic. He entered no less fervently into his friendships, and between his battles and his benefactions Captain Barker left his record deeply drawn across the history of the county. In his old age, crippled by infirmities, he used to ride about Bakersfield and between the town and the mouth of Kern river cañon, driving an old white horse and a roomy phaeton, planning over old plans for the improvement of the Pierce and Barker ranches and the utilization of resources and opportunities that still lie fallow, waiting till the time is ripe for the fulfillment of the prophecies of the pioneer.

Leaders of the Carr & Haggin Forces

Incidental references in preceding pages have given some insight into the character of W. B. Carr, the generalissimo of the Haggin forces. Fat, aggressive, determined, absolutely unabashed, with bull-dog courage and endurance, he was a typical political boss of the larger and more perfect type. Frequently and fervently cursed and hated, he could walk into a saloon in a hostile ward and in ten minutes have enough sworn allies to insure the victory of his candidates. If a delegation of angry farmers in the days of the bitter water troubles came after Carr with the intention of puncturing him with bullets or stringing him up to a high-branching cottonwood, he met them with an outstretched hand and slaps on their backs and sent them away wreathed in smiles of hope and assurance. Moreover, Carr had the valuable instinct that showed him to a nicety when it was necessary to dispense good coin and valuable favors and when mere promises would suffice. Carr was a finished performer and a skillful tutor, and later actors on the Kern county stage sat at his feet and learned to do politics in the scientific, metropolitan style.

Walter James figured in the water disputes, in court and out, mainly as an expert witness. His long and intimate association with everything that had to do with the appropriation and use of Kern river's waters from 1870 down, aided by a retentive memory and a logical, consecutive manner of stating the salient facts concerning a subject made him invaluable as an authority, and no investigation of water or water rights was complete until Walter James had been examined and cross-examined and with a little nasal drawl and imperturbable deliberation had told just how and why it all happened and came to pass. It is difficult to say whether Walter James in his long record in Kern county shines more as an engineer or as a diplomat, but he is hard to out-class in either capacity.

Heads of the Rival Literary Bureaus

Dozens of portraits of interesting actors in the great drama of the Kern river water contest might be added to this little gallery of character sketches, but I shall attempt but two more—those of the chiefs of the rival literary bureaus that flooded the state with syndicated editorials and syndicated supplements setting forth the rival arguments of appropriators and riparian owners and the history, law, custom and usage touching the utilization of water for any and all purposes since Noah launched the ark on the diluvian seas.

In addition to his numerous other activities Julius Chester, in the days of his ascendancy in Kern county, founded the Southern Californian and was its editor for a number of years. Like the other weeklies of the pioneer days, the Southern Californian was stronger as an organ of personal opinion than it was as a purveyor of news, and Uncle Julius, as he was called by rival editors, was as handy as the best of them in the use of the king's English. He was almost as diplomatic and persuasive in his writing as he was in his speech, and how effective he was in the latter may be gathered from an incident that is related as the truth by a veracious citizen of the time. Uncle Julius had used some of his best literary art in writing up a certain very undesirable citizen, and the day following the appearance of the paper on the street he was sitting comfortably in his office with his feet on the desk when the undesirable citizen appeared. His eye was wild, his breath was laden with liquor and he waved a big six-shooter before the editor's stomach in a very promiscuous manner while he talked.

"Get your feet down from there because I'm going to kill you," the bad citizen commanded.

Uncle Julius recognized that if the bad citizen had really intended to kill him a little matter of his feet being on the desk need not have interfered, and he asked what the trouble was all about as coolly and pleasantly as though it were only an advertiser wanting to know why his announcement did not appear to the top of the page next to pure reading matter as per contract.

"You know blanked well what the matter is," said the bad citizen, "that there thing you wrote about me in your paper."

Chester took his feet down deliberately, deliberately found a copy of the paper, sat down, put his feet on the desk again, adjusted his glasses and began to read the offending article aloud.

He stopped at the end of the first paragraph. "I don't see anything the matter with that, Tom," he said. "That's all so, aint it?"

"Yes," said Tom, "that's all so, but you read on farther."

Chester read another paragraph, and repeated his question as to the accuracy of the narrative.

Tom indicated with his gun that the most offensive portion of the story was to be found still farther down, and Chester read on. When he got to the bottom of the last paragraph Tom had admitted that every assertion in the red hot arraignment—and it was red hot—was true, and the two men went out and had a drink together.

Chester in these days had descended from his former position of principal factor in the county's industry and commerce, his property was slipping out of his hands or had previously escaped, and he was constantly being sued for debt. His fighting instinct never forsook him, and during the latter part of his journalistic career he was engaged, a very large share of his time in putting the county officials on the spit and turning them slowly and scientifically over the coals of incandescent journalism. The county officials winced in patience at first, but after Chester was known to be on the financial toboggan they joined gleefully in pelting him on his way to the bottom. Everything Chester had was attached over and over. Once he was arrested on a charge of stealing corn from a Chinaman, but that probably was only a fair offset to the defamatory charges which Chester heaped upon them. The corn theft case was dismissed. But finally Chester's presses and type were attached and sold to A. C. Maude, and Chester was able to retain possession of them only by showing that they had been leased to George Wear, another of the picturesque and notable newspaper men of the county, who figures more prominently at a little later date. Wear held down the outfit, and Chester continued to publish the Southern Californian and to berate the county officials. Maude, who claimed that he had bought not only the outfit but the name of Chester's paper, began publication of the Kern County Californian, with Richard Hudnut as editorial writer and news-gatherer in chief. Finally Wear sold his lease to a printer by name of Warren and a school teacher by name of Vrooman. For a time the latter kept a guard over the shop by night as well as by day, but one evening Maude's forces inveigled the guard away and captured the shop.

With nothing left but the name of his paper, Chester took himself to San Francisco and issued the Southern Californian from there until the close of the political campaign that ended with the defeat of what he was pleased to call the Reed ring, and the election of B. Brundage, the opponent of Judge Reed, to be the first judge of the superior court of Kern county. Judge Reed had been judge of the county court, but that office was abolished by the change in the constitution.

Richard Hudnut was a highly educated and very dignified man. His writing was silkier than Chester's, and he had such an easy, refined and polished way of flaying his victim that after the victim was flayed he knew that he had lost his hide, but had in his mind only a vague, circumstantial suspicion that it was Hudnut who had skinned him. When Chester was charged with stealing the Chinaman's corn Hudnut mourned over him in paragraph after paragraph as one might mourn over the grave of misled innocence.

It will be appreciated readily that in a fight like the one which the great water contest occasioned, where it was necessary to depict everyone on the other side as a red-handed pirate, a dark-alley thug and a horse thief, the peculiar accomplishments of Hudnut and Chester were invaluable. Moreover, both Hudnut and Chester had all the history of Kern county water rights at their fingers' ends, and when they were established at Sacramento with the money of the two rival corporations behind them, respectively, they poured out a class and quantity of militant, journalistic literature that marks a milestone in the newspaper history of the state.

Still another journalistic factor was injected into the great fight. When the issue was fairly joined between the riparianists and the appropriators, in 1886, the Kern County Echo was founded by a company of farmers and business men, who gathered one day at the old Burnap drug store and decided that there was still a third side to the great question and that a new organ should be established to advocate it. Capt. John Barker was sent to San Francisco to buy the plant, and S. C. Smith, then a young lawyer of Bakersfield, afterward state senator and still later congressman from the eighth district, was elected managing editor. Through the controversy the Echo urged that neither appropriators nor riparian owners be given a monopoly of the water of the river, but that the state retain the ownership in trust for the people and that the use of the water be permitted for irrigation and other purposes under state regulation and control. Water is one of the elements and is no more a proper object of monopoly than is the air, was the gist of the Echo's persistent argument during those days.

The Great Water Suit

The great water suit, known by the title "Lux versus Haggin," not only marks an epoch in the history of Kern county but marks an epoch, also, in the history of irrigation in the state of California. It began with little more notice from the public than any of the other hundred or more suits that had been filed by rival claimants to the waters of Kern river, but before it had gone far local people realized that this was the battle royal, and before it was finally dismissed it had focussed the attention of the state, ranged practically every California newspaper of general circulation on one side or the other, resulted in the calling of two state irrigation conventions and a special session of the legislature, and started a movement to amend the state constitution so that the supreme court, which rendered an unpopular decision in connection with the suit, might be reorganized. The latter movement did not succeed.

In brief, the contention of the plaintiffs was that they were the owners of riparian lands along the lower reaches of Kern river, that Kern river was a natural stream flowing in an established and continuous channel through their lands, and that under the common law of England they were entitled to have the waters of the river flow over, through and upon their lands, undiminished in quantity and unimpaired in quality.

The defendants claimed that they were entitled by right of appropriation to divert the waters from the river for purposes of irrigation, to develop water power, and for domestic and other purposes. It was a contest, in short, between riparian rights and the right of appropriation. In addition to setting forth the rights of the plaintiffs the complaint alleged that the defendants, by diverting the water in their canals had rendered the lands of the plaintiffs dry and barren to such an extent that their cattle had neither grass to eat nor water to drink.

The papers in the suit were drawn in San Francisco and sent here to be filed in the superior court on September 2, 1880. On the morning of April 15, 1881, the trial began with Judge B. Brundage on the bench and a formidable array of counsel for both parties before the bar. Louis Haggin was in charge of the case for the defendant, and was assisted by John Garber and George Flournoy, Sr., father of the present justice of the peace of the sixth township of Kern county. Hall McAllister was nominally the chief counsel for Lux, but R. E. Houghton, then a comparatively young attorney, was the active man and really the one who outlined and carried on the campaign.

The reporters of the day declared that the testimony, the taking of which consumed forty-nine days, was tedious and uninteresting, but it is suspected that they were too close to the scene to realize in full its dramatic interest or even its numerous comedy features. The witnesses included everybody in the county who was supposed to know anything about the history and habits of Kern river, the locations of its various courses and the dates when these courses were changed, or anything concerning the appropriation of water from the river, and in addition to these, sundry expert witnesses who had read in books what happened in Calcutta or what the river Nile did in the days of the Pharaohs and whose testimony was duly objected to because they had not been present at the times and places mentioned nor seen with their own eyes the things they pretended to describe.

Walter James, chief engineer for Haggin, and S. W. Wible, superintendent and engineer for Miller & Lux, were the star performers and spent day after day on the witness stand, mainly under cross-examination. Meantime all the attorneys whittled redwood shingles, and it was a part of the unofficial duties of the sheriff to see that the supply of timber never ran low.

John Garber carried a potato in his pocket for luck, and developed a habit of taking it out and shaking it at the witness when he asked a question of especial moment. R. E. Houghton, on a like occasion would stand up, reach across the table and dip his pen in the ink as though he intended forthwith to write the answer down in plain black and white so that it could never be denied, altered or evaded evermore. The witnesses were even more eccentric and picturesque. An old man by name of Stevens, who came from the head of the South Fork valley, made a speech in response to every question that was put to him, and finally as he was leaving the stand he swept his long arm out over the big assemblage of pioneers who crowded the space behind the attorneys and remarked: "I'm gettin' to be an old man, and I don't know if I'll ever see you all here together again; and I want to say to you now, while I've got you all together, that I'm the oldest settler in Kern county." Of course one of the attorneys took an exception to the statement and asked that it be stricken from the records.

Each evening when court was adjourned for the day the attorneys and many of the witnesses for Haggin were driven to headquarters at Bellevue where the walls beneath the spacious porches were lined with maps and diagrams. Here the net results of the day's testimony were reviewed, and engineers, zanjeros and scouts of all descriptions were sent out to get whatever evidence was needed to fill in the gaps.

In the meantime, if the local papers were not doing much in the way of reporting the trial they were sparing no effort to prove what the judgment of the court should be. Despite all efforts to put him out of business, Julius Chester was still editing the Southern Californian, and was presenting through its columns the contentions of the riparianists as represented by Miller & Lux. The Californian, owned by A. C. Maude and edited by Richard Hudnut, was doing no less valiant service for Haggin. But the choicest language of which these masters were possessed they saved for rhetorically pummelling each other.

The last witness was heard on June 2, 1881, and all the testimony, when it was written up, made a stack of paper four feet high. For the convenience of the lawyers the court consented to hear the arguments in San Francisco. The speech-making began on June 20th, and on November 3d, Judge Brundage rendered his decision in favor of Haggin, which was to the effect that the appropriators were entitled to the water of the river as against the riparian owners, represented by Lux. Of course Miller & Lux appealed to the supreme court, and forthwith in Kern county there began a fierce political campaign to re-elect Judge Brundage on the one hand and to defeat him on the other.

Kern River Plays Another Prank

We have seen heretofore in the course of this narrative that Kern river seemed possessed of a certain titanic sense of humor, and none will be surprised to read that while the supreme court took its time in considering a mass of evidence, a gist of which was that neither party to the suit was willing to let the other have any water, the river began to increase its flow, and in the early part of 1884 the two chief parties to the suit were engaged in a fiercer fight than ever to keep the swollen river from flooding their lands, even though it involved turning the excess waters over on the other.

As indicated in his statement referred to in the previous chapter, Haggin had reclaimed the beds of Kern and Buena Vista lakes and had built the Goose lake canal to carry off any excess water that the Calloway and other irrigation canals could not handle. The Goose lake canal led off to the north, and on the south side of the river Haggin had built the Cole levee farther to prevent the river from breaking over and flooding his reclaimed lake bottoms.

By far the greater part of Haggin's reclaimed lands lay to the south of the river, and by far the greater part of Miller & Lux's reclaimed lands lay to the north. The latter had built levees along the north bank to protect their lands, and had constructed the great Kern Valley Water Company's canal to carry any excess waters off to the north of their cultivated fields.

As the snows melted in the mountains and the river lapped higher and higher against the levees it became a most absorbing question as to whether the waters would break on Miller's side or on Haggin's. They broke on Haggin's side on May 17, 1884, and in a few hours there was a hole in the Cole levee forty feet wide and through it a stream of muddy water, twenty feet deep, was rushing to cover all the lands that Haggin had reclaimed with so great expense.

There were great forces of men on the Haggin ranches in those days, and in very short order Billy Carr, Walter James, C. L. Conner, Dave Coffee and other superintendents and foremen for miles around were dispatching workmen, teams, scrapers, shovels and sand bags to the break. With the bags of sand the broken ends of the levee were rip-rapped to prevent further washing, and a row of piling was driven across the break.

Early in these proceedings Henry Miller arrived with R. E. Houghton. Having a suit in the supreme court in which their contention was that they were entitled to have the full flow of the river run over, through and upon their lands at all times, Miller and his attorney were hardly in a position to object to Haggin's men repairing a break in their levee that would tend to throw the full force of the stream over on Miller & Lux. But Houghton was fully equal to the emergency. It happened that Miller owned forty acres of land in the bed of Buena Vista lake (surrounded by the Haggin sections) and Miller set up the claim that he was entitled to have the river flow unhindered over, through and upon this land, also.

Miller strode up to the break in the levee where Walter James was superintending the driving of the piles. "What are you doing here? What are you doing here?" he demanded.

"I'm just carrying out my instructions," drawled Walter James in his imperturbable manner. "We thought we'd put a few piles in here, because we may want to build a bridge across, or something."

"Well, I don't want you to stop my water. I don't want you to stop my water. Do you understand? I don't want you to stop my water," shouted Miller. "Have a cigar, Mr. James."

So soon as the train could take him back to San Francisco, Houghton went to Judge Hunt of the superior court, and on a petition setting forth that Miller was the owner of a piece of land, to wit, forty acres, etc., and that whereas when the waters of Kern river were allowed to flow over it unhindered, etc., large quantities of tules and other plants and grasses valuable for feed grew thereon, and whereas one Haggin had a force of men at work with piles, a pile driver, brush, etc., endeavoring to restrain the said water from flowing over Miller's said land, etc., and whereas Miller would be greatly damaged, etc., etc., an injunction was duly secured.

By the time the injunction was served the ends of the levee were pretty well protected with sand bags, and most of the piling had been driven, but the water was flowing through the break almost as rapidly as ever.

Walter James was out at the levee when a telegram arrived ordering him to make all speed to San Francisco. He jumped on the horse that brought the messenger, galloped to Bellevue, and found there another horse saddled and waiting. A man thrust into his hand a purse of money. "The gates are all wide open," they shouted, and James was off for the Southern Pacific depot. He got there fifteen minutes late, but the train was an hour behind time, and he walked over to the hotel. The first man he saw was S. W. Wible.

"Hello, James," said Wible, "where are you going?"

"I'm just going down to the city for a few days," said James.

"Well, that's funny," said Wible, "I'm just going down to the city myself. Come in and let's have a drink."

In San Francisco the next morning James assured Louis Haggin that if he had a free hand and all the resources of the Haggin ranches at his command he could stop the break in the Cole levee in twenty-four hours. Haggin told him to take the first train back to Bakersfield, and to look for a telegram at Lathrop. Meantime the lawyer would undertake to get Judge Hunt's injunction lifted, and if he succeeded he would send a message to Lathrop reading, "Make the trip."

It was no small task to get the injunction set aside for the reason that after he had issued it Judge Hunt had gone on a fishing trip back into the mountains, leaving orders for nobody to interfere with any matter in his court during his absence. Louis Haggin, however, prevailed on another judge to set aside Judge Hunt's order, and James got his telegraphic instruction to "Make the trip."

On the journey home James laid out his campaign, and on his arrival at Bellevue orders were dispatched in all directions. Florence Gleason with a gang of men was already at the gap in the levee filling sand bags. Word was sent to C. L. Connor to report at once at the levee with all his men. J. E. Yancey and Frank Collins with the crews under them were to follow a little later, and still later were to come C. W. Jackson and the men from the Poso ranch. There were enough men, altogether, to keep fresh shifts at work at the gap all day and all night.

The camp previously established on the levee was enlarged to accommodate no less than five hundred men. Under the direction of Dave Coffee the hoisting engine used in driving piles was rigged to haul wagons loaded with sand along the levee. Heavy cables were laced back and forth among the piles, and the work of building in a wall of sand bags to stop the rushing flood proceeded with system and dispatch.

"But R. E. Houghton never overlooked anything," said Walter James in telling the story. While Louis Haggin was getting rid of Judge Hunt's injunction in San Francisco, Houghton was getting another injunction out of the superior court of Napa county. This was issued at the request of George Cornwell, who owned a small piece of land on the south side of the river and many thousands on the north side and who made the same representation as Miller had made before Judge Hunt.

Wible was less than a day behind James, but when he had reached Bakersfield, and came dashing down the road along the Cole levee with his Napa county injunction and Sheriff Coons, James and his great crew of men were swarming over the levee like human ants, working in a frenzy of haste to place the last sand bags that would stop the torrent of water.

Every superintendent from the Haggin ranches in Kern county was there, with Billy Carr in personal command. The sheriff waved the injunction and ordered the work stopped, but everyone was too busy to hear. It was an intense moment, for many months of work, tens of thousands of dollars, and (what was almost more than either for the men of fighting blood who were ranged on either side) victory or defeat in the contest depended on a few more minutes of time.

Sheriff Coons handed the injunction to Carr and explained its purport, but Carr had to read the document, and his glasses were over in the tent. He went to the tent, got his glasses, sat down and read the injunction and the complaint which accompanied it. All the while Wible was enjoining haste. When Carr finished studying the order of the court he desired James to read it, and James read it, quite as slowly and carefully as Carr had done. Wible stormed over to where Dave Coffee was rushing in the sand bags with redoubled haste and energy, and commanded him to desist in the name of the law. But Coffee knew nothing of law or injunctions and he kept right on shoving the sand bags down to the men who were building them, now, just above the surface of the yellow water. Finally Carr sauntered back from the tent, saw that the gap in the levee was closed and the bags of sand rose clear and dry above the surface, and held up his hand as a signal of submission to the court's decree.

But one thing had not been done. James had buried logs, or "dead men" on the upper side of the levee and had attached to them loops of cable ready to slip over the tops of the piling to help them carry the great weight of the water pressing on the narrow dam. But these loops of cable had not been adjusted, and the upper ends of the piling were without support. For a little while the piles and the wall of sand bags stood, and then, as the water lowered on the outer side, they leaned and swayed; the sand-bag wall splashed out of sight, the broken piles bobbed merrily to the surface, and the yellow flood leaped through the breach once more to spread over section after section of Haggin's reclaimed swamp land, and "undiminished in quantity and unimpaired in quality," flowed over, through and upon Miller's forty acres of Buena Vista lake bottom until it was covered a dozen or fifteen feet in depth, and it remained covered until the wild geese came and went and went and came again.

On July 5th, more than a month after the wall of sand bags washed out, the water was still pouring through the Cole levee upon Haggin's land at the rate of 3000 cubic feet per second.

But R. E. Houghton never overlooked anything. On July 26th he had W. B. Carr and Walter James haled before the court of Napa county to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt of court for consuming a quarter of an hour in reading the court's injunction.

"Did you have any thought in your mind, Mr. Carr," said the Napa lawyer who appeared for Houghton, "that you might profit by the delay you were causing?"

"Not in the least," said Carr.

"Of course not," said the Napa lawyer with fine sarcasm.

The Napa judge let Carr and James off with a mild admonition, but Judge Hunt was more obdurate. He declared that no court had any authority to set aside his injunction, and that all the time the five hundred men were rushing sand bags into the break they were in contempt. "The defendants are fined $1000 each."

Supreme Court Decides for Riparianists

Another victory was coming to the Miller forces. The same issue of the Haggin & Carr paper that contained the short paragraph about the Cole break and the San Francisco injunction carried an equally short paragraph stating that the great water suit had been resubmitted. It took until October 27, 1884, for the supreme court to reach a final decision, and the remittitur was not filed in this county until May 28, 1886, but not to make the story long, the supreme justices, or a majority of them, found that Judge Brundage had committed an error in not allowing certain testimony on the part of the defense that would have made but little difference, probably, in the main issue. But accompanying their order was a most important expression of opinion to the effect that the English common law respecting riparian rights governed the use of water in the state of California. In other words, as the Chester and Hudnut literary bureaus soon after made the whole state aware, the owner of land on the banks of a natural water course was entitled to have all the waters of the stream flow over and through his land, undiminished in quantity and unimpaired in quality. That meant that nobody could take water out of a stream in an irrigating ditch and spread it over his land, for if he did so, certainly he could not restore it again to its natural channel, undiminished and unimpaired, or either.

Of course every irrigator in the state sat up and howled, and it was not very long before an active and able politician like Billy Carr had them organized and holding big irrigation conventions, first at Riverside and then at Fresno, and drafting laws for submission to the state legislature that were calculated to send the doctrine of riparian rights back to England on the first tramp steamer that left the Golden Gate.

Carr did more. He went to work quietly among the members of the state legislature and before Miller's men knew what was going on he had the signatures of about two-thirds of them appended to a petition asking the governor to call a special session of the legislature and virtually pledging themselves to enact into law the measures framed at the two irrigation conventions.

Governor Calls Legislature Together

Armed with this petition and reinforced by a stalwart bunch of his friends from Kern county and elsewhere, Carr met Governor Stoneman at a hotel in San Francisco. Everybody had a good time, and the governor, who was a veteran of the Union army, distinguished and endeared himself in the eyes of Carr's southern followers by consuming without a quiver more mint juleps than any man in the crowd from below the Mason and Dixon line could carry off. Before the evening was over the call for the special session of the legislature was signed.

This was in July, 1886, but meantime Kern county had gone through another political campaign (the hottest and most vindictive, perhaps, which was ever waged in the valley) in which the issue turned on the election of the superior judge before whom the great water suit should come for re-trial. Brundage, of course, was supported by the Haggin & Carr forces, and all of Miller's strength was thrown behind Judge Arick. The latter was victorious by the scant majority of four votes.

Meantime, too, the whole state was being flooded with the fruits of the labors of Chester and Hudnut and other writers of the Miller & Lux and Carr & Haggin literary bureaus. Supplements treating the water question from Miller's side were furnished free to every paper of importance in the state that would handle them. The next week an equally copious flood of Haggin supplements descended on the readers. Plain print was seconded by whole page, colored cartoons, and these in addition to being sent to the papers were posted on the dead walls about the towns like circus announcements.

The extra session of the legislature convened in August, 1886, and with the din of a state-wide battle in their ears, the members of the assembly passed the irrigation bills as per schedule. But the senate balked. It would not defeat the bills nor would it pass them, and on September 11, 1886, the legislature adjourned with the question of water legislation immersed a thousand fathoms deep in statu quo.

It was sometime during the events recorded in this chapter that Henry Miller made the important discovery and confided it to a friend that "plenty of money makes a good politician."

How much money it took to make the very high grade politicians that fought each other to a stand still in the legislature of 1886, the author has not been able, even approximately, to ascertain, but battles like the one over the judgeship and battles like that at Cole's levee were evidently so immensely expensive that both Haggin & Carr and Miller & Lux wished for peace. The big suit fell to Judge Arick to try, but he granted a petition for a change of venue to Tulare county, which the supreme court sustained, and there the case lay until all the points involved in the contest were settled to the satisfaction of both parties by the celebrated Miller-Haggin agreement.

Miller-Haggin Agreement Ends Litigation

This agreement, which was signed on July 28, 1888, and which bears the signatures of thirty-one corporations and fifty-eight individuals owning water rights at the time on Kern river, practically divided the waters of the stream between Miller & Lux and Haggin and the different canal companies that were represented by them. The length of the document is fully commensurate with its importance and the number of parties interested, but as it was later incorporated into the findings of the Shaw decree, issued by Judge Lucien Shaw of Los Angeles sitting in the superior court of Kern county in 1895, and has been made a part of every deed executed by either of the two great land owners of the county since then, a scant summary of its provisions here is justifiable.

The agreement begins by recognizing that certain of the parties have riparian rights, and that certain other of the parties have vested rights by appropriation against all the world except the aforesaid riparian owners. This point settled, the agreement provides that the parties of the first part, represented by Miller, shall have one-third of all the waters of the river during the months of March, April, May, June, July, and August of each year, and that the parties of the second part, represented by Haggin, shall have all the remainder.

It provides for the measurement and delivery of the water, and for the construction of the Buena Vista Lake reservoir, covering approximately thirty-six sections of land. The two parties join in this undertaking, sharing equally the expense of construction, repair and maintenance. The two parties also share equally the expense of building the levees necessary to carry the water of the river from the second point of measurement to the reservoir, and of building an outlet canal from Buena Vista lake to the Kern Valley Water Company's canal. Both parties agree to join in suit against any person or persons who attempt to divert any water from the river above the second point of measurement, and each is to bear half the expense of such litigation. All pending suits between the two parties were to be dismissed. The agreement is made a perpetual covenant, running with all the land owned or claimed by any of the parties within the territory described in the contract.

---

CHAPTER XII

First Attempt at Colonization

The first effects of the settlement of the contests over water rights by means of the Miller-Haggin agreement were to stiffen land values in all the irrigated portion of the county, and to bring to a head the plans of Haggin and his associates for subdividing their lands and placing them on the market. The inevitable great expense of developing water rights, building canals and improving large ranches had been increased enormously by the outlays connected with the water contests with Livermore and Chester and then with Miller & Lux and by the expensive political campaigns incident thereto, and by the summer of 1888 the expenditures of Haggin and Tevis in their Kern county ventures had reached a huge aggregate. Meantime the growing of cotton and hops had not proven remunerative on account of the large labor cost and the failure of the attempts to secure low-priced workmen, and the same difficulty seemed to place a bar across other avenues to profit through agricultural activities on a vast scale. Lloyd Tevis, it is remembered, was a banker, and from the viewpoint of a banker who keeps tab on the amount of money invested and the amount of interest which it should bring in at current rates, the Kern county property of Haggin & Carr certainly did not look very hopeful.

Hence the decision to colonize the Haggin lands. But from the start differences arose between the parties interested as to the exact methods of procedure. According to seemingly reliable statements, it appears that Carr was skeptical about the wisdom of beginning the land sales at all just at that time, and he interposed strenuous objections to parting with any of the lands which had been planted to alfalfa or otherwise brought into a revenue producing condition. He objected, also, it is said, to selling the most desirable of the lands, which generally were those south of Bakersfield under the Kern Island canal. L. C. McAfee and C. Brower, managers of the sales department under the name of the Land Department of J. B. Haggin, proposed making certain improvements on the lands before offering them for sale, and employing a superintendent to advise and instruct the colonists in the management of their farms and orchards so that fewer mistakes would be made through inexperience. But all this involved more expenditures, and the plan did not meet with favor from those who had to sign the checks.

Still other points of difference arose. S. W. Fergusson, who had established a reputation as a boomer of real estate subdivisions, was sent to take charge of the Haggin colonization, and clashes of authority arose between him and Carr. For example, Carr and Fergusson differed as to the proper size for the irrigation ditches that were built through the colonies. Gradually

BUSINESS SECTION OF BAKERSFIELD AFTER THE BIG FIRE OF JULY, 1889

FOURTH AND CENTER STREETS, TAFT, IN 1910

Fergusson superseded Carr in the control of different departments of the Haggin activities, and it was not in Carr's nature to like a second place. In the end Carr sold out his interest, and the Kern County Land Company succeeded to Haggin & Carr. But these initial elements of failure in the colonization project were under the surface, and the people of Bakersfield rejoiced over the prospect that at last the great land holdings that had hedged the town about and impeded its growth and development were to be broken up. It was like opening the throttle to the pent up energies of the community, and new enterprises began to spring into life as the restraint was removed. There were other incentives to hope and progress. At a banquet tendered him by the citizens of Bakersfield, General Beale announced that he had plans for the colonization of the Tejon ranch; the Southern Pacific was grading the Porterville branch railroad; the railroad shops were being moved to Sumner, and more and more confidence was being placed in the constant report that the Valley railroad was soon to be built.

Many Plans for Progress

Under the influence of all these better prospects the Southern Hotel Association began the construction of its first building at the corner of Nineteenth street and Chester avenue; L. P. St. Clair and O. O. Mattson undertook the construction of a gas and electric lighting system; H. H. Fish, H. A. Blodget and T. J. Packard launched their plans for building a street railway system, and citizens of the town and land owners of the surrounding country subscribed a fund of $3000 for advertising the county at Los Angeles, then as now the distributing point for the Eastern home-seekers. In the spring of 1899 the Postal Telegraph Company completed its line to Bakersfield, the people of the county voted by 852 to 381 to bond the county for $250,000 for public improvements including an addition to the court house, a new jail, a county hospital and the grading and improving of many roads in different parts of the county.

Fire Wipes Out Business Section

In the midst of all these evidences of progress and while Bakersfield was looking forward with greater hope and expectancy than ever before in its history, came the fire of July 7, 1889, and wiped the business part of the little city clean. The business section of Bakersfield was confined in those days to the area bounded on the west by I street, on the south by Seventeenth, on the east by M, and on the north by Twentieth. Practically everything within these limits was destroyed.

The fire started in or near N. E. Kelsey's residence on Twentieth street about midway between Chester and I street, just back of where the Bank of Bakersfield now stands, or about on the spot where the rear quarter of the bank building is located. Mrs. Kelsey was getting the Sunday dinner on a gasoline stove, but as to further details of how the building caught fire reports differ widely. The volunteer fire department responded to the alarm with ordinary promptness, and hitched the suction hose of the Silsby steam fire engine to the old cast iron hydrant that still stands in front of the Southern Hotel at Nineteenth and Chester. This hydrant connected with the old Scribner water system, which was supplied by pumps and wells located at the southeast corner of Seventeenth street and Chester avenue. The small mains and the light engine, however, were insufficient to provide a stream that would check the flames. There was no wind, and the smoke and flames for a time mounted straight upward. In a very little time the fire spread to the Kelsey furniture and undertaking establishment on the corner where the Bank of Bakersfield is, and to the store of Hayden & White and the Echo office, all of which were on the same half block with Kelsey's residence and faced on Chester avenue. From these the Southern Hotel Association's new building at Nineteenth and Chester was ignited. By that time the heat from the flames had driven the firemen east on Nineteenth street, where the hose was dropped into one of the cisterns built at the street intersections on purpose to supply water for fighting fire. These cisterns were connected with the Town ditch by redwood conduits six inches square, but the conduits had grown full of roots and the cisterns were soon exhausted. Meantime burning shingles carried high in the air by the draft from the fire, had fallen on the roof of the Union stable, on the south side of Nineteenth street between K and L, and a new center of conflagration had been started. Also the fire had leaped across Nineteenth street to the south from the Southern hotel and was eating out the line of buildings on the west side of Chester avenue. Everything was burned along this street as far south as Seventeenth street, where the skating rink, standing where the new Morgan building now is, was the last building consumed. The water tower, diagonally across the avenue, was saved by the man in charge, who climbed to the roof and kept it wet down.

For a long time the Arlington, almost in the center of the fire, was saved by two means. The roof and veranda were covered with wet blankets and a small hose was used to keep them wet, and after the fire was well under way a breeze seemed to suck around the Southern hotel corner in such a way as to keep the heat from the Arlington. The building finally succumbed to the backfire from the east, but it was one of the last to go down in the central part of town.

The Episcopal church at Seventeenth and I streets, the Catholic church at Seventeenth and K, and the Baptist church at I and Twenty-second were mentioned roughly as the limits of the burned district, although the fire did not reach really so far as the Baptist church. How completely the business houses were wiped out is illustrated by the fact that it was impossible to buy a plug of tobacco in Bakersfield after the fire.

The fire occasioned a staggering property loss to the people of Bakersfield, but none went hungry or unsheltered for a night. Very few residences were destroyed, comparatively, and probably not over a hundred people were made homeless. These were speedily cared for by the more fortunate. For provisions there were the stores of Sumner, a mile away, including the well-stocked general merchandise establishment of Ardizzi-Olcese Company, and Haggin & Carr at once hauled in a large stock of provisions of all kinds from the company store at Bellvue. Carr also had many beeves slaughtered, and everyone had meat in abundance, whether he had money to pay or not.

So soon as the news of the disaster reached San Francisco an offer of aid was tendered by that city. Bakersfield was able to answer that no aid was needed, but the people of this city remembered the prompt offer years after when San Francisco was stricken, and few communities responded more promptly or liberally to the bay city's need than did Bakersfield.

Bakersfield Quickly Rebuilds

Before the embers were cool on the lots in the burned district new offices and business houses were being established in hastily built shacks in streets. Every newspaper office in the city was destroyed, but George Wear of the Gazette managed to save an old hand press and some cases of type, and the usual editions were gotten out with these meagre facilities, or copy was forwarded to San Francisco and the papers printed there until new plants could be obtained. The Southern Hotel Association rebuilt better and larger than before, and almost every other burned building was replaced at once by a better one. In a year's time all the temporary buildings had disappeared from the streets, and the city was bigger and better than it had been before the fire. During the rebuilding time, of course, the town was very active. The colonists were coming then in large numbers, extensions were being made in the canal systems, and there was great activity in locating desert lands, homesteads and pre-emptions.

A little more than a year after the fire the Bank of Bakersfield was founded, engineers were surveying in the vicinity of Bakersfield for the new valley railroad, the Kern County Land Company had been organized to take over the Haggin & Carr holdings, and S. W. Fergusson was placed in charge of the Rosedale and other colony lands, including Greenfield and Lerdo.

Colonization on a Large Scale

Fergusson at once organized a large office force in Bakersfield, established branch agencies in the east and in England, and prepared to do a colonization business on a very large scale. His advertising and the activities of his agents soon had a stream of immigrants and prospective land buyers flowing into Bakersfield from all points of the compass. Rosedale, situated six or eight miles due west of Bakersfield, was the principal scene of the colonization operations, although numbers of tracts of land were sold at Greenfield and elsewhere. The Rosedale lands lie under the Calloway canal, and are chiefly light, sandy soils, easily tilled, well suited to irrigation and quite productive. Most of the newcomers were well satisfied with the propositions offered them, and sales were reasonably brisk. The arrival of the English colonists was a great event in Bakersfield. They were of all sorts and conditions from market gardeners of experience who had saved small sums of money in years of industry and thrift, to scions of nobility who were shipped abroad by their relatives as a last despairing means for their moral and industrial redemption. It was a vain hope so far as the latter was concerned.

The few farmers among the English colonists got to work in their own fashion to the amazement and mirth of the California ranchers. The latter, used to driving six to ten horses attached to a gang plow, made great sport of the English farmers who went to their fields with a boy to lead the single horse while a man held the plow handles. But the little orchards and vineyards that the Englishmen planted grew and thrived, and so did the peanuts, corn and other vegetables that they planted between the rows.

Scions of Nobility Make Things Hum

The scions of nobility for the most part disdained to toil. There were neither orchards, vineyards nor vegetables to show for their labors, but they certainly made lively times about the Southern bar and lobby and in many other parts of the city less approved by good society. Nearly all the idlers were remittance men, and they ran uniformly successful races with time to dissipate their monthly allowances before the next batch of checks came from home. If they were sent out here to be clear of the temptations of English city life they were thrown from the frying pan into the fire, for if the slums of Bakersfield lacked anything that the young British bloods were used to they speedily arranged to supply the deficiency and to give all vice a Western air and relish that the most artistic panderers to depravity in European capitals could not put to blush. It was profitable to cater to the pleasures and follies of the remittance men, and in those days a dollar that was not in visible circulation was counted a dollar lost in Bakersfield. To illustrate how cheerfully and enthusiastically the sports from across the seas put their money into circulation while it lasted it is related that on one occasion when the birthday of the queen was being celebrated with a banquet at the Southern, the loyalty rose to such a height that not only was her majesty's health drunk copiously in the Southern's best champagne but the cheering crowd came storming out of the dining room and tried to pour champagne down the throats of the ponies tied at the rail beside the curb.

An International Romance

With this story of the Rosedale remittance men belongs the romantic tale of the wooing of Loretta Addis by Lord Sholto Douglas, third son of the Marquis of Queensbury. Loretta Addis was Miss Maggie Mooney's stage name, and Miss Maggie Mooney was a pretty and piquant little Irish girl who made an honest if not conventional living for herself by doing a turn on the stage of big Frank Carson's place on Twentieth street.

Lord Sholto and many others were captivated by Miss Mooney's charms, and Sholto proposed on every appropriate and inappropriate occasion he could find or manufacture. But Loretta was suspicious of alliances with the nobility, and she did not lack friends who told her that the marquis and marchioness never would sanction the match and that if she married their son she certainly would be cast off and renounced but a little later. Being cast off and renounced did not suit the fancy of this spunky Irish girl, and she set her face sternly against the tender appeals of Sholto. Finally the young lord's friends interfered to break up the languishing match, and failing in persuasive tactics they had Sholto arrested on a charge of insanity. Then they set to work to get Miss Mooney out of Bakersfield.

Undoubtedly this would have been accomplished had it not been for the exigencies of journalism, which include the fostering of a good story and the making of a sequel to a good story when the good story plays out. The love affairs of Lord Sholto and Loretta Addis made a good story, or at least the stories that the Bakersfield correspondents sent out looked good to the San Francisco city editors, and they gave the Bakersfield correspondents carte blanc, printed their stuff on the front page and clamored for more. C. P. Fox and W. D. Young, both familiar figures in Kern county journalism, were local correspondents for the Chronicle and the Examiner and were working the story together. Five dollars a column and full space rates for pictures was like a gold mine while it lasted, but it did not last sufficiently long. When Sholto was locked up in one of the private rooms at the sheriff's quarters and Sholto's friends were about to succeed in persuading or hiring Miss Mooney to move to another city, Young and Fox saw the end of their pay streak. They held a solemn consultation and decided that the only way to save the story was to complete Sholto's wooing for him. So they hired a hack and drove in all state to Miss Mooney's lodgings. She received them graciously, but turned a deaf ear to the eloquent words in which they pictured Sholto's double despair, spurned by his heart's desire and charged with madness, for nothing more than that he loved the fair Loretta.

It was of no use. Miss Mooney knew blarney when she heard it. Then Fox and Young painted the glamor of the British nobility and showed Miss Mooney how much better off she would be as a member of one of the oldest families of England than as a dancer and singer in a vaudeville theater in the wild west. It made no difference to Miss Mooney how fine the British nobility might be if the British nobility was going to renounce her, and she indicated as much. It began to look pretty desperate for that five-dollar-a-column stuff, but Fox rallied his jaded eloquence and taking an argumentative tone he recounted the history of the Marquis of Queensbury, showed that the old gentleman was a true old sport, quick to recognize merit, not too fastidious in his associates and amusements and altogether unlikely to play the part of a prude or a pharisee when the variety actress was presented to him as his daughter-in-law. The argument fell flat. The opposition had prejudiced her mind too thoroughly.

Then Young played his last trump card. He raised himself to the full of his raw-boned height and assumed a belligerent air. "Let them renounce you, if they dare," he exclaimed, "and you go on the stage as Lady Sholto Douglas, daughter-in-law of the Marquis of Queensbury. With the talent you've got——"

The practical instinct of a good press agent won where flattery and persuasion failed.

"I'll do it!" exclaimed Miss Mooney, springing up.

"Get on your hat," said Fox, also springing up.

Fifteen minutes later Fox and Young and Deputy Sheriff Joe Drouillard were ushering Miss Mooney into the little room where Sholto sat brooding his unhappy fate.

Another fifteen minutes, and they were receiving her in the little corridor, and the happy Sholto was consoling himself in his imprisonment with dreams of future bliss.

The San Francisco papers had another big story next morning; another when, a few days thereafter, came a cablegram containing the cheerful consent of the Marquis to his son's proposed alliance; another when Sholto was released without a complaint of insanity actually having been placed against him, and still another when Lord Douglas and Miss Mooney were happily married in an Episcopal church in San Francisco.

It is pleasant to conclude the story with the statement that they are still living happily on a ranch in Canada where Sholto has learned to farm and where Lady Sholto reigns with all the grace of sweet domesticity, her children growing up about her.

Not All Beer and Skittles

But it was not all champagne and romance with the Rosedale colonists. Only a small proportion, even among the industrious knew how to irrigate or understood the use and duty of water. A lot of them had a reckless habit of shutting down the gates of the side ditches when they wanted to go to their meals, and the water, backing up, would break the main ditch and flood five or ten acres of land before anyone knew anything about it. The low lands were the ones invariably flooded in this manner, and presently, what with the breaking of ditches and the prodigal use of water at all times, the lower lands became water-logged and black with the alkali that the rising water level brought up.

The Land Company put teams and men at work digging miles of drain ditches. About the time they were finished the dry years came, and the trees and vines on the high lands that had escaped the drowning began to perish for want of water. The Calloway's water right was good only after certain other ditches had been supplied.

There was no home market except for a very limited amount of fruit and farm produce, and shipments of fruit to the east began to show returns in red figures. Added to everything else was the financial panic that swept over the entire country in 1893-4. It is little wonder that Rosedale colony became a reproach in the county and that Bakersfield's second great hope for the cutting up of the great land holdings of the county came to naught.

It did not quite come to naught, for a few steady, industrious farmers stayed with their Rosedale land, and in the end developed fine homes and valuable property. They did it, moreover, with no less labor and waiting than the ordinary farmer has to undergo in any new country before his land pays for itself and begins to earn him a competency. At the present time, sixteen or seventeen years after it was denounced as a failure, Rosedale colony is as fair and pleasant a place and the farmers there are as happy and prosperous as any to be found in all the valley.

But the Fergusson administration of the Kern County Land Company affairs ended in general denunciation, and the big concern was more unpopular than at any other time, before or since, in the history of the county.

Another Swamp Land Contest

Another incident that added to the bad favor in which the Land Company found itself about the year 1895, was the contest over swamp lands bordering Buena Vista lake between settlers and the Land Company. This contest began to assume the form of open hostilities in March of the year named. Haggin claimed the land under certificates of purchase from the state as swamp land obtained by Duncan Beaumont in the '70s and assigned to Haggin. The settlers claimed that when the United States deeded the swamp and overflow land in California to the state the land in dispute was unsurveyed and was, as a matter of fact, a part of the bottom of a navigable lake and so was not conveyed by the grant to the state and was not subject to sale by the state.

The contest was soon carried into the courts, but while it was pending there men sent out under the command of Count Von Petersdorf tore down a number of the settlers' houses and threw them off the land. The settlers rallied, replaced their houses and again were driven off. There seems to have been no bloodshed, but both parties to the contest were armed, and arrests were frequent. There was quite a furore over the affair, but the proceedings of the justice court before which the combatants were brought were not of a character to promote solemnity. One day a company of settlers, all of whom were or had been fully armed, would be brought into court and duly charged with disturbing the peace by loud, boisterous and tumultuous language, fighting or offering to fight and exhibiting fire arms with the threat then and there to do bodily harm to certain other persons then and there present, all of which was contrary to the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California, etc. The settlers would then be admitted to bail in certain generous sums and released on their own recognizance. The next day Von Petersdorf and a dozen or so of his men would be haled before the court on a similar charge and released in the same manner. Altogether a sufficient total of bail bonds was named by Justice Fox to have bought all the land in dispute several times over. Eventually W. S. Tevis and H. A. Jastro took a hand in the matter, met the settlers and effected a compromise in which the Land Company got the land but the settlers were reimbursed for their improvements and expenditures.

The Jastro Administration

Not very long after that date H. A. Jastro became the general manager of the Land Company and inaugurated a new policy in the handling of the affairs of the concern. Under Carr's administration nearly all the money handled in the Haggin and Carr offices went out. Carr was buying land all the time, and building canals or making other improvements. Fergusson, of course, took in large aggregates of cash, but in another sense his administration was an extravagant one, for the colonization scheme consumed a large sum and was not a success, and the ranches paid little if any more under Fergusson than under Carr. Jastro put the business on a paying basis. Enterprises that did not yield a balance on the right side of the ledger were discouraged, and a minimum amount of money was spent on improvements that did not add to the immediate revenue producing power of the property.

Jastro's policy and its revenue producing result probably have prevented further efforts to sell the Kern County Land Company holdings to the present time. At least there have been no more colonization projects on the part of the Land Company, although the company has sold three considerable tracts for colonization—the Wasco and Mountain View colonies, which were handled by the California Home Extension Association, and the Lerdo tract which is to be colonized by the Lerdo Land & Water Company.

---

CHAPTER XIII

Important Events of a Decade, 1890-1900

The desert gold mines of Goler were first worked in the spring of 1893, and in December of that year a newspaper correspondent writing from Kane springs states that approximately $50,000 had been taken out by the thousand or more men who had been there. Four-fifths of this amount was found by less than a dozen men, and the bulk of the remaining fifth was taken out by a small fraction of the nine hundred and eighty-eight others. Coming from Bakersfield or Los Angeles the first camp in the Goler district was at Red Rock cañon, in a side gulch of which were developed the richest placer diggings in the state. At the time of the letter eight men were taking out $1000 a week from the Bell claim in this gulch. Over the ridge in another draw Sullivan & Black were doing about as well. At Goler, fifteen miles east of Red Rock, a few had struck it rich, others were doing fairly well, and many were obliged to live on the money they had brought with them. Bonanza gulch placers were yielding thirty cents to the pan from the bed rock. Twelve miles east of Goler at Summit, the Van Sykes had struck it rich.

That the desert mines had been prospected by the first of the California gold seekers was shown by the discovery in 1894 by W. J. Langdon of a location notice posted by Hiram Johnson bearing date of 1853. On a rock near by Langdon also found a pair of rusty gold scales, and by an old fire place, buried under three feet of drifting sands, the same prospector found a black whiskey bottle with gold dust in it to the value of $6.20.

The desert placers were exceedingly rich on the surface, but the great lack of water, not only for washing but even for drinking, held back development until the remainder of the state was long overrun by the placer miner and his burro. In 1894 Langdon, Ben Magee of Selma, a man by name of Cummings from Los Angeles, and F. M. Mooers, formerly a newspaper man of New York, panned the first gold in the Randsburg district, then unnamed. Even then, although the sands were found to be exceedingly rich, the difficulties of desert mining discouraged the majority of the party from continuing. They all drifted away except Mooers who went back to the Summit mines for a while, worked out his placers there, and then, in partnership with John Singleton and C. A. Burcham, went back to the Rand district and began dry washing in a gulch. They made about $5 per day each here, and later struck a better placer on the top of the hill.

Discovery of the Yellow Aster

One night when they had been away from camp and were coming home late they lost their way and made their bed in a gulch by chance. They slept late, and when Mooers opened his eyes in the morning the sun was glistening on the little particles of free gold in the ledge about his head. Burcham got his hammer, struck the rock of the projecting vein, and laid bare before the dazzled eyes of the three prospectors the treasure of the Yellow Aster. This was in the fall of 1895. Not for more than a year later was the wealth of the great mine demonstrated. For a long time its owners were content to take out its riches in a modest way. They had no money to begin with, and large development on the desert meant the investment of large sums. Ore for the first millings was hauled to Garlock, a distance of ten miles. Water for all purposes was hauled back from the same place and retailed for ten cents a gallon or three dollars per barrel. Later water was piped from Goler and from Squaw springs on Squaw mountain.

With the Yellow Aster, Mooers, Burcham and Singleton located the Rand, Olympus and Trilby claims, combining them under the name of Yellow Aster mine. In 1898 they built a thirty-stamp mill, and afterward increased it to one hundred stamps. The mine is now reckoned as the largest gold mine in the state. The ore is quarried out in glory holes, run down to the mill in cars and handled in every way on a wholesale scale.

Other Famous Desert Mines

Other famous mines of the Rand district include the Kinyon, named for its owner, who came to the desert without a dollar, and took out $40,000 with a windlass the first year from a little shallow shaft a short distance from the Yellow Aster. Silas Drouillard was grubstaked by the sheriff and his deputies in Bakersfield and went to Randsburg in search of the desert's treasure. The desert lured him across the sands until he dropped in exhaustion beside a rock. As a parting blow in the face of fate he struck the rock with his hammer and broke off a chunk that even in the dazzling days of the first Randsburg boom was worthy a place on a shelf in a saloon where the hungry-eyed prospectors could look and marvel between their libations to the fickle Fortune of the desert. The Wedge, Hammond's Winnie, and the Ramey brothers' Butte were among the strikes that gave the camp its first fame.

The Town of Randsburg

The town started first on the Yellow Aster property where Cuffle had a store and Mrs. Freeman ran a boarding house. In 1895 Abram Staley and his son Homer opened a blacksmith shop on the flat, the first wooden building on the present townsite. Charles Keehn opened the first store in the town proper; Montgomery Brothers started a saloon, John Crawford started another, and after that the arrivals were too rapid and numerous to be remembered.

During the rush of 1896 Randsburg had its first experience of the disorder that belongs by tradition to new mining camps. "The Dirty Dozen," as the members of a gang of dry washers from an older camp chose to call themselves, conceived the pleasant pastime of visiting Randsburg of evenings, making a rough house in the different saloons and finally promenading the streets, firing their revolvers. As most of the houses in the camp had only canvas walls and as the members of the Dirty Dozen were careless in their aim there was a general protest which resulted in a mass meeting on the porch of the Cliff house (hotel) and the organization of the Citizens' committee. At first it was planned to make it a vigilante organization, but soberer discussion resulted in the agreement that the disorders were not grave enough for such means of repression, and "Ironsides" Raines was hired to act as town marshal at a salary of $100 per month. A number of citizens were made deputy constables without pay. Personal notice was served on all the known members of the Dirty Dozen that their visits could be dispensed with, and a notice in the following words was posted in the streets:

The Citizens of Randsburg have organized to enforce the laws. Ten Deputy Constables have been appointed, and any riotous and threatening conduct will be punished.

by order of the

CITIZENS' COMMITTEE

There was no further disorder. At least there was no further general menace to life or limb, although for some time afterward the diversions of the miners that assembled in the desert camp differed somewhat from those of a Sunday-school picnic.

At the present time there is more genuine, profitable mining going on in the Randsburg district than at any other time since the camp was established. All the mines named heretofore are worked with profit, and in addition the King Solomon, Sunshine and Merced are yielding good returns to their owners. Mooers of the Yellow Aster is dead, but his heirs and his original partners, Burcham and Singleton, still own the mine and are taking out about 600 tons of $5 ore per day.

Discovery of Tungsten Mines

About ten years ago, during the progress of a strike of union miners at the Yellow Aster, Charles Taylor, one of the strikers, and Tom McCarthy went prospecting and discovered the afterward famous tungsten mines of Randsburg district. It soon developed that the tungsten deposits were among the largest and most accessible in the world, and the quality was exceptionally good. Somewhere between two million and three million dollars worth of the mineral have been taken out, and the mines are but fairly opened up.

The Mojave mines were discovered about the time of the first Randsburg rush or a few months later. The Queen Esther, Carmel, Golden Treasure and other mines of Mojave are celebrated producers, but the district never attained the fame that was accorded to Randsburg.

The Amalie District

Among the more important of the recent mining operations in the county are those about Amalie, a short distance above Caliente on the northern side of the Tehachapi pass. The Amalie mines carry both silver and gold, and with depth the ledges improve greatly. The Gold Peak, Amalie and other less celebrated mines of that vicinity have passed the stage of experiment and are reckoned as certain producers in the hands of competent management. Mining men familiar with the district prophesy that the future will see Amalie recognized as one of the most important mining sections of the state.

Other Important Events

Other matters that lend a special interest to the busy and eventful period in Kern county's history about the years of 1890 to 1900 include the building of the electric light, gas and street railway systems of Bakersfield, the beginning of the utilization of the waters of Kern river for the development of electric power, discovery and development of the desert mines, the local phases of the great railroad strike of 1894, the visit of the Oakland contingent of Coxey's army, the second incorporation of Bakersfield and the issuance of the celebrated Shaw decree, by which the terms of the Miller-Haggin agreement were given a semblance, at least, of judicial authority.

Gas and Electric Plants

The first gas plant was built and operated by L. P. St. Clair, Sr., and O. O. Mattson about the first part of 1889. Later H. A. Blodget and H. A. Jastro bought out Mattson's interest. The first plant was a crude affair comprising eight retorts, and the gas was manufactured from gasoline. In summer it was too rich, and in winter it was too thin for perfectly satisfactory use. During the summer of 1889, it is recalled, a big bellows was used to pump air into the holders to reduce the quality of the gas and prevent its smoking by reason of an excess of carbon. In the fall of 1889 the plant was changed to use coal instead of gasoline. The use of crude oil in the manufacture of gas was begun in 1896 and 1897, and continued to the fall of 1911, when natural gas from the great gas wells of the Standard Oil Company in the Buena Vista hills was turned into the mains.

It was not long after the gas plant was established that electric lighting began to gain greatly in popularity, and outside parties visited Bakersfield with a view to obtaining a franchise for an electric lighting system. They failed to get the franchise, but their visit spurred the local lighting company into action, and electricity was added to gas as a means of illumination in the city. In the spring of 1890 a 40-light dynamo was installed and a wood-burning steam engine was utilized to furnish power. The limitations of wood-generated steam and the advantages of water power in the generation of electricity were speedily recognized, and for a time a plan for using water power from the mill ditch was entertained. The fact that it is necessary to dry out the ditch occasionally for cleaning and repairs stood in the way of this plan, and the idea of maintaining a steam auxiliary plant for use when the ditch was out of commission did not appeal to the electric company.

It was the natural thing to turn to Kern river cañon as a source of power, and the plans for the first power plant built there were drawn by Blodget, Jastro, W. S. Tevis, S. W. Fergusson and C. N. Beale. The first intention was to interest eastern capital in the enterprise, but when it was mentioned to Lloyd Tevis he said that he would take it up himself, and did so. Work was begun December 13, 1894, building the flume along the wall of the cañon to carry the water from the intake up the cañon to the water wheel at the cañon's mouth where the present power house is located. The wooden flume first used to convey the water was later replaced by a tunnel driven in the rock of the cañon wall.

First Street Railway

The first street railway system was established about the same time as the gas plant. John M. Keith and H. A. Blodget were the originators of the project, and they called in H. H. Fish, who was operating a line of hacks and omnibuses and whose co-operation instead of competition was desirable. Fish went into the street car plan and Keith withdrew. The first equipment of rolling stock consisted of little horse cars, and one of the diversions offered the passengers was to help put the cars back on the track once in a while when the unaccustomed street car nags would get scared at something and bolt off at a tangent from the rails.

With the building of the power plant in the cañon (finished in 1897) the horse car system was supplanted by electric cars and C. N. Beale joined with Fish and Blodget in the enterprise. Six or eight years later the Power, Transit & Light Company was organized as a subsidiary corporation of the Kern County Land Company, and the street car, gas and electric lighting systems were taken over by it. In 1911 the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation bought out the Power, Transit & Light Company. Meantime, in 1897, the Electric Water Company, also a Land Company corporation, bought the Scribner Water Works and extended the system to meet the growing needs of the city.

The First Levee Canal

What is known as the levee canal, built a little distance south of Kern river from the Kern Island canal near Panorama heights southwest to the Stine canal, was constructed in the summer of 1890. On May 8th a subscription paper was circulated for the purpose of raising money to buy land for a right of way and for building the levee, and the following subscriptions were secured: W. B. Carr, $500; Celsus Brower, L. S. Rogers, H. C. Park, H. A. Jastro, H. A. Blodget, W. H. Scribner, J. Neiderauer, Dinkelspiel Brothers, Joseph Weringer, Solomon Jewett, Kern Valley Bank, A. C. Maude and J. E. Bailey, each $100; Paul Galtes, A. Weill and Hirshfeld and Brodek, each $150; C. L. Connor and Alex Mills (not the ancient marshal), each $50.

The right of way, however, was purchased by the county from Haggins & Carr for $4500, the deed being made on July 15, 1890. The levee canal was built along the right of way, and the dirt was thrown mostly on the side of the ditch next to the river so as to make an embankment sufficient to restrain any ordinary high water. This levee broke toward the north end at the time of the flood of 1893, and since then has been strengthened, a little dirt and sand being added whenever the river became threateningly high.

Ever since the first levee was built periodic movements have been started looking to the construction of an embankment that would permanently dispose of all possibility of the river getting into the town, but with the subsidence of the freshets the interest in the plans wane and only the incidental repairs and improvements mentioned have been made. The latest project for levee building includes the construction of a boulevard along the top of the proposed embankment, connecting with Oak street on the west and mounting Panorama heights on the east and connecting thence by Baker street and Truxtun avenue with the southern end of Oak street and forming a complete driveway around the northern half of the city. This project has been lingering in statu quo for several months past, but has not been definitely abandoned.

The Great Railway Strike

The great strike of the American Railway Union which began Thursday, June 28, 1894, affected Bakersfield and Kern about as it affected any other railroad division point. There was much excitement during the first few days of the tie-up, and on July 12th, two hundred men met at Reich opera house, which stood just across Jap alley from Weill's store, and organized the Citizens' committee of safety. S. W. Wible acted as chairman, and after the adoption of resolutions and a prayer by Rev. Henry, fifty men signed the roll as volunteer home guards, took the oath to support the constitution and pledged themselves to guard duty in case Company G of the National Guard were ordered away from town and their services were required. Officers were elected as follows: captain, F. S. Rice; lieutenants, G. K. Ober and C. A. Maul; sergeants, John O. Miller, G. L. Dillman, C. Von Petersdorf, Leo F. Winchell and H. C. Park; corporals, H. F. Condict, W. Lowell, A. W. Storms and R. M. Walker.

The committee of safety, however, was never called upon for active duty. Before the guards were organized the railroad men had established a patrol of their own under the informal but recognized leadership of Parker Barrett (then a conductor, but later one of the owners of the world-famous Lakeview oil gusher), and generally the best of order prevailed among the strikers. Following the meeting at Reich opera house the A. R. U. representatives called a mass meeting at Athletic park, at the southeast corner of Nineteenth street and Union avenue, where about four hundred people were addressed by three or four speakers and where long resolutions were adopted.

Bakersfield did not go hungry because of the strike, but a large part of it went thirsty or drank warm beverages. Most of the ice used in the city was shipped here from Truckee in those days, and except in the case of E. Downing's candy store the supplies were all small when the tie-up of the railroad began. When the saloons were out of ice they were nearly out of business, for few people would drink warm beer in July. Downing had 3000 pounds of ice when the strike began, and for a time his soda water fountain was the most popular place in Bakersfield. Finally the stock of ice was reduced to 700 pounds, and Downing hung the closed sign on the front of the fountain. "The rest of it is for the sick folks," he explained, and after that anyone who could show that he was sick got ice from Downing for nothing. Nobody else could get it at all.

Coxey's Army Comes and Goes

On June 7, 1894, what was known as the Oakland contingent of Coxey's Industrial Army arrived in Bakersfield on its way to Washington to join in the celebrated protest which ended in the "army" being ordered off the White House grass. For a time the supervisors entertained the army at the Reich opera house and later they were kept in a stockade built back of the jail. Even the latter accommodations were expensive to maintain, however, and the supervisors held a conference with Division Superintendent Burkhalter of the Southern Pacific with the result that a special train consisting in large part of stock cars was ordered, and the whole army was loaded aboard and headed for the south. Chairman Jastro of the supervisors and some of the railroad officials accompanied the army to Mojave, where they were landed in the midst of a blinding sandstorm. The army would have eaten Mojave out of house and home in a day's time, and to leave it there was out of the question. So Jastro and the Southern Pacific men called the leaders into consultation. "What you people want," they put it, "is to get east as quickly as possible. Now the Santa Fe is the shortest and fastest line from this coast (think of the S. P. men saying that) and what you want to do is just to confiscate the first Santa Fe train that comes along and take yourselves east with it."

It looked like a good plan to the army officers, and they proceeded to carry it out. Then a telegram was sent to Los Angeles, and a light engine loaded with United States deputy marshals ran out, headed off the stolen Santa Fe train at Barstow and carried the whole army back to Los Angeles under arrest, for the Santa Fe was in the hands of a receiver at the time and so under government authority.

Twin Towns Incorporate

With all these movements for the progress and improvement of Bakersfield under way the re-incorporation of the town was inevitable. Kern, the lesser of the twin towns, not half so populous as Bakersfield, had been incorporated. But a large element of the voters in Bakersfield opposed incorporation, and when, in December, 1896, the question was submitted after a long period of agitation, it was voted down by 268 to 197. In January, 1898, a second election was held, and the proposition won by 387 to 146. The vote by precincts was as follows:

Number 1—For, 121; against, 30.

Number 2—For, 74; against, 15.

Number 3—For, 43; against, 44.

Number 4—For, 70; against, 39.

Number 5—For, 79; against, 18.

The first officers elected were: Trustees, Paul Galtes, L. P. St. Clair, Sr., H. H. Fish, W. R. Macmurdo, J. Walters; board of education, J. A. Baker, Celsus Brower, O. D. Fish, F. S. Rice, E. P. Davis; assessor, H. F. Condict; marshal, T. A. Baker; treasurer, O. O. Mattson; attorney, S. N. Reed; clerk, A. T. Lightner.

Bakersfield was incorporated as a city of the fifth class, taking the charter provided by state law for such cities, and the same charter is in effect still, although Bakersfield and Kern have since been consolidated and the combined population is far in excess of the number required for a city of the fourth class.

Company G Responds to Duty

On May 8, 1898, Bakersfield proudly dispatched its first company of citizen soldiery to the defense of the state. Company G, National Guard, was ordered to San Francisco to do garrison duty at San Francisco during the progress of the Spanish-American war, and although the men left the armory at 5 a. m. they were greeted at the depot by a large body of citizens who gave them a farewell breakfast and presented them with a handsome silk flag on behalf of those who stayed at home. T. W. Lockhart made the speech of presentation. Capt. W. H. Cook made an address in response. The roster of the company was as follows:

Captain, W. H. Cook; second lieutenant, Lucien Beer; first sergeant, B. A. Hayden; second sergeant, H. C. Lechner; third sergeant, K. C. Masteller; fourth sergeant, C. E. Harding; corporals, H. J. Haley, C. L. Dunn, J. G. Broom, H. F. Stanley, C. R. Blodget, F. J. Downing and William Reddy; privates, L. C. Moon (musician), A. H. Abram, I. Barnes, John Barnes, W. Barnes, W. Barnhart, E. H. Bartley, J. L. Benoit, F. F. Blackington, H. H. Borem, D. E. Brewer, A. Brundy, A. M. Cammack, E. H. Chandler, A. S. Colton, E. R. Crane, A. S. Crites, G. S. Crites, F. W. Crocker, L. Cunningham, J. R. Daly, T. E. Davis, E. Dixon, R. Dinwiddie, R. Durnal, A. R. Elder, D. Fiedler, G. N. Frazier, R. Garner, W. G. Garrison, C. Colby, F. Hamilton, W. C. Hewitt, E. A. Hicks, F. M. Hicks, W. F. Hunt, S. A. Ice, G. H. Ingles, C. W. Kirk, Bert Kunkelman, O. P. Lindgren, E. P. Munsey, F. N. Mills, H. R. McKenzie, W. Olds, C. H. Ortte, J. H. Paulke, J. Pennington, W. H. Powers, Lynn Roberts, E. J. Ruddy, J. Savage, J. Timson, I. W. Tucker, J. B. Ware, C. W. West, B. F. Whittom, J. C. Ashby, C. W. Bollinger, E. Brodley, A. R. Shurtleff, W. Lakin, C. Manley, F. J. Kincaid, J. Manning.

News Notes, 1895 to 1900

August 29, 1895—J. B. Haggin had deeded to W. B. Carr all his right, title and interest in 14,280 acres of swamp land in Kings county.

Letters from farmers and others published in the newspapers suggest general farming as a solution of the troubles of the Rosedale colonists. Especially the farmers are urged to raise hogs.

October 10, 1895—The Kern River Power Company is surveying for its power generating plant on Kern river and for an electric transmission line to Los Angeles.

November 14, 1895—Mooers, Burcham and Singleton win in a suit attacking their title to the Yellow Aster mine.

December, 1895—W. S. Tevis settles with homesteaders on the Haggin swamp lands near Buena Vista, giving them a year's rent free and paying them for the improvements on the land.

Same date—Rights of way are being secured for the Valley railroad.

June 11, 1896—The new court house is finished.

July 16, 1896—An unsuccessful attempt is made to crack the vault in the county treasurer's office.

July, 1896—Silas Drouillard finds the St. Elmo mine in the Randsburg district and names it for one of his partners, Elmo Pyle.

September 25, 1896—The contract is let for the Power, Transit & Light Company's substation, and the machinery is ordered from Schenectady.

INTERSECTION OF CHESTER AVENUE AND NINETEENTH STREET, BAKERSFIELD

NEW CONCRETE BRIDGE OVER KERN RIVER AT BAKERSFIELD

January 28, 1897—The business of the Bakersfield post office for the past year amounted to $74,000.

December, 1896—The Bakersfield Creamery is established.

April 4, 1897—The electric current is turned on from the power plant in the cañon, and the Kern County Land Company is preparing to use the electricity for pumping water at Stockdale, to run a cold storage plant at Bellevue, and to drive the machinery in its shops in Bakersfield.

May 10, 1897—W. B. Carr is found dead in his room in San Francisco from asphyxiation.

August, 1897—The Kern County Land Company is constructing a slaughter house and meat-packing establishment at Bellevue.

April, 1897—The Bakersfield Labor Exchange is organized.

September 23, 1897—The Land Company is laying pipes for a new water system in Bakersfield.

October 28, 1897—S. C. Smith has secured the last deed for the right of way for the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley railroad.

December, 1897—H. E. Huntington says that the Southern Pacific is willing to build a loop into Bakersfield and build a depot nearer the business section. 148 citizens signed a petition asking W. S. Tevis to use his influence to prevent the proposed loop and depot from being built.

May 12, 1898—Company G of the National Guard goes to San Francisco for duty in the Spanish American war.

May 27, 1898—The arrival of the Valley railroad is celebrated in Bakersfield with a parade, floats, wild west show, speeches and fireworks.

July 14, 1898—Fire, starting in the California theater, lays waste the larger part of the business section of Kern city.

November, 1899—The paving of the streets in the business section of the city is in progress.

During October, 1899, 323 oil land locations were recorded in the county. Bakersfield is soon to have free mail delivery.

Levee agitation is active.

W. S. Tevis and others make tender of sites for city parks, but all of them are rejected for one reason or another.

January 12, 1900—The corner stone of the Woman's Club Hall is laid.

January, 1900—Oil land locators begin to have trouble with scrippers.

February, 1900—The electric road between Bakersfield and Kern is soon to be started.

March, 1900—The Southern Pacific has begun the use of oil as fuel in its engines.

March 16, 1900—Solomon Jewett, H. A. Blodget, L. P. St. Clair, C. N. Beal and F. T. Whorff incorporate the Sunset Railroad Company to build a road to the Sunset oil fields where Jewett & Blodget are largely interested in development work.

March 26, 1900—Truxtun Beale presents to the city of Bakersfield a deed to the Beale Memorial public library.

CHAPTER XIV

Development of Oil Fields

Ask the first man you meet on the streets of Bakersfield what gave the town its great boost forward about the year 1900, and he is very likely to answer that it was the discovery of the oil fields. Perhaps he will be more specific and say the discovery of the Kern river oil field. In either case, however, he will be very far from the actual, historic truth as to the date of these discoveries. Titus Fey Cronise's "The Natural Wealth of California," published in 1868 by Bancroft & Company at San Francisco, states that from Fort Tejon to Kern river, a distance of forty miles and extending out a space of ten miles from the Coast range, the country is covered with salt marshes, brine and petroleum springs. Petroleum and asphalt deposits, the same authority continues, extend from San Emidio cañon to Buena Vista lake (so named by the Spaniards in 1806) the main deposit being eighteen miles southeast of the lake. At that place there was a spring of maltha covering an acre in extent, the center of which was a viscid pool, agitated by gas, and the outer edge of which was hardened into stony asphalt, full of the bones of beasts. Works erected here, Cronise says, produced in 1864 several thousand barrels of good oil, which was shipped to San Francisco. The great cost of transportation prevented the enterprise from being a financial success.

About the same date R. M. Gilbert took a barrel of thick, tarry oil out of an oil spring on the north bank of Kern river at the lower edge of the present Kern river field and hauled it to Solomon Jewett's sheep ranch a few miles up the river to mark the sheep with. On April 23, 1872, J. O. Lovejoy deeded to the Buena Vista Petroleum Company all his right, title and interest in a certificate of purchase dated April 3, 1872, for 640 acres in the northeast quarter and the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section nineteen; the west half and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter, the east half and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter and the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section twenty, and the northeast quarter of section twenty-nine, all in township thirty, south of range twenty-two. This comprised the heart of the old McKittrick field, where many of the present producing wells are located, and the exact description of the land is given to show that even in those days the oil men had learned to "lay the ruler diagonally across the sections from northwest to southeast" when they studied their maps.

This is sufficient to show that thirty or thirty-five years before the first big oil boom in Kern county oil had been discovered in all the great fields of the present day except Midway and Lost Hills. Moreover, six years before the oil boom in 1899, when the Kern river field was uncovered and oil began to be the principal subject of interest in Kern county, the quiet, laborious and not too profitable development of the oil and asphalt industry at McKittrick and Sunset had reached such a stage that the McKittrick railroad had been built and the Sunset road was projected. The big oil boom was not, accordingly, so much a boom of discovery as a boom due to the ripening of market conditions and the revival of industrial enterprise and expansion after the financial depression of 1893-4. Similarly all the later booms have depended as much on outside conditions as on the bringing in of wells in new territory. Whenever the market has demanded more oil and the price offered has been tempting the oil industry of Kern county has risen to the emergency, and there is now every reason to believe that future renewals of the same conditions will stimulate the industry to renewed activity until the county's oil production reaches several times its present great aggregate.

Early Development at McKittrick

Aside from the unprofitable efforts of the war-time oil prospectors already referred to, the first development of the Kern county oil deposit was in the early '70s when a company of Italians from Mariposa county built a crude refinery at McKittrick, sunk shafts into the beds of asphaltum and dug some shallow wells in search of oil.

It was the natural thing that development should begin at this place, for near the present site of the town of McKittrick violent upheavals of the earth in ages past had rent and torn the strata leaving a great body of oil sand exposed. From this oil sand the crude petroleum oozed and flowed gently over the broken edge of the hill, thickening as the sun and air extracted the lighter elements and finally forming great masses of natural asphalt, pure and clean except for the sand and dust that the winds carried into it. At no other place in the county were the oil sands so largely exposed, and nowhere else were the surface evidences of petroleum so conspicuous and extensive. It was only a matter of quarrying to obtain the asphalt in great quantities, and the early operators sought only enough oil to serve as a flux for the heavier product that Nature had prepared in her own laboratory. At one place the Italians drove a tunnel eighty feet into a mass of asphalt that had flowed over the edge of a little cañon, but at that time there was no railroad in the valley, and it was altogether out of the question to reach a profitable market.

Following the building of the Southern Pacific and the beginning of new enterprises in Kern county with the capital of Livermore & Redington and J. B. Haggin, the Columbian Oil Company was organized by Solomon Jewett, F. R. Fillebrown, Dr. George F. Thornton, J. G. Parke, Alfonse and Jacob Weill and others and a well was started on section 13, 30-21, on what is now known as the Del Monte property. Parke, who was a civil engineer, had some experience in the Pennsylvania oil fields, and was the prime mover in the enterprise of the Columbian. The company drilled to a depth of 800 feet, but by that time the gas pressure had become so strong that the drillers were unable to go deeper with the imperfect machinery then obtainable. The derrick was moved to section 24, and a contract made for a hole 1000 feet deep. The result was a clean, dry hole with neither gas nor oil nor any other valuable product.

Operators Move to Sunset

The Columbian abandoned the field, and in 1890 the derrick was moved to Sunset, where Jewett & Blodget had begun operations. The first activity at Sunset began in 1889, when Solomon Jewett, H. A. Blodget, John Hambleton, Judge J. O. Lovejoy, J. H. Woody, William F. Woods and others located 2000 acres of land along the edge of the hills northwest and southeast of Old Sunset, organized the Sunset Oil Company, and started a well on section 2, 11-24, about half a mile west of where the fine producing wells of the Adeline Extension were subsequently brought in.

This first well was drilled by William DeWitt of Tulare, and was located, as was the case of nearly all the earlier wells, in a bed of brea, just at the point where the oil sands outcropped. DeWitt got a strong flow of sulphur water at 300 feet and abandoned the well. Had he moved his derrick a little farther to the east he would have developed an oil well at a very shallow depth, but instead he found another bed of brea on section 21, 11-23, about five miles southeast of his first location, and started drilling there. At a depth of 100 feet the drill went into a very heavy oil that rose in the casing and oozed over the top.

Meantime Jewett & Blodget and Charles Bernard of Ventura county secured a lease on the Sunset Oil Company's 2000 acres of land, and Bernard, who had gained some experience in the Ventura oil fields, took over the DeWitt outfit and began a new well close to the second hole which was drilled by the latter on section 21. By the time Bernard had gone down 300 feet he had three strings of tools in the well, and decided that it was cheaper to move than to fish them out. He took his derrick to section 13, 11-24, drilled down 300 feet, got a flowing sulphur water well, and sold his interest in the lease to Jewett & Blodget.

Blodget then took charge of the development of the Sunset field, bought the rig of the Columbian Oil Company at McKittrick, and drilled a number of small wells along the edge of the outcroppings near Old Sunset. None of the wells yielded much oil, but the total output was sufficient to supply the flux for making asphalt, and in 1891 the Jewett & Blodget refinery was established at Old Sunset. The natural asphalt was quarried as at McKittrick and melted in open kettles with a small amount of crude oil as a flux. Then the hot asphalt was drawn off into wooden boxes, and the settlings of dirt and sand were shovelled out of the kettles ready for another batch. The asphalt was hauled to Bakersfield by teams of sixteen to twenty-four horses and shipped east.

McKittrick Railroad Built

The expense of this method of transportation was so great that Jewett & Blodget through H. F. Williams and A. N. Towne began negotiations with the Southern Pacific for a railroad to Sunset and one to McKittrick, where Jewett & Blodget were operating also to some extent. The result was an agreement in 1892 by which the railroad undertook to build a road to McKittrick within two years, and another to Sunset within five years, Jewett & Blodget to secure the right of way and guarantee sufficient business to pay the operating expenses. As a part of the agreement, also, the Standard Asphalt Company was organized with Jewett & Blodget and the railroad company as equal partners. Later the agreement as to the building of the roads was amended by the Southern Pacific beginning the construction of the McKittrick branch at once and the Sunset branch construction being postponed indefinitely. The McKittrick road was completed in 1893, just in time for the financial panic to offset by reduced demand for asphalt the advantage of better transportation facilities. The operations of the Standard Asphalt Company did not pay, and the partnership between Jewett & Blodget and the railroad was dissolved, Jewett & Blodget going back to Sunset and the railroad taking the McKittrick end of the business.

Jewett & Blodget kept plodding away in the Sunset field, bringing in small, shallow wells near the outcroppings, and in 1895 they had a production that justified them putting in stills for the manufacture of asphalt. These operations comprised the whole of the oil business in Kern county until 1898, when McWhorter, Doheny and others of the advance guard of the first rush of oil men began to explore the west side. In 1899 the oil excitement had spread from the south and from Coalinga. There was much talk of the McKittrick field and many visitors and prospectors were arriving there from all parts of the state.

One of the men who invested in McKittrick was Judson F. Elwood of Fresno, who bought a few shares in one of the early companies and went to see what the property looked like. On his way home he stopped to visit his brother, James Munroe Elwood, who was keeping a small wood yard in Bakersfield. Judson told his brother about his McKittrick oil venture, and remarked that the country north of Kern river looked much as it did at McKittrick. James Elwood's interest was further excited by overhearing two men discussing the story of the oil spring from which Gilbert took the tar to mark Jewett's sheep in the '60s. He made inquiries of Thomas A. Means, who owned land along the north side of the river, and Means told him that the Kern County Land Company, in excavating for a ditch years before, had uncovered oil sand and that gas had been seen bubbling up in the waters of the river. The exposed oil sand had long been recovered, however, and the gas was seen no more. Means for a long time past had been seeking to interest someone in the oil prospects on the north side of the river, and had shown E. L. Doheny and W. S. Tevis over the land without result. Accordingly he was only too glad to give James Elwood a favorable lease, and Elwood wrote to his father, Jonathan Elwood, who was living in Fresno county and who was an old prospector, to come and help him find the Kern river oil.

Discovery of the Kern River Field

In a letter to the California Oil World published August 24, 1911, Jonathan Elwood tells the story of the discovery in these words:

"James Munroe Elwood and I, Jonathan Elwood, alone and without the assistance of anyone, discovered oil on the north bank of Kern river, seven miles northeast of Bakersfield on Thomas A. Means' farm. This was in May, 1899. We made the discovery with a hand auger, under the edge of a cliff, close to the river. Our auger consisted of a piece of thin steel about four inches wide and twisted so as to bore a hole about three inches in diameter.

"We had a short piece of one-half inch iron rod, making the bit and rod together four feet long. A screw was cut on the end of this rod to receive a one-half inch gas pipe which we had cut in four and eight-foot lengths, so we could bore one and the other alternately and never have our auger handle more than four feet above the ground. We bored a number of holes fifteen or twenty feet deep and every time would bore into water sand that we could not keep on our auger.

"We concluded that the bank must have slid down and that we were boring where the river had once been. We then went where the bank was worn off by the river perpendicularly thirty feet. We dug back into the bluff as if making a tunnel three or four feet, and set our auger on solid formation and in three hours we were in oil sand at a depth of only thirteen feet. We had enough auger stem with us to go on to a depth of twenty-five feet and it was looking well.

"We then went up onto the bluff and commenced a shaft, and at the depth of forty-three feet we again struck the oil sand. We were then obliged to get timber and curb as we went down, as the oil sand was too soft to stand up. We were obliged to put in an air blast to furnish fresh air to the man below on account of the strong odor of gas. At a depth of seventy-five feet there was so much oil and gas that we concluded we had better get a steam rig. We got this and went down 343 feet.

"By this time men were coming there from all over the state, locating government land and quarreling over first rights, jumping some that we had located, three or four claims deep. The shaft furnished us with oil to run our own steam rig also rigs for several of the locators. The first oil taken away was when I took four whiskey barrels of it to Kern city and shipped it to Millwood for skid grease, getting $1 a barrel net."

As Mr. Elwood says, by that time people were coming to Kern county from all parts of the state, and very soon after they were coming from all parts of the world. The boom resulted in development that soon proved the land over the great Kern river oil pool, and scattered derricks north along the low hills as far as Poso creek. It extended to the Sunset and McKittrick fields, and spread a line of prospectors all across the territory between, which soon took the name of Midway.

Sunset Railroad Built

In March, 1900, Solomon Jewett, H. A. Blodgett, L. P. St. Clair, C. N. Beal and F. T. Whorff incorporated the Sunset Railroad Company, and Beal, who formerly had been in the employ of the Santa Fe railroad, undertook to interest President Ripley of the Santa Fe in the Sunset branch. This he succeeded in doing, and arrangements were made to float a bond issue of $300,000, guaranteed by the Santa Fe. Before the plan was carried out, however, the Santa Fe and Southern Pacific entered into an agreement to build and operate jointly all branch or feeder roads terminating at common points. This agreement and the death of C. P. Huntington, president of the Southern Pacific, delayed the building of the Sunset road until 1902.

The Southern Pacific in December, 1899, began building the short branch from its main line west of the Kern river field into the lower part of the producing territory, where oil from all the leases higher up could be delivered by gravity or small pumping power to the loading racks. By these means all the producing fields of the county had rail transportation by the latter part of 1902 except Midway, which was then hardly in the producing class.

Begin Building Pipe Lines

In the spring of 1902, also, the Standard Oil Company began its eight-inch pipe line from the Kern river field to Point Richmond, and in October or November it was practically ready for use, thus affording a large additional means of handling the oil. But the production of oil and the means for handling it increased much faster than did the markets. In 1902 the Kern county fields produced 9,705,703 barrels of oil. In 1903 the amount had jumped to over 18,000,000 barrels. The production of the state was nearly 14,000,000 barrels in 1902, and in 1903 it was over 24,000,000 barrels. The result of this tremendous increase in the supply of a commodity which the state had been getting along without only a very few years before could have but one consequence—a rapid and steady decline in price. In spite of the decline the impetus that the industry had gained from the first excitement carried it to a production of 19,600,000 barrels in Kern county in 1904.

Then the prices went to complete ruin, and the Standard Oil Company built great earthen reservoirs—holding a half million to a million barrels each—and began filling them with oil at fifteen, twelve and a half, and finally at eleven and two-thirds cents per barrel. Bankruptcy stared the producers in the face.

Associated Oil Company Formed

With the first appearance of the Standard on the horizon of the California oil industry a number of producing companies in the Kern river and other fields joined in the organization of the Associated Oil Company, the avowed object of which was protection from the aggressions of larger concerns and economy and efficiency in the marketing of its oil. The Associated early effected an alliance with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and at the time of the depression in 1904 it occupied a position of great strength as compared with the independent, unorganized producers. In fact the large factors in the oil situation in the state at that time were recognized to be the Standard, the Associated, the Union Oil Company, the Southern Pacific Railroad and the Pacific Oil & Transportation Company.

It was early in August, 1904, that the Standard announced that it would pay eleven and two-thirds cents for oil in the Kern river field. Although the Associated and Standard were commonly supposed to have a working agreement by which each steered clear of competition with the other, officers of the former company gave out that for the sake of accommodating the producer it would pay fifteen cents. About the same time W. S. Porter, general manager of the Associated, estimated the overproduction of oil in the state at 8,000,000 barrels per year. On August 15th the Standard, which was at that time completing storage reservoirs in the Kern river field at the rate of one half-million barrel reservoir per month, announced that it did not care to buy Kern river oil at any price.

Independent Agency Organized

Oil men estimated that under twenty-five cents per barrel they could not produce oil, pay expenses and set aside the sinking fund to meet the value of their investments against the time the wells went dry. The plan of shutting down the wells was generally discussed, but for many of the companies this was wholly out of the question, either because they had leases that required the operation of the property or because they had creditors who would not consent to wait for their money. On August 23d the Morning Echo of Bakersfield printed an interview with H. H. Blood, one of the best known of the early operators in the Kern river field, in which the organization of the producers was strongly urged, not for the purpose of fighting, as Blood pointed out, but for the purpose of facilitating the sale of oil and to prevent the indiscriminate, disorganized competition by means of which the producers were constantly opposing each others' interests.

Blood's suggestion formed a stable point around which the random discussion of the situation began to crystalize, and that evening, on the initiative of W. D. Young, a meeting of oil men was called at the National Oil Supply Company's office to talk the matter over. The meeting was organized by the election of W. S. Morton as chairman and W. D. Young as secretary, and the secretary was instructed to send out invitations to the independent producers of the state asking them to meet in Bakersfield on September 1st for the purpose of forming a permanent organization. On the date named representatives of forty-four companies met at the Southern hotel parlor, elected Timothy Spellacy chairman and W. D. Young secretary and appointed a committee to name a committee of five on organization.

At that meeting it was stated that between 9,000,000 and 10,000,000 barrels of oil were stored in the Kern river field, mostly in the reservoirs of the Standard. The next day, however, the committee on organization decided that the job was too big for it, and another meeting was called for September 5th to name a committee of ten to draft a plan for the new concern. This committee, duly appointed and consisting of T. Spellacy, T. Earley, M. V. McQuigg, W. B. Robb, A. H. Liscomb, C. H. Ritchie, W. W. Stevenson, F. W. McNear, I. E. Segur and H. U. Maxfield, met on September 10th, with all members present, and spent the whole day and until 10 o'clock at night in deliberating over the task. A further meeting was held next day, and lawyers were called in counsel, among them being George W. Lane, who remained with the organization as its attorney until the present day.

The result of all these serious and extended conferences was the formal organization of the Independent Oil Producers' Agency on November 3, 1904. On that date incorporation papers were filed in Sacramento having first been filed in Kern county, and the following officers were elected: President, M. V. McQuigg; first vice president, Timothy Spellacy; second vice president, F. F. Weed; secretary, A. H. Liscomb; treasurer, W. B. Robb; auditing committee, W. H. Hill, T. Turner and J. Benson Wrenn. The directors for the first year, each representing a producing oil company, were Timothy Spellacy, W. B. Robb, A. H. Liscomb, W. S. Morton, C. H. Ritchie, W. W. Stevenson, L. P. St. Clair, Jr., S. P. Wible, W. H. Hill, G. J. Planz, Lesser Hirshfeld, W. A. Ferguson, E. E. Jones, C. C. Bowles, J. F. Lucey, J. B. Batz, T. O. Turner, C. A. Barlow, H. A. Jastro, J. Benson Wrenn, W. D. Young, T. V. Doub, L. E. Doan, E. Dinkelspiel, Thomas Earley, J. F. Ker, F. F. Weed, L. Woodbury, E. Denicke, G. W. Lane, A. J. Wallace, M. V. McQuigg, T. M. Gardner, F. P. Fuller and F. N. Scofield.

The organization, which has had so large a part and influence in the making of subsequent history in Kern county as to require especial detail in its description, was organized on a plan conspicuous both for its strength and its democracy. Each constituent company signed a lease of its property to the Agency for a period of five years, and the Agency executed a license and agreement giving each company the right to operate its own property, the Agency, however, reserving the right to handle and dispose of all the oil produced. Each constituent company was given one share of stock in the Agency, entitling it to one vote in all stockholders' meetings. The unique feature of this arrangement was that no matter whether the Agency company owned a thousand acres of oil land and was producing 100,000 barrels per month or had a lease on two and a half acres and was producing 1000 barrels per month it had the same voice and vote in the management of the affairs of the Agency. It is a matter of history, also, that the Agency has been remarkable throughout almost its entire career so far for the free publicity which has been given to its affairs and its deliberations. A great percentage of its directors' meetings at which matters of vital importance have been discussed have been with open doors and with representatives of the press occupying seats about a table in the foreground. Whether or not it has been in any degree a result of this policy, it is a fact that the Agency, struggling at all times to increase the price of its product, has had the universal goodwill of the people of the state, including the "ultimate consumer," who is usually supposed to be hostile to any movement for an advance in prices.

The first plan of the Agency was not to go into the business of marketing of oil, and its first sales contract was with the Associated. After two weeks of negotiations with the executive committee of the Agency, the Associated agreed, on December 23, 1904, to buy, at eighteen cents per barrel, sixty per cent of the Agency's total output for the year, estimated at 3,500,000 barrels, and to store the other forty per cent at a reasonable rate.

In view of the fact that the producers had been declaring that oil could not be produced under twenty-five cents per barrel and meet all expenses and depreciation, this contract was not hailed with absolute satisfaction. It was agreed, however, that the executive committee had done as well as it could under the circumstances, and the situation was accepted with good grace.

The low price, hard as it bore on the individual producers, had two good effects on the market. It discouraged production and it encouraged consumption. The production in the Kern county fields fell off from 19,600,000 barrels in 1904 to 14,487,967 barrels in 1905. In 1906 the Kern county production was almost the same, and the production throughout the state increased only 3,600,000 barrels from 1904 to 1906, inclusive.

On the completion of the first year's contract with the Associated it was renewed at twenty-seven and a half cents per barrel, the half cent representing the cost of handling the oil by the Agency. The increase in price was very gratifying to the independents, but it did not result, as we have seen, in any great immediate increase in production. The prices for the two years, however, did permit the marketers to extend the use of oil to new fields, with the result that all the stock oil in the state except what was stored in the Standard's reservoirs, was well cleaned up by the spring of 1908, and L. P. St. Clair, then president of the Agency and charged with the sale of the independent oil, was able to close a contract with W. S. Porter of the Associated for two years on the basis of sixty and a half cents for the first year and sixty-three and a half cents for the second year.

The new prices gave the oil producer some of the rewards which his toil and waiting had justified, and they also excited the imaginations of oil producers, promoters and the investing public generally with visions of wealth to be taken from the Kern county oil fields. Pumps were started everywhere. Air compressors were installed on leases in the Kern river field where the wells had fallen off in their yield or had gone to water, and in many instances their oil productivity was revived. Drills began dropping everywhere, and Bakersfield felt the blood of a new boom quickening in her veins. In 1907 the oil production of the county was 15,600,000 barrels. In 1908 it had jumped to 17,800,000 barrels, and in 1910 it reached the tremendous total of 39,958,000 barrels.

Fortunately the increase throughout the state did not keep pace with the increase in Kern county. Elsewhere the fields were restricted or development expensive or both, and so it happened that of the entire gain in yield throughout the state in 1910, five-sixths was credited to Kern county. This great increase in output was due only in part to the activity in drilling which the higher prices for oil stimulated. Operators working farther out from the hills to the north of Maricopa and in the Midway valley north, northwest and east of Taft began reaching the great gusher sands and brought in the remarkable procession of flowing wells that made the year 1910 and the latter part of the year 1909 famous in the history of California oil. It is literally true that many producers got a great deal more oil than they expected to get which is saying much, indeed.

As early as the spring of 1909 the men close to the marketing end of the industry began to sound a note of warning against another period of overproduction, but it always has been hard for producers to curb their native instinct to get more oil so long as they had money in the bank to pay the bills, and there is something about an oil gusher that fires the imagination of the most staid and commonplace of men and makes him a plunger for the time being. Two other circumstances lured the oil men on to greater and greater activity in drilling new land. The bringing in of the great flowing wells of the Midway valley and the development of great gas wells in the Buena Vista hills in the latter part of 1909 proved that the oil measures crossed the valley from the older portions of Midway and Sunset and rose in an anticline beneath the Buena Vista hills. This meant a great extension of the practically proven territory, and not only did operators rush in to hold all the land within the newly proven strip, but they located everything far out on the Elk hills, to the north of McKittrick and to the east of Sunset and Old Sunset. Then came the oil land withdrawal of September, 1909, which was interpreted as permitting the development of claims on which rights more or less shadowy had at that time been secured, but which plainly denied the right to any subsequent location of oil claims within the territory described in this order. This made it necessary to do something toward development in order to hold down the claims already entered, and most of the locators who were able to do so either began drilling themselves or leased their claims to someone who could proceed with development for them. Others who could do neither built cabins or derricks on their land or did some other work which they could swear was in line with and necessary to actual drilling.

The Boom of 1910

All these considerations and necessities brought about, on the night of December 31, 1909, a great rush of locators to the west side fields and especially to the Elk and Buena Vista hills. The rush was not heralded; but as dusk fell autos loaded with armed men and camping outfits began rolling out of Bakersfield and the west side towns, and on the morning of January 1, 1910, the desert hills were well sprinkled with tents, armed guards and stakes from which fluttered the little, white location notices. Nearly all this land had been located before in earlier booms, sometimes by the same parties and sometimes by others, and on some of the land were many conflicting claims. This conflict of interest caused many encounters and many threats of violence, but for the most part actual hostilities were avoided or the rival forces lay on their arms behind their entrenchments while their principals got together and divided the land or effected a compromise on some other basis.

The whole effect of the oil boom of the spring of 1910 was to bring a rush of people to Bakersfield and the oil fields that would have done justice to any gold excitement in the history of the state. In fact the Nevada mining camps gave up a large share of their population to swell the rush to Bakersfield. All the hotel accommodations of Bakersfield, Maricopa and McKittrick were swamped. Taft, in the Midway field, sprang into existence during the year 1909 and in 1910 claimed the supremacy from Maricopa and McKittrick, both of which had been small but prosperous little towns since the first oil boom. All the lumber yards of the county were exhausted and train loads of derrick timbers were hurried here from all points of supply on the coast. The oil well supply houses were almost equally depleted. Strings of big teams made new roads radiating fanwise to the northward of Maricopa, Taft and McKittrick, and autos kept perpetual clouds of dust hanging over the roads from Bakersfield to the west side. Bakersfield experienced the greatest building boom in its history, and the new houses were filled as soon as they were ready for occupancy.

Meantime important things were happening at the end of the industry where oil is turned into dollars. In June, 1909, an agreement was made between the Union Oil Company, the Independent Oil Producers' Agency of Kern county and a similar agency which had been formed among the producers of Coalinga whereby the Union became a member of the agencies, putting its Kern county property into the Kern county Agency and its Coalinga properties into the Coalinga Agency, and also undertook to act as sales agent for the oil produced by both Agencies for a period of ten years beginning February 1, 1910. The agreement included also the formation of the Producers' Transportation Company, and bound the Agency for a period of ten years to deliver its oil to the latter for transportation at certain rates fixed in the agreement. The Union was allowed by the agreement a commission of ten per cent on all sales of oil made for the Agency. An arbitration committee provided for in the agreement gave the representatives of the Agencies a direct voice in the making of contracts and as a matter of fact, L. P. St. Clair, president of the Kern county Agency (and later of the consolidated Agency, when the Kern county and Coalinga organizations were joined in one) has been the active selling agent so far in the life of the Union-Independent contract.

The Producers' Transportation Company, provided for in the Union-Independent agreement, built during the winter of 1909-10 a pipe line connecting all the Kern county fields and Coalinga with the ocean at Port Harford. The Associated meantime had completed its Coalinga-Port Costa pipe line down the west side to McKittrick and Midway, the Standard had extended its pipe line from Kern river to Midway and McKittrick and was planning to duplicate the entire line from the west side fields through Kern river to Point Richmond.

All these pipe lines and the railroads reaching every field in the valley furnished the necessary transportation facilities, and the chief problem remained the expansion of the market to consume the oil produced. As a means of further organization of the marketing end of the industry the Agency, not long after the signing of the Union-Independent agreement, took into its fold the Doheny companies, the American Oilfields, the American Petroleum, the Nevada Petroleum and other big factors in the state's production, and late in 1910 an agreement was negotiated between L. P. St. Clair and the Associated Oil Company officials whereby the Associated became practically a partner with the Union-Independents in the marketing business.

Briefly, the Associated-Union-Independent agreement—which was made a month to month affair, revocable by either party on notice—makes the Associated the selling agent for the Union-Independents for all the latter's unsold oil. The Union-Independents were to retain all their present business, the Associated was to retain all its present business, and so fast as the Associated took new contracts (which were subject to approval by the Union-Independents) they were to be assigned to the Union-Independents until such time as the monthly sales of the Union-Independents should equal the monthly sales of the Associated. After that the new business taken was to be divided equally. Under a separate contract the Associated agreed to purchase from the Union-Independents (which is to say the Agency) all oil which it might need outside its own production and present contracts to supply its sales contracts.

The effect of all these agreements was to make but two large factors in the oil industry of the coast, the Agency-Union-Associated combination and the Standard Oil Company. It is stated unofficially that an effort was made to bring the Standard into a harmonious agreement with the others to preserve and regulate the oil market in the interest of stability of price and production, but while the Standard's Pacific Coast representatives were disposed to look favorably on the proposition it was turned down quickly and decidedly when submitted to 26 Broadway for approval.

Getting the Markets Organized

By this organization of the marketing arrangements it has been possible to effect a very great saving in the expense of handling the oil. Competition of the small, vexatious, mutually expensive sort has been eliminated to a very great extent, and by the ability to insure prompt and unfailing deliveries of oil in large quantities it has become possible to obtain contracts from large consumers of fuel who could not be reached by individual producing companies or even by smaller combinations of such companies. At the present time the larger fuel consumers of the entire state are practically all using California fuel oil, and the same is true of western Washington and Oregon except in the immediate vicinity of the coal mines or in the heavy timber districts. All the railroads having Pacific Coast terminals are burning oil in their engines. The northern railroads have installed but a comparatively few oil burners as yet, but the way is opened for a great extension of the market in this direction. Oil is used by the steamships plying between the Hawaiian islands and the mainland, and by coastwise vessels, and it is believed to be but a matter of a short time before oil will constitute a large part, at least, of the fuel of the trans-Pacific liners. California oil has found markets in Arizona and the northern part of Mexico, and has reached down along the west coast of South America.

Efforts to Check Overproduction

But all these extensions of the field of consumption have not sufficed to utilize all the increase in the production and all during 1910 and the early part of 1911 the stocks in the hands of the Agency continued to increase. Oil produced outside the Agency companies, the Associated, and the Southern Pacific and Santa Fe railroads has been sold chiefly to the Standard in the last few years, and that company also has added greatly to its stocks on hand. Early in the present year the Agency adopted a resolution that in the future only so much oil should be received from the constituent companies each month as would equal in aggregate the sales of the preceding month. Companies producing more than their share of the deliveries on this basis have been obliged to store their own oil or shut down their wells to the required output. By this means a halt has been called in the increase of surplus oil, but the restriction of production is not wholly satisfactory, and the Agency is now working on the details of a plan for providing 10,000,000 barrels of storage for its excess oil and other plans which it is hoped may permit the companies to develop and pump their properties without restraint.

The oil land withdrawals already referred to have served, also, as a barrier against over-production, although their effect will be more apparent in the future than at the present time. Very briefly the history of the oil land withdrawals follows:

Oil Land Withdrawals

During the summer of 1909 the news of bringing in of great flowing wells on land only recently taken up from the public domain under the placer mining laws began to drift east and acting in conjunction with the great popular demand for the conservation of natural resources and the retention of the title to natural resources by the government, prompted the summary withdrawal from further entry of all the public land in the San Joaquin valley which was held to be oil bearing by the government geologists. This withdrawal order was dated September 27, 1909.

Strange or not, as the reader may consider it, little attention was paid to the withdrawal order except to stimulate claimants under locations made prior to the order to begin drilling or to induce others to begin drilling on their account. It was variously held that the executive department exceeded its authority in making the order without express authority from Congress, or that the order did not forbid drilling on lands which had been covered by previous locations. Most of the larger companies took leases on withdrawn land from men who held it under these previous locations, and either began drilling or indicated their intention to do so by building cabins or other improvements thereon and establishing guards or "lease herders" in charge. Smaller companies, assuming that the big fellows were acting under competent legal advice, did the same.

The Pickett Bill

The ensuing Congress passed what is known as the Pickett bill, which gave to the President authority to withdraw oil lands from entry, but which contained the following provision:

"Provided, That the rights of any person who, at the date of withdrawal heretofore made, is a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas-bearing lands and who, at such date, is in diligent prosecution of work leading to discovery of oil or gas—shall not be affected or impaired by such order, so long as such occupant or claimant shall continue in diligent prosecution of such work."

Following the passage of the Pickett bill, President Taft made a new withdrawal order, dated July 2, 1910, which included all the lands covered by the previous order. Subsequently other withdrawals were made, establishing the fact that the administration's policy was to withdraw all land in the public domain on which there was any reason to suppose that oil might be found.

The Yard Decision

Further adding to the rigors of the situation as affecting oil land locators, a ruling was made by the general land office officials to the effect that there could be no valid location of land under the placer mining laws prior to the actual discovery of the oil or other mineral for which it was taken up, and another (known far and wide as the Yard decision) to the effect that "a placer location for 160 acres, made by eight persons and subsequently transferred to a single individual, invalid because not preceded by discovery, cannot be perfected by the transferee upon a subsequent discovery."

Smith Remedial Bill

By the spring of 1911 the number of acres included in the oil land withdrawals had reached the enormous aggregate of nearly four and a half million. It should be at once understood, first that hundreds of thousands of acres included in the withdrawals probably will never yield a drop of oil, and second that the withdrawals were made in blanket fashion and included in the descriptions of land sent out great tracts which had been patented under homestead claims, railroad grants and otherwise many years before. Nevertheless the withdrawals included an immense amount of undoubted oil land, the title to which remained in the government, and by far the greater part of this land is in Kern county. In very many cases oil companies had spent from $10,000 to $100,000 and upward in development work on land to which they would have not the slightest title under these rulings and withdrawals, and the question of legislation for the relief of these companies and of locators of oil land generally became the most urgent public matter in Kern county and among oil men throughout the state. A committee of oil men was sent to Washington to present the case of the locators and developers to the federal authorities and with their aid Congressman S. C. Smith of the Eighth California district, whose home was in Bakersfield, succeeded in securing the passage of the Smith remedial oil land bill, which nullified the effects of the Yard decision so far as oil lands are concerned and also cleared away in part some of the other complexities which had clouded the decision.

But while the Smith bill rescued from jeopardy millions of dollars invested in legitimate development on the public domain and enabled many oil companies to perfect title to lands which they otherwise would not have been able to retain, the great bulk of the withdrawals remained in full force, and constituted an effectual bar to further development or extension of the producing oil fields. In view of the present overproduction of oil this arbitrary restriction of development has not been generally regarded as a thing to be regretted except by men who would like to assume the hazard of prospecting for oil on the public domain. When the withdrawn land will be restored to entry and under what conditions is a problem for the future. It is not likely, however, that withdrawn land will again be subject to entry under the placer mining laws, these laws having been abundantly shown to be inadequate and unfit for application to oil lands.

Asphalt and Oil Refining

Paradoxical as it may appear, the business of manufacturing the products of crude petroleum in Kern county antedated the commercial production of the crude oil itself. As has been noted, in the early '70s a number of Italians began quarrying asphaltum from the great deposits which were formed in the McKittrick hills by the evaporation of the lighter elements of the crude oil that seeped from the exposed edges of the broken oil-bearing strata. And from this time down to 1898, when the oil boom reached Kern county, the primary object of the development in the West Side fields was the production of asphaltum. Oil was desired only as a flux for handling the heavier product.

There is an interesting legend, however, to the effect that kerosene, not asphaltum, was the very first commercial product of the Kern county oil fields. Far back, about the time of the Civil war, some old chap, whose name the legend fails to preserve, stretched woolen blankets over the pools of thick, tarry oil that oozed out of the ground about Old Sunset and got a pretty decent quality of illuminating oil by wringing his blankets over a bucket after the vapors rising from the pool had saturated them. Such is the legend. The writer does not vouch for it.

The history of the oil refining business in the county, however, begins with the establishment of the Jewett & Blodget refinery at Old Sunset in 1891. From that time until the present the junior member of the firm has been engaged in making asphaltum, and, in later years, many other products of petroleum, including kerosene, gasoline, distillates, and lubricating oils of different kinds.

With the development of the Kern river field refineries were established there, and because of the special aptitude of the Kern county oils for the production of asphaltum the industry developed until, in 1907, ten refineries in the county were producing about 6000 tons of asphaltum per month, valued at about $84,000.

The number of refineries producing asphaltum has not since increased, but there has been a steady gain in the quantity and quality of the output, until now Kern county asphaltum is held in the highest esteem by road-builders in every part of the United States. The National Oil Refining & Manufacturing Company, the Phoenix and others, also, are competing successfully with the Standard Oil Company in the manufacture and sale of illuminating oil, gasoline, distillate and all grades of lubricants.

Natural Gas Production

As has been noted, the presence of gas in the oil-bearing formation was one of the difficulties which defeated the first efforts to drill oil wells in the West Side fields. Nearly all of the wells of the Sunset, Midway and McKittrick fields produce a greater or less quantity of gas, and in the former field even the thick, heavy oil from the shallow wells is forced out in intermittent gobs, rather than in a steady stream—by the pressure of the gas in the oil sands.

Natural Gas in Bakersfield

However, it was not until the great gas wells of the Buena Vista hills began to come in during 1909 that plans began to be made for the commercial utilization of natural gas on any large scale. The Standard Oil Company began using gas in its furnaces in the West Side fields in the early part of 1910, and a little later laid a gas pipe line to carry the fuel to its pumping stations on its oil pipe line between Midway and the Kern river field. Toward the last of 1910 the California Natural Gas Company, a subsidiary of the Standard, was organized, and the gas pipe line was completed to the city limits of Bakersfield, where the gas was turned into the distributing system of the Bakersfield Gas & Electric Company.

During the past year a pipe line has been laid from Midway to Los Angeles to carry natural gas to that city, and late in the summer of 1913 gas was turned into the city mains along with the artificial product. Gas wells in the Buena Vista field when first brought in range in output from twelve million to fifty million cubic feet per twenty-four hours, and the force with which the gas shoots from the ground when first released by the drill is almost irresistible.

For example, a gas well belonging to the Standard Oil Company on section 26, 31-23, one day tore the heavy iron gate from the top of the casing, sent it hurtling through the derrick, knocked over six workmen as though they had been ninepins, and went roaring through the derrick top like a cyclone, while the men lay stunned on the ground, some of them with broken bones, until rescuers came from a neighboring derrick.

The pressure of the gas in one of the Honolulu Consolidated Oil Company's wells on section 6, 32-24, tore away not only the massive iron gate but a section of pipe to which it was fastened extending eighteen feet into the ground. The outer, "stovepipe" casing was uninjured, and around this was dug a pit fourteen feet across and thirty-seven feet deep. This pit was filled with concrete to serve as an anchor for another cap with which the well eventually was controlled. Before the well was finished, however, the gas became ignited, and formed a giant torch, 125 feet in height, which burned until additional boilers could be installed on the lease and pipes laid with which to direct a great stream of steam upon the mouth of the well to smother the flames. Several of the great gas wells have been set on fire accidentally, and their great towers of flame have formed one of the most awe-inspiring sights of the West Side fields, where exhibitions of the power of natural forces are not uncommon.

Making Gasoline From Gas

During 1910 experiments were made with a process of extracting gasoline from gas. The method is similar to that employed in making liquid air, and the theory is similar. The gas is alternately compressed and cooled until it is reduced to a liquid form. The pressure required is about 400 pounds to the square foot, and in some instances two gallons of gasoline are taken from 1000 cubic feet of gas. The amount of gasoline contained in the gas varies greatly, however. The extent of the county's proven gas belt has been estimated at seven miles in width and sixteen miles in length, making an area of about 72,000 acres.

Some of Kern County's Famous Oil Gushers

It is the romance of oil, the ever present possibility of sudden wealth and the equally ubiquitous chance of sudden disaster, that moulds the spirit of the oil fields, and the spirit of the oil fields was generally the spirit of Kern county during the period from 1899 to 1913. And there is no better means of setting forth the circumstances that contribute to this romance than by recounting the history of the great gushers that made the Sunset and Midway oil fields celebrated around the globe in the years 1909 and 1910.

Great quantities of gas confined in the oil measures of the Sunset field have made it throughout its history a field of flowing wells. The earlier wells, drilled into the shallower strata of thick, heavy oil, flowed in but very small amounts, compared with the gushers of the later period, and in very many cases the flow was the merest trickle over the top of the casing or an occasional gob of thick, tarry substance, thrown up with much guttural sputtering by the imprisoned gas below. But during the year 1909, wells drilled farther out from the hills, and particularly in the northern part of the field, produced a lighter oil and a larger flow. Notable among these were the wells of the Ethel D., the Wellman, the Monte Cristo and the Kern Trading & Oil Company in sections 36, 12-24, and 1, 11-24, a mile northeast of Maricopa.

In 1909, also, came the Santa Fe's famous 10,000-barrel well on section 6, 32-23, in the North Midway field, and in section 10, 32-24, over in the Buena Vista hills, nearly seven miles north of Maricopa, the Honolulu's great gasser, drilled down into the oil sand, became an oil well, flowing between 3000 and 4000 barrels per day. Other wells that prepared the public mind for the big events that came later on the program were the St. Lawrence, on section 35, 32-23, the Crandall on 31, 31-25, and the Standard's big wells on section 30, 32-24, the largest of which flowed for some time at a rate of 10,000 barrels per day.

The bringing in of all these wells proved the whole of the Midway valley to be oil bearing, and the Honolulu's strike demonstrated that the oil sands extended far out under the Buena Vista hills. A strip of territory roughly estimated at sixteen miles in length and five or six miles in width was added to the proven oil belt of the Sunset-Midway field, and the cause was laid for the oil land boom of 1910, which swept over the whole of the Elk and Buena Vista hills, over the North McKittrick front and out along the hills east of Old Sunset, far past San Emidio.

Gushers Start Boom of 1910

By the end of February, 1910, the secrecy which was first observed by the locators who swarmed to the new territory at the beginning of the new year had been cast aside, and the eyes of the whole state were turned to the Sunset and Midway fields and the great things that were going on there. On March 6th the Mays gusher on section 30, 32-24, broke loose and drenched the surrounding country with a rain of oil. There was the widest variation in the estimates of the amount of oil produced, and no measurements could be made for the reason that very little of the oil was saved during the few hours' flow prior to the first sanding up. The state of the public mind, however, was such as to accept the biggest estimates most readily, and before there was time for a careful decision of the controversy the Lakeview came in and for many months thereafter held the center of the stage. A week after its first performance the Mays well broke loose a second time, tore away a "T" that had been placed on the casing to control the flow, wrecked the upper part of the derrick, wet down the desert sands about it with another shower of oil, and again sanded. Sometime later the well was brought under subjection and became a steady producer of little spectacular interest to the public, but of much greater profit to the stockholders.

Lakeview Comes In

At 8 o'clock on Monday night on March 14, 1910, the Lakeview gusher, at the west end of fractional section 25, 12-24, a mile and a half due north of Maricopa, came in with a rush of gas that hurled the baler into the crown block of the derrick and followed it with a shower of oil that was estimated at 18,000 barrels for the first twenty-four hours' flow. Tuesday night something happened down at the bottom of the well, 2260 feet in the earth. For a few seconds the flow of oil stopped and its place was taken by a torrent of rocks, sand and gas that filled the derrick with incandescent atoms, tore away the top of the derrick in which the baler was still hanging, and sent the drillers scurrying for their lives.

Nobody got very close to the mouth of the Lakeview for many months after that. Oil rained on everything for miles around as the breeze carried the spray from the gusher. The Union Oil Company's new camp just built on a nearby hill, was abandoned, and the neat green cottages soon wore a funereal black. Other wells drilling in the neighborhood were left unfinished, fires were put out in all the boiler plants within the radius that the gas from the Lakeview reached. Hundreds of men and teams were rushed to the scene to dig ditches, build dams across gulleys and scrape reservoirs in the earth to catch and hold the oil. The sand that the well threw out built a mound fifteen or twenty feet high all about the derrick, burying the engine house. Gradually the derrick was torn to pieces by the rushing column of oil, and sections of the inner casing of the well were hurled out. The question of whether the casing would all be worn out by the cutting of the sand and the well become a great crater in the ground became a very serious one. The Union Oil Company's engineers tackled the job of harnessing the great well with faint hope of success. An hour's work in the suffocating gas and drenching oil about the gusher brought $4 or $5 and upward, and men did not seek the job at that price. The first futile device for smothering the well was a great wooden hood made of timbers a foot or more in thickness. But the stream of oil ate its way through the wood, and went on playing the biggest and blackest fountain the world ever saw. Every train to Sunset bore sightseers, and a line of guards was placed in a great circle about the well to prevent the possibility of any accidental ignition of the gas.

Finally after some months of effort, when the well was largely cleared of sand and the upward force of the oil was less, an embankment was built about the gusher with sacks of sand and earth to a height of twenty or thirty feet, thus confining the oil over the mouth of the well and forming a cushion against which the big, black geyser could beat. By that time every vestige of the derrick was gone, and the well looked like an inky fountain playing in an inky pool.

Meantime, down on the flat a half mile or farther away, lakes of oil were accumulating. By September 5,000,000 barrels of oil had been stored in these makeshift reservoirs. The seepage was great, and the evaporation was greater, and the danger of accidental fire turning the whole into a flood of flame to go farther down the valley was the greatest anxiety of all.

Product Swamps Pipe Lines

At one time the Lakeview's output reached 68,000 barrels per day, twice the capacity of the greatest oil pipe line on the coast. There was no such thing as properly caring for the oil. During the months of September and October the Producers' Transportation Company's pipe line to the coast was placed almost exclusively at the service of Lakeview oil, and pumps and pipe lines installed by the Union were set to work forcing the oil from the temporary reservoirs on the flat to two new reservoirs built in the edge of the hills. These reservoirs, dug in a cañon and protected with earth and concrete dams and artificial waterways cut through the hills above them, held five million barrels of oil.

After ten or eleven months of continuous production the Lakeview was still delivering 8,000 or 10,000 barrels per day, but its product was a mixture or emulsion of oil, water, and mud called "mulsh" by the oil men, and deemed of no value at the then low price of good oil. Months later the flow suddenly stopped altogether, and after letting the giant slumber undisturbed for a respectful period the owners rigged a derrick over the crater, explored the hole with the drill, patched up the wornout casing, and finally tapped the sands again. The well flowed a little and gave up large quantities of gas, but it never resumed its place in the ranks of the big producers.

The Consolidated Midway

A mile east of the Lakeview was brought in the Consolidated Midway gusher on section 30, 12-23. It was spudded in March 2, 1910, and on June 20th went through a thin shell into the gusher sand at 2165 feet. The 10-inch casing had been landed at 2145 feet and the last twenty feet of the well was an open hole. A gate was fixed on the 10-inch casing and the 10-inch was anchored to the 12-inch, making a total load of sixty-six tons of casing with which to hold down the enormous gas pressure which was anticipated. The water in the well was baled down 600 feet when the flow started. The well soon sanded, but each time it responded to further baling, and each time the flow grew greater. Another gate was placed above the first one as a safeguard against one of them being worn out by the friction of sand and oil, and later reducers were placed on the pipe above the upper gate to lessen the flow and better control the well. The result was that the well, estimated at 10,000 barrels daily capacity, was as easily and thoroughly controlled as a faucet in a kitchen sink. Like most gushers, however, the Consolidated Midway finally went to water.

A Procession of Gushers

Other gushers of the Lakeview group include a 5,000 barrel well of the Maricopa-Thirty-Six, on section 36, 12-24; a well of the Sunset Monarch which started flowing at a 24,000-barrel rate; the Standard's three gushers on section 30, 32-24, and the Sage wells on section 35, 12-24, belonging to the Union Oil Company. The Sage wells were chiefly famous for the terrific bombardments of sand and rocks which they sent through the tops of their derricks at uncertain intervals. At the beginning of these bombardments would come a roll of thunder from the casing mouth; the drillers and tool dressers would scamper to the lee of a neighboring hill, and the tools that happened to be in the well would go shrieking through the crown block, followed by the sand and rock and a little sprinkling of oil. Then the well would choke with 1500 or 2000 feet of sand in the casing, and the workmen would repair the derrick and tools and begin the long job of digging down toward the oil measures again. With a certain amount of sand removed the pent-up gas would hurl forth another shower, the casing would sand up again, and the whole process would start over again. And this kept on and on, and on, for so many months that everyone except the owners and the immediate neighbors finally forgot what eventually became of the Sage sand gushers.

North Midway Gushers

Next to the remarkable group of wells of which the Lakeview was chief, range in interest the magnificent wells of the North Midway valley. Beginning with the Santa Fe, St. Lawrence, the Crandall and the Mays, the North Midway gusher population was increased by the American Oilfields' great No. 79, several lesser producers of the same company, the Eagle Creek, Le Blanc, the California Midway, Pioneer Midway, the Visalia Midway and Santa Fe on section 25, 31-22, the Midway Premier, Midway Five, on section 5, 32-23, and others of lesser fame, if not of lesser merit.

The prince of them all in North Midway was the American Oilfields 79, which ranked next to the Lakeview as a producer. At its best it made 22,000 barrels of oil per day, which is the more remarkable from the fact that it was finished at a little over 900 feet with a single string of 12-inch casing and produced 23-gravity oil. Like the Lakeview, the well made great quantities of sand, and it was impossible to control or diminish its flow. The only thing accomplished in this line was to slant a heavy shield of boiler iron over the mouth of the well to deflect the column of oil and prevent so much of it being lost in vapor. The well gave out great quantities of gas and standing on the edge of the great sump built about it, its roar was like that of a Kansas tornado heard from the conning tower of a cyclone cellar. The well was brought in in April, 1910, and at the end of the year it was still flowing at the rate of 5000 barrels per day.

The American Oilfield Company's well No. 56 is celebrated as the first big Midway gusher to catch fire. It ignited at 1:30 p. m. September 11 from a burning sump, and shortly after the well of the Honolulu Consolidated, formerly the Crandall, just across the section line to the east, started flowing and immediately was ablaze. The two great pillars of flame, 200 feet or more in height, burned until 5 o'clock while a frantic swarm of men from all the nearby country employed every effort to keep the other flowing wells and oil reservoirs in the vicinity from joining in the conflagration. The task of putting out the two burning wells was too great to be seriously attempted, and a general pean of thanksgiving went up from the tired workers when at the last named hour both wells sanded up and went out. During the night No. 56 again started flowing and again took fire from the embers of the derrick, but it stopped once more of its own accord.

The Eagle Creek gusher on section 31, 31-23, brought in in April, 1910, at 1600 feet, has the distinction of having thrown up a good portion of the vertebrae of some deep-buried saurian monster. When the Eagle Creek first came in the Santa Fe, just across the section line, stopped flowing for a time, and then started in at a greater rate than ever as though in rivalry with its new neighbor.

Effect on the Oil Game

The story of Kern county oil gushers might be indefinitely prolonged. They continue to come in to the present day, and some of the later arrivals rival in interest and output the American Oilfields 79 and the Lakeview itself. But the stories related are typical of all the gushers in a general way, and the partial list of big wells that were brought in in the first few months of 1910 will suggest the fever of excitement and expectancy which spread not only over Kern county but throughout the state wherever people read newspapers and bought oil stocks.

The fact that nearly all the gushers were brought in in territory which but a few months before had been miles away from the proven oil belt gained credence for the promises of the wildest of wildcat oil promoters and there was a rush of tenderfeet into the oil game, quite regardless of the fact that the product of the gushers was beating the price of oil to the bankruptcy level.

and that seasoned operators were growing more and more pessimistic as the stocks of oil on hand increased.

Fortunately for the old producers and unfortunately for the tenderfeet, a great proportion of the drilling begun in the latter half of 1910 proved unproductive. Gradually the prospect holes started in the Elk hills were abandoned, and the companies that began pushing the line of development far out on the Maricopa flat went broke or got tired of paying assessments. By the end of 1911 most of the drilling still going on was by old hands in the business who had contracts to fill or who had capital sufficient to carry them over the period of low prices.

In addition to proving the productiveness of a portion of the Maricopa flat and practically all of the Midway valley, the drilling since the beginning of 1910 has demonstrated that oil underlies the gas formation in the Buena Vista hills; that if there is oil in the Elk hills it is not so easy to find as the first prospectors hoped; that there is a considerable amount of barren or excessively deep territory north of McKittrick; that just north of this seemingly barren territory is the Belridge anticline where excellent wells of light oil are brought in at shallow depths and that still farther north in the Lost Hills country is another shallow formation carrying light oil and large quantities of gas.

To the Union Oil Company fell the lot of demonstrating the unprofitableness of the territory between the McKittrick field and Belridge. It drilled a number of deep holes without finding oil in paying quantities, but the big concern went about the job in a quiet, systematic, businesslike way that becomes a strong organization that takes the lean with the fat and so there was little romance and only a passive public interest in its operations there.

The same is true of the development of Belridge, which was as profitable as the Union's North Midway venture was unprofitable. The Belridge operators were stockholders in the Associated Oil Company and other seasoned oil men, and they staked out the land, sunk some prospect holes, found the oil and exercised options on a great amount of land surrounding their strike before the public in general knew what was going on.

The Lost Hills Field

Martin & Dudley, who were the dominant factors in the discovery and development of the Lost Hills field, followed the same plan, but their operations were attended by more picturesque features, and the Lost Hills, although no more important than Belridge in the matter of production, perhaps, attracted vastly more attention from the outside world.

The story of the Lost Hills field really dates from 1899, the year in which the Elwoods found oil at Kern river. Orlando Barton, son of one of the oldest of the Kern county pioneers, prospected the lonesome desert country in the northwestern part of the county from the Devil's Den to the swamp, including in his general survey the present Lost Hills field. In 1907 he helped form the Lost Hills Mining Company, and located the section of land on which the Lakeshore well, the well in which the Lost Hills discovery was made, is now situated—section 30, 26-21. A contract was let to Los Angeles parties to drill the section, but it was allowed to lapse without action. The news got about in the south, however, that there was government land on which oil might be found, and shortly all the government land in the township was filed upon by homesteaders.

The Square Deal Oil Company of Hanford made an unsuccessful effort to reach the oil sand on section 18, and this failure discouraged the homesteaders, most of whom abandoned their claims. The Lost Hills Mining Company worked its claims for gypsum, and Barton personally remained in possession of the land practically all of the time until the Lakeshore well was brought in.

The Discovery Well

In December, 1909, Barton interested Martin & Dudley, real estate men of Visalia, and after looking over the field they acted on the advice of Barton, who told them that they would find oil at less than 600 feet. Barton picked the location of Lakeshore No. 1, and very early in 1910 Martin & Dudley began to drill.

On March 8, 1910, the well was down 160 feet, and there was so much oil in the hole that drilling was stopped, and arrangements were begun to take advantage of the strike which the Lakeshore Company felt sure was coming. Other rigs were secured, titles to land in the vicinity were looked up, and the plans were laid which made Martin & Dudley the complete masters of the situation when the field came in some months later.

The Lost Hills were far out in the midst of the lonesome west side desert, but oil prospectors see far, and even out there it was necessary to use the utmost caution to prevent premature publicity of the important find. Along in May some more drilling was done in the Lakeshore well, and by June 3d so much gas was developed that drilling was again stopped to await the progress of the other features of the program. The place was fenced and guards were left to see that inquisitive people did not get near enough to the well to smell the gas.

In July work was again resumed and on July 26th, at a depth of 463 feet, the gas threw the water out of the hole and over the derrick top. After that the drillers had frequent shower baths of mud, water and oil, and on July 29th, at 527 feet depth the oil was struck and rose within 80 feet of the top of the casing, and refused to be lowered more than a dozen feet by the most rapid baling.

The oil sand was not penetrated and the casing was far from the bottom of the hole, but Martin & Dudley did not bother about finishing their well in the most scientific fashion. They put a cap on it, instead, moved away the derrick, obliterated all traces of oil, left a guard to keep strangers outside the fence, and began taking options on all the land they could tie up in the district.

How successful they were was demonstrated when the news of the strike came out. Martin & Dudley were the big men in the new field, and the hundreds of oil men and tenderfeet who rushed to the Lost Hills discovered that the men from Visalia had some sort of claim on practically every piece of land that was worth a prospect hole. Martin & Dudley arranged with the Associated Oil Company to take up their options on a great body of land along the Lost Hills anticline, and the Associated was the first of the big concerns in the new field. The Universal and the Standard also secured considerable tracts of land there, and most of the development has been done by the three companies.

But it took time for prospectors and would-be prospectors to find out how thoroughly Martin & Dudley had preempted the ground. Scores of men who had overlooked the opportunity to get in on the ground floor when the other oil fields were opened up, resolved not to sleep on their chances in the Lost Hills, and after the first profound skepticism concerning the genuineness of the new strike gave way to conviction, the dust got no chance to settle on the road between Bakersfield and the little ridge of sand that was understood to mark the apex of the Lost Hills anticline. It was proclaimed as a poor man's field. The territory was wonderfully shallow, and a well could be drilled with a light, portable rig and stovepipe casing, according to popular report. So there was presently a string of portable rigs headed toward the Lost Hills. Also there were men with shotguns and rifles to hold the claims against the rival prospectors, and later on there were lawsuits to determine the relative value of homestead filings and mineral claims. Then winter came on, and showers of rain amounting to half an inch or less made the alkaline roads almost impassable. The Associated built a standard rig a little west of the anticline and drilled for weeks and months without finding any oil so far as the public knew. Water and fuel were difficult to get, and the portable rigs were not efficient. So the tenderfoot operators got out with as little loss as they could manage, and the field was left to the big concerns.

With a number of good wells brought in a little to the south of the Lakeshore, the big companies soon put Lost Hills in the list of producing fields, and the output continues to increase with a few strong concerns doing all the development.

A Field Not Yet Arrived

One other oil excitement punctuates the history of the industry in Kern county. In the fall of 1912, Dr. A. H. Liscomb, a pioneer operator of the Kern river field, and a number of his friends, and Harry C. Rambo, a rancher of Semitropic, and a number of his friends formed a theory that the connecting link between the West Side oil formation and that of the Kern river field was via the ridge of land that runs northwest past Lerdo and Semitropic in the general direction of Lost Hills. They were strengthened in this theory by the assurance of a Mrs. Brown, who used an instrument in detecting the presence of oil and minerals hidden in the earth. They tested Mrs. Brown's powers by having her expert land in proven fields and checking her figures against the logs of drilled wells, and finally they secured options on a large body of land at prices based on its probable value for agriculture, and began drilling two wells. The Liscomb well made the most progress, and early in January, 1913, a reported strike of exceedingly light oil started a miniature oil boom over all the territory between Wasco and the swamp. If any oil was found in the Liscomb well, however, it was drowned by water, and the well had to be abandoned. The Rambo well was a failure for the same reason, and although one or other of these parties have been drilling almost steadily throughout the year, neither has yet made a strike that the oil public accepts as of any value.

CHAPTER XV

Progress of the County From 1900 to 1913

The events of larger and more permanent importance which have transpired in Kern county between 1900 and the summer of 1913, when this chronicle closes, range themselves under four heads: Development of the oil fields, the beginning of a new agricultural development through the agency of pump irrigation, a great advance in permanent construction in Bakersfield, including a better class of dwellings, business structures, public buildings and paved streets, and a steady improvement in civic standards coincident with the transition of the county from a field of speculation and transient residence to one of investment and permanent homes.

First honors are due to the oil development, for it occupied the most conspicuous place in the public interest and because, to a very large degree, it made all the other developments mentioned possible. Because of their importance and for the sake of continuity in the narrative, the discovery and development of the county's oil fields have been given a chapter to themselves. Second place in logical sequence belongs to the development of pump irrigation and the new agricultural and horticultural enterprises which it opened up.

Development of Pump Irrigation

A history of the efforts of the first pump irrigators would be but a dreary and disheartening tale. As other portions of this narrative have shown, the waters of Kern river were early appropriated by the owners of the delta lands that lie in the lower portion of the valley, leaving only the scanty rainfall—averaging between six and seven inches per season—to wet the equally rich lands along the mesa and the higher or more distant portions of the plain. The efforts of the dry grain farmers demonstrated that the mesa lands were not only fertile but easy to work. Many of the grain farmers installed windmills to pump stock and domestic water, and the surplus was used to irrigate vegetable gardens and small family orchards. This demonstrated, first that good water wells were to be found in any part of the valley or the mesas at depths varying with the elevation of the surface; second, that comparatively little water was necessary to make the soil productive, and third, that on the higher lands the growing season was even longer than in the trough of the valley, and the winter frosts were less severe. The magnificent area of the dry plain and mesa lands offered a tempting prize for successful pump irrigation, but the difficulties that faced the first experimenters were practically insurmountable.

These experimenters lived before the day of gas engine efficiency, and suitable fuel for steam engines, prior to the development of the oil fields, was not to be had. The steam engines used for threshing grain burned straw, and some of the first pump irrigators lifted their water with these straw-burners. Others used for fuel the sage brush which they cleared from their land. Both methods were laborious, expensive and generally unsatisfactory.

The early pumps were inefficient, and when a fairly successful combination of pump and engine was effected the irrigator had trouble with his well. The first wells were well suited to windmill power, but when greatly increased drafts were made upon them by larger pumps great quantities of sand were sucked out with the water, and presently the walls of the well near the bottom caved in, choking off the supply of water with quantities of falling clay. Not a few of the early pump irrigators became insolvent trying to construct wells that would not cave in, and the general pessimism as to the possibility of obtaining water in any considerable quantities by this means increased.

Simultaneously all these discouraging experiences were suffered in the vicinity of Delano, at Rio Bravo, in what is now the Wasco country, and on the mesa southeast of Bakersfield. Gradually the pump irrigators learned to make the perforations in their casing so small that only the finer grains of sand could be drawn through, and also to attach one pump to several wells so that the suction on each well would be reduced.

A great boost was given to pump irrigation by a lowering in the price of gasoline and distillate that followed their manufacture in the Kern county oil fields, and by the production of a light oil at Coalinga that could be used in the gasoline engines without refining.

In the spring of 1902 pump irrigation had reached about this stage of development and was being taken seriously by the people of Delano where Ben Thomas, Frank Schlitz, R. W. Lockridge and several others were successfully operating plants. At Rio Bravo, about this time, H. S. Knight was making about the same progress, and the Kern County Land Company had installed several pumps at Rosedale and Stockdale and was operating them with electricity to supplement canal irrigation in dry seasons. But the new means of irrigation made progress very slowly so far as practical results were concerned and in the succeeding five years the area made productive by this means did not materially increase.

Experiments at Wasco and McFarland

With the founding of Wasco colony in the spring of 1907 the success of an entire community was staked on pump irrigation for the first time in Kern county. And the outcome for the first two years was full of doubt. Most of the colonists were short of funds and had to make payments on their land in addition to meeting their living expenses and the constant demand for buildings, fences and implements that goes with the founding of a new farm. For this reason the mutual water company which the colonists formed to sink wells and install pumping plants practiced a frugality far in excess of true economy. Second-hand pumps and engines were purchased, cheap ditches were built, and the inevitable poor service brought hard times to the irrigators and fomented one storm after another in the stockholders' meetings.

Despite discouragements, however, the sturdy Wasco colonists gradually replaced their poor pumping equipment, laid cement ditches and conduits, and in 1911, when the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation began covering the farming districts of the county with transmission wires, they substituted electric power for gasoline. From that date the advancement of the colony was very marked, and in a couple of years more it had come to be one of the show places of the county's farming districts, outranking in attractiveness and evidences of prosperity the rich delta districts where cheap canal water had been available for many years.

McFarland colony, founded a year later than Wasco, went through less hardships in its earliest infancy because Wasco's mistakes were largely avoided and better equipment gave good results from the start. To McFarland and Wasco, almost equally, is due the credit of having lifted pump irrigation from the slough of doubt and discredit and made it generally recognized in the county as one of the greatest factors in the county's agricultural development.

Development of the Citrus Belt

What Wasco and McFarland did with pump irrigation in the alfalfa and deciduous fruit districts, the Edison Land & Water Company is doing in the citrus belt. The company began sinking wells at Edison in the winter of 1908, and planted its first orange trees in the spring of 1909. It was fortunate in possessing ample capital, and all the improvements were of the best character and workmanship. Deep well pumps were installed and electricity was secured from the power generating plant in Kern river cañon. An abundance of water was obtained where a few years previous it was supposed no considerable amount of water could be developed. The orange trees did well from the start, and the following year many orange growers from the southern part of the state became interested. In 1911 and 1912 the acreage planted was greatly increased. The unprecedented frosts of 1912-13 checked planting at Edison as in every other part of the state, but the summer of 1913 demonstrated that the trees in the Kern citrus belt had suffered no more than in the most favored citrus districts and that the full extent of the damage would not exceed the loss of a year's growth of the trees.

Meantime pumping plants were being installed at intervals all over the great belt of mesa land that stretches south and southeast from Edison, around Delano and all along the high sloping lands to the east and southeast of that place. At Rio Bravo the same progress is being made, and the new colonies of Shafter and Lerdo are laying good foundations for a similar success.

Pumping Plant Extension in 1912

The Lerdo colony was founded in 1912 by a corporation controlled by the same men who are the dominant factors in the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation, and one of the purposes in mind was to furnish a market for electrical power which the latter concern would supply. Wells were sunk and pumps and electric motors installed before any land was offered for sale. Active selling began in the spring of 1913. Shares in the wells and pumping plants go with the land, which is sold on long time payments.

The Lerdo colony proposes to make a specialty of hemp and ramie culture. George W. Schlichten, inventor of an improved decorticating machine, is taking the lead in this enterprise and promises to furnish a market for the product of all the lands planted to ramie as well as to assist in furnishing the plants necessary to get the ramie fields established.

The Shafter colony is a venture of the Kern County Land Company. A number of wells have been sunk on the Shafter lands, but this is only for the purpose of demonstrating the water supply. The company does not propose to sell wells and pumping plants with the land, but it will let each buyer develop his own water.

On the mesa south of Edison are the Sunflower colony, the Citrus Foot-hill Farms colony, and numerous small centers of development all established within the past three years.

As a result of all these successes and promises of success the people of the county, who were very doubtful of the practicability of pump irrigation a very few years ago, have come to believe that eventually every acre of arable land in the valley portion of the county not irrigated from canals will be reclaimed by means of pumping plants.

Conservative estimates place the number of pumping plants in operation in Kern county at the present time at not less than 1500. Of this number about 275 are run by electricity and the remainder by gasoline engines. The San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation supplies current for 250 of the pumps and the remainder is furnished by the Mount Whitney Power Company, whose lines extend into the country about Delano.

The engines and motors average about ten horsepower each, and with the average lift they are capable of raising water to irrigate about 45,000 acres in the aggregate, or about thirty acres for each ten horsepower.

Of the total number of pumps about eighty per cent were installed within the past five years, and about 500 were installed during the past year. At present about fifty are in process of installation, and between ten and fifteen well-drilling outfits are kept busy developing water for prospective pump irrigators. This summer Miller & Lux are preparing to install pumps and motors which will utilize about 700 horsepower of electricity in raising water to irrigate the old swamp land north of Buena Vista lake reservoir. This will be the first extensive use of pumping plants in this section, and their installation is due to dry seasons just past when Miller & Lux's share of the waters of Kern river have been inadequate for their needs.

In addition to the activities of its allied corporation at Lerdo, the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation is actively aiding the extension of pump irrigation by a liberal policy of extending its transmission lines into new territory where there is any prospect of building up a market for power. The company also is promoting experiments in the most economical use of water. Rates for electric power still remain at the seemingly exorbitant figure of $50 per horsepower per year, but the pumpers are looking forward to a substantial reduction in rates when the use of electricity for this purpose becomes more general.

At this time, the summer of 1913, electric power is available for pumping at Delano, McFarland, Famoso, Wasco, Shafter, Lerdo, Edison, and all the country south and east of Bakersfield so far as the pump irrigators have ventured, which is about to the lower line of township 31.

Planting Apples at Tehachapi

Following close on the successful development of the valley districts as just related came evidence that the mountain valley country about Tehachapi is especially adapted to the cultivation of apples, pears, cherries and other deciduous fruits of that character. Tehachapi's metamorphosis from a stock and grain country to a fruitgrowing district began in 1910 when B. M. Denison sunk a thirteen-inch well, installed a pumping plant and planted forty acres to Bartlett pears. The evidences of an ample water supply and the growth made by the young trees encouraged other ventures, and at this time the young orchards about the mountain town make an imposing display.

Still later the pumping plant invaded the desert about Rosamond and Willow Springs, and in the far northeastern corner of the county at Inyokern. In the latter place a good beginning was made last spring in the planting of deciduous fruit trees as well as in the raising of grain and alfalfa.

As this book is designed mainly for future reading it may be well to leave the future to put its own appraisalment on the permanent value of the experiments and developments recounted. Suffice it to say that they have been the means of awakening a new interest in the agricultural and horticultural development of the county, and also of raising the market value of the arid plain and mesa lands from almost imperceptible figures to anywhere from $20 to $100 per acre. The higher prices are paid for lands nearer the centers of development. Still higher prices are asked for land close to Bakersfield or for land on which pumping plants have been installed and water developed. It is the common belief that these prices will continue to ascend, although the vast area subject to development and settlement and the moderate rate at which these processes so far have proceeded may make any further advance in values equally deliberate.

Status of Fruit Growing in 1913

Figures collected by Kent S. Knowlton, county horticultural commissioner, show a total of 444,000 fruit trees in the county, in the summer of 1913, of which 121,500 are bearing and 322,500 non-bearing, and 935 acres of grape vines, 660 acres of which are bearing.

The acreage in grape vines has fallen off greatly since the early days of the Rosedale colony, when large numbers of raisin vineyards were planted. The ill success of the Rosedale colonists and years of low prices for raisins discouraged the raising of grapes, and no great extension of this industry is in sight at present.

That oranges and apples are forging to the front as the county's leading fruits is shown by the following table, which is prepared by the commissioner and which also shows at a glance the recent progress of fruit growing in the county:

Fruit Trees in Kern County in 1913

Variety	Bearing	Non-bearing	1 year	2 year	3 year	4 year
Apricot .....	20,000	12,000	4,000	3,000	3,000	2,000
Apple .....	10,000	92,500	48,000	30,000	10,000	4,500
Fig .....	1,000	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
Olive .....	4,000	15,000	15,000	.....	.....	.....
Peach .....	50,000	15,000	3,000	3,500	3,500	25,000
Pear .....	1,500	65,000	20,000	35,000	15,000	10,000
Plum .....	5,000	6,000	2,000	2,000	1,000	1,000
Prune .....	20,000	2,000	1,000	500	500	.....
Orange .....	10,000	115,000	25,000	45,000	25,000	20,000

These figures, of course, do not include trees in family orchards, and small orchards of lemons, cherries, almonds and walnuts are omitted. Most of the apple and pear trees are in the Tehachapi country, and the bulk of the orange trees are around Edison and Delano.

Bakersfield in 1904

As will be noted more fully in the chapters devoted to the oil industry, the enormous increase in oil production from 1902 to 1904 resulted in a complete demoralization of the market and brought not only the threat of bankruptcy to the producers, but general depression to all lines of business in Bakersfield, which by that time had become a distinctively oil town, recognized as the center of the oil industry of the state and chiefly dependent on that industry for its prosperity and growth. As a matter of fact, Bakersfield continued to grow and business remained reasonably good even during the summer of 1904, which saw the price of oil drop to the ruinous figure of eleven and two-thirds cents per barrel. But the air was blue with pessimism. On the street corners it was alternately predicted that consumption never would overtake production, and that the Kern river field was going to water and its derricks would be sold for kindling wood in a few years more.

Good Times Return

But both prophecies failed. Kern river continued to produce, and following the organization of the Independent Oil Producers' Agency prices began to recover. In the spring of 1908 the Agency closed a contract with the Associated for sixty and one-half cents per barrel, and a new oil boom began that presently filled Bakersfield to such a state of overflowing that visitors to the town were compelled to telegraph ahead at least twenty-four hours to secure any sort of sleeping quarters, either in the hotels or in the rooms, in private residences and elsewhere throughout the city, which the hotel proprietors had leased to meet the emergency.

Under such circumstances a building boom was inevitable and in 1909 began a rush of construction that involved a total investment in residence and business buildings before the close of 1910 estimated at upward of $2,500,000.

Quite as significant as the size of the investment was the fact that the buildings generally were of a better character than had been erected previously in the city's history. The cost of the business buildings erected during this period ranged from $10,000 to $70,000, and the residences from $1500 to $17,000. Among the business buildings built at this time are the Brower building at Nineteenth and I streets, the Manley apartments at Eighteenth and F, the Security Trust Company's bank at Eighteenth and Chester, Southern hotel annex on Twentieth street, an additional story on the Southern hotel, the Redlick building at Eighteenth and Chester, the Willis building on South Chester, the Rice building and Baer building on diagonal corners at Chester and Twenty-first, the Kosel hotel, Herrington-Cohn building, Bakersfield garage, Southern garage, Kern Valley garage, Webster garage and extensive additions to the Mason & Flickinger garage. The automobile business was in its glory.

It is particularly worthy of note, also, that during this period a great number of well-to-do Bakersfield people who had been living in apartments or rented houses, manifestly because they lacked a feeling of permanence and not from lack of means, cast their lot with the city by building handsome and expensive homes. The change of sentiment that accompanied this action was very marked. Previously a very great proportion of the residents of the city considered themselves as sojourners only, and did not disguise from themselves or others their expectation of making their permanent residence elsewhere when they had accumulated a fortune, a competence or a working capital from the easy money that circulated in the oil town.

Raising the Civic Standards

To this change of attitude may be traced a new public sentiment demanding the elimination of various forms of flagrant vice that had been tolerated as symptoms of the general fever of speculation and endurable in a city of temporary sojourn, but instantly recognizable as out of place in a city of permanent homes. The public dance halls, conducted as adjuncts of the more disreputable saloons, went first as the result of a crusade in which a number of prominent private citizens served in the capacity of special officers to make arrests. Efforts to curb illegal forms of gambling continued long with vacillating symptoms of success and failure. Gradually the worst places were closed, and the professional gambler sought less troubled fields of operation in the new West Side oil towns. The slot machines vanished in a day when the state law making it an offense to have them on one's premises went into effect. In the spring of 1911 an effort on the part of the city trustees to narrow the boundaries of the redlight district provoked a war between keepers of rival resorts and an injunction suit brought at the instance of one of the parties closed every known disorderly house in town. Strenuous efforts were made to effect a compromise, but public sentiment refused to permit any retrogression, and two years later the old redlight district remains practically deserted.

Consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern

Occasional movements for the consolidation of Bakersfield and the rival town which the Southern Pacific railroad founded under the name of Sumner and incorporated later under the name of Kern, resulted finally on February 25, 1908, in an election in which the union was defeated by ten votes in Kern, although the voters of Bakersfield approved it by a majority of 342. On December 21, 1909, however, a second election resulted in a vote of 265 for, to 154 against, in Kern, and 518 for, to 186 against, in Bakersfield. The first election of the consolidated city, held on July 18, 1910, resulted in the selection of the following officers: Trustees, W. V. Matlack, J. R. Williams, F. L. Gribble, H. S. Dumble, P. L. Jewett; board of education, L. G. Pauly, George Hay, H. A. Blodget, G. L. Snider and Celsus Brower; city clerk, H. F. Murdock; city attorney, Matthew S. Platz; marshal, James McKamy; treasurer, A. Weaver; recorder, W. H. Thomas; assessor, Ben L. Brundage. In April, 1911, the date of the regular elections for cities of the fifth class—which class the consolidated city assumed—the trustees and nearly all the other city officials were re-elected.

Bakersfield Paves Her Streets

The same new feeling of permanence and proprietorship in the city's future that prompted the building of many residences and the improvement of moral conditions showed further evidence in the demand for better streets, and following the consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern and the election of a new board of city trustees in the summer of 1910 systematic preparations for a long campaign of street paving were begun. The city leased a gravel pit at the west end of Panorama heights, installed a screening plant and purchased a steam traction roller and other street-building apparatus. All of these were placed at the disposal of street contractors for the purpose of inducing favorable bids for paving.

The first ambitious job undertaken was the paving of East Nineteenth street, Grove and Park streets, connecting the business centers of East Bakersfield and the main portion of the city. This main thoroughfare of the city had been in a chronic state of bad order from time immemorial, owing to the heavy traffic and the light, friable soil of which the roadbed was made. Nothing short of a standard pavement would answer the requirements, and the fact that a large percentage of the abutting property was vacant and producing no revenue discouraged the hope that the owners would bear the expense of paving. However, the city trustees adopted a resolution ordering the work done under the Vrooman act, and the proceedings went through without protest.

KERN COUNTY COURT HOUSE, BAKERSFIELD

Long before the paving of East Nineteenth street was completed property owners on other streets began filing petitions for similar improvements at their expense, and for two years the work has continued without interruption about as fast as the facilities at hand would conveniently permit. During this time about 200 blocks have been paved at a cost of a little over half a million dollars, and indications are that the campaign will continue for many ensuing months.

Bonds for County Roads

Considerations similar to those that prompted the paving of Bakersfield streets, coupled with a desire to bind together the several centers of development in the county, led, in the summer and fall of 1912, to a county-wide agitation in favor of a county system of permanent roads. At this time the preliminary survey for the state highway had been completed through the county, following the Southern Pacific railroad from the north county line to Bakersfield, and running thence in a nearly southerly direction through Tejon cañon to Los Angeles. People interested in the Tehachapi and desert sections of the county continued their efforts to have the state road routed past the mountain town, but it was officially assumed that the Tejon route would be adopted, and the county highway commission, consisting of C. E. Getchell, A. J. Woody and J. L. Evans, laid out a proposed system of county roads branching from the line of the proposed state highway and reaching all the important centers of population of the county save Randsburg and the farthest eastern portion of the desert section. This plan was submitted to the voters of the county on July 8, 1913, and was approved, together with a bond issue of $2,500,000 for carrying it out. The vote was: For the bonds, 2,529; against the bonds, 693.

The bond issue as submitted to the voters provided for improving the following roads at the estimated costs indicated: Delano to the Tulare county line, 8.5 miles, $37,243; Wasco to McFarland, 11.6 miles, $66,327; Wasco to Lost Hills, 21.3 miles, $274,766; Rio Bravo to Wasco, 18 miles, $87,237; Bakersfield to McKittrick, 37.6 miles, $325,207; McKittrick to Maricopa, 25.5 miles, $249,244; Bakersfield to Taft, 37.1 miles, $378,609; Old River school house to Maricopa, 28.7 miles (connecting with road from Taft to Bakersfield) $252,314; Bakersfield to Oil Center, 7.4 miles, $67,405; Bakersfield to Sand Cut, 21.5 miles, $90,086; Weed Patch loop, 13.3 miles, $69,010; all the foregoing graded and paved, and the following only graded: Oil Center to Glennville, 30.5 miles, $80,775; Sand Cut to Tehachapi, 28.2 miles, $300,663; Tehachapi to Mojave, 20.8 miles, $86,483; Caliente to Kernville, 38.5 miles, $80,775; Randsburg-Johannesburg-Stringer district highways, 14.5 miles, $53,850.

Public Buildings of 1900-13

The new county court house heads the list of important public buildings erected in the county in the past decade. A $400,000 bond issue for its erection was approved by the voters on September 14, 1909, and construction was begun in July, 1910. F. J. Amweg of San Francisco secured the contract for $340,827. The site, which includes two blocks on the east side of Chester avenue between Truxtun avenue and Fifteenth street, was bought from Miller & Lux and R. E. Houghton for $16,000, and about $50,000 was spent on the interior furnishings and the improvement of the grounds. The building is of white Manti stone, is three stories and basement and covers a ground space of eighty-two by two hundred and forty-five feet.

The old court house occupying the block across Chester avenue to the west, was sold to the city of Bakersfield for a city hall for $125,000 on July 9, 1913. Funds for the purpose and $25,000 additional for the remodelling of the building were voted by the city on June 18, 1912, at which time, also, were approved bond issues as follows: For the construction of a supplemental sewer system, $210,000; for the construction of two new fire stations and the purchase of a new auto-driven equipment, $60,000; for a library building and site for East Bakersfield, $27,000.

Church Building

That the progress of the churches has kept pace with other lines of improvement during the past decade is witnessed by the fact that nearly every church organization has erected a new building or made extensive additions to its old one during that time. Handsome and commodious brick structures have been built by the Methodist Episcopal, Roman Catholic and Baptist. The German Lutheran, East Bakersfield Methodist and Christian Science churches have built frame buildings, the Methodist Episcopal South and the Christian churches have made important additions, and the Presbyterian and Congregationalist are beginning fine brick edifices. Most of the new church buildings are equipped for institutional work to a greater or less degree. The Catholic church has maintained a parochial school for three years past, and the Sisters of Mercy have this year completed a large brick hospital on West Truxtun avenue to supplement a commodious wooden structure which they purchased several years ago.

Progress of the Schools

Recent events of importance in the city and county educational systems include the introduction of manual training in the city schools in January, 1903, and the addition of a thorough course of domestic science under the direction of Mrs. F. B. Thomas in 1906. Inspired by the same practical aim, the high school, which was organized in 1893, added consecutively courses in bookkeeping, commercial law and stenography, manual training, domestic science, agriculture and assaying. Land for a high school farm was leased in 1909, and in June, 1910, the county supervisors purchased for $16,000 the twenty-seven acres comprising the old Hudnut place and used just previously as a county fair ground. This land, which lies in the northern part of the city, is being improved steadily as an experiment station where high school pupils are taught the practical art of husbandry, propagation of plants, breeding of stock, dairying and poultry raising. The manual training department, meantime, has grown to include a well equipped machine shop, a wood-working department, blacksmith shop and foundry, all housed in a commodious manual arts building of brick and concrete floors, erected in 1911. The first high school building was finished in 1895, and the second in 1906.

At the present time plans are being perfected to add to the regular academic course the first two years' work of the university, which will enable graduates of the high school to enter the state university as juniors, and will much better equip those who end their period of instruction with their high school graduation.

In 1910 there were 5812 school children in the county, eighty school districts, and 168 teachers. The school property of the county was appraised at $470,667. In the same year Bakersfield and Kern contained 2600 children of school age, and $66,289.36 was expended in their education. Since that time the growth of the city schools has required the building of three new school buildings and the construction of additions practically doubling the capacity of two others, and during all of the time it has been necessary to use temporary buildings to keep pace with the demand.

The Rescue of Lindsey B. Hicks

No more intensely dramatic incident has happened in the history of Kern county than the rescue of Lindsey B. Hicks just before midnight on December 22, 1906, after he had been buried nearly sixteen days under thousands of tons of earth by the caving in of the great shaft of the Edison Electric Company at its power generating plant in Kern river cañon about seventeen miles above Bakersfield. The accident occurred in the process of putting the heavy steel and concrete lining in the shaft which carries the water from the forebay down to the power plant eight hundred and sixty-five feet below. The whole length of the shaft is seventeen hundred and twenty-three feet. It was mined upward from the bottom, and as the work progressed the walls were supported by timbers cut and fitted end to end to form a succession of octagons fitting against the earthen sides of the shaft and wedged tightly to hold them in place without nailing or cross braces. The placing of the sections of steel tubing followed the same direction. First the bottom sections were placed, and concrete tamped about between the steel and the walls of the shaft.

In order to protect the workmen engaged at this task from clods or stones that might fall from above, a bulk head of heavy timbers was built across the shaft a little way above them. As the work progressed this bulkhead was moved higher and higher up. On the morning of Friday, December 7th, the bulkhead had been moved successively upward until it was two-thirds or more of the way to the top of the shaft, and the progress of the workmen below had made it necessary to move it once again.

To do this work, Hicks, Gus Anderson (foreman), George Warner, C. D. Robles, H. Parris and John Wilbar were sent down the shaft from the top. Preliminary to moving the bulkhead one of the men was ordered by Anderson to knock loose the lowest of the set of timbers. Some objection was made to doing this on the ground that it was not safe, and it was stated later that express orders had been given against the removal of the timbers. However, on the order being repeated the workman knocked out the wedge that released the timbers. The reader who is unfamiliar with the subject should understand that the timbers were held in position only by being wedged tightly against the walls of the shaft. No sooner was the first set of timbers collapsed than a cave started that released the second set of timbers. This let down more earth, and in turn released the third octagon. With the falling of the second set of timbers the men turned to flee up the steep incline of the shaft, but the falling of the timbers, one after another, like dominoes that knock each other over in a row, was too fast for them. One man reached a point of safety. The others were caught like rats in a deadfall.

Hicks, who was somewhere midway in the group of men, was struck by a falling timber just as he reached a skip—or small car built to run down the shaft on an iron track—and he fell forward beside the car, with the timber pressing on his back, and the whole mountain above him, apparently thundering down to close him in.

The superintendents and workmen about the tunnel, the shaft and the power plant gathered about the collapsed hole in horror. The coroner was notified, the news of the death of the buried men was telegraphed, and the tremendous task of exhuming the dead bodies began. Seventy hours later, as the muckers were digging away at the top of the cave, Pearl Davis, a shift boss, heard a faint tapping that seemed to come from deep down in the earth. He stood still for a moment while his flesh turned cold, and then he heard the tapping again. He put his ear to the tram rail that led into the collapsed shaft, and heard it again, clearly and distinctly. Someone, down beneath the crumbled mass of earth and boulders, was striking with a piece of steel against the rail. Davis answered the signal and was answered in turn.

The news spread quickly that one or more of the men was alive, but it was not until the 11th (the cave occurred on the 7th) that definite communication was established between the buried miner and the men who now were keyed to the highest tension to effect his rescue. A gaspipe, cleansed and sterilized under the direction of the company's physician, was driven down beside the rail of the tram to where Hicks lay. On the eleventh this work was done and Hicks was breaking his four days' fast with milk and broth poured down the pipe. General Superintendent W. S. Cone of the Edison Electric Company came from San Fernando. General Manager Sinclair came from Los Angeles. The best miners and the cleverest engineers were summoned from the different camps, and one of the finest and in many respects most remarkable efforts for the rescue of a human being in the history of the state was begun. Hicks was absolutely an unknown man, without a relative or a special friend on earth so far as was known then or has developed since, but the news of his peril and the heroic work for his rescue was telegraphed twice a day to every section of the United States.

The plan of digging down from the top of the caved shaft was abandoned as unsafe for both Hicks and the rescuers, and a tunnel was started in the shoulder of the mountain a little below and ninety-six feet distant from where the buried miner lay. The mouth of the new tunnel was seven hundred feet or more above the river bed, and on the face of a precipice so steep that a scaffolding had to be built from which to start the work.

The earth and crumbled rocks through which the path of the tunnel lay were treacherous, and it was necessary to timber nearly all the way. When nothing else impeded progress, the miners would run against a boulder. Sometimes it could be cracked; once they mined around it, rolled it out of the tunnel and sent it hurtling down the mountain side. The miners worked in frequent shifts, and pick handles never cooled. The last five days the tension was extreme. City editors in cities a hundred and fifty miles away called up the Bakersfield newspapers the last moment before going to press to know if Hicks was rescued yet, or to know the exact number of feet and inches of earth that remained to be penetrated.

Finally, when the tunnel was done, and the foreman of the rescue shift had shaken hands with Hicks and passed him a plug of tobacco, it was necessary to saw the rails of the tram in four places and haul the buried man under the car. A man had to lie on his back and saw the rail over his head.

Newspaper men at the tunnel 'phoned to Bakersfield when the sawing began, and a crowd of thousands of people walked the streets and waited for further news. Arrangements had been made to ring the fire bell when the first word came that Hicks was safe. For two days and nights J. M. Duty, an old Texas ranger, with two men hired to help him, had kept his irons hot ready to fire a salute of anvils on the lot where the new court house stands, the moment the good news should come.

At 11 o'clock at night someone 'phoned to the engine house that Hicks was out, and Foreman Arthur Nagle sprang to the tower and turned the old bell loose. Duty got his anvils in action, loading them, not with powder, but with dynamite. The crowd on the street went frantic. Newspaper men at this end of the line got in touch with the watchers at the tunnel. Hicks was still beneath the car. A messenger hastened to the engine house, warning the crowds on the sidewalk as he went that the danger was not yet over, that the loosening of the last bit of rail might let the car fall and render fruitless the sixteen days of toil and care. But there was no stopping the premature rejoicing. By that time the engines in the Southern Pacific and Santa Fe yards were sending up their shrill jubilee, society women in the residence districts were beating tin pans, marching and laughing hysterically. Out in the Kern river oil fields the great steam whistles were sounding a symphony of joy that floated into Bakersfield like the rushing of a wind in the pine trees. Dell Gamble, custodian of the town clock, was making the big bell in the tower peal off as many hours as Hicks had lain in his living tomb. Church bells were ringing everywhere.

It was a full quarter of an hour after the wild demonstration began before Hicks was out in the tunnel, and at least five minutes more before the word was shouted down from the mountain side to the man at the 'phone by the river and by him transmitted to Bakersfield.

Of course Hicks went on the stage, and his first appearance was in the Armory in Bakersfield. An ordinary sitting room would have held the crowd. He fell as flat in Los Angeles, and everywhere. Hicks buried alive with heroic men risking their own lives to save him was an object of national interest. Hicks rescued dropped back to his old place and importance. He was a mucker, no different from any other mucker, no better nor more interesting than any other man that may be carrying a hod or sweeping up the litter on the streets.

The last heard of Hicks was that some widow had married him, and so he passed permanently from his brief pedestal of public prominence to the common level of domestic obscurity.

News Notes, 1899 to 1910

October 5, 1899—Scribner's opera house is filled at a reception to Major Frank S. Rice on his return from a campaign in the Philippines.

October 9—Mojave's business section is wiped out by a fire which is believed to be incendiary.

November 16—The sidewalk-building campaign is in full blast, and property owners on West Nineteenth street petition for the building of concrete walks from Chester avenue to Oak street, a total length—counting both sides—of 7556 feet.

December 15—Bakersfield expects free mail delivery soon.

December 21—Bakersfield is discussing park and levee plans, and Engineers W. C. Ambrose, W. R. Macmurdo and Walter James submit a report estimating that a sufficient levee to guard against all danger of flood from the river can be built for $12,000.

January 17, 1900—The corner stone of the Woman's Club hall at Sixteenth and H streets is laid, and the Beale memorial library at Seventeenth and Chester is nearing completion.

March 21—The Sunset Railroad Company is incorporated by local men.

March 28—Truxtun Beale deeds the Beale library to the city as a memorial to his father, General E. F. Beale.

April 11—Work starts on the electric railroad from Bakersfield to Kern.

July 19—A call is issued for a meeting of oil producers to organize to control the market and insure remunerative prices for oil. This is the beginning of the Associated Oil Company.

July 20—Meeting is held and a committee on organization is appointed consisting of C. A. Canfield, J. M. Keith, W. G. Kerckhoff, W. E. Knowles, E. L. Doheny, H. A. Blodget, W. H. McKenzie, Burt Green, B. F. Brooks, O. Scribner, H. H. Blood and D. S. Ewing.

September 12—Producers' Oil Association is organized as a result of the meetings on July 19 and 20.

September 25—Judge Ross of the federal court in Los Angeles decides against the scrippers in the cases of Pacific Land and Improvement Company against Elwood Oil Company, and Cosmos Exploration Company against Gray Eagle Oil Company.

Electric cars will run on the new street railway soon after January 1, 1901.

February, 1901—A building boom is on in East Bakersfield.

A campaign against illegal gambling starts. The games are closed on Sunday but run all the week.

April 17—A meeting is held preliminary to the organization of the First National Bank of Bakersfield.

April 18—The famous battle at Midway between representatives of the Mt. Diablo Oil Company and the Superior Sunset Oil Company occurs in the darkness of night, and G. P. Cornell and J. T. Walker, alleged gunmen in the employ of the latter company, are badly wounded. The battle is over sections 24 and 26, 32-23. The Mt. Diablo people get the land by court decision, but long litigation follows over the shooting affair.

April 25—Kern City floral carnival opens with Miss Della Wells as queen.

April 26—Bakersfield gets news of a decision against the scrippers in the case of Kern County Oil Company against Gray Eagle Oil Company.

May 18—The Southern Pacific is changing its engines from coal to oil burners.

May 20—George Hinkle has hard luck in a poker game, and just as he gets aces up with big money in the pot his wife enters and leads him out by the ear. At home Hinkle gives his wife a beating, and has to leave the town hastily to escape a band of fellow gamblers who are warming a pot of tar and emptying a feather bed.

May 23—The Masonic temple at Chester avenue and Twentieth street is dedicated with elaborate ceremonies.

May 25—The senior academic class of the high school is suspended for insubordination as the result of a quarrel about the place on the stage which the commercial class is to occupy at the graduation exercises. The trouble is adjusted later and all graduate happily.

NINETEENTH STREET LOOKING EAST FROM G STREET, BAKERSFIELD

June 1—The county supervisors are putting oil on the Rosedale road for the first time.

June 10—An agitation for the closing of the stores at 6 o'clock is started.

June 25—The ministers and the retail clerks join in a meeting at the opera house to promote the 6 o'clock and Sunday closing movement.

July 5—Kern county's assessment totals $20,850,000, against $15,184,000 in 1900.

July 23—A petition with 441 signers is presented to the city trustees urging the purchase of parks for the city.

August 13—The Santa Fe Railroad adopts plans for a new depot at Bakersfield.

August 8—The site for the Lowell school is purchased.

August 20—The Edison Electric Company announces plans for building a power plant in Kern river cañon.

August 28—The Pacific Refinery (afterward the Phoenix) starts work on its refinery near Reeder lake, just west of Bakersfield.

October 16—The Standard Oil Company is securing rights of way for its pipe line to Point Richmond (the first pipe line built in the county). Producers are complaining of shortage of tank cars.

October 16—A party leaves Bakersfield to hunt grizzly bears in the mountains above Tejon.

October 16—The contract is let for the Lowell school.

October 20—The tracks of the Sunset Railroad have reached Hazelton in the Old Sunset field.

November—The Kern River Power Company is organized to build power plants on Kern river.

December 21—Kern Company, Uniform Rank, Knights of Pythias, is mustered in.

December 21—The supervisors let the contract to L. Wilcox to build a bridge across Kern river opposite the oil fields.

December 23—The first train leaves for Sunset over the new road.

December 24—The Southern Pacific has ordered more engines to handle the increased business that the oil fields create.

January 1, 1902—The St. Paul's Episcopal church at Seventeenth and I streets is consecrated.

January 3—Miller & Lux offer to give the herd of elk that has roamed on the company's lands for years to the Bakersfield lodge of Elks. The offer was accepted and the elk moved to the national park in the Sierras.

January 14—Work is progressing on the Producers' Savings Bank building at Nineteenth and H streets, and the directors of the Bank of Bakersfield decide to build at Chester and Twentieth streets.

There is much talk about an electric railroad to the coast, and there are rumors that the Denver & Rio Grande will build through Walker's pass into Bakersfield.

The January shipments of oil from the Kern river field reach 3,000 cars and break all records.

January 31—The Board of Trade is organized with Frank S. Rice as president and the following additional members of the executive committee: L. M. Dinkelspiel, L. P. St. Clair, A. Weill, W. J. Doherty, Alfred Harrell, R. C. Hussey, L. C. Ross and S. C. Smith.

February 10—The Southern Pacific begins building oil storage tanks along its tracks through the state.

February 20—E. F. Carter strikes a strong flow of gas on section 25, 32-23.

March 1—The First Congregational church celebrates its tenth anniversary. The church was organized on February 28, 1892.

April 15—The shippers lose again in contests over oil lands.

April 22—Miss Theresa Ellen Lacey is elected queen of the street carnival to be held on May 3d.

May 2—The Oil Exchange building at H and Nineteenth streets is formally opened.

May 3—The Merchants' Free Street Carnival opens with Queen Tessie on the throne. The coronation ball is held on Monday night, and the week is given over to mirth and gaiety. Governor Gage visits the city on the last day of the carnival.

May 7—Oil companies talk of building a railroad to Maricopa with private capital.

May 11—The school census shows 2011 boys and 1911 girls of school age in the county.

May 21—Pipe is being delivered for the Standard Oil Company's pipe line to Point Richmond.

May 22—Ben Thomas is putting in a pump irrigation plant at Delano at a cost of $1200.

May 25—Company G wins a prize as the most efficient company in the regiment.

July 4—The Kern County Democrats hold a "non-partisan" Fourth of July celebration with a big barbecue on West Nineteenth street.

August 3—The first carload of materials for the Kern River Power Company's canal is delivered.

September 3—The first Labor Day celebration is held in Bakersfield.

Many plans are discussed for building a railroad to Ventura and a meeting is held to consider a railroad to Kernville. None of these plans have yet materialized.

October 17—Dr. George C. Pardee speaks in Bakersfield. Governor Gage speaks at the opera house. A hot political campaign, both state and county, is in progress.

December 4—A petition is in circulation asking that the legislature create a second department of the superior court. The movement was successful, and late in the next spring Governor Pardee appointed Paul W. Bennett to the new office, a position which he filled continuously until his death in the summer of 1913.

January 7, 1903—Sheriff John W. Kelly closes the illegal gambling games which previously had been running wide open.

March 24—The Associated Oil Company starts work on a 470,000 barrel earthen reservoir in the Kern river field.

April 19—The outlaw, James McKinney, after being tracked from Visalia through the mountains to Arizona and back to Bakersfield, is killed in a battle with officers on Sunday morning about 9:30 o'clock in the Chinese joss house on L street between Twenty-first and Twenty-second streets. Marshal T. J. Packard and Deputy Sheriff W. E. Tibbet are shot and killed by McKinney and an associate supposed to be Al Hulse, in whose room in the joss house the outlaw was hiding. Hulse is arrested, and B. M. Tibbet, who shot McKinney, is appointed marshal by the city trustees.

April 27—The Native Sons of the Golden West hold their state parlor in Bakersfield.

August 22—City election ballots are stolen from a vault in the city clerk's office to prevent their being recounted in a contest filed by E. P. Davis against the election of T. J. Packard as city marshal. The thieves took the ballots to a lonely gully east of Kern city and partly destroyed them by fire. J. T. Wells, a rancher hauling hogs to town before daylight in the morning, saw the fire and two men with a buggy. He reported to Constable Stroble, who, with Marshal Ham Farris of Kern, went out and found the ballots on the 24th and placed them in the safe in Justice Marion's office. The theft was not made public until September 10th.

November 10—The trial of Al Hulse begins in Judge Mahon's court.

November 20—The San Joaquin Valley Federation of Woman's Clubs meets in Bakersfield.

December 15—The city trustees decide on the intersection of Chester avenue and Seventeenth street as the site for the Beale memorial clock tower.

January 5, 1904—The election contest of E. P. Davis against T. J. Packard comes to a hearing before Judge Mahon after long delay, despite the death of Packard and the burning of the ballots, and Davis is declared elected by a vote of 442 to 445. Davis lost one vote and Packard nine in the hearing.

January 15—H. A. Jastro is elected vice president of the National Live-stock Association. Later he served several times as president.

April 15—G. P. Cornell, one of the men who were wounded in the Midway battle of April 18, 1901, enraged at the outcome of a preliminary examination of men against whom he had brought a charge of deadly assault, fired seven shots from a Colt's automatic revolver at Dr. A. F. Schafer and E. J. Boust, one bullet passing through Boust's coat and the others flying wild about Nineteenth street in front of the Arlington hotel, where Cornell was standing at the time. One shot drew blood on the leg of a salesman standing in the door of Weill's department store and another struck the shoe of John Herrick, who was standing in front of the Magnolia saloon.

May 16—The Knights of Pythias and Rathbone Sisters hold their state conventions in Bakersfield.

May 25—The second trial of Al Hulse for the murder of Packard and Tibbet begins. Hulse was convicted, but committed suicide several years later while still waiting in the county jail for the result of an appeal. He never went to prison.

November 2—The Independent Oil Producers' Agency files articles of incorporation.

November 8—Roosevelt carries Kern county and the Republicans elect an assemblyman, judge and two supervisors. Chairman E. M. Roberts of the Democratic county committee presents Chairman J. W. Wiley of the Republican committee with a new broom, which is hung out of the window of the Republican headquarters.

November 19—The Eagles celebrate the fourth anniversary of the founding of the Bakersfield aerie.

November 23—The Independent Oil Producers' Agency completes its organization and the member companies sign over to the agency leases covering $25,000,000 worth of property.

November 28—The post office is moved to its present location in the Southern Hotel building on I street.

December—Water is giving serious trouble in the Kern river oil field.

December 20—A campaign against the dance halls is in progress.

December 29—Litigation between the irrigating canal companies and the power development companies is settled and Judge Bennett issues a decree perpetually enjoining the Kern River Power Company from building storage reservoirs or from diverting water from Kern river except for power development purposes.

December 30—Water is turned through the Kern River Power Company's tunnel and power plant and electricity is carried to Los Angeles to run the street cars.

January 4, 1905—The county supervisors let the contract to the Edison Electric Company to build the road up Kern river cañon for $21,000.

January 9—The city trustees begin hearing a protest against the open dance halls, and on January 16th, after a stormy session of the board, Trustee R. McDonald left the meeting and the other trustees declined to renew the licenses of the saloons having dance houses in connection. Mayor H. H. Fish ordered the marshal to close the saloons having no licenses, but the saloons evaded the issue by selling soft drinks only. The dance hall cases were carried from the trustees to the city recorder's court, and the jury disagreed. The dance hall keepers applied to the superior court for a writ of mandate to compel the trustees to issue them liquor licenses, but the writ was finally refused.

March 5—Knights of Columbus lodge instituted.

March 25—The Catholics make plans for the new St. Francis church, which is to cost $40,000.

April 9—The new First Baptist church is dedicated.

April 12—The Salvation Army buys a lot at K and Twentieth street. Free mail delivery is to be established in Kern in June.

April 10—In the city election R. McDonald wins over H. H. Fish by a vote of 630 to 387, and Mayor Fish, in retiring from the board, declares that the election is a victory for the "wide open town."

April 25—The new board of city trustees reconsiders the action of the old board in refusing to issue licenses to the saloons having dance halls in connection. It is declared that the dance halls will not be allowed to run, but they are gradually reopened.

The Redmen are raising $5000 for a Fourth of July celebration.

May 1—The Santa Fe railroad has bought the Chanslor-Canfield Midway Oil Company's great holding of oil lands at Midway.

May 1—H. A. Jastro, on behalf of the Kern County Land Company, tenders the city thirty acres of land in the western part of the city for a public park on condition that the city spend at least $3000 per year in improvements until a total of at least $30,000 is expended. The city accepted the tender, but did not comply with the terms, and the land was withdrawn by the donor.

May 12—Plans are submitted for the Elks' building on South Chester.

June 2—Burglars roll the safe out of the Santa Fe depot and across the street and maul it open with sledge hammers stolen from the section crew's tool box. Never apprehended.

June 17—Kern river is shipping little oil, but is storing a lot.

June 24—The jury finds E. P. Cornell not guilty of assault to kill E. J. Boust.

July 4—The Redmen's Fourth of July celebration is a great success. Mrs. Frank Fether is Goddess of Liberty, Miss Flo Massa represents California, and Miss Buxton represents Kern county in the big parade. Governor Pardee delivers the oration.

August 15—Scribner's opera house and adjoining buildings burn and a loud complaint concerning the fire department and the water supply results in a reorganization of the fire company.

August 21—The Standard Oil Company is pumping oil into its big earthen reservoirs west of the Kern river field at the rate of 30,000 barrels per day.

September 1—The Southern Pacific is corrugating the pipe for its pipe line between the Kern river field and Delano.

October 12—The dance halls are trying to get permission to run all night Saturday nights and until 3 o'clock in the morning other nights.

November 14—The county supervisors decide to build a new high school building to supplement the old one. The cost is estimated at $50,000.

December 23—The Public Ownership party is organized by Charles P. Fox and W. D. Young, and during the meeting, which is held in the court house, the heaviest earthquake shock felt in Bakersfield in many years occurs.

January 16, 1906—The corner stone of the new St. Francis church is laid by Bishop Conaty, who delivers an address in the open air to a great gathering of people.

April 3—Rev. A. M. Shaw, president of the Law and Order League of Kern County, issues a statement declaring war on the dance halls, but some years more elapse before they are finally closed, not to reopen.

April 4—The Allison Machinery Company installs a steam plant to furnish steam heat to downtown business houses.

April 8—The Buckeye Refinery is making kerosene oil in the Kern river field.

April 17—Plans are drawn for the Bakersfield opera house.

April 19—A mass meeting is held at Armory hall to draft plans in aid of the San Francisco fire sufferers and $2777 is subscribed by the citizens present.

May 27—Kern river reaches the highest point since 1893.

May 30—The contract between the Independent Oil Producers' Agency and the Associated Oil Company expires and producers begin shutting down their wells on account of the low price of oil.

July 4—The Bakersfield Board of Trade makes an excursion to the Amalie mining district which is showing renewed activity.

July 7—The Masons have placed a six-ton granite boulder in the center of their plot in Union cemetery.

August 11—Plans for the Santa Fe's new round house are announced.

August 23—Bakersfield's assessment roll totals $3,147,213.

September—Northern Kern county farmers will get $300,000 for wheat grown on 30,000 acres.

September 3—The Brodek block at Nineteenth and K streets is burned. Loss $41,000.

September 9—Bakersfield trustees adopt plans for a new sewer system calculated to serve a population of 20,000 people.

September 10—Bakersfield city schools open with 702 pupils; Kern schools, 415.

September 29—The new St. Francis Catholic church is nearing completion.

October 14—Al Hulse, partner of Outlaw McKinney in the joss house battle of April 19, 1903, commits suicide in the county jail where he is awaiting the result of his appeal from the superior court, where he was convicted of murder.

October 25—S. C. Smith and C. A. Barlow, candidates for congress from the eighth district, hold a joint debate on the issues of the campaign at Armory hall, and one of the largest audiences that ever attended a political meeting in Bakersfield is present.

November 2—Stud poker games are closed by Sheriff Kelley's order.

November 5—The new Bakersfield opera house is opened with Checkers, a character play.

November 6—The Democrats carry the county by pluralities ranging from 400 to 1000.

November 11—Gen. William R. Shafter, commander in chief of the Santiago campaign in the Spanish-American war, died at the home of his son-in-law, Capt. W. H. McKittrick, fifteen miles south of Bakersfield.

November 13—Bakersfield trustees are discussing dollar gas to no effect.

November 17—Delano ranchers have filled the warehouses and have thousands of sacks of wheat piled in the streets waiting shipment.

November 23—After a two days' session in the Kern river fields the Independent Oil Producers Agency closes a contract to sell to the Associated Oil Company 950,000 barrels of stored oil at twenty-five cents, and all its product for the ensuing year, estimated at 2,555,000 barrels at twenty-seven and one-half cents.

December 6—The shortage of cars for handling oil is causing agitation for the passage of the "Texas car law."

December 7—Lindsay B. Hicks and five other miners are buried alive by the collapse of the Edison Power Company's shaft in the Kern river cañon.

December 11—News reaches Bakersfield that Hicks is still alive and work of rescuing him is begun.

December 15—Committee of Home Extension Association inspects Wasco land and decides to locate a colony there.

December 22—Hicks is rescued after sixteen days' imprisonment in the collapsed power shaft and the town of Bakersfield goes wild with joy.

December 27—Hicks makes his first appearance on the stage at the Armory and is a decided failure as a footlight hero.

January 14, 1907—City trustees order an election to vote bonds as follows: For a new sewer system, $120,000; for a city hall and site, $50,000; for the improvement of city parks, $30,000.

January 19—Geologists estimate the original oil deposits of the San Joaquin valley fields at 1,254,000,000 barrels, of which 112,000,000 barrels have been taken out.

January 18—Cornerstone of Oil Center Congregational church is laid, W. W. Riley, pastor.

January 18—Woodmen of the World initiate sixty candidates.

January 25—The Porter-Higgins Company buys 2000 acres north of Delano and a large acreage east of Bakersfield, and plans to bring colonists from the east.

February 1—One hundred and ninety families secure allotments of land in Wasco Colony.

February 6—State Federation of Woman's Clubs begins its sixth annual session in the First Methodist church.

February 8—Mrs. E. D. Buss of Bakersfield is elected president of the State Federation of Woman's Clubs.

February 10—The Standard is paying thirty cents for Midway oil.

February 18—The price of highballs, Tom and Jerrys, all case goods and fancy drinks is raised to twelve and one-half cents by Bakersfield thirst emporiums.

March 22—Cosmopolitan hotel block burns, loss $25,000.

March 25—A $120,000 bond issue for building a new sewer system carries by a vote of 499 to 91.

March 26—The $30,000 bond issue for improving city parks is defeated by a vote of 321 to 219. It needed two-thirds to carry.

March 27—The $50,000 city hall bonds are defeated by a vote of 16 for and 213 against.

April 15—J. E. Bailey becomes mayor of Bakersfield. Truxtun Beale tenders two-black park to the city.

April 16—City trustees begin investigation of fire department that results in retirement of Chief Willow and nearly all the old firemen.

April 16—African Methodist conference for Northern California meets in Bakersfield.

April 21—Consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern is under discussion.

April 22—Many burglaries occur in Bakersfield.

May 6—The sixth regiment, N. G. C., is mustered out and Company G goes with it.

May 15—The Edison Electric Company's first power plant in Kern river cañon is put in commission.

May 16—A month's course of lectures at the Woman's Club hall by State University professors is begun. Truxtun Beale, who pays the expenses of the course, proposes to make it an annual affair.

May 24—The Bakersfield Club is drawing plans for a club building.

May 28—State Aerie of Eagles meets in Bakersfield.

May 31—Burglars crack Attorney Clafin's safe with a sledge hammer and try to enter three other offices in the Bank of Bakersfield building.

June 11—Colored Mason's grand lodge meets in Bakersfield. Illegal gambling is being suppressed.

June 21—A petition for the consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern is put in circulation.

July 3—The east levee of Buena Vista lake breaks and floods the old swamp lands to the east border of Kern lake, doing damage estimated at $250,000.

July 11—Southern Pacific will continue its pipe line to Port Costa.

July 12—J. W. Wiley is appointed code commissioner.

July 15—Work of repairing break in Buena Vista levee begins.

July 20—Judge Paul W. Bennett is acting as trustee to secure titles from the government to Havilah town lots. Havilah was built on unsurveyed land, and the residents have held their lots all these years by right of occupation only.

July 20—Mr. and Mrs. S. J. Swift, driving a Ford auto from Los Angeles to San Francisco on their wedding trip, let the empty machine run off the grade in Tejon cañon and fall eighty feet to the bottom. Swift, who is a machinist, rebuilds the car with an old saw, an axe, a jack knife and a lot of bailing wire and drives it into town, making a record in emergency auto repairing.

August 6—Trustees sell sewer bonds to Los Angeles Trust Company for par and accrued interest to date of delivery.

August 9—Enormous deposits of rich ore uncovered in Clear Creek cañon.

August 11—Destructive forest fire burns over several thousand acres in the Greenhorn mountain.

August 31—Sunset Road Oil Company makes contract with the Salt Lake Road to supply them with fuel oil for a period of five years at thirty to fifty cents.

September 14—Eight hundred pupils are enrolled in the city schools.

September 17—Illegal gambling closed again.

September 18—Kern county oil takes prize at the State Fair.

September 20—Eagles hold first meeting in new hall.

September 25—The pipe organ for the Episcopal church arrives.

October 1—Trustees order census of Kern and Bakersfield in preparation for consolidation.

October 10—Truxtun Beale presents to trustees plans for a Greek theatre to be built in Beale park. It is built later at Beale's expense.

October 22—A valuable collection of pictures, the gift of Truxtun Beale, was placed in the new high school building.

October 27—Census returns for the city of Bakersfield, 7,338, and for Kern, 3,422.

October 31—The first tract is sold in the Mountain View Colony.

November 5—The contract for the Hall of Records is let to Weymouth Crowell of Los Angeles for $44,340.

November 14—Thomas B. Larson, a pioneer of Linns Valley district dies in San Francisco aged eighty-two years.

December 4—Trustees call for bids for sewer construction. M. W. Buffington qualifies as city engineer.

December 5—Supervisors plan to raise saloon tax from $100 to $300.

December 8—Work begins on Greek theatre.

December 19—The Bakersfield band is organized.

December 31—Thirty-one thousand acres of the Cox ranch sold.

January 1, 1908—The Santa Fe is finishing its new thirty-five-stall round house.

January 7—City trustees let contract to Glass & Fisher to build new sewer system for $53,877.

January 10—City trustees call Bakersfield and Kern consolidation election for February 25th.

January 11—F. A. Tracy, pioneer, dies.

January 11—Congressman Smith has introduced a bill to provide a post office building for Bakersfield and the post office department has asked for statistics regarding the town and the business of the office.

January 14—W. S. Tevis files libel suit against San Francisco Bulletin.

January 31—The Independent Agency is standing pat on its demand for seventy-five cents per barrel from the Associated. First meeting is held to organize a branch of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League in Bakersfield.

February 11—The Woman's club plans to issue bonds to cover its indebtedness of $2400.

February 18—Mayor Bailey introduces an ordinance to reduce the price of gas to $1. It never passed, but it caused a long controversy and great expectations.

February 19—Independent Oil Producers Agency closes contract with the Associated for the sale of its oil for two years at sixty and one-half cents for the first year and sixty-three for the second year.

February 25—The first election for the consolidating of Bakersfield and Kern is carried in Bakersfield but is lost in Kern.

March 4—Disorderly saloons are under investigation and Trustee Everett St. Clair promises to introduce the afterward famous St. Clair ordinance, to close dance halls and side and rear entrances of the saloons.

March 9—St. Clair ordinances are introduced at a meeting attended by the largest audience the city trustees ever had.

March 11—Municipal reform is the chief talk of the town.

March 13—Lincoln-Roosevelt League organized by Chester H. Rowell.

March 16—St. Clair ordinances are passed.

March 17—Santa Fe round house is accepted.

March 20—Walter Stiern and Drury Wieman win third intercollegiate debate for Kern county high school, making three annual victories for the local school.

March 23—Illegal gambling gets "another death blow."

March 23—The Thomas flyer, America's car in the International New York to Paris automobile race, goes through Bakersfield.

March 24—It is announced that a railroad will be built from Los Angeles to San Francisco via the Tejon cañon and the west side oil fields. (It has not yet materialized.)

March 26—Oil men meet to urge passage of Smith oil land bill.

March 31—To the tune of "Auld Lang Syne," "Home Sweet Home" and "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," the dance halls closed at midnight in compliance with the St. Clair ordinance. The Owl and Standard will continue to sell soft drinks.

April 5—Gambling is in full blast again.

April 7—Soft drink dance halls are dull.

April 13—Woman's Club urges park improvement.

April 13—It is announced that City Trustee George A. Tilton will resign from the board as the result of an effort to get him to introduce amendments to the St. Clair ordinances.

April 16—Labor council endorses Trustee Tilton and petitions are in circulation asking the trustees to appoint G. J. Planz to the expected vacancy. Fred Gunther is also advanced as a candidate for the place.

April 21—Trustee Tilton resigned.

April 27—The Wasco Congregationalists are building a church.

April 28—The Delonega stage and four horses roll 200 feet down a cliff. The passengers jump and escape with varying degrees of injury.

April 30—Kern city is discussing municipal water works, but never takes final action.

May 2—The Order of Owls, Bakersfield Nest, is organized with twenty-one charter members.

May 2—Ardizzi-Olcese plant five acres to oranges on the Kern Heights.

May 3—R. G. Hill, cattleman of Tehachapi, buys twenty-five sections of the Towne ranch.

May 5—Second movement for consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern starts with petitions circulating in both towns.

May 7—The funeral of Wellington Canfield, pioneer ranch owner, is held in Bakersfield.

May 14—Mr. and Mrs. Placido Giglo are experimenting with silk culture in Bakersfield.

May 15—Kernites saw the big fleet of war ships at San Francisco.

June 4—Kern City stores close during funeral of James L. Depauli.

June 5—Anti-saloon league presents petition with 624 signatures asking the county supervisors to pass an ordinance giving each precinct local option. The ordinance was never passed.

June 11—Bakersfield buys the west half of section 3, 30-28 from the Southern Pacific for a sewer farm. Price $2.50 an acre.

June 27—Bakersfield will spend $2200 celebrating the Fourth.

June 27—An organization of citizens is making a crusade against illegal gambling. Constable D. B. Newell and citizen deputies raid crap and roulette games at 1215 Twenty-first street and M. H. Sisson swears to complaint against the gamblers.

July 3—Undersheriff T. A. Baker, Constable Newell and thirty citizens raid the Palace, Standard and Owl dance halls and arrest the keepers.

July 16—The jury disagrees in the first gambling trial.

July 19—The county assessment roll shows an increase of $2,371,641 over 1907. Present total, $26,712,953.

July 21—The Sisters of Mercy buy the L. P. St. Clair residence at H. and Fourteenth streets for a hospital.

July 27—Kern County Anti-saloon League organized.

August 4—State Federation of Colored Woman's Clubs meets in Bakersfield. Colored Odd Fellows open district lodge.

August 6—Charles P. Fox launches the California Oil World, a weekly devoted to the state oil industry.

September 6—The St. Clair Hospital, afterward Mercy Hospital, is opened.

September 7—Kern County High School opens with two new departments, manual training and domestic science. Delano installs first street light.

September 7—Bakersfield city schools show attendance of 792; High School 211; Kern city schools 440.

September 9—A. F. Stoner is appointed city trustee to fill vacancy left by George A. Tilton's resignation.

September 10—New hall of records is accepted. Cost, $50,000.

September 11—Gamblers arrested in citizens' crusade plead guilty. Crap and roulette tables will be shipped to Nevada.

September 22—State convention of county assessors meets in Bakersfield.

September 23—Woodmen of the World adopt plans for building at I and Eighteenth streets.

October 7—Dance hall cases go on trial before Justice of the Peace Black and Slim Moore is acquitted.

October 10—John McWilliams buys 5000 acres of Lerdo Land from Kern County Land Company.

November 13—Building boom strikes Bakersfield.

November 18—First probation committee appointed.

December 3—Mrs. F. A. Tracy gives two acres of land to Children's Shelter in memory of her husband, F. A. Tracy.

December 5—First Children's Shelter tag day is held and $6,000 is raised.

December 17—Union Oil Company has leased 6000 acres of land from the Sunset Road Oil Company.

December 22—Bakersfield new sewer system is finished.

January 15, 1909—High water in Kern river threatens levees. The river is carrying about 15,000 cubic feet of water per second.

January 21—H. L. Packard dies in San Francisco.

February 3—O. D. Fish dies in Los Angeles.

February 5—Supervisors create Aqueduct and Standard School districts.

February 7—W. T. Jameson dies at his ranch.

February 25—The Edison Land & Water Company is organized.

February 27—Mrs. W. M. Beekman and four children are burned to death in their beds when their home is consumed by fire. The origin of the fire still remains a mystery.

March 13—The edict goes forth that illegal gambling in the West Side oil towns must cease.

April 15—The Independent Oil Producers' Agency asks producers to curtail the production of oil for six months on account of the increasing surplus.

April 20—Henry J. Martens lands here with fifty Mennonites to found the Lerdo colony. The colony failed because Martens could not give title to the land, and the colonists scattered to other parts of the county and the state. The first children's playground in Bakersfield is opened under the supervision of Miss Evelyn Pluss.

April 21—Admiral Robley D. Evans lectures in Bakersfield.

April 25—A Kern county steer weighing 2500 pounds live weight and standing twenty hands high, is slaughtered in San Francisco by Miller & Lux, who claim that it is the record for size.

April 28—The Associated Oil Company votes $25,000,000 bonds to build pipe lines from Coalinga to Port Costa and from its west side holdings to Gaviota and for other improvements.

April 29—A $55,000 school bond election called for May 22 to build an addition to the Lowell school and buy sites for two more buildings.

May 6—There are over 200 motor cars in Kern county.

May 6—The Elks are excavating for their building on South Chester.

The Bakersfield band is playing at Nineteenth and Chester every Saturday night during the summer.

May 9—The Kern County High School captures the pennant in the valley inter-scholastic track meet. Lloyd Stroud, Cecil Baker, Gordon Baker, John Stroud, Antone Wegis and Drury Wieman are the stars.

May 12—William Harrison Lowell, Civil war veteran and Kern county pioneer, dies.

May 21—Plans are drawn for the Producers' Transportation Company's pipe line to the coast. Capt. John Barker, pioneer, dies at his home in Bakersfield.

June 2—The school census shows 5039 school children in the county.

June 7—The supervisors decide to call an election to vote $400,000 in bonds for a new court house.

June 11—The Producers' Transportation Company files incorporation papers.

June 11—Bakersfield merchants organize the Kern County Credit Association to protect its members from bad debts.

June 15—Caliente is wiped out by fire. Loss, $46,800.

June 17—The subject of better levee protection is discussed in Bakersfield.

July 5—The Eagles celebrate with a big picnic and barbecue.

July 9—The Druids are finishing their hall in East Bakersfield.

July 16—The county supervisors decide to add an agricultural department to the High School. A small plot of rented ground was used for experimental purposes for a time and later the Hudnut Park tract of twenty-six acres was bought by the county from the Kern County Fair Association.

July 20—The county assessment roll totals $31,787,898.

August 21—The county's hay and grain crop is estimated at $1,271,000.

August 25—A Santa Fe freight train with forty-seven loaded cars runs away down the Tehachapi grade and collides with a switch engine in the yards at Mojave. Five men killed; property loss, $200,000.

August 30—Dr. A. F. Schafer is experimenting with the manufacture of serums for the cure of acute diseases.

September 12—City schools open with 965 pupils and twenty-four teachers; High School, 205 pupils.

September 14—Kern county votes $400,000 to build a new court house.

September 22—Miller & Lux are extending the old Kern Valley Water

Company's canal north along the west side of the swamp and plan eventually to continue it to Tulare lake.

September 25—A new movement is launched to consolidate Bakersfield and Kern.

September 27—The historic oil land withdrawal order is made, and many thousands of acres of oil land claims in the West Side fields are clouded.

October 1—The Bakersfield Baseball Association is organized and a valley league is planned.

October 2—The Kern County Land Company sells five sections for the Mountain View colonization project.

Much general interest is taken in oil lands on the North McKittrick front.

October 10—President Taft speaks to many thousands from a platform near the Southern Pacific depot in East Bakersfield.

October 13—The Edison Land & Water Company is subdividing its land at $200 per acre with an interest in pumping plants and cement irrigation systems.

October 22—The town of Moron is wiped out by fire. Loss $35,000.

October 28—Two auto loads of gun fighters go out to do battle over the J. C. Yancey oil claims on the North McKittrick front. No blood shed.

Business men are looking for stores to rent in Bakersfield, but none are to be found.

November 2—Bakersfield city trustees pass a 12:30 saloon-closing ordinance.

Transient visitors to Bakersfield have to telegraph several days ahead to secure rooms, the town is so full of people. The 1910 oil boom is getting under way.

November 12—The Children's Shelter is dedicated.

November 25—Flaming arc street lights are being placed along Nineteenth street by property owners.

December 10—Plans are made for organizing a building trades council.

The Producers' Transportation Company's pipe line will be finished January 15th.

December 21—Bakersfield and Kern vote to consolidate. Bakersfield, 518, for; 186, against. Kern, 265, for; 154, against.

December 29—Barney Oldfield makes a mile in 1:10½ with an automobile at Hudnut park, lowering the former record of 1:12 for a mile on a half-mile dirt track.

December 30—The year's building record in Bakersfield is estimated at $221,300, and fifty-three buildings are under construction. Building tradesmen employed are: Carpenters, 180; plumbers, 25; painters, 50; brick masons, 30; plasterers, 15; cement workers, 25; inside wiremen, 10; laborers, 100.

December 30—Fifteen Bakersfield architects banquet at the Southern hotel. Building activity is near the top notch in Bakersfield's history.

December 31—Many auto loads of armed men leave Bakersfield for the West Side to post oil land locations with the stroke of midnight, and usher in with the new year the last great contest to take and hold—by force if need be—the rich government oil land of the Midway valley and the Elk and Buena Vista hills.

CHAPTER XVI

Brief Histories of Kern County Towns

Ever since Bakersfield wrested the county seat from Havilah in 1874 she has been the center of trade, growth and development in the county, and as such her story is closely interwoven with the story of the county, told in the preceding pages. It is not the purpose to repeat this story in detail in this chapter, but only to pick out some of the more important dates and events in the town's history for convenience in reference and for the purpose of furnishing a little clearer picture of Bakersfield's progress than the general history of the county affords.

The location of Bakersfield was fore-ordained from the time the geography of the southern end of the San Joaquin valley was determined. It is located at the point where Kern river leaves the deep furrow which it has ploughed for itself through the higher mesa land and reaches the flat, alluvial plain. It is the point where the water of the river could be most easily and profitably diverted for irrigation, and the soil of the townsite was such as to tempt the first settlers in the valley to locate there.

Bakersfield in 1859

The first of these settlers who established permanent homes on what is now the site of Bakersfield came in 1859 or just before that date. At that time Bakersfield was not a swamp, but Kern river divided just below Panorama heights and flowed through the present townsite in two main and one or two lesser channels. The largest of the channels was later known as Panama slough and crossed the townsite diagonally to the southwest, passing the present corner of B and Nineteenth street. The second largest channel was the old south fork, the remains of which are still in evidence just west of the Mill ditch.

In 1859 the Overland stage road or immigrant trail which came through Tejon pass ran through the Lowell addition and crossed the river somewhere west of Panorama heights. Immigrants entering the valley over this road formed the first transient settlement of what is now Bakersfield, and in the winter of 1861-62, at the time of the first flood that history records, this settlement numbered something more than half a dozen families besides native Indians.

The flood came the day after Christmas and cut a new channel for the river—the one it now follows—as is described in more detail in chapter five of this book. Some of the settlers and a good part of the Indian population moved away when the roads got dry enough, but at least four families remained, the Shirleys, the Gilberts, Harvey S. Skiles and Lewis Reeder.

Coming of Colonel Baker

In 1862 came Colonel Thomas Baker and Edward Tibbet. Colonel Baker had a contract with the state to reclaim all the swamp land that was overflowed by Kern river and immediately began the construction of a dam across the south fork below Panorama heights. The other settlers farmed the future townsite.

In 1863 a private school was established in the settlement, and the first public school was opened in 1877. During the Civil war the mail service over the southern route was discontinued, and the settlers here got their mail from Los Angeles or Visalia by the courtesy of neighbors or travelers. The first post office was established at Bakersfield about 1868.

In the winter of 1867-8 came the second flood, larger than the first, cutting the new channel deeper and strewing the townsite with logs from the mountains.

Kern County Created

Kern county was created by an act of the legislature on April 2, 1866, by which the county seat was fixed at Havilah. One of the first acts of the county supervisors, however, was to organize reclamation districts covering the land all around Bakersfield, and the settlement soon took on an activity that foreshadowed its eclipse of the mountain town the legislature had honored.

Bakersfield Formally Laid Out

On December 22, 1869, A. D. Jones, publisher of the Havilah Courier, moved his plant to Bakersfield, which Colonel Baker had formally laid out the September preceding. In January, 1870, Bakersfield had two stores, Livermore & Chester's and Caswell & Ellis', a telegraph office, printing shop, carriage shop, harness shop, fifty school children, two boarding houses, one doctor, one lawyer and a saloon.

In March, 1870, the town was resurveyed, and in the fall of that year a bill was introduced in the legislature to make it the county seat, but it did not become a law. At that time the whole population of "the island" was placed at 600.

In September, 1871, the surveyors were running preliminary lines through Bakersfield for the Southern Pacific railroad, and a month later it is recorded that Havilah residents were moving to Bakersfield and bringing their houses with them. Colonel Baker died November 24, 1872.

Bakersfield Wins the County Seat

Efforts of Bakersfield to secure the county seat resulted in an election on February 15, 1873, in which Bakersfield was declared the winner by twelve votes. Havilah secured an injunction, however, and litigation followed which resulted in a new count of the ballots on January 26, 1874, in which the figures stood, Bakersfield, 354; Havilah, 332.

For the growth which made this victory possible Bakersfield was indebted to the rich delta lands, which were being hungrily gathered up under the generous swamp reclamation laws. By this time Livermore & Chester had become the dominant factors in the community and were carrying on large operations in land reclamation, teaming, trading and other lines. The town was a center for sheep and cattle men, and was a stopping place for teamsters hauling ore and other products from the south and east to the end of the Southern Pacific railroad, which was then building down the valley.

Bakersfield Is Incorporated

In May, 1873, the county supervisors, acting on a petition of residents, declared Bakersfield an incorporated town, and on May 24th the first city officers were elected as follows: Trustees, W. S. Adams, L. S. Rogers, M. Jacoby, J. B. Tungate, and R. W. Withington.

Early in 1874 W. B. Carr, the fore-runner of J. B. Haggin and the Kern County Land Company, arrived in Bakersfield. That spring the first Methodist Episcopal church was built. In August the Southern Pacific reached the north side of the river; in September it was getting ready to lay out the town of Sumner, afterward Kern, now East Bakersfield. On September 1, 1874, George B. Chester deeded to the county the old court house block, and on October 5th a contract was let for the erection of a court house at a cost of $29,999.

Bakersfield Disincorporates

A perusal of the fuller accounts in chapters seven and eight will show that this was an era of great expectation for Bakersfield. But the railroad did less for the town than had been expected, and a series of dry years and the beginning of a contest between Livermore & Chester and Haggin & Carr for control of the irrigation waters caused a period of waiting and uncertainty that checked the town's growth. In 1876 Bakersfield got tired of paying a town marshal $76 per month for doing nothing, and disincorporated. It was incorporated a second time January 11, 1898.

By 1880 Billy Carr had out-generaled Julius Chester, and Haggin & Carr succeeded Livermore & Chester as the dominant factors in the growth of Bakersfield and Kern county. Then came the contest between Haggin & Carr and Miller & Lux told at length in preceding chapters, and the final compromise by which the waters of Kern river were divided between the two corporations. This compromise was embodied in an agreement signed on July 28, 1888.

Another Era of Progress

A little later rumor of plans for the colonization of the Haggin lands began to take on apparent substance, and the years 1888 and 1889 seem to have been notable for community progress in Bakersfield. On December 25, 1887, the Silsby fire engine—revered in the memory of the pioneers—arrived in town. In the summer of 1888 work was started on the Southern hotel. That fall L. P. St. Clair got a franchise for gas and electric works, and the next year H. A. Blodget, H. H. Fish and Jeff Packard got a franchise for the first street railway. In the spring of 1889 Haggin did put a small amount of land on the market, and the county voted $250,000 bonds to build a jail, a county hospital, an addition to the court house and to improve the county roads.

July 7, 1889, fire swept the business section of the hopeful young city and left little more than some acres of ashes with a fringe of dwelling houses around them.

Colonization of Rosedale

In September, 1890, the Kern County Land Company was incorporated, S. W. Fergusson was made manager, and the colonization of the Rosedale lands was begun. Extensive advertising of the Rosedale lands, the arrival of colonists and the expectation of the people of Bakersfield gave the town its next boom. Building, mostly of a light character, went forward with feverish activity.

On February 10, 1893, Kern river broke its levees and the water flowed over the northern part of the town and stood a foot deep at Nineteenth and I street, but in a few days it disappeared with little damage. The abundance of water which the flood indicated helped the Rosedale colonists—nearly all unaccustomed to irrigation—to over-irrigate their lands. Succeeding dry years and a shortage in the river largely remedied the error, so far as the lands were concerned, but the colonists meantime became doubly discouraged by the failure of their crops and the general hard times of 1893 and 1894.

When the Kern County Land Company fully decided that the Rosedale colonization venture was a failure it withdrew its agents, stopped selling land, and H. A. Jastro succeeded to the management of the concern and its great properties in the county.

Public Utilities in 1889-90

The first gas plant was built in Bakersfield about the first part of 1889, and the first electric lighting plant, run by steam, in 1890. The Power, Transit & Light Company finished the electric generating plant at the mouth of Kern river cañon in 1897 and took over the street car system, which previously had been run by horse power. In 1897, also, the Electric Water Company took over the old Scribner Water Works and began supplying the city generally with water. Chapter 13 gives important events and dates of this period in detail.

Kern River Oil Boom

In May, 1899, Jonathan Elwood and his son James discovered oil in the Kern river field, gave a great incentive to the oil boom that was beginning to materialize through work in the West Side fields, and started the greatest boom that Bakersfield had experienced up to that time in her history. In Bakersfield the result of this boom showed mainly in the rapid building of business and residence buildings to meet the swiftly expanding demand and the laying of miles of cement sidewalk in all parts of the city. Before the movement for public improvement reached the point of paving more than a few blocks in the business center the price of oil dropped under the weight of over-production.

Bakersfield did not drop back from the effects of this boom, nor did it ever drop back from the effects of any boom in its history; it has always held all it has gained, and been ready to take advantage of the next incentive to growth that good fortune afforded it.

Present Prospects

In Chapter 15 the more recent events in the history of Bakersfield are related and it is unnecessary to repeat the story here. At the present time the city is looking forward chiefly to prospective colonization enterprises, to the settlement of the mesa lands through pump irrigation, and to the hope of electric railways joining this city and Los Angeles via the Weed Patch and other lines from this city to the West Side oil towns. Bonds have been voted for the construction of a system of paved roads connecting Bakersfield with all parts of the county, and by these and other means the city is hoping to maintain her supremacy as the trade center of the county, a destiny of no modest proportions when the vast resources of the county are developed.

Towns of the West Side Oil Fields—Maricopa

The first railroad station established in the Sunset oil field when the Sunset railroad was built in 1902 was called Hazelton, but the wells around the first terminal were small producers, and the development gradually drifted to the north. The railroad followed with an extension of its tracks past the present site of Maricopa to a point known to the railroad company as Monarch, but which never attained much significance in the mind of the public. Most of the people who bought tickets to Monarch found it more convenient to get off at a point a mile or so to the south where many shallow wells producing a heavy road oil were brought in about 1902 and 1903 and thereafter, and gradually—because the slump in oil prices discouraged haste in those days—the present town of Maricopa took root and established itself as the permanent trade center of the Sunset field.

MARICOPA IN 1910

The first store was opened in 1906 by F. F. Torpey, and the first hotel was built by William Carter. C. W. Beatty opened a store in Maricopa in 1908, and also served as postmaster for a number of years.

During these years Maricopa was the only town in the West Side oil fields, and she therefore claims the title of Mother City of the West Side fields as well as the title of The Gusher City. But it was not until the gushers began coming in and the boom of 1909 and 1910 struck the West Side fields that Maricopa made any great progress toward prosperity or permanence.

But when the Lakeview gusher baptized the town with oil and the flood of land locators, prospectors and genuine oil producers began to arrive, Maricopa arose to the occasion. In 1910 the railroad company gave up the fiction that Monarch was the chief point on its Sunset line and built a substantial and commodious depot at Maricopa. A $12,000 grammar school building was built, two new hotels, the Lakeview and the Lenox, were opened to the public, the first garage and the first steam laundry were built; the Wagy Water Company completed laying water pipes from springs in the mountains, affording the city a good supply of water for domestic purposes and fire protection; 7,000 feet of private sewer main were laid, and gas and electric light and power service were extended to all parts of the town. During 1910 new houses were completed at the rate of two or three per day, telephone lines were extended throughout the Sunset field with a central office in Maricopa, and later these lines were carried to all parts of the expanding West Side district by the Kern Mutual Telephone Company, a West Side concern.

Maricopa was incorporated in July, 1911, at which time the following officers were elected: Trustees, C. W. Beatty, W. E. Thornton, James Wallace, H. C. Doll and C. Z. Irvine; clerk, E. E. Ballagh; treasurer, M. Y. White; recorder, T. W. Brown; attorney, L. R. Godward; marshal, H. J. Babcock; fire chief, Harry Parke; engineer, L. L. Coleman.

On June 20, 1911, about a third of Maricopa's business houses were destroyed by fire, but all the buildings were promptly replaced by others of a more enduring character.

During the past year and a half Maricopa's growth has been a little less rapid owing to a falling off in the activity of oil development, but every year the permanence of the West Side oil fields and of the cities that depend upon them seems more and more assured.

Maricopa has good banking facilities, and is well served in the field of journalism by the Maricopa Oil News. Among the prospects for the future is a good automobile road connecting Maricopa with the Ventura coast, and an electric railroad from Los Angeles via Tejon pass through Maricopa to the other West Side towns. The citizens of Maricopa have been actively promoting the coast road for a year and more past, and are now very hopeful that it will be built. This will place Maricopa on the line of much through travel from other parts of the valley to the sea, and the electric line, if it is built, will give the people of the Sunset town quick and frequent communication with Los Angeles.

Taft

The town of Taft has been at all its stages the logical outgrowth of the necessities of the Midway oil field, of which it is the business center. Although the first oil prospectors who entered Kern county from Coalinga overran and located the greater part of the Midway field, the lack of transportation facilities, water and fuel and the depth of the oil sands as compared to that in the older parts of the McKittrick and Sunset fields discouraged development. A map of the field published in 1901 shows but six oil wells, all in township 32-23. At that time 900 or 1000 feet was considered the limit of profitable drilling, whereas the big producers of the field in later years were brought in, for the most part, at twice that depth, or more.

In 1903 and thereabout, in the Midway field, occurred some of the bitterest contests over oil lands that have marked the history of the industry in the state, but the drop in oil prices just after that period reduced the activity of the Midway operators almost to the vanishing point. As late as 1907 the production of the Midway field was only 134,174 barrels for the entire year, less than half what some of the later wells of the territory produced per well in a month.

But with the cleaning up of the surplus oil stocks of the state during 1907, interest turned again to the Midway field, and the train of events which resulted in the building of Taft began. Foreseeing that the possession of its own supply of fuel might some day be of great advantage, the Santa Fe railroad bought the extensive holdings of Chanslor & Canfield in the Midway field; the Standard Oil Company also began to acquire land in Midway—the first venture of the big concern into the field of production in this state—and the construction of the Standard pipe line from the Kern river field to Midway was begun. Under the name of the Sunset Western, the Sunset railroad was extended from Maricopa to a point a little northwest of the present townsite of Taft, and a side track for the unloading of lumber and oil well supplies was put in. In the winter of 1908-9 an excursion of Bakersfield people went by train to the end of the Sunset Western road and spent half an hour looking at the sights of the embryo metropolis of the Midway field. They consisted of two or three shacks and several acres of oil well casing and derrick timbers piled along the siding.

But when the town began to grow it lost no time. By the summer of 1909 it had ten or a dozen business houses and some 200 inhabitants, and in July of that year it was given a post office with H. A. Hopkins, one of the pioneer merchants, as postmaster. Less than two years later the population had been multiplied by ten, and the business had increased still faster.

But there were intervening vicissitudes. Before the railroad was built water had to be hauled from Buena Vista lake and cost $8 per barrel. Afterward it was shipped by tank cars from East Bakersfield and retailed at fifty cents. The town was first built on the south side of the railroad track on land leased from the railroad on short tenure, and the architecture was of a correspondingly frail and temporary character. On October 22, 1909, at five o'clock in the morning a drunken man tried to light a distillate burner in a Chinese restaurant. He turned on the distillate and struck a match. The match went out, and he struck another. Meantime the distillate flowed out of the stove and through a hole in the floor. The second match started the fire. There was an explosion, and in an hour and a half the business street of the little Midway town was in ashes. There was no such thing as a fire department, and the total supply of water in the town at the time was estimated at ten gallons. Some of the losers by the fire were Evans & Parish, general merchants; W. L. Alvord, confectioner; Hahn & Krull, furniture dealers; Max Tupper, stationer; Fred O'Brien, pool hall and barber shop; Harry A. Hopkins, general merchant and postmaster; S. C. Burchard, butcher; James & Dooley, clothing merchants; Dr. Summers, and two or three others.

The remainder of the town was composed of tents, tent houses and shacks of the lightest construction. The railroad company in July had notified its lessees on the south side of the track that all that ground was needed for sidings, and had platted a townsite on the north side of the track where lots were offered for sale outright, except with provisions in the deed reserving the right to drill for oil and forbidding the sale of liquor.

About the same time J. W. Jameson platted a townsite on the south side of the railroad a little distance from the tracks on section 24, and a sharp contest arose over the location of the post office. The railroad company won the post office and most of the business houses, although enough of the latter located on the Jameson townsite to make quite a showing and to keep the ultimate result of the rivalry between the two locations in doubt for a considerable time.

Up to this time the railroad had called the new town Moro, but as there was an express office in San Luis Obispo county by that name an "n" was added to the end of the name of the Midway town. But there was a Moron in Colorado, and the postal authorities objected to duplicating the name in California, as the abbreviations used for the two states look so much alike.

After many weeks of debate and the vigorous rejection of several suggested names, Postmaster Hopkins, sitting in the office of Postmaster R. A. Edmonds in Bakersfield one day, happened to raise his eyes to a portrait of the president which hung above the desk. "Let's call it Taft," said Hopkins to Edmonds, and the suggestion finally prevailed, so far as the post office was concerned, although the railroad still clung to the name of Moron for its station.

Up to the end of 1909 neither of the rival towns had made much progress, but with the beginning of 1910 both began to forge ahead with a vigor and enterprise that renewed the doubt as to which would gain the supremacy. But in September, 1910, the Jameson townsite was swept by fire, and the backset which it thus received put its rival hopelessly in the lead.

A movement for the incorporation of Taft was started in April or May, 1910, and on November 8th of that year, at an election called by the county supervisors, the proposition carried by a rousing vote, and the following officers were elected: Trustees, H. W. Blaisdell, H. A. Hopkins, E. L. Burnham, J. W. Ragesdale and J. P. Dooley; marshal, E. G. Wood; clerk, Dr. Fred Bolstad. The trustees appointed T. J. O'Boyle recorder, and Fred Seybolt city attorney.

The Taft Public Utilities Company, the first corporation formed to serve the public in the new town, was incorporated in the fall of 1910. It shipped water from East Bakersfield by tank cars, pumped it to a couple of 1200-barrel tanks, and delivered it thence by gravity to the consumers. On February 1, 1911, the company's business and distributing system was sold to the Consumers' Water Company, a concern controlled by stockholders of the Western Water Company, which pumps water through a pipe line from wells located not far from Buena Vista lake in the trough of the valley.

The city is supplied with gas from the natural gas wells in the Buena Vista hills, and with electricity by the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation, whose transmission lines run through all the West Side fields.

In November, 1912, the town of Taft voted bonds in the sum of $41,000 for the construction of a sewer and a system of water mains for fire protection. The sewer was completed in June, 1913, and the fire mains and hydrants were put into service shortly thereafter. The city built a concrete jail at a cost of $1650 in 1911, and in the summer of 1913 completed a new $20,000 grammar school building. The concrete building used as a post office was built by popular subscription, and free sites were offered to the city for a school building and to the first church that would erect a house of worship. The Catholics were the first to accept the latter offer.

At the present time Taft is a well-built little city of about 3,000 people; has a good percentage of brick and concrete buildings; is well supplied with public utilities, as has been seen; has a daily paper, The Midway Driller, and a weekly oil paper, The Petroleum Reporter, edited by members of the Petroleum Club. Besides the Sunset Western railroad which connects it with Maricopa and Bakersfield, it has an auto stage line running to McKittrick, and is promised another running to Bakersfield. Within the last few weeks announcement has been made that an electric railroad will be built from Los Angeles through the Tejon pass and thence west and northwest through the Sunset, Midway and McKittrick fields. With all these facilities and with the rich and steadily increasing oil field about it, the future of Taft as this history is closed is very bright.

Fellows

Fellows first appeared on the map as a railroad terminal in 1908, when the Sunset Western railroad was extended from Pentland Junction, near Maricopa, to the northern portion of the Midway field. Nothing but a growing or diminishing pile of lumber and oil well supplies marked the spot, however, until the revival of interest in oil development in 1909 began to make it an important point for the unloading of supplies for the oil companies that began about that time to venture out into the upper part of the Midway valley. Then the Santa Fe, operating large oil properties in North Midway as the Chanslor-Canfield Oil Company, established headquarters at Fellows and made the place noteworthy by sparing enough of its expensively obtained domestic water to grow a row of cottonwood trees on the barren mesa. As the field developed Fellows became a modest trading point. James & Dooley established the first store in the place in 1910. Lawton & Blanck followed soon after with a similar establishment, in which was located the postoffice, and by the beginning of 1911 Fellows boasted two stores, a drug store, a billiard room, a livery stable and a liberal supply of saloons.

In the last two years Fellows has taken on an air of greater stability by the erection of better buildings, among which is a grammar school building that would do credit to a place of several times its age and number of inhabitants. The Fellows Courier, an enterprising weekly, has been established recently.

McKittrick

The town of McKittrick, which is the shipping and trading point for the oil fields of that name, is about forty miles west of Bakersfield. The earliest settlement at that place was called Asphalto, because of an asphalt mine located there in the early days, and the railroad, which was built to the field in 1891, still calls its station by the original name, although everyone else adopted the name McKittrick in 1895. The manufacture of asphaltum was the first industry of the town, and was the means of inducing the Southern Pacific to build a branch of its railroad to connect the place with Bakersfield. The railroad refined asphaltum under the name of the Standard Asphalt Company for some years. The first mail was distributed by Mrs. Quarra, but she did the work as a matter of accommodation and not as a government official. When H. F. Peters built the first store in 1900 he was appointed the first postmaster. Prior to this date A. Bandettini was conducting a hotel at McKittrick. The town was laid out as it now is in 1900.

With the general activity in oil development beginning in 1900 McKittrick began to grow, and it has been conspicuous among oil towns for the even prosperity it has enjoyed, although it never developed the booms which sent the population of Taft and Maricopa into the thousands.

McKittrick now has about 500 inhabitants. It was incorporated in September, 1911, with the following officers: Trustees, R. Butterfield, president; W. J. McCarthy, S. A. Hubbard, H. E. Phelan and Fred Ehlers; city clerk, Warren Bridges. The McKittrick Clarion dispenses the local news.

Lost Hills

The founding of the town of Lost Hills followed the discovery of the oil field of that name, the story of which is told in the chapters devoted to oil. Martin & Dudley, discoverers of the field, laid out a townsite on sections 2 and 3, township 27, range 21, the winter following the strike. G. T. Nighbert erected the first building, which was occupied by a restaurant conducted by Mrs. Hamilton, the first woman in the new town. Nighbert also built the first hotel and the first store building, the latter being leased to Crow & Cullen, who previously conducted the first mercantile business in Lost Hills in a tent.

With the development of the Lost Hills field the town has grown steadily until there are now about 200 residents, and all lines of business one would expect to find in a city of that size are represented. Excellent telephone service with the fields and with the outside world is afforded, there is a daily stage to Wasco, and bonds for a school house have been voted.

Two explanations of the origin of the name "Lost Hills" are at the discretion of the historian. One is that a traveler approaching the district from the east sees from a distance what appears to be a considerable elevation of land, but as he comes nearer the hills seem to fade away until, when he has actually reached them, they appear hardly higher than the surrounding land. The second explanation is that the low range of hills which bear the name has no apparent relation to the surrounding country and the man who named them may have humored the conceit that they had wandered away from the other foothills of the Coast range—from which they are many miles distant—and lost themselves on the desolate and uninhabited mesa.

As a matter of fact, the Lost Hills are formed by a very steep anticline which the wash of centuries has nearly covered with alluvial sands. But it required expensive drilling to ascertain this fact, and so it probably did not influence the selection of the name.

Towns of the Valley Farming Districts—Delano

The town of Delano had its beginning as a railroad terminal. On July, 1873, the Southern Pacific railroad, building from Oakland to Los Angeles, reached that point with its tracks, and work was suspended until August 6, 1874. During this interval of a year and fifteen days Delano was the end of the line, and freight to and from Bakersfield and all the valley and mountain districts south and even as far away as Inyo county, was hauled to Delano or from Delano by big ox- and mule-teams. For some weeks before and after these dates Delano was headquarters for the railroad grading and track-laying crews, and for many years thereafter it remained a favorite gathering place for itinerant sheep men at the spring and fall shearing times.

In addition to all these incentives to growth, Delano became the trading point for a large number of homesteaders who settled the fertile, sunny, attractive plains that spread between the railroad and the Sierra foot hills. The rainfall on these plains is scant, and the crops of wheat which the homesteaders raised were correspondingly meager, but the land was so easily tilled that one man with six horses and a gang plow could farm several hundred acres. As a result, Delano, a little later in its history, was an important wheat-shipping point. The more gradual development of the heavier lands to the west of the railroad brought a little more business to Delano. The organization of the Poso irrigation district, and the hope of getting gravity water from Kern river or from Poso creek nursed Delano's dreams of greatness for some years, and when both of these projects had to be abandoned, the town turned to the pumping plants.

Delano was the first place in the county to build air castles on a foundation of pump irrigation, but the somewhat greater depth to water than prevailed at Wasco and McFarland, and the fact that a series of dry years and low prices had left the wheat ranchers too poor to risk investments in unproven experiments delayed progress in the successful installation of pump irrigation.

It was not until 1908 that pump irrigation began to be a considerable factor in the development of Delano, but from that date on it grew steadily in importance, and those who are familiar with the soil and the water conditions expect to see Delano take rank among the most productive and prosperous farming sections of the country.

The first store in Delano was conducted by E. Chauvin, and stood nearly straight across the street from the railroad depot. Chauvin also was the first postmaster. The principal business houses of the earliest days faced the railroad, but in 1890 a fire swept most of them away, and the next street to the east took front rank in importance. The town now boasts two business streets, a fair number of brick buildings, a large grammar school building, a high school, opened in 1912, a bank, three churches, Baptist, Methodist and Catholic, two grain warehouses, and a weekly newspaper, the Delano Record.

Wasco

Wasco colony as founded in February, 1907, as the result of indirect efforts of the Kern county board of trade. The executive committee of the board, having failed of great success in the attempt to induce immigration, decided, during the previous year, to interest colonization agencies and let the latter do the hard work of getting in touch with the home-seeker. This endeavor resulted in the purchase of nine sections of land from the Kern County Land Company by the California Home Extension Association and the organization of the Fourth Home Extension Colony by M. V. Hartranft, manager. Capital to float the enterprise was supplied by the sale of bonds to prospective colonists, and these bonds were exchanged for land at a general meeting of the purchasers in February, 1907. At that meeting the land, which was laid out in 20-acre tracts and town lots, and duly appraised, was auctioned off to the bond holders. Choice tracts brought a small bonus above the appraisement, and this bonus was turned into a general improvement fund, the bonds being exchanged for the land at the appraised valuation.

The first settlers arrived on the colony March 1, 1907. While the land was under the Calloway canal it was sold without a water right, and a mutual water company was formed to sink wells and install pumping plants. In a year twenty-two wells were sunk and five pumping plants were in operation. As stated elsewhere, the need of economy prompted the purchase of second-hand engines, and the result was endless difficulty and a perennial shortage of water in time of need until years after, when the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation extended its power lines to the colony, electric motors were installed.

With more reliable power the complete success of pump irrigation was demonstrated, and Wasco soon developed into one of the most attractive farming sections of the county. All kinds of deciduous fruits and grapes were planted by the early colonists, but a large part of the land has been devoted at all times to the growing of alfalfa and general farm crops. The comparative small water lift and the easily tilled land make this practicable.

The discovery of the Lost Hills oil field in the summer of 1910 and the excitement that developed the following winter gave a great boost to Wasco as a trading point. All the supplies for the new field were unloaded from the Santa Fe railroad at Wasco and hauled thence about twenty-one miles by dirt road to where the wonderfully shallow wells were being brought in. Teams of eight, ten, twelve and sixteen horses speedily wore out the roads with their loads of derrick timbers and rig irons, and made exceedingly rough sledding for the whirring strings of automobiles that carried their loads of eager fortune seekers to the Lost Hills.

Wasco became a very necessary half-way house, and the business of its merchants trebled. Moreover, one of the more venturesome land owners began sinking a deep well in the colony itself, and persistent rumors that good oil indications were encountered prevailed. Nothing more developed, but before hope from this source was abandoned Harry Rambo and associates began drilling for oil at Semitropic, and Dr. A. H. Liscomb and a number of his friends started a similar effort still nearer Wasco not far from the Lost Hills road. Both these wells were started in the fall of 1912, and shortly after the first of the following year a considerable amount of excitement was created by report that light oil had been struck in the Liscomb well. Real estate prices jumped in Wasco and all the adjacent country on the strength of the report, but the strike did not materialize, and six months later the oil is still undiscovered, although the prospectors are not yet discouraged.

With or without oil, however, Wasco's future seems assured. Land in the colony is valued at $150 per acre with water, and at still higher prices with more improvements. The population of the town is about 300, and the business streets are well lined with brick and concrete buildings. A bank, four churches, a club hall and a fine new grammar school building are among the landmarks in the town. The colonists generally have built comfortable houses and an abundance of trees and vines add to the attractiveness of the place.

The Wasco News was established by J. L. Gill on November 25, 1911, and a year later was sold to Lawrence Lavers, the present proprietor.

Prior to the founding of Wasco colony the Santa Fe railroad maintained a station at that place under the name of Dewey. The depot, a store, a blacksmith shop and two saloons composed the town at the time the colony was launched.

Famoso

Famoso, on the Southern Pacific about midway between Bakersfield and Delano, took its place on the map as Poso station when the railroad was first built through the valley. The name was inherited from the creek which flows past the place in time of freshet, and the first postoffice was established there under that name. Mail intended for the residents, however, got mixed with that intended for Pozo, San Luis Obispo county, and the government changed the name to Spottiswood. The natives could see neither reason nor romance in Spottiswood, so a protest resulted in the adoption of the name Famoso, which is understood to mean the city of the rolling hills.

For many years the Kern County Land Company has maintained a large warehouse, stock yard and sheep-shearing camp at that place in connection with its Poso ranch, which adjoins the town on the west. In the earlier history of the town the business that developed twice a year during the spring and fall shearing seasons was a large factor in its commercial activity. The plains to the east of Famoso formerly were farmed to grain, and the Poso district achieved some fame by sending the first wheat to the San Francisco market every spring.

An ill-starred scheme to bring water from Poso creek by canal to irrigate the country to the east and north developed the fact that water was not available from that source and left the Poso irrigation district burdened with a heavy load of bonds and nothing to show for it save many miles of useless ditches. This unfortunate venture blocked the growth of Famoso down to the present time. Recently, however, promising efforts have been made to effect a mutually advantageous arrangement between the bond holders and the owners of the land, and it may be possible soon to clear the titles which have been clouded by unpaid bond assessments for nearly twenty years. Should this result materialize the Famoso district probably will take its place in the general march of progress with the country adjoining it on all sides.

The first store at Famoso was conducted by John Barrington, who was succeeded by J. S. Brooks. The latter previously had been station agent for the Southern Pacific. Brooks retired and left the mercantile field to C. E. Kitchen, who still occupies it with a general merchandise store and who also dispenses justice as a justice of the peace.

McFarland

McFarland colony and town were founded in the spring of 1908 by J. B. McFarland and W. F. Laird on land purchased by McFarland the year previous. Up to that time a siding on the Southern Pacific railroad known as Hunt was the only thing that distinguished the spot from any other part of the miles of bare and untilled plain between Delano and Famoso, but through the energy of McFarland and Laird water wells were sunk, pumping plants installed and colonists located on the land, and in a few months' time the place took on the character of a permanent settlement.

Most of the people who purchased land in McFarland had some capital, and the homes built and the other improvements made gave the colony from the start an appearance of prosperity and attractiveness. Ralph Kern opened the first grocery store early in 1908, and in the fall of that year he was appointed postmaster. The following year O. Woodard opened a general merchandise store and a hotel and lumber yard were established. In the same year the Associated Oil Company built its pipe line from the Kern river fields to San Francisco bay, and built one of its pumping stations at McFarland.

The McFarland colonists have made a specialty of dairying, and have been very successful. Good land and a low water lift have formed the basis for a thorough demonstration of the practicability of pump irrigation, and to McFarland, perhaps, belongs the honor of having first answered that question past all shadow of doubt. In five years the place has progressed from a tract of absolutely virgin land to a town of 300 people and a colony of over 100 pumping plants, with telephone, electric light and electric power service, a new railroad depot, a creamery, ice plant, bank, two churches, a four-room grammar school built at a cost of $12,000, and exceptionally attractive homes and prosperous fields and orchards. McFarland butter is noted for its quality and won a gold medal at the state fair in 1911. The town and colony are "dry," a clause having been inserted in the deeds to the land forbidding the sale of liquor thereon.

Other centers of farming development in the valley hardly ranking as towns are Rio Bravo, which is only a neighborhood of pioneer pump irrigators about fifteen miles west of Bakersfield; Button Willow, which is a shipping point and headquarters for the Miller & Lux ranches; Shafter, where the Kern County Land Company is just opening a townsite in connection with a subdivision of 7000 acres now being placed on the market; Rosedale, which was founded as the community center of Rosedale colony in 1889 and which is now holding its own with a country store, a school house and two churches, and Edison, which is the chief center of the new citrus industry just beginning on the mesa east of Bakersfield. At present Edison is only a little group of residences with a school house and a railroad station and unloading tracks, but it has reasonable prospects for a more important place in history later on.

Towns of the Mountain Section—Tehachapi

The first permanent settler in the Tehachapi region, according to the best memory of the oldest present residents, was John Moore Brite, who located in Tehachapi valley in the fall of 1854. Afterward he moved to the valley that now bears his name and built an adobe residence, in which he also kept a stock of groceries and miners' supplies to accommodate the scattered miners and stockmen who comprised the early population of the mountain district. This was the first store in the Tehachapi country.

The first of the Cuddebacks arrived soon after John M. Brite, and he settled first in what is now Brites' valley, moving later to the present site of Tehachapi.

The China hill placers were responsible for the first considerable immigration to the Tehachapi country. The hill turned out several thousand dollars in gold, and some of the miners made as much as $15 per day while the placers were at their best. Mining created a demand for lumber, which was supplied by whip-sawing the native pine logs.

According to the best authority, the first post office in the vicinity of Tehachapi was opened about 1870 by John Narboe, who lived in Narboe cañon on the stage line that ran to Havilah. Before Narboe's time the settlers got their mail from Los Angeles, when they or their neighbors went to that place for provisions. William Wiggins was the first postmaster at Old Town, and was also the first justice of the peace at that place.

One of the first Fourth of July celebrations that the traditions of Kern county record was held under a large oak tree near the present site of Tehachapi in 1856. Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Brite, Mrs. Smith and their families and a number of bachelor residents of the country helped to kindle the fires of patriotism in the new land. Red, white and blue calico decorations and a good dinner stand out among the enduring memories of the day.

Ed. Green opened the first store, in the original Tehachapi, later known as Old Town, after Squire Wiggins became postmaster there, and a little later a man by name of Murphy, who had started a store a little distance away, moved his establishment into the embryo city. Ed. Green succeeded to the office of postmaster and retained it for many years.

W. C. Wiggins taught the first school in Old Town in 1861. The name of his successor is not recorded, but the third teacher was "Doc" Dozier. In May, 1867, Miss Louisa Jewett, afterward Mrs. Crites, began a term of several months in a log cabin that had been built for a school house about half way between Brites' valley and Old Town. Miss Jackson followed Miss Jewett, and later the old log school house was abandoned for a new building in Old Town. As the country settled up schools were started in Brites, Cummings and Bear valleys.

Uncle Jimmie Williams built the first hotel in Old Town and also started a blacksmith shop, livery stable and feed corrals to care for the travellers and teamsters who passed that way between Los Angeles and the San Joaquin valley. Prior to the building of the Southern Pacific railroad a large amount of teaming was carried on by way of Old Town, and it became quite a busy and hopeful little town.

But in the summer of 1876 the railroad was built through Tehachapi pass, and changes began to take place in the map. Tehachapi, meaning "the crow's nest," was located about three miles west of the site of the present town, in the edge of the hills. But the railroad chose the level land over which to run its tracks and on which to build its station. Anticipating the coming of the railroad a settlement had sprung up about a mile west of the present Tehachapi station under the name of Greenwich, so called in honor of P. D. Green, who kept the post office there. The railroad founded the new town of Tehachapi, taking the name of the older place in the hills, which struggled against fate for a time, came to be known as Old Town and finally capitulated to the power of modern transportation. Greenwich promptly moved itself to the railroad's townsite, and Green took his post office there. For a time the office continued under the name of Greenwich, but in the end it was changed to Tehachapi, and the name Greenwich survived only as the designation of a voting precinct.

While the post office was at Greenwich, William N. Cuddeback, then but a boy, carried the mail on muleback, furnishing his own mule. P. D. Green was elected justice of the peace at Tehachapi and Charles A. Lee, afterward county recorder, succeeded him as postmaster.

The first store in Tehachapi (New Town) was owned by J. E. Prewett, now judge of the superior court of Placer county. The second store was built by S. Alexander, who had been a clerk for Hirshfeld Brothers at Old Town. The exodus from Old Town soon became general. Hirshfeld Brothers closed their store there, and Isidor Asher, another of their clerks, moved the remainder of the stock to Tehachapi, where he opened a business on his own account.

Many of the residents of Old Town brought their houses with them when they moved down to the railroad. Mr. and Mrs. Kessing and Mrs. Mary Anne Haig moved in from "Camp 7," and established the first eating house in the new town. Soon after Mrs. Haig opened the first rooming house, Jack Eveleth built the first hotel, which stood on the corner opposite the depot.

In 1875 a school was established in a log cabin at Greenwich, but when the new town got under way it followed the shifting center of population and was housed in a two-story frame building erected for the purpose. This school house did duty until 1901, when it was moved south of the railroad track, made into a hotel, and its place was taken by a $10,000, three-room, brick building.

The Catholics built a church early in the history of the mountain town, and the Protestant denominations united in the construction of a union church.

At the present time Tehachapi has a population of about 600. It was incorporated by an election held on August 13, 1910, at which time T. P. Sullivan, John Hickey, J. M. Jackley, H. S. Downs and Fred Snider were elected as the first board of trustees; E. V. Reed, first city clerk; C. V. Barnard, first marshal, and C. O. Lee, first city treasurer. John Hickey is now the president of the board of trustees.

In 1912 Tehachapi voted bonds to the amount of $14,000 and constructed a public water system consisting of wells and pumping plants which furnish an abundant supply of good water.

Twice Tehachapi has been almost destroyed by fire, but each time it has been pluckily rebuilt in more substantial form.

For years after it was founded Tehachapi was only a trading point for stockmen and miners scattered through the hills and mountains, and a stopping place for the through travel over the pass. Then the fertile valleys began to be tilled, and it became a shipping point for grain, hay, wool and stock. The early settlers, however, planted little family orchards of apple and pear trees, and within the past five or six years experienced horticulturists have noted the excellence of the fruit from these trees and have established what promises to be a very thriving and profitable industry. In the past two years the acreage planted to fruit trees in the Tehachapi and other valleys has greatly increased, and while the young orchards are not yet old enough to have demonstrated their producing qualities, the growth of the trees is very satisfactory, and the orchardists are satisfied to trust the matter of fruitfulness to the evidence furnished by the old, family orchard trees.

As an evidence of its faith in the future of Tehachapi as an apple country Kern county this summer waged a successful campaign for the election of Miss Ruby Brite as queen of the Watsonville apple carnival, an annual festival in which all the apple-growing sections of the state participate and in which they all compete for the honor of naming the queen.

Glennville

Linns valley was named for William Lynn who came to what is now Kern county in 1854 with his partner, George Ely. Like nearly everyone else who came here in those days they were attracted by the mines, but unlike most of the early miners they turned to agriculture and stock-raising instead of following the rainbow of fortune to the next mining camp. Eventually Lynn returned to the east, but Ely lived out his days on a farm which he homesteaded in the fertile valley, and was finally buried there.

David Lavers arrived in Linns valley in the spring of 1855, and soon afterward located on the farm where he still resides, a short distance above Glennville. In 1857 came the Glenn, Reed and Ellis families. Glennville was named for Martin Glenn, who took up a farm close to where the present town of Glennville stands. The first house in the town, an adobe, was built by Thomas Fitzgerald, and the first store was opened by Reed & Wilkes.

Throughout its history thus far stock-raising, together with a small amount of farming in the mountain valleys and meadows, has been the main support of Glennville, although the prospector and his burro have been familiar sights along the roads thereabout through all the years, and some business is brought to the town by summer campers seeking the cool and beauty of the mountains.

Woody

The little foothill town of Woody took its name from S. W. Woody, one of the early pioneers of the mountain section. A school teacher by name of Gurnell was the first postmaster, and he was succeeded by Thomas Hopper, who opened the first store.

Mining and stock-raising have been Woody's chief industries, and although the latter finally displaced the former, interest still remains in the gold ledges, and Woody residents insist that the old mines will again be worked.

In 1891 Joseph Weringer opened the Greenback copper mine and founded the town of Weringdale a quarter of a mile above the old Woody store. This copper mine is now showing promising ore, carrying some gold and silver with the copper. Weringer is working day and night shifts and expects soon to begin shipping ore in quantity.

Kernville

Kernville is the successor of the early mining camp which was famous over the state at one time as Whiskey Flat. It lies on the west bank of the North Fork of Kern river about four miles above its junction with the South Fork. Kernville discarded the picturesque but undignified name of Whiskey Flat in 1864. The first store in the place was founded by Curtis & Davis in 1863, and Mrs. Carmel taught the first school, which was conducted in a private residence. The post office was established in 1864 with Adam Hamilton as postmaster.

The Big Blue mine was the greatest factor in the early prosperity of Kernville, but in later years the farms and stock ranches of the mountain valley have maintained its business activity at a steady though not a killing pace. In 1883 fire destroyed a part of the business section of the town and many dwellings. N. P. Peterson, who lost a hotel and several dwelling houses, was one of the largest sufferers in the fire.

Kernville has a good grammar school, a Methodist church, a daily stage to Caliente and telephone communication with the outside world via the same place. The store of A. Brown Company carries a very complete stock of general merchandise.

Isabella

Isabella, at the junction of the South and North Forks of Kern river, was laid out in 1892 by Stephen Barton on a portion of his homestead. G. W. King conducted the first store and was the first postmaster. The place numbers about fifty residents, has a grammar school, a Methodist church, and a justice of the peace who represents the third branch of government for the surrounding mountain district.

Weldon

At Weldon, ten miles above Isabella on the South Fork, the A. Brown Company has a store and keeps the postoffice.

Onyx

Onyx, four miles above Weldon, boasts only a postoffice in a private residence.

Bodfish

Bodfish is a little hamlet at the foot of Hot Springs hill. For many years it was only a post office at the home of Mrs. Vaughn, the postmistress. In 1896 John Cross opened a store and stage office. There is a country grammar school at the place, and three miles distant, on Kern river, is the plant of the Pacific Light & Power Corporation.

Havilah

The history of Havilah is told in chapter three, along with that of the other early mining districts and in chapters six and seven where the story of its decline and the rise of Bakersfield as the dominant center of the county's development is recounted. Today, Havilah is little more than a memory, and its memory is best honored by letting the curtain fall over the years of its decline after it lost its gallant fight to retain the county seat and its people began moving not only their household goods but their houses as well to the more vigorous and promising city on the plain.

Caliente

Caliente was established first as a railroad grading camp when the Southern Pacific railroad began its long job of building its roadbed up the hills of Tehachapi. The town is located almost in the edge of the hills where the cañon of Caliente creek widens out into a little valley. About this point the railroad grade begins its difficult climbing, and the track makes great curves back and forth that afford the traveller recurring views of the town from different elevations as he looks out from a car window, climbing or descending.

Stage lines and mail carriers leave Caliente for Havilah, Kernville and other mountain points, and the town is the first shipping point for a great mountain section. One or two fires and a flood last summer that filled the streets with mud and washed two or three light houses from their foundations are among the few events that have varied the slow but even growth of the little village.

Towns of the Desert—Randsburg

Randsburg, in the extreme eastern part of the county, is the principal trading point for the Rand mining district, which was organized at a meeting of miners held on December 20, 1895. John Singleton presided. A resolution was adopted naming the district after the famous Rand of South Africa, and E. B. McGinnis was elected the first mining recorder. The great Yellow Aster, the largest gold mine in the state, located by John Singleton, C. A. Burcham and Fred M. Moores, was first called the Rand mine, its name being changed in 1897, when the Yellow Aster Mining & Milling Company was organized.

W. C. Wilson, who had been conducting a general store in Mojave, moved to Randsburg and opened a like establishment at the beginning of the excitement in the new camp. D. C. Kuffel was his first manager. The building first occupied was vacated in 1896, and a larger building, 28 by 80 feet in size, was moved from Garlock. S. J. Montgomery built the second store soon after, and both establishments, together with practically the whole of the town, were wiped out by fire in 1897.

In 1898 a railroad was built from Kramer to Johannesburg, about a mile distant from Randsburg, but prior to that time everything the Rand mining district wanted from the outside world had to be hauled fifty miles by team from Mojave.

The post office was established at Randsburg in 1895 with Fred Moores as the first post master. At the first miners' meeting in 1895 thirty-three votes were cast, but so rapidly did the new camp acquire fame and population that a year later the number of votes at a similar meeting was 687. In the fall of 1896 the St. Elmo hotel was built, only to be burned in the big fire the next June. Twice since 1897 fire has swept the mining town.

The first school was established in 1897. In April, 1901, the present school building was built at a cost of $3500.

Randsburg now has a population of about 1000, and is the metropolis of the greatest mining district in the state in the value of its output. The principal mines are the world-famous Yellow Aster, the Consolidated Mining Company's properties, the Little Butte, the King Solomon group, the Baltic and the G. B. Mining Company's group.

Just at present Randsburg is being given a boost by the introduction of electric light and power by the Southern Sierras Power Company, the installation of dry crushing, the cyaniding of raw ore and the starting up of some of the larger placer mines. The town is supplied with water by the Randsburg Water Company, which pipes it from Squaw and Mountain springs.

Johannesburg

Johannesburg, a mile south of Randsburg, was founded in the fall of 1897 and the spring of 1898, it is said by Chauncey M. Depew and associates, who bought a half section of school land, laid out the townsite and built the railroad connecting it with the Santa Fe main line at Kramer, expecting that the new and thriving camp of Randsburg would move over to the railroad en masse. In this hope they were disappointed, and the Johannesburg railroad was sold to the Santa Fe.

The founders of the town piped water from Mountain spring, and this system later was combined with the Randsburg water system, which had its supply from Squaw springs.

Johannesburg boasts the Johannesburg Reduction Works, known as the Red Dog, a custom mill, built in 1897; the Santa Ana, the Pioneer and the Windy.

Mojave

The town of Mojave was established by the Southern Pacific railroad when it laid its tracks through the desert in 1876. The first store was built by a man named Moon, and Mrs. Morrissey opened the Morrissey hotel, which was the first hostelry. Robert Charlton was the first postmaster. W. C. Wilson, at one time county auditor, conducted a general merchandise store at Mojave for some years.

Up to the present time the railroad has been the chief reason for the existence of the town. It is situated at the foot of the climb from the south to the top of Tehachapi pass, and is therefore a convenient place for coupling and uncoupling helper engines. It is now the end of an oil pipe line carrying fuel oil over the Tehachapi mountains for the use of the railroads. Mojave also has been the shipping point for borax hauled from Borax lake and Death valley. The beds at Borax lake were discovered by John Searles of Skilling & Searles, who for many years have hauled the product across the desert sands to Mojave with 20-mule teams, taking fifteen days for the round trip.

During the early days of the Randsburg mining boom Mojave was the point at which miners and their provisions and materials left the railroad, and the trade so produced helped the town to prosper until the railroad was built to Johannesburg. The building of the Los Angeles aqueduct gave Mojave another temporary boom.

For many years some mining has been carried on in the country tributary to Mojave, and recently satisfactory results have been obtained in developing water for pump irrigation in the vicinity of the town. The desert lands are rich and adapted to cultivation if a sufficient supply of water for irrigation can be obtained, and on the experiments in this line may depend Mojave's ultimate prosperity or adversity.

During the past year a refinery has been built at Mojave for extracting some of the lighter elements from the oil that is piped over the mountains, the residue being as valuable for fuel as the native oil, and the part taken out selling for enough to make a very substantial reduction in the railroad's fuel bill.

Two churches and a good grammar school are among Mojave's public assets.

Rosamond

Rosamond is a station on the Southern Pacific fourteen miles south of Mojave, near the southern line of the county. The first store was opened about 1888 by a man by name of Hyde and Miss Sarah Hayes. C. P. Sutton was the first postmaster and was succeeded by E. S. Waite, Charles Graves and Miss Kinton, in the order named. Ike Boyles ran the first hotel, and Miss Kate Titus taught the first school. It was kept up for two seasons by private subscription, but not until 1908 were there enough children to warrant the establishment of a school district.

Rosamond was named for a daughter of one of the Southern Pacific railroad officials.

Henry A. Jarrico

BIOGRAPHICAL

HENRY A. JASTRO.—A record of the life of Henry A. Jastro is in many respects an epitome of the progress of Kern county. So long has been his identification with this great region and so intimate his association with local development that, viewing the remarkable transformation wrought within his memory, he may well exclaim, "All of which I saw and part of which I was." Great as has been his business activity, bringing to him prominence and prestige throughout the entire United States, it is as supervisor that the people of his home county know him best and regard him with the deepest affection. Through the period of more than twenty years measuring his service as a member of the board of supervisors, to which he was chosen by a large majority at each election and as invariably made chairman of the board, mind and heart have been engrossed in the well-being of the county. Evidence of his unusual ability as a financier appears in the fact that Kern county is operated on a cash basis with the lowest tax rate in the state, yet there have been erected quite recently a county high school and hall of records, an addition to the county hospital doubling its capacity, and a courthouse that ranks among the finest in the state; also, the Kern River bridge, one of the longest bridges in the state, built of reinforced concrete. Each of these buildings and structures is attractive in architecture, substantial in construction, modern in equipment and convenient in interior arrangement, each in a word a model of its kind, yet such was the skill of the supervisors as financiers, under the leadership of their chairman, that the enormous tasks were completed amicably and economically without taint of graft or criticism of extravagance. The courthouse in particular has attracted architects from distant points, for its pronounced excellence invites a close inspection on the part of all associated with the architecture of public buildings. The plans of the supervisors did not end with construction work, but include the ultimate transformation of the courthouse grounds into a bower of horticultural beauty unsurpassed in the valley of the San Joaquin.

Born in Germany in 1850, Henry A. Jastro was thirteen years of age when he accompanied his family from Germany to America. Later he came alone to California by way of Panama and after landing in San Francisco traveled from there by stage to Los Angeles. With youthful enthusiasm he threw himself into the task of earning a livelihood in a strange country, far from the friends of earlier days. For a time he engaged in freighting to Arizona. Another task was that of working with cattle and sheep between Wilmington and Catalina Islands. In the meantime he was learning much concerning the great undeveloped resources of the state. During 1870 he saw Bakersfield for the first time. The now flourishing city was a small hamlet, comprising a primitive collection of cabins and offering little inducement to the ordinary settler. But Mr. Jastro was then as he is now an optimist concerning the country. From the first he realized its possibilities and foresaw its future growth, although not realizing at the time that oil and natural gas would form the secret of such development. Subsequent events have deepened his faith in Kern county and he is now a "veritable encyclopedia" concerning its resources. In his opinion the discoveries of oil and natural gas are the greatest benefits California has ever received, not excepting gold. With the advent of natural gas in Bakersfield, pipes were laid to convey it to San Francisco and Los Angeles; while it is not inferior to manufactured gas for illuminating purposes, it has the advantage of a greater heat unit. After oil had given the state cheap fuel, California jumped from the twenty-fifth place in manufacturing to the eleventh, and Mr. Jastro believes that within a few years it will rank fourth or fifth among the manufacturing states. In his estimation this will come through the establishment of cotton and woolen factories. Already cotton is being produced in large quantities in the state, while sheep always will be raised on lands adapted for no other purpose than grazing.

Through his marriage to Miss May E. Baker, who died in 1894, Mr. Jastro became allied with a notable family of Kern county, for his father-in-law, Col. Thomas Baker, is remembered in the annals of local history as the founder of Bakersfield. A son, Harry A., and two daughters were born of the union. One of the daughters, now residing at Albuquerque, N. M., is the wife of M. O. Chadbourne, son of Colonel Chadbourne, of San Francisco. Since the death of his wife Mr. Jastro has made his home with his widowed daughter, Mrs. May Greer, in a comfortable home in Bakersfield, and he is seldom away from the city except at such times as the demands of his large business interests necessitate his presence elsewhere. His identification with Messrs. Carr and Haggin, the predecessors of the Kern County Land Company, began in 1874, four years after his location in Bakersfield. From that time to the present, excepting a period of about four years from 1886 to 1890, he has become more and more a power in the profitable development of this close corporation, comprising the estate of Lloyd Tevis (represented by William S. Tevis) and the holdings of J. B. Haggin, now of New York. Stockdale, one of the company's great ranches, is the seat of the Tevis home. The tropical splendors of this ranch defy any description. One of the most unusual attractions is a bamboo forest, where the bamboo by actual measurement has grown twenty-five inches in twenty-four hours. The hothouse contains rare plants and the artificial lake is stocked with rare water fowl, while grottoes and fountains add to the charm of the ranch.

A colonization scheme by the manager of the company failed signally in 1903. Mr. Jastro, who had been with the company for nineteen years in different capacities, was chosen manager. The properties over which he has absolute control include four hundred and sixty thousand acres in California, six hundred and ten thousand acres in New Mexico, one hundred thousand acres in Arizona, and two hundred and twenty-five thousand acres in Mexico. An extensive irrigation scheme has been installed by the general manager on the San Pedro river in Arizona and this will irrigate ten thousand acres. The site of the government Elephant Butte dam in New Mexico is on forty thousand acres formerly held by the company, but taken over by the government on an equitable basis. Water from the reclamation project will be used on the company land.

As early as 1885 this company attempted to raise cotton and in that year they raised the first big crop of cotton ever grown in California. The product was of very fine quality, but labor conditions made the venture a failure. In order to secure the required number of cotton pickers they imported negroes, but they did not remain. Next they tried Chinamen, but cotton picking requires long fingers and the short Chinese fingers tore the staple. The industry was then abandoned. At the present time alfalfa and grain are the principal crops, but citrus and deciduous fruits and vines are raised, while in stock they have good success with every department, cattle, horses, mules, sheep and hogs. In Bakersfield and on the ranches the manager has established machine and wagon shops, warehouses, supply departments and tinshops, besides which he has built canals and waterworks. The cattle are raised in Arizona and New Mexico, then brought to Kern county for fattening on alfalfa or corn and chopped hay. Enough beef is produced to supply regularly eighty thousand people. The stock business conducted upon such an enormous scale calls for rare abilities, but the general manager has proved equal to every emergency and has displayed a sagacity, keen discrimination and wise foresight seldom equalled.

The fact that Mr. Jastro is a staunch Democrat has made no difference to the people in their solicitude to secure his public services. Republicans have displayed as much enthusiasm for him as supervisor as have the Democrats and during the great Roosevelt landslide in 1904, when the county gave a great Republican majority, he received a flattering majority for supervisor on the Democratic ticket. In fact, the people have divorced politics from public service in their desire for his able assistance in public affairs and in this respect they resemble Mr. Jastro himself, for one of his hobbies is the divorcing of trade relations and civic progress from politics. Five times elected president of the National Live Stock Association (the last time at Phoenix, Ariz., in January of 1913), in that office he has made a study of the tariff question in connection with the hides and wool schedule. It is his belief that the commerce of our country will not much longer permit itself to be a prey to political vicissitudes. As a remedial agency he favors the appointment of a board of tariff commissioners on a non-partisan basis, such board to be continuously in session and have the power to adjust the tariff duties as occasion may demand. The action of President Taft in appointing tariff commissioners he regards as a step in the right direction. As a member of the state board of agriculture of which he was president for three terms his able services have been given to the uplifting of the farmer, whose interests he believes to be second to none in importance if the permanent prosperity of our commonwealth is to be conserved. In every post of honor accepted by him he has given dignified and noteworthy service. With his commanding presence and magnetic personality, he is equally a power among the greatest captains of industry in the country and among the humbler workers of life's great field. His name ever will stand at the very forefront in the annals of Kern county and in the history of the stock industry throughout the west.

PETER GARDETTE.—A record of the life of Peter Gardette is in many respects an epitome of the agricultural development of Kern county, whither he came at a period so early that no county organization had yet been effected and few emigrants had endeavored to surmount the sufferings incident to existence on plains undeveloped, unsettled and often drought-stricken. The tenacity of purpose which characterized him is exhibited in his fearless attempt to aid in the huge task of pioneer development. While he knew little of frontier hardships, he had learned to be persistent in labor and self-reliant in action, and every former association of his busy life had qualified him for pioneering. Born near Danzig, Prussia, December 22, 1825, he had attended a school of navigation in youth and then had followed the sea for a livelihood. During 1851 the ship on which he was employed sailed around the Horn and came up the Pacific to San Francisco. The influx of emigrants had not lessened since the first excitement caused by the discovery of gold. Swept away from former plans by the contagion of large throngs making for the mines, he left his ship at San Francisco, although he did not follow the general example in trying his luck at the mines. Instead he spent a winter in San Francisco. It was a season of great excitement. Not the least important of his experiences there was a participation in fighting the great fire of that winter which almost destroyed the city. Shortly afterward he left the city for the mines of Mariposa county and in April, 1854, when the first excitement was aroused through the discovery of gold at Keyesville, then in Tulare county, he followed the rush of travel to the new camp.

It was the privilege of Mr. Gardette to witness the organization of Kern county and to be one of the very first citizens admitted by naturalization papers, this being about 1866. In partnership with Judge Sayles, later of Fresno, now deceased, he started a general store on Greenhorn mountain at the present site of the camp of the forest supervisors. Within ten miles of the store he located a homestead on Poso Flat, where he began to raise cattle and sheep. His brand, the capital letter "S," was the very first to be recorded in Kern county and is now used by his son, Henry B., who continues the stock business at the old homestead. A log cabin was built on the claim as early as 1859 and in it the pioneer stockman kept bachelor's hall for some time. Eventually his means permitted him to provide better accommodations and in 1871 he erected a frame house that still stands. Meanwhile he had put in a valuable irrigation system for his own use and had purchased adjacent land, so that five hundred and twenty acres were devoted to grain and alfalfa. When his children began to need educational advantages he erected a residence on the corner of F and Twenty-first streets, Bakersfield, and there the family maintained their headquarters, although much of his time continued to be spent upon the ranch until his final retirement from heavy manual work. It was not until 1905 that he relinquished the management of the ranch into the hands of his son, Henry B., and thereupon he retired to private life, spending his last days quietly in Bakersfield, where he died May 19, 1911, at the family residence.

The marriage of Peter Gardette occurred in San Francisco March 24, 1871, and united him with Miss Agnes E. A. Weber, a native of Dresden, Saxony, and a daughter of Henry and Augusta W. (Otto) Weber. Her father followed the occupation of a builder and both he and his wife remained in Saxony until their death. During young womanhood Mrs. Gardette left her home in Germany and came via Panama to California in 1868, settling at Visalia. Three years later she became the wife of Mr. Gardette and accompanied him to the ranch in Kern county. Since the death of her husband she has continued to reside in Bakersfield and has superintended her business matters with quiet, keen capability, one of her undertakings having been the building, with her son, Henry B., of the Kern Valley garage on the corner of L and Eighteenth streets. For years she has been identified with the Kern County Pioneer Society, to which Mr. Gardette also belonged, he having been at the time of his demise one of the very oldest settlers of the county. In religion she is of the Episcopalian faith, while he was reared in the Lutheran denomination and always adhered to its doctrines and creed. Their family consists of four children, of whom one daughter, Margaret D., is a successful teacher in the Bakersfield schools; a son, Henry B., continues at the old home ranch; Mrs. Mildred Munsey is a resident of Bakersfield, and the younger son, Helmuth C., follows the occupation of an electrical engineer in Los Angeles.

W. S. WILHELM.—The president and general manager of the Maricopa Queen Oil Company is an Iowan by birth and was born in Muscatine October 16, 1864, being a son of Samuel and Elizabeth (Christ) Wilhelm. The lineage of the family is traced back to worthy Teutonic progenitors. Very early in the colonization of America members of the family crossed the ocean from Germany and identified themselves with the material upbuilding of the new country. Later generations became pioneers of Iowa. The Muscatine branch of the family had little means, but possessed worth of character and nobility of purpose. In the midst of discouragements and poverty they retained their devotion to the higher principles of life. It was not possible for W. S. to attend school with any regularity, yet he has become a man of the broadest information and widest culture. Brought up to a life of hard work on a farm, when only fourteen years of age he engaged in cutting wood at sixty cents a cord. By such work he supported himself in the months of winter. The summer seasons were given to farming. The sterling qualities of industry and thrift instilled in his mind during youth have stood him in good stead through his subsequent career. For a time in young manhood he was connected with the secret service of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad in Missouri. While employed in that state he met and married Miss Dora J. Duncan, a cultured woman who in every way has promoted his success and enhanced his happiness. Seven children blessed their union and they still remain to brighten the elegant and attractive family residence in Long Beach.

E. M. Roberts

For two years after his marriage Mr. Wilhelm engaged in farming in Missouri, but later he removed to Colorado and interested himself in mining. By slow degrees he rose to wealth. Important interests were acquired not only in Colorado, but also in Idaho, Montana and Nevada. Since coming to California and establishing a home in Long Beach he has devoted much of his time to the interests of the Maricopa Queen Oil Company, of which he is president and general manager. The company has the distinction of owning an exceedingly valuable lease, comprising twenty acres on section 32, township 12, range 23, in the Sunset-Midway field. There are now seven wells on the lease and two of these flow from fifteen hundred to two thousand barrels per day. In the development of this important lease Mr. Wilhelm has used his large means lavishly and the returns have fully justified his most sanguine expectations. In addition to his holdings previously mentioned he has valuable mining properties in the west and considerable oil property in Texas.

COL. E. M. ROBERTS.—Martial valor has been a leading characteristic of the Roberts family during the entire period of its known history, which in America dates from the colonial period of Virginian settlement and reveals a record of patriotic devotion guided by a high order of intelligence. It is worthy of note that not only the Colonel's paternal grandfather, but likewise his maternal grandfather, Adam Harber, served under General Jackson in the memorable battle of New Orleans during the war of 1812 and gave loyal service to the country throughout that historic struggle. Of English birth and honorable Anglo-Saxon lineage, Mr. Harber had immigrated to the new world during young manhood, settled upon a plantation in Tennessee and married a southern lady. Their daughter, Annie Aletha, a native of Tennessee and a lifelong resident of that state, became the wife of H. B. Roberts, who was born in North Carolina. While still a young woman she passed away, leaving a family of three sons and one daughter, the eldest son, E. M., having been born at Chapelhill, Marshall county, Tenn., September 11, 1843. After the death of the mother the children were taken to Missouri in 1849 by their father, who settled in Springfield in the midst of a vast tract of unimproved acreage. Being a skilled mechanic he opened a blacksmith's shop and there he made the first moldboard plow ever seen in Springfield. With this he turned the first furrows in the soil of his raw land. The other settlers, seeing the success of his invention, engaged him to manufacture similar implements for their use. The first decade of his residence in Missouri brought him gratifying success and, had fate spared him for later usefulness, he would have gained financial prosperity. Through all of his life a resident of the south, in sympathy with its institutions, devoted to its people and attached to its policies, he naturally embraced the Confederate side at the opening of the Civil war. At the very outset he enlisted under General Price, but it was not his destiny to see the defeat of the Southern flag. Near the close of the year 1861, while in active service, he died in Springfield at the age of forty-five years.

Among the memories of childhood days treasured in the mind of Colonel Roberts are those associated with the removal of the family from Tennessee to Missouri when he was six years of age. In company with a train of emigrants comprising probably thirty teams he and other members of his family journeyed in their own wagon drawn by oxen and crossed the Mississippi at St. Louis in a ferry run by horsepower. The frontier of Missouri was the environment of his boyhood. The country was new and settlers few, so that schools were widely scattered. About two or three months of each year a subscription school was held six miles from his home and to it he walked each day. Notwithstanding the handicap of limited education he became a man of broad information and fine mental attainments. During the opening year of the Civil war he lost his father, and the example of that gallant Confederate soldier led him to enlist in the Southern army. During 1862, when scarcely nineteen years of age, he enlisted in Company A, Third Regiment of Missouri Cavalry, under Col. Dick Campbell, of Springfield, Mo., remaining at the front until he gave up his arms at Shreveport, La., in June of 1865. Among the engagements in which he bore a part were those of Pea Ridge, Cain Springs, Saline River, Prairie Grove, Poison Springs, Hartville (where he had a horse shot under him), Camden and Pine Bluff, all in Arkansas, besides which he fought in Price's raid, where six weeks were given to continuous skirmishing, including the battles of Iron Mountain, Jefferson City, Herman, Little Blue and Big Blue, Brush Creek, Helena, Little Rock and Granby, Ark.

During the battle of Saline River the young Southern soldier served as an orderly for General Shelby. Many years later, when the General was serving as United States Marshal of Missouri and had engaged a negro lad to act as deputy, Colonel Roberts met his old commander and inquired about the deputy. General Shelby replied that the boy's father and mother took care of and saved his family from danger during the Civil war and the gratitude which he felt caused him to recognize the undoubted worth of their son. Returning home at the close of the war, Colonel Roberts visited there for a month and then went to Kansas City in search of employment, landing there without a dollar. His first position, which he held for four years, was that of assistant in a saw mill at $33.33 per month. When he left the place he had saved an amount sufficient to buy one hundred and sixty acres near Paola, Miami county, Kansas, and to that location he moved, beginning there in agricultural undertakings that continued with fair success until the grasshoppers in 1874 completely destroyed his crop. With such funds as he could secure from the disaster he came to California in September, 1874, and settled at Oakland, where he formed a partnership in the butcher business. There he not only lost the balance of his money, but was left in debt. Beginning anew he became buyer for H. M. Ames. Six months later he paid the last of his debts, besides which he had been able to buy a span of horses, harness and wagon. With $20 in cash and his team, accompanied by his wife and child, he came to the San Joaquin country in April of 1876. On the first of May he arrived in Kern county and located on one hundred and sixty acres of railroad land, which he improved with such success that the railroad company charged him $10 an acre for the place, an excessive amount for those days. One year after coming to the valley he became superintendent of canal work for the Kern County Land Company (later known as Haggin & Co.), and in addition he had the contract for building the Beardsley canal of thirty miles and the McCord canal of fifteen miles. With a partner, W. H. Brand, he built twenty-five miles of the Calloway canal and the East Side canal of twenty-seven miles. Under his direction about sixteen sections of desert land were reclaimed for the Kern County Land Company, and after ditches had been dug and the land brought under irrigation, settlers could legally prove up on claims.

The trials of frontier existence are indicated by the fact that when Colonel Roberts began to farm in Kern county he and his wife lived in a brush shed for a time, then occupied a log cabin and next had to content themselves with a box-house 12x15. Finally, however, his increasing prosperity was evidenced by the erection of a two-story residence of ten rooms, considered the finest farm house in the entire county in its day. Besides raising fine horses and mules extensively, he had one hundred milch cows comprising one of the largest dairy herds in the county. From time to time he added to his ranch until he owned three hundred and thirty-one acres under cultivation to alfalfa and fitted for the stock industry and dairy business through valuable improvements. During March of 1909 he sold the ranch at an excellent figure and removed to Bakersfield, where he owns and occupies a commodious residence at No. 2402 L street. In addition he owns about twenty houses in Bakersfield and a ranch of one hundred and twenty acres in the county, besides being interested in oil lands. Throughout his long identification with the San Joaquin valley he has favored every enterprise for its development. From early life a Democrat, staunch in his adherence to party principles, he has been a local leader and for sixteen years or more has served as chairman of the Kern county Democratic central committee. For seven years he was a member of the board of supervisors and during four years of that time he officiated as its chairman. The congressional and state central committees of his party have had the benefit of his ripened judgment and intense devotion to party tenets. At the time of the election of Governor Gage he was the Democratic nominee for state senator in a district that gives a customary Republican majority of five hundred. Notwithstanding the fact that the Republicans received an overwhelming majority at that election he was defeated by only thirty-two votes, which in itself furnishes a tribute to his popularity and high standing in the district. The Bakersfield Board of Trade for years has had his name upon its membership roll and other organizations for local progress have enjoyed the aid of his splendid citizenship. Fraternally he is identified with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Ancient Order of United Workmen.

While living in Kansas City, Mo., Colonel Roberts married Miss Lydia Eaton, who was born in Ontario, Canada, and descended directly from Sir Francis Eaton of England, who crossed the ocean to Plymouth as a passenger on the historic Mayflower. The family owned a large estate in England; but the American descendants were never able to secure their share of the property. Three children of Colonel and Mrs. Roberts are now living and all reside in Bakersfield, viz.: Mrs. Maude Davis, Mrs. Daisy Pyle and Herbert. The older son, Lynn, enlisted in the Sixth California Regiment at the opening of the Spanish-American war and died in the service while stationed with his company at San Francisco.

W. W. KAYE.—The senior member of the law firm of Kaye & Siemon, who is also widely known as one of the most scholarly men of Kern county and one of the leading representatives of the Bakersfield bar, came to the west from Iowa. On a farm near Riverside, Washington county, that state, where he was born June 26, 1869, and where he spent the first seventeen years of his life, his parents, Jesse I. and Anna L. (Kling) Kaye, labored with self-sacrificing devotion to provide a livelihood for their family. While still in the midst of the struggle the father died on the home farm. The mother, who was a native of Pennsylvania, but a resident of Iowa throughout all of her active life, was privileged to reap the reward of her patient industry, and now, at the age of eighty-four years, is passing her declining days at Boulder, Colo., where she is surrounded by the comforts deservedly won in those years of strenuous labor. It was not possible to give the son good educational advantages, but with characteristic ambition he determined to work his way through school. The splendid university education which he acquired represents his unaided exertions. At the age of seventeen he entered the Iowa City Academy, from which he was graduated in 1889. During the fall of that year he matriculated in the Iowa State University and in 1893 he was graduated from the classical course of that institution. Meanwhile he had devoted eighteen hours of each day to study or to teaching, for in order to pay his expenses in the university he had taught higher arithmetic, algebra, geometry and physics in the academy.

Immediately after his graduation from the university in 1893 Mr. Kaye went to Washington and organized the high school at Waterville, of which he was chosen the first principal. During the two years of his service in that position he placed the school upon a substantial basis and raised its standard so that all of its graduates were eligible to admission to any university, their names being placed on the accredited list according to their standing. After two years at Waterville he left Washington for California and entered the Hastings Law School of San Francisco, from which in 1898 he received the degree of LL. B. During the same year he was admitted to the bar by the supreme court of California. Meanwhile he had paid all of his expenses in the law school. For a time he had taught school at Berkeley, Cal., and in addition as a traveling salesman carrying a commercial line he visited every town from Seattle to San Francisco. At various times he worked in the law offices of Judge A. W. Thompson, C. L. Tilden, W. H. Payson and A. H. Ricketts. After graduating from the law college he spent several years with Curtis H. Lindley, author of Lindley on Mines, his special task being the making of an abstract on all current decisions of state and federal courts pertaining to mining laws. The abstract thus prepared played an important part in the preparation of the second edition of Lindley on Mines, which now is the standard text-book on mining law. When Mr. Lindley began to prepare data for his treatise on the Law of Waters, he engaged Mr. Kaye to abstract all statutes and state and federal decisions pertaining to the subject. Another task that commanded much of his time was important editorial work for a very prominent firm of publishers of law books.

Upon coming to Bakersfield in 1902 and opening a law office, Mr. Kaye formed a partnership with C. V. Anderson under the firm name of Anderson & Kaye. Three years later the partnership was dissolved and Mr. Kaye opened an office in the Hopkins building, where he has continued ever since. During June of 1911 he formed a partnership with Alfred Siemon, who had come to Bakersfield early in the previous year and had identified himself with the Title Assurance Company as its secretary. The firm carry on a general practice in all of the courts and are consulted for every class of legal advice. The interests of their large clientele are protected with skill and success. To aid them in their practice they have one of the best law libraries of the San Joaquin valley, these books having been gathered together by Mr. Kaye during his stay in San Francisco and representing the decisions of the best legal lights of this and preceding eras.

Much of the success of Mr. Kaye is due to his fondness for work. The most difficult and intricate case does not weary him, but spurs him on to further efforts in his zeal to unravel knotty law problems. No case can be presented to him that he finds too intricate for his eager mind. An inveterate, tireless worker, he finds his greatest pleasure in tasks that would dismay men of lesser energy and to this fact may be attributed much of his success in the law. Good judgment is responsible for much of his financial success. Investments have been made sagaciously and have brought him gratifying returns. Included in his possessions are a ranch of two hundred and thirty acres with an adequate pumping plant, citrus property east of Kern, suburban acreage, town lots, a controlling interest in the stock of the Kern Citrus Realty Company, and a modern and attractive residence on North B street, Bakersfield. This home is brightened by the presence of his four children, Louise, William Minton, Emelie and Jessie, and presided over with dignity and grace by his accomplished wife, a woman of culture and at one time a teacher. Born in Oregon, she bore the maiden name of Fanny

Chas. A. Barclay

B. Minton and received excellent educational advantages, which she utilized in her chosen profession. During 1895 she became the wife of Mr. Kaye at Berkeley, where they established a home and resided until their removal to Bakersfield. Politically a Republican, Mr. Kaye has served as secretary of the Kern county central committee and has been very influential in local party affairs. Fraternally a Mason of the Shriner degree, he has been chosen past master of Bakersfield Lodge No. 224., F. & A. M., also has served as past high priest of Bakersfield Chapter No. 75, R. A. M., and has been an officer in Bakersfield Commandery No. 39, K. T., all of which degrees of the order have benefited by his devotion to their advancement and his cordial co-operation in all of their philanthropies.

HON. CHARLES A. BARLOW AND WILLIAM H. HILL.—No industry has contributed in greater degree to the wealth of Kern county than that of oil development and probably no firm has been identified more intimately with the advancement of the industry during the past decade than that of Barlow & Hill, a title familiar to all who have kept in touch with local progress. Since the organization of the firm in 1902 they have organized many companies, all of which have been successful, and the six which they now operate have shares of stock that are quoted as gilt-edged security with a continuous tendency to rise in public and private markets. Besides the six companies they are at present interested in Maricopa and Midway oil properties and in addition have been successful in establishing a national reputation for Sunset road oil, which is extensively used in the states of California, Oregon, Washington, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Texas and Idaho and, in fact, as far east as Kansas City. To the enterprise, knowledge and direction of the two members of the firm, Kern county is in a great measure indebted for its present high standing as an oil-producing section. No temporary discouragement has lessened their faith in the oil industry of this region and in the natural mineral wealth of the state. Thoroughly optimistic in temperament, yet conservative in action, they stand for that large element of loyal citizenship indissolubly associated with the progress of city, county and commonwealth.

Born in Cleveland, Ohio, March 17, 1858, Hon. Charles Averill Barlow is a son of Hon. Merrill and Ann Frances (Arnold) Barlow, the former a distinguished attorney in Cleveland, who during the war administration was selected to serve as quartermaster-general of Ohio. About 1872, when forty-eight years of age, he was stricken suddenly with apoplexy and passed from earth before he had achieved financial success, but in the midst of a remarkable professional career that had brought him fame as a leading criminal lawyer of Cleveland. Surviving him were his wife and four children, the latter named as follows: Coralinne, now the wife of James S. Rice, a retired orange-grower living at Tustin, Orange county, Cal.; Charles Averill, of Bakersfield; Edward Sumner, who resides on the old home farm at Ventura, this state; and Belle Remington, now the wife of Frank Bates, of Ventura. When the family came to California about the year 1875 they settled at Ventura-by-the-sea and C. A., then a youth of seventeen years, began with eagerness to study western conditions, resources and prospects, meanwhile earning a livelihood on farms and in various occupations in town. Possessing ideas that were in advance of his time, he joined enthusiastically in many reform movements and for such work he found a favorable opening when he and a partner, Mr. Tuley, established and conducted the Reasoner, a weekly paper that became the Populist organ for San Luis Obispo county. As early as 1888 he began to support the free silver cause and for years he was the leading exponent of that movement in his part of the state. During 1893 the Populist party elected him to the state legislature, where he served not only with fidelity, but even with distinction.

With the assistance of the votes of free silver Republicans Mr. Barlow in 1896 was elected by the Populist party to the Fifty-fifth congress as the representative from the sixth congressional district, which at that time included the counties of Los Angeles, Ventura, Santa Barbara, San Luis Obispo, Monterey and Santa Cruz. In congress he distinguished himself for his uncompromising stand in favor of reform measures. Credited to his efforts was the passage of a bill setting aside the Pine mountain forest reservation, comprising several million acres of land extending south almost as far as Pasadena. Other measures for the permanent benefit of the state and the people received his steadfast aid. When the principles of the Populist party were to some extent adopted by the Democrats, he turned to the older party organization, in which since he has been an active worker. During 1912 he was chosen one of four delegates-at-large from California to the national Democratic convention at Baltimore that nominated Woodrow Wilson for President of the United States. The American Mining Congress, of which he is a member, selected him as committeeman to propose a plank in the national Democratic platform of that year favorable to mining and the oil industry.

During 1901 Mr. Barlow and his accomplished wife, who was formerly Miss Elizabeth McDonell, of Ventura county, established their home in Bakersfield, where they erected and now occupy a beautiful residence fitted with all modern improvements and conveniences. Since his removal to this city Mr. Barlow has become a very prominent citizen and has served ably as president of the Kern county board of trade, besides being a large stockholder and one of the directors in the new Security Trust Company. In business circles he enjoys a high reputation. Fraternally he has been actively associated with the Woodmen, Elks and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Since 1902 he has been a partner of W. H. Hill, a resident of California and Bakersfield from the year 1901 and a native of Geneseo, Livingston county, N. Y., born November 19, 1848. While yet very young Mr. Hill began to work in the lumber business and for years he gave to that occupation his entire time and attention. For twelve years he served as chairman of the board of supervisors of Schoolcraft county, Mich. Since coming west he has become known as a well-informed, accurate business man and his counsel is much sought, particularly by those wishing to embark in the oil business. He is a stockholder and director of the First National Bank of Bakersfield and the Producers' Savings Bank. Like his partner, he owns a fine home in Bakersfield and is a firm believer in a prosperous future assured for the city.

Concerning the firm of Barlow & Hill we quote the following from the oil review edition of the Morning Echo, Bakersfield, February 28, 1911: "California has no better known industry than oil and the oil industry has no more well known firm than Barlow & Hill, for the past nine years doing a large business in Bakersfield and Kern county as dealers in oil lands and producing oil companies, essentially the latter. The personnel of the firm, C. A. Barlow and W. H. Hill, assures its high standing and gives confidence to its constantly increasing clientele. Barlow & Hill formed a partnership in August, 1902, to deal in oil lands. Since that time they have organized many oil companies, all of which have become producers, and Barlow & Hill have never taken a dollar of their clients' money but what in each case the company joined the ranks of the paying producers. They have six oil companies of their own and are extensively interested in Maricopa and Midway oil properties. They rehabilitated three oil companies which were sold to eastern capitalists and have produced oil in quantities as claimed by the firm, frequently in excess of their estimates. Among the many successful ventures which Barlow & Hill have had to deal with was the making of the country-wide reputation for Sunset road oil. They took hold of the Sunset companies at Maricopa when it was considered unprofitable and well-nigh impracticable to handle this oil, owing to its being too heavy and hard for fuel purposes. But Barlow & Hill were not discouraged and by dint of their well-directed efforts Sunset road oil or its equivalent has become a part of the specifications in road-building with oil as demanded by municipalities on the Pacific coast and elsewhere."

A Half Century of Progress, Bakersfield and Kern County, 1912, in mentioning the progressive business efforts of Barlow & Hill, give the following summary of their work in the oil industry and the importance of this industry to the development of local wealth: "It should be a matter of the liveliest satisfaction to the people of California to know that no single corporation or group of individuals is controlling the destiny of the state's oil industry by the monopolization of territory, rate of development and production, or the fixing of arbitrary prices. The petroleum interests of California are too big for any combination of capital to swing and manipulate at will for any period of time. Petroleum apparently exists in every section of this big commonwealth, so blessed by nature in the glories of sky and air, in the ocean about it and in its pregnant soil, blessed even in the bowels of its earth, which yield a rich return to man's labor almost for the asking. There are any number of safe investments in Kern county open to inspection. Money must be active to make quick and large profits. Slow money slowly responds with slow interest. The investor who is content with the latter is out of joint with the times and in the rear end of the race for competency and wealth. No class of speculative investment is safer or promises larger profits than investment in oil companies backed by unlimited capital and experience, and directed by reputable men. Such is the character of the six oil companies operated by Barlow & Hill, a firm established in 1902 to deal in oil lands, and that since has been one of the effectual forces in the building up of the oil industry in Kern county. Among their many successful ventures was the making of a country-wide reputation for Sunset road oil. The two partners in the firm are widely known and are numbered among the most influential men of the community, taking an active interest in all measures for the advancement of Bakersfield and her commercial interests."

JOHN ALFRED FREEAR.—The superintendent of the Maricopa Queen Oil Company's lease of twenty acres occupies a position of importance in the Sunset-Midway field. Not alone a native of California, but also born in Kern county and practically a lifelong resident hereof, he is deeply devoted to this portion of the state, believes in its future possibilities and promotes with enthusiasm all movements for the local progress. With his twin brother, James Albion, likewise associated with the Maricopa Queen lease, he has exhibited a devotion to work, a morality of conduct and a talent for the oil business that reflects credit upon himself and upon his native county, the two men displaying an efficiency and thoroughness that came to them as an inheritance from worthy parents and patriotic ancestry.

Born in Bakersfield August 24, 1885, John Alfred Freear was primarily educated in the schools of that city and in 1905 was graduated from Heald's Business College at Stockton. During early life he had become familiar with farming in the old River district, but agriculture interested him less than oil enterprises and it is not strange that his preferences led him to seek employment in the oil fields. For a short time he engaged as bookkeeper for the Associated and Union Oil Companies in the Kern river field and there too he gained practical experience in the industry through working as a roustabout. From this county he went to the Santa Maria oil field and remained four years, meanwhile learning to dress tools and to drill wells. Upon returning to Kern county and coming to the west side field, in 1909, he secured employment on the Maricopa Queen lease of twenty acres, situated on section 32, township 12, range 23. At that time the lease had one well, a gusher. Since then he has helped to bring in five wells on the lease, the last one, Maricopa Queen No. 7, brought in March 1, 1913, being a gusher yielding two thousand barrels per day of oil of twenty-five degrees gravity. The entire production from the lease averages about seventy thousand barrels per month, an almost phenomenal record and one indicative of the value of the properties. The superintendent understands the business in every detail and has proved thoroughly competent to handle the many vexatious problems presenting themselves for daily consideration and solution.

HARRY ROSCOE LUFKIN.—The day of the office boy who enters a business establishment and soon works his way to a place of high responsibility is well nigh past. It may not be impossible for such a thing to occur under present conditions, but the likelihood of its occurring in the case of any specific office boy is very slight. To meet the strenuous economic conditions now existing young men and young women must be equipped with a business training thoroughly up-to-date, such as may be obtained at the Bakersfield Business college, of which Harry Roscoe Lufkin was the founder and of which he is the proprietor and manager.

It was at Walnut Grove, Sacramento county, Cal., that Professor Lufkin was born June 3, 1880, a son of H. T. and Louisa J. (Wise) Lufkin. His father was born at Freeport, Cal., a son of David T. Lufkin, a native of Maine, who came to California in the early '50s and died in the East while absent from home on a business trip. Grandfather Lufkin farmed and mined in the Sacramento valley and was one of the early horticulturists in the vicinity of Freeport. His son, H. T. Lufkin, was in his early life a teacher and later a general merchant at Walnut Grove. Still later he engaged in horticulture on the old Lufkin homestead at Freeport, where he died in 1899. Louisa J. Wise, whom he married, was born at Walnut Grove, a daughter of Joseph Wise, a native of Missouri, who came across the plains with an ox-team train locating in 1852 on a ranch at Walnut Grove, where he has prospered and where he is still living at the advanced age of eighty-four years. Mrs. Lufkin, who died at Freeport, bore her husband three children, of whom Harry Roscoe was the eldest. He lived at Walnut Grove until he was sixteen years old, attending public schools, then his activities were transferred for a time to Freeport. After having acquired a normal school education, he became a student at the Atkinson Business College in Sacramento, where he was graduated May 5, 1902. He found employment as a bookkeeper in a commercial house in that city, but after five months was sent for by Professor Atkinson and offered a position as teacher in the commercial department of the Atkinson Business College, where he was in charge of actual business instruction for more than four years. He then went to Reno, Nev., to take the management of the Atkinson Business College in that city. After a year and a half he went back to Sacramento with a commercial house there, but at the solicitation of Professor Atkinson again took charge of the commercial department of the Atkinson Business College in Sacramento. In 1907 he gave up his position there and came to Bakersfield and in September of that year opened the Bakersfield Business College in the Galtes building, where he conducted it until in September, 1910. It having outgrown its quarters he removed it to its present location at No. 2020 I street. The institution was a success almost from the start. Beginning with five students it had twenty-three before thirty days had passed and has been growing ever since. This popular school is conducted on strict business lines and its rooms are especially arranged, well lighted and ventilated, and no expense has been spared to afford to the student every possible convenience. The work of imparting a business education is as systematic as if the institution were a real financial, commercial or industrial concern. In the stenographic department students work exactly as they would work in a business office and are instructed how to conduct themselves in a real office position. Shorthand, bookkeeping, typewriting and commercial law are taught and a high grade of scholarship is maintained. Graduates, now filling positions in commercial and manufacturing, railroad, real estate and law offices are giving satisfaction and working their way to high places in the business world.

Andrew Brown

In politics Mr. Lufkin is a Republican. He was made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M. He was married at Reno, Nev., to Miss Myrtle G. Reel, a native of Oregon, and they have a son, Harry Roscoe Lufkin, Jr.

ANDREW BROWN—A summary of the splendid life of the late Andrew Brown would be indeed lacking were the mention of his influence and close associations in Kern county omitted, for to him not less than to any other individual who has lived in that vicinity is due the advancement and improvement of commercial conditions in the county. A self-made man in the best sense of the word, upon coming to Kern county he lent his aid toward its progress, his keen foresight, wonderful business acumen and strict honesty early winning for him respect and esteem from all with whom he had dealings. The son of Samuel Brown, a merchant and farmer in Falcarragh, County Donegal, Ireland, it was in that place that Andrew was born September 15, 1829. Fortune brought him when a youth to Philadelphia, Pa., whence in 1852 he sailed around Cape Horn and landed in San Francisco. Like many of the early pioneers he rushed to the mines, but not finding the Eldorado dreamed of he began the mercantile business and conducted a store in Mariposa county. Later he became a farmer and stockman in Tulare county, but soon afterward made his way to Kernville to enter the employ of Judge Joseph W. Sumner, who later became his father-in-law, and had charge of operating the quartz mill of the latter. Purchasing the store in Kernville, which later assumed such large proportions, he successfully conducted it, and later seeing an opportunity opened to him whereby he could purchase the store and ranch at Weldon on the South Fork he became owner of them, continuing the mercantile business at Weldon in connection with his store in Kernville. At the same time he began farming operations on his Weldon ranch. As business increased he bought other farms on the South Fork and became engaged extensively in raising cattle, horses, sheep and hogs. Large quantities of wheat were raised on his land, and to achieve the best marketing results he built a flour mill at Weldon, where the wheat was ground into flour and prepared for the local trade. This saved the long haul over the mountains to the railroad. He next built a sawmill, where he manufactured lumber from his lands, much of his lumber being used in the building throughout that section. By additional purchases Mr. Brown became the owner of thousands of acres of land, among which were several thousands of acres of valuable farm lands on the South Fork, which have been brought under irrigation by ditches from the river. Grain and alfalfa are raised in abundance. He also acquired large holdings at Pampa, which are now being developed with a pumping plant for irrigation, as the land lies in a thermal belt which bids fair to prove valuable citrus land.

In 1901 Mr. Brown incorporated the North and South Fork interests as the A. Brown Company, of which he was president until his death, October 12, 1909, since which time Mrs. Brown has filled that position in the company. He also had large real estate interests in Los Angeles which are still owned by Mrs. Brown and their children. In 1904, after many long, useful years of active participation in business, Mr. Brown retired and moved to Los Angeles, where he made his home until he passed away, leaving the imprint of his energetic and persevering career in the many improvements he had accomplished in the county. Truly he was a benefactor to Kern county, and he was known throughout the county as one of its most prominent upbuilders, his unselfishness, dauntless courage and never-failing will power proving a splendid example for the young men of today to emulate. In fraternal affiliations he was a Master Mason, while his religious tendencies were with the Episcopalians. A Protectionist and a Republican, he was ever staunch in his allegiance to party principles. For many years Mr. Brown was a director in the bank of Bakersfield.

The marriage of Mr. Brown to Miss Alice M. Sumner took place in Kernville June 18, 1873. She was born in Lubec, Me., the daughter of Judge Joseph W. Sumner, a native of Newburyport, Mass., and of old Colonial and Revolutionary stock. Judge Sumner was a merchant in Lubec, Me., for some time, in 1849, however, becoming excited over the gold discoveries and coming via Panama to San Francisco. He followed mining in different districts in California and even into British Columbia, and he was one of the early miners at Kernville, operating the Sumner mine and quartz mill until he bought his ranch on the North Fork. He spent his last days in Kernville, where he died in 1911, aged ninety-two years. Like so many of his comrades he had ever a deep interest in mining, which he retained to the last days of his existence. He served as justice of the peace for over thirty years and he was so well liked and esteemed in the community that there was not another person who held a higher place in their regard. His wife was Mary E. Dakin, a native of Digby, Nova Scotia. She passed away in Kernville two months after her husband's death, when she was eighty-five years old. They were the parents of three children, of whom Mrs. Brown was the youngest. Her girlhood was spent in Maine and in the schools of Saco she received her elementary education, later attending Saco Academy. Since her husband's death she has alternated her residence between Kernville and Los Angeles and continues to look after the large business interests which her husband left. She is a member of the Friday Morning Club as well as the Ebell Club, in Los Angeles, making her home at 949 South Hoover street, and she is a devout member of the Emanuel Presbyterian Church. Her two children are P. Sumner, in the real estate business in Los Angeles, and M. Elizabeth, who is the wife of Dr. Edward M. Palette, of Los Angeles. Mrs. Brown is a woman much beloved, and numbers her friends by her acquaintances. She is charitable and kind, but so unostentatious in her giving that none but those receiving the benefits are cognizant of it, and refinement, intelligence and strong will power are her marked characteristics.

JAMES ALBIAN FREEAR.—The name of Freear has been identified with the development of Kern county for a period of almost forty years, its first representative in this region having been Henry T. Freear, an honored veteran of the Civil war, a man of indomitable perseverance and a farmer of considerable ability. After he had served the Union for three years in the Civil war he received an honorable discharge from the Seventeenth Illinois Cavalry and returned to his old home, there to take up the earning of a livelihood through the arts of peace. About 1875 he came to California from Nebraska, where he had engaged in general farming for a few years. In his trip to the west he was accompanied by his family, which at that time consisted of two children beside his wife. Settling in the Old River district of Kern county, he took up raw land, developed a farm, devoted himself to the cultivation of the land and finally retired with a competency. During the last years of his life he made his home in Bakersfield, where he was a leader among the members of the Grand Army and where he was well known for his staunch allegiance to the Republican party. Since his death, March 23, 1904, his widow, Mary (Garlick) Freear, has made her home at No. 1709 Maple avenue, Bakersfield, where she has a comfortable modern bungalow and where, at the age of sixty-three, she attends to housekeeping duties with much of the zest and energy of her younger years. In her family there are eight children, namely: H. R. and C. H.; Lena, wife of R. L. McCutchen, of Old River; J. P.; John Alfred and James Albian, (twins); Verna, who married R. W. Bess, lessee of the United Crude Oil Company, of Maricopa; and Viola, wife of William Perry, engaged as a salesman and demonstrator at Bakersfield for Ben L. Brundage.

The early years of James Albian Freear were passed in an uneventful manner. Work on the home farm alternated with attendance at country schools in Old River district. When twenty years of age in 1905 he was graduated from Heald's Business College at Stockton. From that time until 1909 he was employed in the Santa Maria field, where he learned the details of the oil industry and studied it from the viewpoint of production. Naturally he began work as a roustabout. Later he learned to be a driller. More recently he has been employed in the production department of the Maricopa Queen Oil Company. As gang pusher he has proved energetic, capable and efficient, well liked by the workmen, popular among other officers. The high reputation of the company as the owner of one of the best leases in the Sunset field may be attributed in no small degree to his laborious and intelligent devotion to the production department.

M. W. PASCOE, M. D.—Intense devotion to the science of therapeutics and a thorough knowledge of the attractions, demands and possibilities of the profession, supplementing an excellent practical training in one of the finest universities of the new world, admirably qualify Dr. Pascoe for the building up of a substantial clientele represented by a growing practice in the city of Taft and the surrounding oil districts. While the period of his association with professional work in the west has been comparatively brief (for it was in September of 1911 that he came to California and to Taft), the confidence and patronage of the people of the community have been accorded him and he numbers among his friends the leading men of the locality. When he undertook the establishment of a general hospital at this point he received the warm support of the general public, for all saw the wisdom of his belief that there should be first-class accommodations for the care of men injured in the work of the oil fields or for those of the community in need of surgical treatment or special care. The success of the hospital has been a source of gratification to him personally besides affording him an opportunity to offer to his patients superior advantages and experienced nursing.

Of Canadian birth and parentage, Dr. Pascoe was born at Bowmanville, Ontario, May 10, 1871, and is the fourth among seven children and the youngest of four sons in the family of Thomas and Margaret (Hogarth) Pascoe, now residents of Hempton, Ontario. Excellent educational advantages were put within his reach and of these he availed himself to the utmost. For some years he pursued a special scientific course in Trinity University. Later he took the medical course in the Trinity Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1898 with the degrees of M. D. C. M. and F. T. M. C. Shortly after graduating he came to the States and settled at Ottumwa, Iowa, where he practiced for a period of twelve years. Meanwhile he developed special aptitude for the treatment of diseases of the eye, ear and nose, and in order to fit himself to specialize in these branches he took a post-graduate course in Chicago during 1910-11, after which he came to California and settled at Taft. During his residence in Ottumwa he met and married Miss Mary E. Hendershott and they enjoy the comforts of a cozy home in a five-room bungalow erected by the Doctor shortly after coming to this place. During 1913 he completed the general hospital which he erected at a cost of $5,000 and which is open to all practicing physicians and surgeons for use by their patients, the most experienced and skilled care being given to every inmate. Personally the Doctor is of genial and companionable disposition and he has formed many friendships through his active identification with members of the blue lodge of Masonry, and with the Elks and Moose. In politics he has been a staunch believer in Republican principles and a firm supporter of candidates of that party.

ORVILLE LEE CLARK.—A colonial identification with the commonwealth of Massachusetts and a later migration to Ohio marked the early history of the Clark family in America. It was Orin Clark, a native of the old Bay state, who established his branch of the family in Ohio, settling upon a farm in Cuyahoga county and devoting the balance of his life to its cultivation, excepting only the period of his service in the Sixth Ohio Infantry during the Civil war. The valor which he displayed in military service and the patriotic character of his life both in peace and in war were duplicated in the history of his son, Wallace Watson Clark, a native of Cuyahoga county, Ohio, and at the age of only fifteen years a volunteer in the Union army. Being accepted in spite of his youth, he went to the front with the Fifth Ohio Cavalry and served with recognized bravery and devotion for three years, until the struggle had ended, meanwhile receiving several wounds in battle. For several years after the war he worked in the employ of a large lumber concern at Saginaw, Mich., but from there returned to Cleveland, Ohio, and took up contracting and building. After a long period of activity in that occupation he removed to California in 1903 and is now living retired in Los Angeles. During young manhood he had married Martha Celestia Newton, who was born in Cuyahoga county, Ohio, and died at Cleveland in February of 1886, leaving four children. The next to the youngest of these, Orville Lee, was born in Cleveland, Ohio, March 10, 1883; and was orphaned by the death of his mother when he was yet too young to realize his irreparable loss. The family continued to make their home in Cleveland for some time and he was sent to the grammar-schools of that city, later becoming a student in the high school at Huntsburg, Geauga county. Next he studied mathematics and mechanics at the institute in New Lyme, Ashtabula county, Ohio, and at the same time studied architecture with Mr. White, a prominent architect of Ashtabula. A breakdown in health obliged him to engage in outdoor work and he took up carpentering, from which he was promoted to be superintendent of construction with an Ashtabula concern.

Coming to California during 1907 and from Los Angeles to Bakersfield in February of the next year, Mr. Clark embarked in business as an architect and engineer and since then has been engaged to design many of the most important buildings in the city and county. Among his contracts may be mentioned those for the Hotels Kosel, Olcovich, and Decatur, the addition to the homelike and attractive hotel Massena, the Dixon apartments and the Barlow, Hill and Helm residences. The Southern garage on Chester avenue and Twenty-fifth street represents a style of architecture which is one of his favorites for this climate. This building is almost absolutely fireproof and has a storage capacity of fifty cars. In addition he was architect and engineer of the Bakersfield Club building and Mercy hospital. Two school buildings at Taft, admittedly the most substantial of their kind in the entire county, were designed by him, as were also the Maricopa school house and the H. F. Williams school house, the Franklin school house and the large wing of the Emerson school, the last three in Bakersfield, as well as the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company's main office building on Twentieth street which is a fire-proof building and one of the most substantial and artistic office buildings in the city. The Bakersfield Club has his name enrolled upon its membership list. Made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., he always has supported the philanthropic principles of the order and has been a most generous contributor to its charities, besides being interested warmly in the work of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. Among the scientific societies of which he is a member is the American Institute of Architects and the National Geographic Society of Washington, D. C.

Fred H. Hall

HON. FRED H. HALL.—From whatever standpoint the life of Mr. Hall is viewed, whether as a deputy sheriff and marshal in his earlier years or as a special agent of the Santa Fe Railroad Company, whether as a member of the state legislature promoting measures for the welfare of his constituents, whether as the owner of alfalfa lands or as a large stockholder and director in oil organizations and in water companies, he is found to be a man of versatile abilities, possessing a high order of intelligence, devoted to the commonwealth of his nativity, well informed concerning its possibilities and eager to develop its vast resources. To such citizens may be attributed the great development of the state and from them and their successors must come all future advancement. No narrow spirit has governed his business enterprises, for they have been as broad-gauged as his own mental equipment and as purposeful as his own existence. Throughout the entire west he is well-known in many avenues of activity, where his splendid character and broad intelligence have left an indelible impress for good.

A study of the Hall genealogy indicates that Fred George Hall, a native of Portland, Me., learned the occupation of nurseryman and horticulturist under his father, who for years engaged in that avocation in Maine. As early as 1852, when about thirty-four years of age, he came via Panama to San Francisco and engaged in mining at Mormon Island. During the Civil war he served in California and Arizona as a member of Company I, Second California Cavalry. After receiving an honorable discharge from the army, he became interested in horticulture and the nursery business east of Visalia, Tulare county, but a long period of invalidism greatly hampered his activities. His death occurred at Visalia in July of 1893, when he was seventy-five years of age. During 1907 occurred the demise of his wife at Fresno, this state; she bore the maiden name of Matilda Dillon and was born at Peoria, Ill. Their family comprised two sons and four daughters, but at this writing there survive only Fred H. and one of his sisters. The former was born near Visalia, Tulare county, this state, May 17, 1868, and from the age of four to twenty years he lived with his parents at Tulare. After he was ten the invalidism of his father prevented him from attending school and forced him to work not only for his own support, but also to aid the family. Indeed, for some time he was the sole support of the family. He worked in brick-yards, harvest fields and wherever honest labor commanded living wages. During 1888 he took the family back to Visalia, where he secured employment as deputy city marshal under E. A. Gilliam. In addition he served as deputy sheriff. For one term, beginning about 1892, he served as marshal of Visalia, but he was not a candidate for re-election, continuing, however, as deputy sheriff and deputy city marshal and in these capacities making about thirty-four hundred arrests, some of the suspects proving to be desperate criminal characters. While acting as marshal O. P. Byrd served as his deputy.

Subsequent to his service in Tulare county Mr. Hall entered the special agents' department of the Santa Fe Railroad, where during the first fourteen months his duties consisted chiefly in investigating stolen goods and the pilfering of box-cars. From that he was promoted step by step until finally he was appointed assistant chief of the department with headquarters in Los Angeles. The duties of the position consisted in hiring men and superintending the department work between Albuquerque and San Francisco, also in collecting evidence in law suits and investigating matters that came up in the law department. Often it was said concerning him that he was the only man serving in the office who left the railroad company without an enemy. Railroad Brotherhoods and legislative boards wrote him very complimentary letters of thanks for his services. In every responsibility he exhibited not only wise judgment and practical common sense, but also the utmost tact and the greatest consideration of others.

Resigning from the Santa Fe railroad service in 1906 in order to engage in private business and having previously purchased oil lands, Mr. Hall became a large stockholder in the Visalia Midway Oil Company and assisted in the development of lands secured by that concern. From the first he has been vice-president and general manager of the company and under his sagacious supervision the work of development has proceeded without any necessity for an assessment of stock. On the other hand, there has been an assured income for investors. Near Fellows on the west side the company owns eighty acres, where there are five wells producing and two in process of drilling. It is said that the company for its size is one of the most prosperous in the state. The success of the enterprise may be attributed in large measure to the sagacity of the general manager. The oil lands, however, do not represent the limit of his useful activities. As vice-president and the largest stockholder of the Western Water Company, a company organized to furnish water for the west side oil fields, he has been identified with a movement of considerable importance. By an expenditure of over $500,000 the company has secured water from the artesian wells near the north end of Buena Vista lake. This water, pumped through a twelve-inch line for a distance of twelve miles to Taft and then stored in two tanks of fifty-five thousand barrel capacity in order to furnish pressure for the villages of Taft and Fellows and vicinity, was the first water of good quality ever secured in the locality and the expense to consumers is only one-quarter for domestic use, and one-sixth for oil wells, of what was formerly paid for poor water. On the organization of the National Bank of Bakersfield he was elected a member of the board of directors, and is now serving as its vice-president.

Included among the other interests of Mr. Hall may be mentioned his alfalfa and hog ranch of two hundred acres situated four miles southeast of Kern. One of the most important improvements of the ranch is a pumping plant with a one hundred-inch stream. In addition he is interested in the development of oil in Humboldt county, Cal., where already top oil has been struck. As a member of the California Oil Men's Association of Bakersfield he is connected with an organization that fosters this recent and prosperous industry of the west. Upon the organization of the Western Oil Producers' Association, with headquarters in Los Angeles, he has served as a member of its board of directors. The advisory board of the American Mining Congress also has the benefit of his intelligent co-operation as one of its members. Mr. Hall is an active member of the Prospectors' Alliance of America. Having made a close study of the question of conserving our natural resources and being a man well-posted on the subject, he was selected by the executive committee of the board of directors as a committee of one to present the case to President-elect Wilson, then Governor of New Jersey. The chief object was to acquaint Mr. Wilson with the conditions that exist in the west which directly affect the mining interests and the disposition of the public domain. Making the trip to New Jersey, at Trenton he visited Mr. Wilson and in the interview presented his subject and acquainted the latter with existing conditions in the west, laying before him certain facts pertaining to the public domain, and he urged him to appoint a western man to the office of Secretary of the Interior. As his reason for this appeal he stated that the people of the coast states, where most of the unsettled portion of the country's acres lies, wanted a man for the position who would be able to see the needs through western eyes and make his decisions accordingly, one who was old-fashioned enough to believe in those principles laid down in the Constitution of the United States, and who would not delegate to himself the power to abrogate the laws passed by Congress and in lieu thereof make rulings to conform to his own ideas and whims. A western man received the appointment, and the trip marked success and clever manipulation.

Keenly devoted to the development of Bakersfield, where he built and occupies a comfortable residence at No. 1915 Eighteenth street, he is serving as vice-president of the Board of Trade and by constant co-operation with all progressive movements is endeavoring to promote the growth of his home city.

The marriage of Mr. Hall took place in Visalia and united him with Miss Ruth C. Stokes, who was born near that city, being a daughter of Y. B. Stokes. Possessing an excellent education and a broad culture, she has found mental uplift in the activities of the Woman's Club and also has enjoyed the social amenities of the Eastern Star and the Women of Woodcraft. The marriage was blessed by four children, Rowen F., Maurice E., Thelma and Thalia. Fraternally Mr. Hall holds membership with the Bakersfield lodge and chapter of Masonry, the Woodmen of the World, and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. In politics he is a Democrat of the stanchest kind, loyal to all party principles. His service was recognized in an appreciative manner during the autumn of 1910, when he was elected to represent the sixty-sixth assembly district in the state legislature. During the thirty-ninth session, 1911, he was a member of nine committees, among them being those on counties and county boundaries, county and township government, fish and game, irrigation and drainage, manufactures and internal improvements, mines and mining interests, oil industries and oil mining interests. Largely through his efforts was secured the defeat of a measure to appoint a third judge in Kern county. Needed legislation was promoted by his keen, capable discrimination. The welfare of his constituents was guarded in every emergency and he proved himself not only a faithful, loyal representative of the people, but also a most tactful and intelligent promoter of their interests.

THADDEUS M. McNAMARA, LL. B.—The first representative of the McNamara family in America was William Murro McNamara, who after having served as an officer in the British navy resigned his commission and sought the opportunities afforded by the vast agricultural areas of the new world. The son of a hemp merchant in London, he was born in that city at No. 9 Gloucester place, and entered the navy immediately after graduation from Sedgely Park College. Upon crossing the ocean in 1848 he proceeded direct to Illinois and located on one hundred and sixty acres of government land in Cook county, where he transformed a tract of virgin soil into a productive and profitable dairy farm. At Fayville, Kane county, February 6, 1854, occurred the birth of his only son, Thaddeus M., and on the old preëmption claim he spent many useful, profitable years, but eventually sold the tract in order to remove to California. Close to Visalia he bought a tract of land and established a country home. On that place he died March 6, 1887, at the age of sixty-five years. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Bridget Mary Keating, was born in Tipperary, Ireland, where her father, Patrick Keating, engaged in mercantile pursuits prior to his emigration to the United States and his settlement among the pioneer farmers of Kane county in the vicinity of Elgin.

A temperament inclining him toward the acquisition of knowledge was fostered by the encouragement of devoted parents, so that Thaddeus M. McNamara had every opportunity to gain a thorough education. After he had completed the studies of the Elgin Academy and the University of Notre Dame, he matriculated in the Union College of Law (affiliated with the Northwestern University as the law department of that famous institution) and in 1874 he was granted the degree of LL. B., upon the completion of the regular course of study. Believing the west to offer favorable opportunities for the practice of his profession, he came immediately to California and opened an office at Visalia, where he continued for fifteen years. Since 1875 he has practiced law in Tulare and Kern counties, with the exception of several years' practice spent in Seattle, San Francisco and the Imperial valley. Besides conducting a general practice in Bakersfield, he has affiliated himself with movements for the material upbuilding of the city and also has been prominent in local fraternities, including the Woodmen of the World, the Modern Woodmen of America, the Fraternal Brotherhood, the Yeomen of America, and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

The first marriage of Mr. McNamara took place in Visalia, this state, and united him with Miss Alice Asay, who was born in Philadelphia, Pa., and died at Visalia in 1887. During the Civil war her father, J. L. Asay, M. D., had served as a surgeon in the Union army. A graduate of the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, he was well qualified for such responsibilities through education and natural endowments. Upon removing from Pennsylvania to the western coast he settled in Visalia, and later he became an instructor in surgery in the College of Physicians and Surgeons at San Francisco. In each place he built up a large practice and attained professional distinction. There are three children of the first marriage of Mr. McNamara, the eldest of these bearing the name of the father and being well-known among the physicians of Bakersfield; the second, Loretta, lives in Oakland, and the youngest, Agnes, is the wife of Edward C. Crabbe, of Honolulu. The second marriage of Mr. McNamara occurred in Visalia and united him with Miss Christine E. Gilmore, a native of San Francisco and a daughter of Samuel Gilmore, a native of New Brunswick and reared in Maine. In 1847 he came around Cape Horn to San Francisco, where he was very prominent in building up the city and also in the banking business as a director of the San Francisco Savings & Loan Bank, commonly known as the Clay Street Bank. He was married in San Francisco to Eva Pelty, who was a native of the Bahama Islands and came as a child to California with her parents. Mrs. McNamara was a graduate of the Girls' High School in San Francisco. Born to Mr. McNamara's second union were three children, namely: William E., now with the New York Cloak & Suit House, in Los Angeles; Genevieve, wife of Carl Beck, also of Los Angeles, and Arthur, of Bakersfield.

PHILO LANDON JEWETT.—Although the distinction of being a native son of California does not belong to Mr. Jewett, who was born near Weybridge, Addison county, Vt., January 18, 1871, he has passed the greater part of his life in the west and by long residence as well as close observation has acquired a thorough knowledge of Kern county, both as pertaining to its oil fields and its agricultural lands. After his father, Solomon Jewett, the pioneer stock-raiser and oil-promoter of Kern county, became a citizen of Bakersfield, the son was sent to the local schools and later attended the Oakland high school until his graduation in 1889. Upon his return to Bakersfield he secured a position as bookkeeper in the Kern Valley Bank. Soon, however, he began to study the stock industry and particularly the sheep business. Careful observation convinced him that there were great possibilities in the raising of sheep and at the end of seven months in the bank he resigned in order to embark in his desired specialty. That his judgment was not at fault the succeeding years have proved and he still engages in the raising of sheep with gratifying success. It is said that he has no superior as a judge of a flock of sheep. His preference for this country is the Shropshire breed, which he carries exclusively and which seem well adapted to this climate and range, producing both mutton and wool in profitable measure. At first it was possible to range the flocks on the plains and hills of Linns valley during the summer months, but eventually the reservation was closed to sheep and this forced him to look for other quarters. Since then he has rented railroad lands.

The present headquarters of Mr. Jewett's sheep industry are situated near

Geo. Hay

Rosedale, seven miles west of Bakersfield, where he owns six hundred and forty acres in one tract and an adjacent property of four hundred acres. His mountain headquarters near Glennville contain the ranch-house known among the Mexicans as Casa Blanca and called by others the White house. The six hundred and forty acres at Rosedale are in alfalfa, large crops of which are cut each season. The entire tract lies under the Beardsley ditch and is in the usual farm crops, all feed raised being used for the sheep in winter. The size of the flocks varies from one season to another, but there are never less than five thousand head and at times there have been as many as ten thousand in the flocks.

While recognized as one of the most resourceful and energetic sheep-raisers in the county, it must not be supposed that this industry represents the limit of Mr. Jewett's activities. In addition he owns an interest in six hundred and forty acres in the Midway oil field, also acts as president of the Jewett Oil Company operating in the McKittrick district and owning one hundred and sixty acres on 13 and three hundred and twenty acres on 24, operating thirteen wells with a production of thirty-five hundred barrels per week. The Republican party has received the stanch support of Mr. Jewett in national elections and he has been prominent in its local affairs. Upon the consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern in July, 1910, he was elected a member of the board of trustees of the new corporation and at the regular election held in April of the following year he was chosen by the people to fill the place for the next term, since which time he has acted as chairman of the finance committee and through that service, as well as in other ways, he has proved helpful to the best interests of the community. Enterprising in temperament, progressive in ideals, patriotic in citizenship and loyal to California, he represents that splendid class of men who are giving of their time and talents to further the permanent prosperity of our commonwealth. As a charter member of the Bakersfield Club he was identified with the early history of an organization now prominent and popular and he also has been interested in the upbuilding of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks in his home city.

GEORGE HAY.—During the first half of the nineteenth century James H. Hay, a sturdy young Scot, left the highlands of his native country and crossed the ocean to the United States, where he settled upon a farm in Delaware. When his son, John, a native of Delaware, was a child of three years, in 1835, he took the family across the country to Indiana and settled at Indianapolis, but later moved by wagon northward to Fulton county in that state and took up raw land near Rochester, where he remained until his death. For perhaps twenty years John Hay served as assessor of Fulton county, where for years he ranked as a leading farmer and an honored resident and prosperous citizen until his death, December 28, 1912, at the age of seventy-eight. When he was taken to Indiana there were no railroads in the entire state, and he recalled vividly the excitement incident to the completion of the first railroad built into Indianapolis. In early manhood he married Miss Mary Myers, who was born in Fulton county, that state, and died there in 1900. To her father, John Myers, belonged the distinction of being one of the first settlers in Fulton county and he engaged in general farming there throughout the balance of his busy life.

There were eleven children in the family of John and Mary Hay and nine of these are still living, one son, A. W., being now superintendent of the Union cemetery. George, who was sixth in order of birth among the children, was born near Rochester, Fulton county, Ind., April 15, 1869, and at the age of fifteen began to earn his livelihood as a farm laborer. When seventeen years of age he was given a teachers' certificate and began to follow that occupation in Fulton county. By the frugal saving of his salary he was able to spend two years in the Northern Indiana State University at Valparaiso, where he took the scientific course of study. During 1889 he was graduated from the Terre Haute Business College, after which he taught school in Indiana for a few years. May 1, 1892, he arrived in Bakersfield with a cash capital of $5, but with an abundance of energy and determination. Immediately he found work by the day on a ranch in the Rosedale section, where he remained during the summer. In the fall of the same year he and a brother-in-law, George Batz, rented a stock farm on the south fork of the Kern river, and there he engaged in raising cattle and hogs for three years, after which he disposed of his interests and returned to Bakersfield in 1895. For one year he was employed by Bender & Hewitt, and there gained his first knowledge of the abstract business. Next for two years he served as deputy county assessor under Winfield Scott, and then as deputy tax collector under Charles Day, after which he returned to the employ of Bender & Hewitt for a year. When the county treasurer, J. B. Batz, went to San Francisco on account of business enterprises on the bay, he appointed Mr. Hay deputy county treasurer to take charge of the office during the three years yet remaining of his term of office.

The Bakersfield Abstract Company was incorporated in 1903 by J. H. Jordan, J. B. Batz and George Hay. The following year they bought out Bender & Hewitt, and thus acquired the oldest set of abstract books in the entire county. From the organization of the company Mr. Hay has acted as its secretary and manager. The office of the company is in the basement of the Bank of Bakersfield building, where there are private vaults for records and safety deposit vaults for the public use. The facilities of the concern embrace the ownership of books and documents constituting a complete record of the transfers, changes of ownership, subdivisions, and incumbrances covering all real estate in Kern county from government entry to date; and the company is prepared to issue unlimited certificates of title and complete abstracts of land, water and mining titles in this county. By this system the entire details of the examination of titles and the closing of property sales are assumed by the firm, which is responsible to all parties concerned for the correct carrying out of all instructions as well as for the correctness of the title, for which it issues guaranteed certificates. The company also buys and sells real estate, negotiates loans, takes charge of property for non-resident owners, writes insurance of all kinds, fire, plate-glass, accident and life, issues surety bonds and represents two building and loan companies of Los Angeles.

Aside from his identification with the Bakersfield Abstract Company Mr. Hay has numerous personal interests, having been one of the original stockholders of the Security Trust Company, and also owning interests in several oil companies. Under his ownership the West Park tract of thirty-three acres on Oleander avenue was subdivided and lots were placed on sale with building restrictions that made this one of the finest residence sections in Bakersfield. On some of the lots he built modern and elegant homes which he later sold. The Bakersfield Board of Trade has enjoyed the benefit of his progressive ideas. For some years he has been a member of the board of education, and his intelligent labors in this position have been beneficial to the educational interests of Bakersfield. The improvement of the schools has been a hobby with him. No stone has been left unturned in his effort to raise the standard of education. New buildings have been erected, locations have been secured, a course in domestic science has been added and a reputation has been acquired deservedly that ranks the Bakersfield schools with the best in the state. While not active in politics he has been stanch in his allegiance to the Democratic party. The Woodmen of the World, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Ancient Order of United Workmen, also the Bakersfield Club, number him among their members. His marriage took place in this city and united him with Miss Elise Stahlecker, who was born in Germany, but at an early age came to Kern county. Her father, John Stahlecker, is now living in this county. Mr. and Mrs. Hay are the parents of five children, Mildred, Gerald, Byron, George and Marjorie.

ABIA TAYLOR LIGHTNER.—Genealogical records indicate that during the eighteenth century three brothers, William A., John and Nathaniel Lightner, crossed the ocean from Holland to America and settled in Pennsylvania, where the last-named devoted the remainder of his life to farming in Lancaster county. Capt. Abia Taylor Lightner, son of Nathaniel, was born in that county in October of 1801 and at a very early age became a pioneer of Missouri, where at Independence he married Miss Jemima S. Snelling, a native of Louisville, Ky., born in September, 1809. The Snelling family is of Welsh lineage. During 1849 her aged mother and two brothers, Daniel and Benjamin Snelling, started across the plains, but in the course of the tedious journey the mother died at the age of about eighty-nine years. The brothers continued on their way, settled in California and became men of some local prominence, Benjamin being the founder of the village of Snelling, in Merced county.

Having decided to try his fortunes in the west, Captain Lightner outfitted at Independence, Mo., and during June of 1849 started as captain of a train that journeyed with ox-teams along the southern route through New Mexico and Arizona. More than six months were spent on the way and often in the lonely road they were in great danger from the Indians, but they traveled well-armed, each family taking a large supply of guns and ammunition. The twenty wagons comprising the train were under his guidance as trainmaster and were drawn by oxen, while milch cows were taken along, not only in order that milk and butter might be obtained for daily use, but also to be used for motive power in case of accident to the oxen or to furnish beef if needed. In every respect the expedition was well equipped, hence they escaped many of the privations that befell other bands of Argonauts. A brief stop was made near the present site of Pomona in Los Angeles county, and there on New Year's day of 1850 the numerical importance of the expedition was enhanced by the birth of Abia Taylor Lightner, Jr. Proceeding to the coast and thence northward, the travelers finally separated at Alviso, Santa Clara county, where the captain took up land one and one-half miles from Santa Clara and engaged not only in farming, but also in teaming for James Lick. During the mining excitement on the Kern river he made a trip of investigation and decided to remove to the location. As early as 1856 he bought on that river near Keyesville a mine later known as the Mammoth and also built a quartz mill, where he not only utilized rock from his own mine, but also engaged in custom work. The family established their home at Keyesville during 1857, but the following year, the milling and mining not proving profitable, he purchased the claim and stock owned by "Bob" Wilson in Walker's Basin and removed his wife and children to the new location. Ever since then the place has been occupied by members of the family and is now owned by one of his daughters, Mrs. Walker Rankin. While hauling a load of hay, February 12, 1867, from Walker's Basin to Havilah, then the county seat, he fell from the wagon and was run over by the team and killed. At the time of the accident he was alone and when found life was extinct. The widow remained at the old homestead until her death in 1896. Devoted to the doctrines of the Baptist Church and a generous contributor to denominational work, her interest and gifts continued until her demise; her daughters have exhibited the same intense loyalty to Baptist tenets.

There were nine children in the parental family, but two of these died in Missouri prior to the date of the westward migration. Isaac died at Walker's Basin in 1906, and William passed away in Calaveras county January 3, 1907, while Daniel S. died in Costa Rica, Central America, in 1909.

Diana is the widow of F. T. Barrows and resides at Bandon, Coos county, Ore.; Mary F. married D. W. Walser, of Walker's Basin; and Lavenia E. is the wife of Walker Rankin, also of Walker's Basin. Abia Taylor Lightner, who was the youngest of the family, resides on the northwest quarter of section 24, township 29 south, range 28 east, this being the township in which the city of Bakersfield is located. Proximity to the city and the fact that this is a frostless belt suitable for horticulture, especially for citrus fruits, induced him to build his residence at this point.

Coming to Kern county at the age of seven years, Abia Taylor Lightner remained here from 1857 until 1861, after which he spent a year in Santa Clara county with a sister, Mrs. Diana Barrows. This gave him an opportunity to attend school, which was not possible at the time in Kern county. After the death of his father in 1867 he attended Vacaville College for one year and during 1870 he entered Heald's Business College, from which he was graduated in June, 1871. Returning to Kern county and resuming farming and stock-raising, he continued at that occupation for a time, but afterward engaged as a bookkeeper. The Democrats of Kern county in 1873 nominated him to the office of county clerk, but he was defeated by F. W. Craig. From 1876 to 1878 he served as deputy sheriff under M. P. Wells. During 1879 he was elected county clerk and recorder, defeating his former opponent, F. W. Craig. On the first Monday in March, 1880, he entered upon his official duties. The new constitution went into effect during that year and rendered necessary another election. In the fall of 1880 he was again chosen for the position. At the expiration of the term of two years he was re-elected, serving until January of 1885.

After having engaged in mining with a brother, Daniel S., in May of 1886 Mr. Lightner associated himself with a brother-in-law, C. W. Fore, in the hotel business in Tulare. Ninety days later the hotel was burned to the ground. The disaster was complete and entailed a heavy loss upon Mr. Lightner, whose next position was that of searcher of records for Miller & Creighton of Visalia. Returning to Bakersfield in the spring of 1887, he formed a partnership with W. E. Houghton under the title of Houghton & Lightner, searchers of records. Upon being elected county assessor in the fall of 1890 on the Democratic ticket he retired from the abstract business. From January, 1891, until January, 1895, he acted as assessor, after which, his former partner having died, he took up the old Houghton & Lightner records and resumed abstracting, which he followed for three years. Upon the incorporation of the municipality of Bakersfield he was chosen city clerk. At the expiration of his term in 1910 he was not a candidate for re-election.

As an authority concerning land titles and values Mr. Lightner is said to have no superior in Kern county. His memory of location is unerring, his knowledge of valuations accurate, his judgment keen and his decisions seldom questioned. His office in Room 1, Producers' Savings Bank building, is a scene of constant business activity, for he is in demand as a searcher of records, a judge of land locations and values and an authority concerning titles. As an attorney practicing before the Interior Department, he is regarded as authority in all matters relating to the procedure of acquiring titles to lands under the various acts of congress pertaining thereto. He is one of the inheritance tax appraisers for Kern county, appointed by the state comptroller. The accuracy of his judgment is enhanced by his broad knowledge of jurisprudence, for at an early age he was admitted to practice as an attorney before United States land offices, his certificate of application bearing the signature of Hon. R. E. Arick, judge of the Superior Court of Kern county. One of the oldest native sons in California, he is also one of the most influential and prominent and further has the distinction of being the first past president of Bakersfield Parlor No. 42, N. S. G. W. Besides being connected with the Independent Order of Foresters, he is a charter member of Bakersfield Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E., and is now the oldest surviving member of that body. Mrs. Lightner, formerly Miss Tena Morrell, is also a native Californian and has spent her entire life in the west. There are two daughters in the family, Gladys and Marguerite, the elder of whom is the wife of B. K. Stroud, superintendent of drilling operations in Lost Hills for the Universal Oil Company.

W B Bab

JOHN BUTLER BATZ.—The president of the Bakersfield Abstract Company, who is a pioneer of 1874 in Kern county, represents the fourth generation of the Teutonic family of Batz in America. Henry, a son of the original German immigrant, was born in Pennsylvania, learned the trade of a shoemaker and followed the same in Indiana for many years and until his death. When he removed from the Keystone state he was accompanied by his son, Benjamin, who was born and reared near Philadelphia and after settling in Indiana followed the trade of millwright. Near Rochester, Fulton county, he built a grist-mill operated by water power. Ten miles from the nearest town he took up a tract of raw land and from it he developed a profitable farm, where he was still engaged in agricultural pursuits at the time of his death in 1863. In 1911, in that same vicinity, occurred the death of his wife, who bore the maiden name of Clarissa S. Rice and was born in Ohio. Of their six children only three are living, John Butler being the eldest of these. His two sisters are Mrs. Amelia Meredith of Bakersfield and Mrs. Emma Edgington of Indiana. At the old home farm in Fulton county, Ind., where he was born January 25, 1852, he passed the uneventful years of boyhood alternating attendance at the public schools with such farm work as his size and strength permitted. At the age of sixteen years he began to learn the carpenter trade with a skilled contractor in the home neighborhood and when only eighteen he was able to take up building contracts of his own, making the doors, sash, blinds, etc., by hand and finishing jobs in a manner satisfactory to customers.

Believing that opportunities would be greater further west, in 1872 Mr. Batz removed to Kansas and settled at Grenola, Howard county, but now Elk, where he engaged in carpentering. Not being entirely satisfied with the Sunflower state he came on to California in 1874 and settled in Kern county, where after a time he was employed as superintendent of the Landers stock farm in the South Fork country. Next he secured a clerkship with Michaels & Co., at Kernville. While thus occupied he established domestic ties, being married to Miss Sophie E. Smith, a native of Oakland, this state, and an earnest member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. They are parents of two children now living. The daughter, Daisy M., is the wife of J. H. Jordan, vice-president of the Bakersfield Abstract Company, and the son, Vernon S., is an employe of this company. Mrs. Batz is a daughter of Thomas H. Smith, a native of England, who after crossing the ocean settled in Ohio, but at the time of the discovery of gold in California he closed out his interests in Ohio and in 1849 sailed around the Horn to San Francisco. Later he engaged in the mercantile business in Oakland.

For some years Mr. Batz engaged in stock-raising and some time after his marriage he bought two hundred and forty acres on South Fork, where he had a profitable acreage in alfalfa, also engaged in horticulture and in addition made a specialty of the stock industry. For two years he served as under-sheriff with W. J. Graham and he also held office as trustee of the Scodie school district for some years. From the early period of his residence in the county he ranked among the leading Democrats and his services were in frequent demand as a member of the county central committee of the party. Nominated by the Democrats for the office of county treasurer in 1894, he was elected by a gratifying majority and took the oath of office in January of 1895. At the expiration of his term he was re-elected by a greatly increased majority, a fact which bears strong evidence as to the satisfactory nature of his services. When the second term expired in January, 1903, he was not a candidate for re-election, his business interests being so important as to demand his entire time and attention. Prior to that he had acquired stock in the Occidental Oil Company, operating a producing well near Maricopa, and of this company he served as treasurer and manager; besides he owned an interest in the Monarch Oil Company, proprietors of one hundred and sixty acres and managers of a well of strong productive capacity. After he had sold his oil interests he went to San Francisco and became treasurer and manager of the New Blue Jay Mining Company, owners of the Blue Jay mine on Coffee creek in Trinity county near Carrville. He assisted in organizing the Bakersfield Abstract Company in 1903 and was elected its first president, which position he has filled up to the present time. The company acquired the plant of Bender & Hewitt and thus became owners of the oldest set of records in the county. Employment is furnished to sixteen persons and a business of great importance has been established. On the organization of the National Bank of Bakersfield Mr. Batz was one of the incorporators and is a member of the board of directors. In the midst of extensive business interests and large political connections, he has found leisure for social and fraternal activities and with his wife has been active in the Kern County Pioneer Society, while in addition he is associated with the Fraternal Brotherhood, the Degree of Honor and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. In the latter he is past master workman and has served as representative to the grand lodge. The Independent Order of Odd Fellows has had the benefit of long years of interested activity on his part. As past noble grand and representative to the grand lodge, he is a leading factor in local lodge work, while he further has been prominent in the encampment and the canton, in the former having been representative to the Grand Encampment as well as a prominent official. Movements for the benefit of Kern county have received his staunch support and not the least of these is the organization and maintenance of the Bakersfield Abstract Company, which is a concern of vital importance to the realty affairs of the county and also of more than passing importance through its representation of insurance agencies and building and loan associations.

C. V. ANDERSON.—As examiner of titles for the Kern County Abstract Company, in which he is a large stockholder and also holds the office of vice-president, Mr. Anderson is intimately identified with one of the leading concerns of its kind in the San Joaquin valley. Descended from an old southern family, he was born at Memphis, Tenn., March 11, 1874, and is a son of James A. and Maria Anderson, the latter of whom died when C. V. was a very small child. After a successful career as an attorney in Memphis the father came to California in 1885 and opened a law office in Los Angeles, where he engaged in practice as a partner of the late Attorney-General Fitzgerald, of California. Twice married, by the two unions he became the father of fifteen children, seven of whom are living. Out of this large family C. V. was thirteenth in order of birth. From an early age he expressed a decided preference for the profession of the law, in which his two brothers, W. H. and James A., Jr., have also been successful, forming the firm of Anderson & Anderson, well-known among the law firms of Los Angeles.

After he had completed the studies of the public schools and St. Vincent's College, C. V. Anderson entered his father's office as a law student and during 1897 was admitted to the bar. With other members of the family he then engaged in practice in Los Angeles, whence he came to Bakersfield during the latter part of 1900, influenced in this move by the recent oil discoveries in the Kern county fields. In 1901 he formed a partnership with W. W. Kaye under the firm title of Anderson & Kaye, which connection continued until 1905 and meantime, from 1902 to 1905, he acted as adviser to the Kern County Abstract Company. Returning to Los Angeles in 1906 he became examiner of titles for the Title Insurance & Trust Company, also practiced his profession as a member of the firm of Anderson & Anderson, but in 1910 was induced to relinquish his associations in the southern metropolis in order to identify himself with the Kern County Abstract Company, an important and well-established concern of Bakersfield.

The marriage of Mr. Anderson took place in 1905 and united him with Miss Elizabeth Alexander, of Los Angeles, daughter of the late Col. Richard Henry Alexander, and Emily W. (Houston) Alexander, the latter still a resident of Los Angeles. During a long and brilliant career Colonel Alexander was retained successively as a surgeon in the army, as colonel on the staff of General Miles and as the head of the medical department of the west. Mr. and Mrs. Anderson are the parents of two daughters, Emily and Betty. The religious home of the family is in the Episcopal Church of Bakersfield, to the maintenance of which Mr. Anderson has contributed generously and in whose philanthropies he has been a willing assistant. The Masonic Order and the Bakersfield Club number him among their active members and their progressive projects have received his quiet but earnest co-operation. The Republican party embodies in its platform the principles which he believes to be best adapted to the welfare of the nation and he has given to it his steadfast allegiance.

JAMES EDGAR STONE.—The Kimball-Stone Drug Company ranks among the leading business concerns of Bakersfield. The present organization, which dates from 1904, has been engaged in business since 1910 at No. 1413 Nineteenth street, where the first floor is utilized for the various departments of the trade and in addition the basement furnishes storage facilities for a large reserve stock. The modern stock of the company, valued at $25,000, includes everything known to the science of medicine. The firm carries a full line of pure drugs and druggists' sundries, patent medicines of all kinds, toilet articles, perfumes, brushes and other articles to be found in a first-class shop of the kind. The compounding of prescriptions is a special feature of the business. For that purpose the freshest and purest of drugs are kept in stock. The prescription counter, unsurpassed by any in the state, is open to the public view by means of plate glass. The entire store is a model of neatness and system and indicates the thrifty qualities of the proprietors, whose skill as pharmacists is attested by their high reputation throughout the community.

The junior member of the firm, James Edgar Stone, was born at Warrensburg, Mo., July 23, 1881, and is a son of John W. and Elizabeth (Emery) Stone, natives respectively of Kentucky and Indiana, and early settlers of Missouri, where they were married and where they since have made their home. The father has engaged in raising live stock and still makes a specialty of handling live-stock, through which occupation, coupled with general farming, he has been enabled to reach financial success. In his family there are six children, the eldest of whom, Nellie May, is the wife of W. L. Hyer, an employe of a large packing house at Warrensburg, Mo. The eldest son, John William, Jr., is engaged in the drug business in Kansas City. The third and sixth among the children, Josephine B. and Pansy K., are teachers in the Bakersfield public schools. The fifth, Luther Brooks, is engaged in the stock business with his father. James Edgar, the fourth in order of birth, received his education in Warrensburg, where for three years he was a student in the Missouri State Normal, after he had completed the regular course in the public schools.

At the age of twenty-one years Mr. Stone matriculated in the St. Louis College of Pharmacy, where for two years he studied with industry, diligence and intelligence. At the expiration of that time he was graduated with the degree of Ph. G., as a member of the class of 1904, in which he had the honor of serving as vice-president. During the autumn of the same year he came to Bakersfield and purchased the interest of Dr. B. E. Morrow in the Morrow-Kimball Drug Company, the predecessor of the Kimball-Stone Drug Company. After some years at the old stand the firm removed in 1910 to their present location, where they have a modern and model shop, equipped with every facility and improvement designed to render the business satisfactory and successful. Customers are treated with the most gracious courtesy and are given every possible attention. The Johnson line of remedies and toilet articles is prepared at the manufacturing table, back of which is a room for reserve stock and in the basement a large reserve stock also is maintained. The firm makes a specialty of poisoned wheat manufactured for the extermination of squirrels and gophers. Their stock of Parke-Davis goods is the largest in the San Joaquin valley. Among their bacteriological serums is Dr. Schaeffer's phylacogeus, manufactured by a Bakersfield physician and already having to its credit many astonishing cures.

The marriage of Mr. Stone took place in Kern county and united him with Miss Mae Mouliot, daughter of Martin Mouliot, a stockman now residing in Bakersfield. Born at Tehachapi, Mrs. Stone received her early education in the Bakersfield schools and later completed a course of study in the Chico State Normal. For three years prior to her marriage she taught in the schools of East Bakersfield with gratifying success. Politically Mr. Stone has been staunch in his allegiance to the Democratic party, and has maintained a warm interest in public affairs. Since coming to Bakersfield he has been active in Masonry, and is now a Shriner of the York Rite. Personally he is decidedly popular with everyone with whom he has business dealings or social relations.

THOMAS NORMAN HARVEY.—The genealogy of the Harvey family is traced to England and includes the names of many men of sterling worth and patriotic spirit. During the progress of the Revolutionary struggle they became associated with Canadian affairs, and their intense sympathy with the cause of the Tories led to their being classed with the empire loyalists. Cultured endowments marked every generation of the past. Out of the traditions that lighten the obscurity of bygone ages their names emerge as educators of talent and as far back as the lineage can be traced their identification with pedagogy has been established and even at the present time their association with educational affairs is as pronounced as it is successful. After a lifetime of service in the Canadian schools, during which time he had the supervision of the schools at Sydenham and other Ontario towns, W. B. Harvey died at Toronto, Canada, January 10, 1913. One of his sons, J. F., is superintendent of the high schools at Peterboro, Ontario. A daughter, Catherine, married R. H. Cowley, who now holds the office of superintendent of education for the province of Ontario and resides at Toronto. The present identification of the family with educational work in Canada will thus be seen to be intimate and influential.

The youngest child in the family of W. B. and Jean (Watt) Harvey, (the latter of Scotch extraction) was Thomas Norman Harvey, whose birth occurred in Ontario, Canada, December 9, 1878, and whose education was received in his native province. After he had graduated from the Sydenham high school in 1896 he matriculated in the Ottawa Normal School and took the regular course of study in that institution, graduating with the class of 1900. Immediately after his graduation he took up the task of teaching and served successively as principal of the schools at Strathroy and Parry Sound, Ontario, while in addition for a short time he acted as proprietor and publisher of a weekly newspaper in the village of Wyoming, a small town in Ontario, directly east of Port Huron, Mich. During January of 1904 he came to California and settled in the Napa valley, where for six months he studied law in the office of W. F. Henning and then continued his studies in the Hastings Law School at San Francisco. During 1905, while still a student in the law school, he was admitted upon examination to the supreme court of California and since then he has devoted his attention to law practice. Coming to Bakersfield in July of 1910 he opened an office and has since made a specialty of oil and mining law, practicing before the United States land office. His office is located at No. 1667 Chester avenue and there much of his time is devoted to tireless and effective work in behalf of clients. Earnest in the preparation of cases, logical in reasoning faculties, well informed in the law, he has demonstrated his admirable qualifications for his chosen profession. One month before he came to Bakersfield he was united in marriage with Miss Violet Salter, daughter of J. W. Salter, who was a prominent pioneer and well-known druggist of San Francisco. Mr. Harvey is the father of a son who bears his name. In religion he was reared in the faith of the Church of England and has assisted in other movements for the general advancement.

Joseph Warren Sumner

JOSEPH WARREN SUMNER.—With the earlier events that shaped the history of Kern County the name of this California pioneer of '49 was intimately associated and the title of Judge, by which he was long and familiarly known, came to him through an efficient service of more than thirty years as justice of the peace at Kernville. For the difficult tasks incident to the development of a frontier community he was well qualified by the inheritance of rugged traits of mind and sturdy endurance of body from a long line of American ancestors who were pioneer upbuilders. Whether his task was that leading occupation of earlier days, mining, or the equally arduous experiences incident to hauling freight between Los Angeles and Kernville; whether presiding over the justice court with keen discrimination and impartial judgment or with far-seeing discernment concerning future conditions planting and developing the first commercial orchard in the Kernville region, into each responsibility he threw his energies with the whole-souled devotion and enthusiastic interest that made him a leader among pioneers.

The genealogy of the Sumner family shows a close association with the colonial history of New England, where they became residents about the middle of the seventeenth century. The family history shows that William, the only son of Roger and Joan (Franklin) Sumner (the former a husbandman of Bicester, Oxford, England), was born in that English shire in 1605 and some time after his marriage to Mary West he brought his family to America, settling at Dorchester, Mass., where for many years he was a member of the general court and a prominent citizen. The next generation was represented by William, Jr., likewise a native of Bicester, England, and who married Elizabeth, daughter of Augustine Clement, of Dorchester, England. Throughout much of his life he followed the sea, but eventually he retired to Boston and there his death occurred in February, 1675. Clement, son of William, Jr., was born in Boston September 6, 1671, and married Margaret Harris, by whom he was the father of a son, Samuel Sumner, born in Boston August 31, 1709, and married at Charlestown, Mass., to Abigail, daughter of Samuel Frothingham, of that place. The death of Samuel Sumner occurred January 26, 1784. In the next generation was Ebenezer Sumner, born in Boston in March of 1742, married to Elizabeth Tappan and deceased at Newburyport, Mass., December 27, 1823. Hon. Joseph Sumner, son of Ebenezer, was born at Newburyport, Mass., May 26, 1783, became a merchant at Lubec, Me., served as a member of the Maine state legislature and died September 21, 1861. By his marriage to Sarah Wiggin, a lineal descendant of Governor Wiggin, of Massachusetts, there was born at Newburyport, Mass., January 3, 1819, a son, Joseph Warren Sumner, who in early manhood, after having completed an academic education, engaged in merchandising in Lubec, Me., and also operated a line of fishing boats from that isolated Atlantic port. The discovery of gold in California furnished the incentive for his emigration from the bleak coast of eastern Maine to the then unknown shores of the Pacific. A voyage via Panama brought him to San Francisco, from which city he proceeded to the mines of the Sierras. From that time he never entirely relinquished his identification with mining and his interests in that work took him as far away as British Columbia. During 1860 he became the owner of the Sumner mine at Kernville, where for many years he also owned and operated the Sumner mill, besides conducting a freighting business to Los Angeles. As early as 1869 he purchased the Sumner ranch across the north fork from Kernville and there he embarked in horticulture upon a scale larger than that attempted by previous experimenters in that occupation.

The marriage of Judge Sumner in Lubec, Me., August 3, 1843, united him with Miss Mary E. Dakin, who was born at Digby, Nova Scotia, January 16, 1826. They were spared to a long married life of mutual service and helpfulness and in death were not long divided, his demise taking place at his Kernville home March 29, 1911, when he had reached the age of ninety-two, while the death of his wife followed in the same year on the 31st of May, rounding out eighty-five useful years. Their only son, Elisha Payson Sumner, had passed away at Saco, Me., November 23, 1871. The older daughter, Mary Josephine, of Los Angeles, was the wife of the late Rev. C. G. Belknap, a member of the Southern California conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. The youngest member of the family circle, Alice Maude, is the widow of Andrew Brown, formerly a prominent merchant and banker of Los Angeles. From the standpoint of citizenship Judge Sumner was progressive, in personal character he was just and yet generous and broad. For many years he served as a member of the school board and aided in the building of school houses and the establishment of school districts. Fraternally he was a Master Mason. Originally an old-line Whig in politics, on the founding of the Republican party he transferred his allegiance to its principles and also supported the abolitionist movement from its inception. It was his privilege to vote at eighteen presidential elections, dating back to the exciting campaign of William Henry Harrison, when even at the remote and isolated Maine home of the Sumner family the cry of "Tippecanoe and Tyler too" was the most familiar slogan of the period, and extending through all the years up to and including the scarcely less exciting and interesting Roosevelt campaigns.

WILLIAM VANDEVER MATLACK.—The cashier of the Security Trust Company of Bakersfield traces his lineage to England and Holland and is himself a native of Philadelphia, born February 20, 1859. His parents, John R. and Lydia B. (Vandever) Matlack, were natives respectively of Philadelphia and Baltimore and for many years the former engaged in a manufacturing business in his native city, but after his retirement from business cares he came to California, and in 1896 his death occurred in this state. The English progenitors of the family had spelled the name Matlock and during the Revolutionary war Timothy Matlock, a leading Philadelphia representative of the family, had been identified in business activities with Robert Morris, the financier of the colonists during the first struggle with England. The maternal ancestry was of Dutch extraction. The records show that William Vandever, exiled from Holland during the thirty years' war, found a temporary refuge in Sweden and during 1682 crossed the Atlantic ocean to the new world in company with a colony of Swedes that settled in Delaware. From him descended William Vandever, a bookbinder by trade and a gallant soldier during the War of 1812; after the close of that struggle he settled in Baltimore, where occurred the birth of his daughter, Lydia B., later Mrs. Matlack. Her death occurred in Philadelphia. The oldest son in the family became a prominent resident of California and served as member of congress from Ventura county.

In a family comprising four sons and two daughters, of whom two of the sons are deceased, William Vandever Matlack was third in order of birth and was reared in Philadelphia, where he was graduated from the high school and where later he held a mercantile position. Coming to California in 1887, he made a sojourn of two years in Monrovia and in 1889 settled at Bakersfield, where since he has made his home and where he has wielded a large influence as public-spirited citizen and progressive business man. For some years he was associated with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, first as an assistant and later as chief clerk of the Bakersfield freight office. During 1898 he was chosen local freight and passenger agent, a position of great responsibility, which he filled with recognized efficiency and tact. Resigning in 1908 to accept a position as assistant cashier of the Bank of Bakersfield, he entered upon his present connection with the financial affairs of his home city. Since February 1, 1911, he has been cashier of the bank of the Security Trust Company. While still living in Philadelphia he married Miss Margaret V. Mendenhall, who was born in that city and descended from English ancestry. They are the parents of five daughters, Florence, Edith, Lydia, Mary and Ellen.

Ever since attaining his majority Mr. Matlack has voted with the Republican party. Throughout the entire period of his residence in Bakersfield he has maintained an unceasing interest in civic and educational affairs. During 1891 he was elected a member of the Sumner school board and for fifteen years he served as clerk of that organization, two new schoolhouses being erected during the term of his service. During April of 1908 he was elected a member of the Kern board of trustees and in the summer of the same year he was chosen chairman to fill a vacancy caused by the death of James L. de Pauli. Upon the consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern in 1910 and the organization of Bakersfield as a city of the fifth class, as decided upon by a majority of the voters of both towns, a new election was held July 10, 1910, and Mr. Matlack was chosen a member of the board of trustees of the new city. At the organization of the board he was elected its president. The election of April, 1911, again made him a member of the board of trustees and again he was chosen president of the board, which position he now fills, discharging its duties with characteristic energy and efficiency. For years he has been a leading local worker in the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, in which he served as Exalted Ruler, and in addition he has been associated with the Bakersfield Club. In Pennsylvania he was made a Mason in Fort Washington Lodge, A. F. & A. M.

The Security Trust Company, of which Mr. Matlack is cashier, was incorporated October 7, 1910, with an original paid-up capital of $300,000, but which was increased to $500,000 on January 21, 1913, and conducts business at Chester avenue and Eighteenth street. A savings department forms an important addition to the bank. There is also a trust department, which acts as executor, administrator, guardian, trustee, etc., and the advantages of a strong and perpetual company over individuals in these capacities are too apparent and too universally recognized to call for special comment. The safety deposit department is outfitted with fire and burglar-proof vaults, with rental compartments convenient for the needs of patrons. Since its inception the bank has pursued a conservative course in the making of loans and has won the confidence of a growing list of depositors. On October 19, 1912, the Bank of Bakersfield was purchased and consolidated with the Security Trust Company, whose deposits have now reached practically $3,000,000. The success of the concern may be attributed to the sagacious judgment of its officers and directors, who are as follows: G. J. Planz, President; William V. Matlack, cashier; C. A. Barlow, D. L. Brown, A. S. Crites, W. W. Colm, W. W. Frazier, H. R. Peacock, Chris Mattley, J. M. Jameson, J. A. Hughes, D. Hirshfeld, L. P. St. Clair, G. J. Planz, F. W. Warthorst, J. W. Heard and W. A. Howell.

WALTER OSBORN.—Education and experience alike abundantly qualify Mr. Osborn for able services in the profession of law. When first he determined upon his future calling he placed before himself a high ideal and aspired to gain a classical and legal education that would give him a standing equal to the best. Studious in childhood, always near the head of his class in the public schools, he carried the same devotion to scholarship into college and university and allowed no trivial matter to lessen his ardor for his books. The result was that he acquired a broad knowledge concerning all subjects of general importance, while in his specialty he grasped the principles of jurisprudence with a calm, logical and well-trained mind, and upon receiving his degree entered upon a professional career with every promise of success. During the course of his practice in Indiana he was more than ordinarily popular and it was only the failure of his health that induced him to sever ties so promising for future gains. Since he came to Bakersfield he has been given a place in the profession for which his talents, education and former record qualify him.

The youngest of eight children, all of whom lived to maturity, Walter Osborn was born near Wanatah, LaPorte county, Ind., June 10, 1875, being a son of John and Jane (McIntyre) Osborn, both now deceased. The father passed away when his youngest child was a boy of ten years, but the mother, a woman of energy and capability, did not permit the education of the children to be neglected by reason of their bereavement, and she constantly aided the boy in his efforts to secure the best possible advantages. After he had completed the high-school course at Wanatah he entered Valparaiso University, where he took the commercial course. Next he matriculated in the classical department of Indiana University at Bloomington, from which he was graduated in 1902 with the degree of A.B. Continuing in the same institution as a law student, he completed the regular course and in 1904 received the degree of LL.B., at the same time winning admission to the state and federal courts of the Indiana bar.

Three and one-half years of association with the firm of Anderson, Parker & Crabill, of South Bend, Ind., proved most helpful to the young lawyer, who left them in order to form a partnership with Charles Weidler under the firm name of Weidler & Osborn. For one and one-half years he remained in that connection and meanwhile enjoyed a steady growth in practice, laying the foundation of a success that would have been permanent had not the failure of his health forced him to seek another climate. Altogether, his experience in South Bend has proved most helpful to him in later activities. The firm with which he first associated was one of great prominence, representing the Grand Trunk Railroad, the Pennsylvania lines, St. Joseph County Savings Bank, Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company and other large corporations of that important manufacturing city. Upon leaving the state he spent fifteen months in the Coeur d'Alene district of Idaho, whence in October of 1910 he came to California, settling in Bakersfield on the 13th of December of the same year. On the 12th of that month he was admitted to practice in the courts of California, this being about six years after he had been admitted to practice in the St. Joseph Circuit Court of Indiana, the Supreme Court of that state and the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Indiana.

As an attorney Mr. Osborn is to be credited for two things particularly, first: he makes a very thorough preparation of each case and his briefs on questions of law are most thorough; second, he is a lawyer of strict integrity. To these particulars he clings with most unswerving fidelity, much to the advantage of his growing clientage. While engaged in practice in Indiana he married at Remington, that state, April 27, 1905, Miss Priscilla Hawkins, by whom he has two children, Marion B. and Priscilla J. In politics he is stanch in allegiance to Democratic principles and the present administration. Fraternally he holds membership with the Elks and Masons and is a firm believer in the principles of kindness, philanthropy and helpful comradeship for which these orders stand.

S. S. McIntosh

PRESTON SMITH McCUTCHEN.—Very early in the colonization of America the McCutchen family became identified with the agricultural development of a region lying near the Atlantic seaboard. In the new world, as in their former home in Scotland, they evinced a forceful and resolute determination that won local prestige. Not the least conspicuous member of the family and certainly one of its most gallant patriots and honored representatives was James Corsey McCutchen, a native of Georgia and a soldier in the war of 1812, where only his lack of education prevented him from winning an officer's commission. Upon the close of the war he engaged in the trade of blacksmithing in Virginia. However, while giving his days to manual labor, he devoted his evenings to study, for he was ambitious to make up for lack of early advantages. After he had attained man's estate he took up the common branches of study, taught himself by dint of resolute perseverance and eventually became the possessor of a broad fund of information along every line of mental activity. Particularly was he thorough in mathematics and his work in that line showed considerable native talent. Withal, he was a skilled mechanic, a capable blacksmith and invented a process of setting wagon tires which has never since been improved upon by anyone.

While living in Virginia James Corsey McCutchen married Mrs. Mary Humphreys, a widow with three children, James, William and Jane. Born in the Old Dominion, she was a daughter of John Nevins, an Irishman who enlisted under the English flag and became a sailor in the British navy, but deserted his ship in order that he might enlist in the feeble army of patriots fighting for liberty during the Revolutionary war. Having served with distinction until the close of the struggle, he then secured an honorable discharge and settled in Virginia to devote his remaining years to development work in his adopted country. In person he was stalwart and strong, the possessor of a splendid physique, while temperamentally he had the characteristics of the Celt. His daughter, Mary (or Polly, as she was called in the home circle) became the wife of John Humphreys, who served as a commissioned officer during the war of 1812 and remained at the front until he was shot in battle. A few years later the widow became the wife of James Corsey McCutchen. Nine children were born of their union, namely: John N., Allen (who died at the age of six months), Preston Smith, Robert Sloan, Nancy, Martha, Mary Margery, Elizabeth and Perry.

From Virginia the family removed to Missouri and after a brief sojourn in St. Louis proceeded up the river to St. Charles, where the second son, Preston Smith, was born February 24, 1820. In March of that year the family removed to Callaway county, Mo., where the father not only had a blacksmith shop, but also cultivated land. Leaving Missouri in 1836, he took the family to Iowa and settled on a tract of raw land in Van Buren county, where his wife died. Later he married a second time, but had no children by that union. In 1854 he died at the old Iowa homestead. When the family left Missouri Preston Smith McCutchen was a youth of sixteen, strong and sturdy, eager to be of use in the home and in the world. His father had not permitted any of the boys to learn blacksmithing, therefore he had turned his attention to farming and kindred pursuits. In those days one of the most important tasks on a farm was the clearing of the land and no one could use an axe with greater skill than he, nor could any of the young farmers of the locality surpass him in swinging a scythe or in cradling the grain. Agriculture was then conducted in somewhat primitive fashion, for the magnificent harvesters of the present day, the drills, pulverizers, planters and other modern machinery had not then come into use.

While living in Van Buren county Mr. McCutchen married Miss Jane Wilsey, a splendid young woman, who contributed much to his later success. Of the union there are eight children, namely: James B., Warren C., George W., and Edmund W., who are represented elsewhere in this volume; Mary A., wife of C. W. Johnson, whose sketch appears on another page; Clara J., widow of William G. Wallace and a resident of the vicinity of Hanford; Harriet C., wife of Benjamin Scott, a contractor in San Francisco; and Robert Lincoln, the youngest of the family, and living ten miles southwest of Bakersfield. The McCutchen brothers not only own some of the best producing wells in the Sunset Midway oil field, but also own considerable good agricultural land as well as dairy farms in the Old River district south and west of Bakersfield.

The first trip made by Mr. McCutchen across the plains occurred during the summer of 1850, when he accompanied an expedition of Argonauts to the western country. Starting from Bentonsport, Iowa, with a team of oxen and a wagon, he landed safely at Diamond Springs, Eldorado county, after a tedious trip of six months. In placer mining he met with a fair degree of success. Soon he was able to send $100 back to his wife and later he sent her $500, while in addition he forwarded $200 to pay off an indebtedness he had incurred. The balance of his money he took back in person, when he returned via Panama in 1853. The one-year old son had in his absence grown into a sturdy child of four years, but the success of the trip compensated him somewhat for the long absence from his family. In 1854, accompanied by wife and child, he again crossed the plains with oxen and wagon. Upon his arrival in California he went to the mines of Placer county. After some three years he took his family to Sacramento county, bought land and started to develop a farm. Unfortunately it developed that the land was underlaid with hard pan, but he refused to give up until fourteen years of unsuccessful effort convinced him that it was useless to remain longer. Next he settled in the mountains of Monterey county and engaged in the sheep business, but his sons found the work uncongenial and on their account he removed to Kings county, taking up land five and one-half miles northeast of Hanford, where after the death of his wife in 1877 he made his home with his daughter, Mrs. Wallace. About 1911 his sons prevailed upon him to remove to Kern county and he now makes his home with his son, George W., on the McCutchen Brothers Oil Company's lease near Maricopa. Every member of the family is devoted to his welfare and displays the most tender consideration for his happiness. Notwithstanding the fact that he has been a hard-working man, his ninety-three years rest lightly upon his broad shoulders and he still looks out upon life with the cheerful optimism, progressive spirit and keen mentality more often found in youth than in age.

W. A. EARDLEY.—In the pioneer days of any community the flouring mill is an important enterprise. A leading concern of the kind is the Kern River mills, at Bakersfield, which branch of the Kern County Land Company was established to provide a demand for wheat grown in the country round about and to put a fine grade of flour on the local market. The mills, at Truxtun avenue and S street, include roller machinery of the latest type and up-to-date appliances generally such as are requisite to success in this branch of manufacture. The establishment consumes all the milling wheat grown in Kern county and large quantities of the choicest Kansas hard wheat and of the best wheat produced in Washington. All its wheat is scientifically tested and each and every sack of its flour is guaranteed to be as good as any flour offered in competition. W. A. Eardley, the superintendent under whose watchful care this business is carried on, is an experienced business and mill man, and has long been identified with the development of Bakersfield.

Born in England, a son of William Eardley, Mr. Eardley was brought when quite young to the United States by his father, who located at Granville, Washington county, N. Y. There the son was educated in public schools and also acquired a practical knowledge of the mercantile business. In 1885 he removed to Kane county, Ill., but after four years of clerking there he found a new field of enterprise at Salt Lake City, Utah. From there he came to California in 1893, settling in Los Angeles, where he engaged in the hotel business. In 1900 he removed to Bakersfield, where he was manager of the grocery department of Dinkelspiel Brothers until 1905. It was in the year last mentioned that his connection with the milling department of the Kern County Land Company was begun.

As a citizen Mr. Eardley is progressive and thoroughly up-to-date, devoted to the best interests of Bakersfield, of Kern county and of California. He has advanced to high rank as a Mason, having been initiated into the order in Illinois as a member of Batavia Lodge No. 404, A. F. & A. M., with which he still affiliates while holding membership in the Kern Valley Chapter, R. A. M. Bakersfield Commandery No. 39, K. T., and Al Malaikah Temple, N. M. S. of Los Angeles.

HON. JOSEPH H. TAM.—The attorneys of Bakersfield have gained distinction throughout the state by reason of their far-reaching activities, their broad knowledge of jurisprudence and their familiarity with cases involving intricate questions and large amounts. Not the least influential among these attorneys is Joseph H. Tam, son and namesake of an honored California pioneer of 1849 and himself the possessor of a substantial knowledge of fundamental law, a superior intellectual culture and a gracious dignity that has established him in local prestige. To ability and high purpose he adds the devotion that comes from a life-long residence in the west. The greater part of his useful life has been passed in his native commonwealth, although he enjoys the advantages derived by an intimate identification with Alaska during a period of professional practice in that country. Residence in Bakersfield, although covering only a comparatively few years, has brought him into prominence in many civic struggles and has led him into an unforeseen political activity with increasing possibilities for useful public service.

The discovery of gold in California was the incentive for migration hither on the part of Joseph H. Tam, Sr., and his wife, who bore the maiden name of Sarah Glassford. For two years subsequent to his arrival the newcomer mined for gold, but, destiny withholding from him any great gifts in gold, he turned his attention to the tilling of the soil. He was one of the very first settlers upon the broad ranch lands of the San Joaquin valley, where as yet no attempt had been made at cultivation. On every hand the land remained in its primeval condition of sage brush and sand, its rich possibilities hidden beneath an uninviting surface, its future wealth unguessed by the most hopeful of optimists. To his labors in the new field he brought the advantage of an excellent education, largely acquired in a western Pennsylvania college (of which he was a graduate). In addition he had the advantage of fine native abilities, excellent judgment and business acumen. The splendid pioneer element that laid the foundation of American prosperity had in him a forceful representative.

Throughout his early years Joseph H. Tam, Jr., lived in Stockton, this state. There he was born April 8, 1862, and there he received his education in the public schools. It was while serving as city assessor of Stockton, to which office he was elected in 1884 and re-elected for a second term, that his attention was turned to the study of the law and his readings were conducted in the law office of Terry, Campbell & Bennett, of that city. He was admitted to the bar of the state in 1887, and immediately afterward began in practice in his native city, where in 1890 he was elected city justice. At the expiration of his term of four years he was re-elected for another term and when he had served out that time he removed from Stockton to San Francisco, where he engaged in a general practice for six years. Attracted to Alaska during 1900 by a desire to travel through and investigate conditions in that country, he was induced to establish a law office at Nome, where he remained for seven years, meanwhile also engaging actively in placer mining. In addition to a general practice he acted as attorney for the Pioneer Mining Company and other corporations.

Upon leaving Alaska to resume residence in the United States, Mr. Tam traveled for a time and during 1909 opened an office at Bakersfield, where he has since become prominently identified with professional and civic enterprises. In coming to this city to establish a home he was accompanied by his accomplished wife, whom he had married in 1896, and who was formerly Miss Alice Carey Treadway, of Covington, Ky. Movements for the progress and development of his home city receive his cordial support. The high standing which he occupies in professional circles is indicated by the fact that he has been chosen chairman of the board of trustees of the law library, while his popularity in the Republican party is evidenced in the presentation of his name September 3, 1912, at the party primaries as a candidate for the assembly from the fifty-sixth district. Although not solicitous for party honors, preferring indeed the quiet round of professional duties and social enjoyment, he is not negligent of his duties as a loyal citizen and public-spirited patriot, nor is he unmindful of the opportunities for efficient service for which his unusual abilities eminently qualify him.

MRS. HARRIET VAN ORMAN.—Any list of the pioneers of Bakersfield would be incomplete without the name of Mrs. Van Orman, whose life has been identified with this place continuously since 1860 and who has witnessed the remarkable transformation of the community from a desolate, unpeopled spot to a large city, teeming with industry and surrounded by fertile, well-tilled fields. No attribute of her character is more pronounced than that of devotion to the community of her adoption. Every part of the city possesses for her a unique interest, far beyond the feeling it would arouse in the casual visitor. For many years she has lived at her present home on the corner of Seventeenth and K streets, where it is her expectation to remain until her earth life ends and where she will continue to watch with unabated pleasure the upward growth of Bakersfield. Even in the days when Kern Island had no population excepting rabbits, mosquitoes and gnats, when the sole crop was weeds and the sole visitor an occasional wandering Indian, she had faith that a large city would one day stand on the spot, and she is equally optimistic now concerning Bakersfield's great future and large influence as a business center.

Harriet Taylor was born at Jonesboro, Tenn., September 26, 1835, and is a daughter of the late Skelton and Mary (McCray) Taylor, natives respectively of Virginia and South Carolina. Her paternal grandfather, Henry Taylor, was a soldier in the war of 1812 and her great-grandfather, Christopher, Taylor, who descended from English ancestry, served in the Revolution. The maternal grandfather, Henry McCray, a native of Scotland, married a Miss Moore of South Carolina and became a large planter on the Chattahoochee river in Georgia. When she was one year old her parents moved to Alabama and settled at Huntsville, where she was educated in private schools and an academy. At the age of fifteen she accompanied her family to Texas and there completed her education in a private school.

At Bonham, Tex., in 1854, Miss Taylor became the wife of Robert Gilbert, a native of Tennessee and for years a large land owner in Texas, where he built and operated a saw and grist mill on Bordeaux lake. Two children were born of their union. The son, William Gilbert, became a mining man and died at Bakersfield in 1904. The daughter, Mrs. Callie Pettit, is now living at Tejen, Kern county. During 1859 Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert, accompanied by their two children, removed from Texas to California, making the journey via the Butterfield stage-coach. Their destination was San Jose, but in the fall of the same year they settled at Visalia and September 26, 1860, they arrived at what is now the site of Bakersfield. Later Mrs. Gilbert took up a claim of a quarter section on section 18, near Bellevue, and afterward she became a shareholder in the canal, which made it possible for her to put the place under cultivation to alfalfa. Her second marriage united her with N. Van Orman, of this county. Having been well posted concerning affairs in early days and possessing a retentive memory, she is a very interesting conversationalist and an hour spent in her society, when she is in a reminiscent mood, enables one to gain a vivid comprehension of the trials, hardships and discouragements of those far distant days.

J. B. McArthur

JAMES B. McCUTCHEN.—The position to which he has risen and the obstacles which he has overcome prove the ability of Mr. McCutchen, at the same time indicating what it is within the power of any man of integrity, energy and determination to accomplish for himself. Of discouragements he has had many and vicissitudes not a few, yet all of these he endured with fortitude and conquered by persistence. Whether it was the misfortune of failure in viticulture or an attempt in peach-raising where the cost of production exceeded the receipts from the total sales, or whether it was long sojourns in Old Mexico, enduring the hardships of camp life and the native food, none of his disastrous experiences dampened his ardor or lessened his courage, but each in turn rendered possible the attainment of a final success, represented now by the possession of a fine alfalfa ranch of eighty acres situated nine and one-half miles southwest of Bakersfield under the Stine canal; represented also by a valuable dairy herd comprising one hundred and twenty cows and the modern and sanitary equipment demanded by the up-to-date development of the dairy industry. Recently he erected on his ranch an attractive bungalow of ten rooms, fitted with modern conveniences, not the least of these being electricity furnished by his own electric (Gray and Davis) plant.

Although not a native of California, the early recollections of James B. McCutchen cluster around this state and he was familiar with its development from a frontier community filled with gold-miners to a prosperous commonwealth with varied industries and great possibilities. Born at Bentonsport, Iowa, October 26, 1849, he was four years of age when his father, Preston S. McCutchen (represented elsewhere in this volume) brought the family across the plains and settled at Franklin, Sacramento county. During boyhood he attended the public schools and when not in school he aided his father on the home farm. At the age of twenty years he passed an examination for a teacher's certificate and secured a school at Stony creek in Colusa county, where he taught for two years. From early life he was an expert marksman and interested in the hunting of game. Upon giving up his school he joined with his brother in hunting geese, ducks and quail for the San Francisco markets. Their headquarters were at Tulare lake, from which place they hunted throughout Tulare and Kern counties. During the winter of 1874-75 they shipped almost forty-two thousand ducks and geese, a total weight of forty-two tons in the one season or a little over two pounds per bird, the express charges on the shipments being three cents a pound.

After having given his time to hunting game for a number of years, Mr. McCutchen in 1880 went to the Tiger mine in Arizona. In a short time he secured a school near Prescott and during the next four years he taught in Yavapai county. The stock-raising industry in the Agua Fria region next engaged his attention. Upon his return to California in 1890 he came to Bakersfield and purchased twenty acres in the Old River district. This tract forms the nucleus of his present possessions. His first attempt was to cultivate raisin grapes, but after two crops he replaced the vines with peach trees. The orchard developed successfully and the fruit was of the finest quality, but after peeling and drying the peaches he could not secure more than six cents per pound, which was less than the cost of production. Finding the enterprise unprofitable he grubbed out the trees and put the land under cultivation to alfalfa. While in the main he has devoted himself to the ranch he has had other interests in the meantime. From 1892 to 1895 he spent much time in Old Mexico along the west coast from California to Central America, hunting the egret and the heron for their plumes. At times he would have $3,000 worth of plumes in one suitcase. The dealers in New York paid as much as $30 an ounce for egrets and $10 an ounce for the heron plumes. Unfortunately the business was almost annihilated by the natives, who hunted ruthlessly, without any regard to the saving of the young. This rendered continuance in the business unprofitable.

In order to secure the pasturage necessary for his large herd of milch cows, Mr. McCutchen has leased an alfalfa ranch of three hundred and twenty acres two miles from his home and on the leased property he maintains his stock. The dairy is equipped with a modern sanitary system for the handling of the milk and this, during the heated season, is iced en route to Taft, Maricopa and Fellows, where it is sold to the local retail trade. The utmost care is maintained in the management of the dairy. Not the slightest detail is neglected and it is due to the rigid supervision that complete satisfaction exists among the customers. While the supervision of the dairy and the care of the ranch require close attention on the part of Mr. McCutchen, he has found time for other interests and has been particularly interested in oil development. With his brothers he located one hundred and sixty acres, forming the southwest quarter of the famous section 32, two miles east of Maricopa. On twenty acres of this tract there has been developed by the Maricopa Queen Oil Company one of the best oil wells on the west side, the production from the well averaging two thousand barrels per day of twenty-four gravity oil.

The marriage of Mr. McCutchen was solemnized at Prescott, Ariz., December 26, 1886, and united him with Miss Margaret P. Dickson, who was born at Downey, Cal., January 27, 1868, and is a woman of refinement and true worth. Her parents, John and Mary (Ehle) Dickson, natives of Tennessee and Iowa respectively and pioneers of Los Angeles county, Cal., afterward became early settlers of Yavapai county, Ariz., and lived upon a stock ranch there for some years. In 1901, when seventy-two years of age, Mr. Dickson died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. McCutchen, with whom Mrs. Dickson, now sixty-four years of age, has since remained. There are four children in the McCutchen family, namely: Preston J., who is engaged in the retail milk business on the west side, his headquarters being at Taft; Ollie, a graduate of Hald's Normal and Business College at Stockton and now a teacher at Taft; Van Dickson, proprietor of the Chester machine works in Bakersfield; and Perry, a student in the Kern County high school. Deeply interested in the cause of education, Mr. McCutchen has not limited his attention to aiding his children in securing excellent educational advantages, but has been desirous that every child in the community should receive a practical education. For some years he has served as clerk of the board of trustees of the Old River school district. Politically he is a protectionist and a Republican of progressive tendencies. As a citizen he favors all movements for the well-being of the people, while as an agriculturist he is deeply interested in the development of Kern county land and has an abiding faith in the possibilities of the soil when rightly cultivated and regularly irrigated.

JACOB NIEDERAUR.—It was the good fortune of Bakersfield to enjoy during its early history, as in its later era of progress, the loyal devotion of men of ability, energy and progressive spirit. To the foundation laid by such citizens was added the superstructure of subsequent effort that rendered possible the prosperity now attained by the city. In the list of capable pioneers no name stands out with greater prominence and none is more worthy of an honorable place in local annals than that of the late Jacob Niederaur, who from the time of his settlement in the then struggling, insignificant village in 1869 until his death, February 9, 1903, contributed persistently, effectively and intelligently to the advancement of the town commercially, materially and financially, contributing his quota to every enterprise for the general welfare and leaving the impress of his forceful personality upon every civic project. It would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to name an enterprise of pioneer days which failed to receive his quiet but efficient support. A master workman, skilled in the use of tools, and without a superior in his trade of a cabinet-maker, he did not limit his activities to the occupation in which he had achieved signal success, but entered into other avenues of labor. From the first he appreciated the value to this county of its great oil resources. Nor did he fail to realize the excellent location of Bakersfield as a business headquarters for the oil fields. Other resources of the community were backed by his sincere faith and generous support and the wisdom of his judgment was proved by his own large success, as well as by the steady advancement made by the county and city of his adoption.

Born in Bavaria, Germany, June 15, 1841, Jacob Niederaur was nine years of age when brought to America by his parents, who settled at Bryan, Ohio. He was one of four sons, all of whom were trained by their father, a skilled mechanic, into a thorough knowledge of cabinet-making as soon as they were old enough to handle tools. In skill and quickness he soon proved the equal of the others and was able to earn his livelihood at the trade while yet very young. When he came to Bakersfield at the age of twenty-eight years he had no difficulty in finding employment as a cabinet-maker. Although he had no capital he was thrifty and economical and soon he was able to embark in the furniture business. The beginning of the business was very small, but as time passed he enlarged his stock of furniture and became the leading furniture dealer in the entire valley. Shortly after his arrival in Bakersfield he was impressed by the need of an undertaking establishment and he at once began to study the business, acquiring a thorough familiarity with its every detail. He is remembered today as the pioneer undertaker of the city. During the early days the business houses were mere shacks, but he became a champion of better buildings and himself set the example by erecting a substantial block, the first floor of which he utilized for his undertaking establishment and furniture, while the second floor he rented for general lodge, hall and lecture purposes. At the time of the incorporation of the Southern Hotel Company he became a stockholder in the new enterprise and was enthusiastic in his efforts to secure adequate hotel accommodations for the growing city. Although intensely devoted to the welfare of the community it was not possible to secure his acceptance of public offices and he took no part in politics whatever aside from voting the Republican ticket. The only lodge to which he belonged was the Knights of Pythias, and in that order he ever maintained a warm interest.

For some years after his arrival in the west Mr. Niederaur continued to lead a single life, and it was in this city that he met the attractive young lady whom he chose as his wife. She was Miss Lucy J. Williams, who was born in Ross county, Ohio, May 10, 1860, but grew to girlhood in Vermont, her mother having returned to that state after the death of the husband and father. At the age of sixteen years Miss Williams left the east to come to California as governess for the children of Philo Jewett at Bakersfield. While filling this position she met Mr. Niederaur, whom she married August 6, 1878. Two children came to bless their union, Philip Williams and Helen Jewett. After the death of Mr. Niederaur his widow continued to make her home in the elegant family residence, which since her death, November 30, 1909, has been occupied by her daughter and son-in-law, Helen Jewett Forrest and Thomas W. Forrest. This young couple were married October 16, 1911, Mr. Forrest being vice-president of the E. H. Loveland Produce Company and one of the leading young business men of Bakersfield. The son, Philip Williams Niederaur, formerly engaged in the furniture business in Bakersfield, but now resides in San Francisco.

Among the many friends whom Mr. Niederaur won through his fine qualities of heart and mind there was none to whom he was more deeply attached than to Franz Buckreus, for many years superintendent of the Kern county hospital. Between those two pioneers there was a deep bond of affection which time only served to deepen. The implicit faith which Mr. Niederaur reposed in his friend was shown by his selection of him as administrator of his estate, without bonds, and also as guardian of his children. After the death of his friend Mr. Buckreus continued to operate the furniture and undertaking establishment for a time. During March of 1904 he sold the undertaking business to Morton & Connelly, who are now in that business at No. 1712 Chester avenue. About the same time the furniture business was sold to George C. Habermel, who since has become a leading representative of this line of commercial enterprise in Bakersfield. The estate left by Mr. Niederaur was valued at $70,000 and had he been spared to enjoy the present remarkable growth of his chosen city he would have attained much greater wealth, but the large estate which he accumulated is especially significant because it represented the unaided efforts of a man who ever lived up to his high ideals of honor and his lofty principles of business integrity. Of such pioneers the city and county may well be proud and their descendants may recount their activities with pardonable gratification.

E. T. EDWARDS.—Among the men of resourcefulness and executive force who have sought out the great Midway oil field as the center of their activities, none has been welcomed more heartily and none is forging to the front more rapidly than Elbert T. Edwards, president and general manager of the California Well Drilling Company, Incorporated, whose main office is on the well-known Supply Row in Taft. The company represented by Mr. Edwards is young, strong and aggressive. The special business is contract drilling of wells, whose completion is guaranteed. Besides himself the officers are H. G. Moss of Maricopa, vice-president, and J. H. Osgood, of Taft, secretary and treasurer, with W. W. Stephenson, a director, as the Bakersfield representative of the concern. In addition to Mr. Stephenson and the officers J. F. Swank is also serving as a member of the board of directors. Incorporation was made on a capitalization of $250,000, the stock being divided into two hundred and fifty thousand shares, par value $1 each. The business of the company is not limited to the Midway field but extends through the west side and brings to them the patronage of some of the greatest organizations doing business in Kern county fields, so that the general manager finds himself crowded to the utmost with important work. Tremendous responsibilities rest upon him. These are courageously met and intelligently discharged. In no respect is he more careful than in his efforts to lessen the hazards of a work which, at best, contains the element of danger and the constant fear of accident. The members of the drilling gangs pursue their work with the knowledge that the manager is using every precaution to prevent accidents and injuries to them, and this knowledge is in itself a large asset in giving to the company all the workmen that are needed, numbering at times as many as one hundred and fifty.

W. C. W. L. L. L. L.

The first eighteen years in the life of Mr. Edwards were passed in Tennessee, where he was born at Nashville January 7, 1881. Ever since leaving that state he has engaged in the oil industry and kindred pursuits, first at Houston, Beaumont, Sour Lake and other Texas oil towns, and next at Jennings and Welsh, La., and after 1909 in California. After a short time in the Kern river field he went to Coalinga and engaged as a driller with the Southeastern Oil Company, Limited. During the latter part of 1910 he came to the Midway field. In the latter part of 1911 he organized the California Well Drilling Company, which is prepared to do cementing as well as drilling, and which keeps from three to fourteen strings of tools in use, using the rotary tools principally. Among the concerns for which the company has drilled wells may be mentioned the West Side, Sunset Monarch, May's Consolidated, Pacific Crude, General Petroleum, California Counties, Northern, Spreckels, Maple Leaf, Northern Exploration and other oil and gas companies. The general manager has many heavy duties in connection with a business so great in magnitude. That he has been successful proves him to be a man of force of character and high intelligence. Since coming to Taft he has identified himself with the Petroleum Club. During 1912 he erected a bungalow on North and Second streets, Taft, and here he and his wife, formerly Thelma Sells, a native of Kentucky, have established a home that is sought by their large circle of friends in Kern county.

W. C. McCUTCHEN.—The name of the four McCutchen brothers is identified with many enterprises well-known in the early history of Maricopa, where they have been land-owners from a period antedating the memorable rush incident to the bringing in of the world-famous Lake View gusher. They were among the first to discern oil possibilities in the region and events have proved the wisdom of their forecasts. One of the four, W. C., a man of great energy and a leader in every forward movement in this region, has spent all of his life in the west with the exception of the first four months, for he was born in Iowa December 4, 1853, four months before his parents, P. S. and Jane McCutchen, left that state for the Pacific coast. The long journey across the plains was made with wagons drawn by oxen. The first location of the family was in Placer county, where the father engaged in mining for a number of years. Removing from that locality to Sacramento county, he took up land near Franklin and engaged in general farming. His next removal occurred in 1872 and took him to Monterey county, where he made his home in the Cholame valley near Parkfield. During 1878 he was bereaved by the death of his wife and afterward he went to live with his children, being for a time at Hanford. For some time he has resided with his son, George, at Maricopa. Although now ninety-three years of age, he retains the possession of physical and mental faculties and exhibits a constant interest in neighborhood business affairs.

After the death of his mother in 1878 the family home was broken up and W. C. McCutchen went to Arizona to engage in mining. For two years he worked in the silver mines near Bradshaw. Returning to California he located at Hanford in 1880 and took up land on the Lone Oak slough six miles southwest of town, where he began to improve a farm and engage in the raising of crops suited to the soil and climate. During 1900 he sold out and moved to Tipton, Tulare county, near which town he bought land and engaged in agricultural enterprises. Two years later he came to Bakersfield and about the same time located twenty acres of land at Maricopa. During the great gold rush to the Nevada mines he joined the Argonauts bound for that country and spent two years at Goldfield, finding himself, however, little the richer for the venture. Since 1908 he has had his headquarters at Maricopa and has been interested in the development of property with his brothers, G. W., J. B. and R. L. The company organized by themselves has put down eight wells, six of which proved to be producers, although only four are now in use, being flowing wells. In addition to bearing his share in the management of these wells and the putting down of new ones, Mr. McCutchen has devoted considerable attention to other property interests and is the owner of real estate in the city of Richmond as well as orange land near Edison. With his wife, formerly Miss Louella McClintock, he has established a home at Maricopa (living at the present time on the McCutchen Bros. oil property) and has identified himself with enterprises for the upbuilding of the new town, whose existence is dependent upon the oil industry and whose future has the glowing promises offered by that wealth-producing activity. By a former marriage he is the father of four children, of whom the two sons, G. P. and W. W. (twins), are residents of Maricopa, as is also the youngest child, Mrs. G. E. Fritz, while the third child and elder daughter, Mrs. J. A. Fritz, makes her home at Taft.

JOHN H. CLAYMAN.—An honored place among the pioneers of California is held by John H. Clayman, who has been identified with the development of the commonwealth for a period covering more than fifty years and meanwhile has himself been a large contributor to the industries of agriculture, horticulture and stock-raising, besides aiding in the expansion of the public-school system and in other projects indispensable to permanent prosperity. It is to such pioneers as he that the state owes its remarkable growth in years past and they laid well the foundation for future continued prosperity, so that it may be safe to predict that the development of the past is but the precursor of similar advances in years to come, for all of which due credit must be given to the pioneers.

Much of the active life of John H. Clayman was spent upon the then frontier, and it was not until 1910 that he relinquished agricultural activities, disposed of his ranch and came to Bakersfield to enjoy in his declining days the fruits of long-continued labors. His parents, Benjamin and Permelia (Randall) Clayman, were natives respectively of Pennsylvania and Ohio, and during their early married years lived upon a farm in Marion county, Ohio, where occurred the birth of John H. Clayman March 11, 1842. In 1845 the family removed to the then frontier of Indiana and settled upon a tract of unimproved land in Elkhart county, where the most arduous labor was necessary to improve a productive farm. The mother died in that county. Of her seven children three are now living, John H. being the fourth in order of birth. In 1853 the family followed the tide of migration still further toward the setting sun and established a home on the desolate prairies of Nebraska. The claim which they pre-empted was wild land and the task of developing the property proved so formidable that in 1859 the father with his family crossed the plains with wagon and ox-teams to California and were only thirty-six hours behind the Mountain Meadow massacre. Accompanying them was John H., then an energetic, capable youth of seventeen years, ready and willing to do a man's work and eager to see the vast region west of the mountains. With the hopeful spirit of youth, he tried his luck in placer mines in Shasta county. The success of the experiment was so gratifying that he continued for eight years and at the expiration of that period had accumulated an amount sufficient to enable him to invest in land.

Securing a raw tract of land in Tehama county four miles east of Red Bluff, Mr. Clayman at once began the task of making the property productive and remunerative. At first he engaged in grain-raising and in the stock industry, but having ascertained that certain varieties of fruit would thrive in the region he planted a large orchard of apples, prunes and peaches.

In some years the fruit brought him a very large income, so that he prospered beyond his early expectations. The entire estate of one hundred and sixty acres was placed under cultivation and when eventually sold to other parties brought a great advance over the original purchase price. Meanwhile Mr. Clayman had interested himself in movements for the material upbuilding of his township and county. At the time of the building of the schoolhouse in the Antelope district he served as member of the board of trustees and his counsel and progressive spirit proved of great assistance in the enterprise. Since coming to Bakersfield he has built three residences on the corner of Fourth street and Chester avenue and two of these he rents, occupying the third for a home for himself and wife.

The marriage of John H. Clayman and Catherine Elizabeth Worley was solemnized at Red Bluff, Cal., November 14, 1874, and was blessed with five children, named as follows: Carrie, now a teacher in Tehama county; Elmer, a resident of Bakersfield; Zola, wife of Joseph Percy Freear, of Bakersfield; Crim and Mrs. Bessie Hosmer, also of Bakersfield. Born in Washington county, Iowa, Mrs. Clayman is a daughter of the late James and Elizabeth (Albaugh) Worley, natives of Ohio and pioneer farmers of Washington county, Iowa. During 1859 the family crossed the plains with an expedition of wagons drawn by ox-teams. For a time Mr. Worley engaged in teaming in Shasta county, but later he took up farm pursuits in Tehama county, where he resided until death. There were two sons and one daughter in the Worley family and of these Mrs. Clayman was the eldest. In religion she was reared in the faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to which she since has adhered with earnest sincerity. Politically Mr. Clayman is a Republican. Fraternally he has been connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and with his wife holds membership with the Rebekahs.

CAREY L. SEAGER.—The Producers Refining Company, of which Mr. Seager is secretary, treasurer and superintendent, ranks among the leading organizations of its kind in the Kern river field. Not only does its plant utilize the entire product from the Lackawanna lease of eighty acres in the Kern river oil fields, but in addition crude oil of the West side fields is bought in large quantities. An average of twenty-five hundred barrels of crude oil is treated each month. From the Kern river crude oils the following products are made: kerosene; 34 degrees stove distillate; gas engine cylinder oil; autogram, the copyrighted title of a cylinder oil particularly adapted to the use of automobiles and now winning the highest praise from its users; light engine oil, heavy engine oil, steam cylinder oil, fuel distillate and asphalt. The crude oils of the west side are utilized in the manufacture of four products, viz.: gasoline; gas engine distillate of grades Nos. 1, 2 and 3; fuel distillate and asphalt. The lubricants are admittedly of a superior grade. Their value is recognized even by the experts connected with the most formidable rivals and competitors of the company, while the quality of both kerosene and gasoline is of the highest grade.

Of eastern descent, belonging to a family of high standing and exceptional culture, Carey L. Seager was born at Randolph, Cattaraugus county, N. Y., August 12, 1884, and was the eldest of three children. The second son, Roy E., is engaged with the Producers Refining Company, and the youngest child, Pearl J., is employed as a bookkeeper with this concern. The father, George H. Seager, was born and reared on a New York farm and at the age of sixteen married Miss Julia F. Mack, a girl of fifteen who had been his schoolmate. Shortly after his early marriage he began to work in the oil refining industry, to which his later years have been devoted with such success that he now ranks as an expert in the construction and operation of refineries as well as in the production of kerosene, gasoline and high-grade lubricating oils. As assistant superintendent he had active charge of the construction work of the Gulf refinery owned by the Gulf Refining Company at Port Arthur, Tex. He served as superintendent for the Union Oil Company at the time they constructed the addition to their refinery at Oleum on San Pablo bay. At present he is engaged in the buying, selling and mixing or compounding of oils at Tulsa, Okla., where he makes his business headquarters.

Although a native of York state, the earliest recollections of Carey L. Seager are associated with Pennsylvania, for in his infancy the family established a home at Corry, that state, and later lived in Chester, Delaware county. Eventually his mother established her permanent home at Warren, Pa., and there he spent two years in the high school. At the age of seventeen he was graduated from the Warren Business College. Shortly after graduation he joined his father at Port Arthur, Tex., where for four years he was connected with the Gulf Refining Company, serving first as assistant stillman and later as foreman. His next experience was as assistant to his father while the latter superintended the construction of the refinery for the Union Oil Company at Oleum. Later he was given work for nine months as stillman with the Standard Oil Company at Point Richmond, Contra Costa county. Meanwhile, having determined to start a refinery of his own, he had the good fortune to meet with members of the San Francisco firm of W. P. Fuller & Co., compounders, and they encouraged him in his project. In addition, they rendered him practical help, introducing him to George Calhoun of the National refinery. The latter agreed to form a partnership on equal terms with Mr. Seager, the two taking a lease of the Buckeye refining plant and continuing together for two years. At the expiration of that time Mr. Seager took a sub-lease from C. Applegarth of the Volcan Refining Company, which under the title of C. L. Seager & Co., he operated for seven months.

Through a deal with Dr. Liscomb of Pasadena, Cal., made in May of 1911, Mr. Seager turned in his property and took stock for it in the Producers Refining Company, which since has made many valuable improvements. The officers of the company besides Mr. Seager are as follows: Dr. A. H. Liscomb, president; William Ellery of San Francisco, first vice-president; and H. S. Bridge of San Francisco, second vice-president. Employment is furnished to six men regularly. The one ambition of every worker is to maintain a product of admitted perfection and a constant stimulus to their work is given them by the enthusiasm and energy of the superintendent. The latter has his home in the oil fields, his family comprising a daughter, Margaret Pearl, and his wife, who prior to their marriage in New York state in 1902 was Miss Pearl G. Bouton. While living in Pennsylvania he became a member of the Maccabees at Warren and later he was initiated into Masonry at Port Arthur, Tex., becoming a member of Cosmopolitan Lodge No. 872, F. & A. M., at that place. Since coming to the west the demands upon his time by business affairs have been so engrossing that he has not taken an active part in fraternal or political matters, although always ready to assist in any movement for the permanent development of Kern county or the expansion of its great resources.

EDWARD GARFIELD NORRIS.—When the Norris family disposed of their interests in Missouri and made the long journey to Bakersfield with the anticipation of establishing a permanent home, Edward Garfield Norris, whose birth had occurred near Kansas City on the 17th of April, 1881, was a small boy only two years of age, hence his earliest recollections cluster around Kern county and the associations of a lifetime endear him to the city of his residence and business affiliations. Educated in the grammar and high schools of Bakersfield, upon the completion of the regular course of study he was apprenticed to the trade of plumber with C. H. Quincy, remaining with that gentleman until he had acquired a thorough preparatory training. Later he completed the trade in a large shop in Los Angeles, where he had the best possible facilities for gaining a complete knowledge of the many details connected with the occupation. Upon returning to Bakersfield he secured employment as a journeyman and worked for others for three and one-half years. Meanwhile he had cherished the plan of embarking in business for himself. During November of 1907 he carried out the plan and established the Kern Plumbing Company, of which he continued to be the sole proprietor for the first two years. At the expiration of that time he sold a one-half interest to Edward Miller and the two gentlemen immediately purchased a lot at No. 517 Grove street, where they erected a building to be used for warerooms, shop and office. Since beginning in the new structure they have engaged in sheet metal work and have carried a full line of plumbing and heating supplies, by their excellent business methods and recognized skill having been able to secure and carry to completion many important contracts for the plumbing and heating of public buildings and residences.

G. W. McEntchen

For a time Mr. Norris was honored with the presidency of the Master Plumbers' Association and he still is one of its most influential members. Fraternally he holds active connections with the Woodmen of the World. The residence which he erected at No. 815 N street he still owns, but lately he has built and now occupies a home at No. 615 Flower street, East Bakersfield, which is presided over by Mrs. Norris, whom he married in Bakersfield and who was Miss Mabel Hunt, a native of Missouri. The pleasant and comfortable home is brightened by the presence of one son, Kenneth Edward.

GEORGE W. McCUTCHEN.—The genealogy of the McCutchen family is traced to Scotland, whence religious persecution caused a number of that name to seek refuge in Ireland, later generations establishing the family in Georgia. After having served with conspicuous valor in the War of 1812 James Corsey McCutchen removed from his native Georgia to Virginia and settled upon a plantation. Marriage united him with a daughter of John Nevins, an Irishman by nativity and a sailor by occupation, who having landed in Boston during the course of the Revolution, enlisted in the American army and fought until the close of the war, later settling in Virginia upon a farm. Preston S. McCutchen, son of the soldier of 1812, was born in St. Charles, Mo., February 24, 1820, and at Bentonsport, Iowa, married Jane Wilsey, a native of Utica, N. Y. The discovery of gold in California directed his attention to this part of the country. During the summer of 1850 he crossed the plains from Bentonsport, Iowa, (where he was living at the time), and began to mine for gold, although without any special success. However, he was so pleased with the west that he remained until 1853, and then returned only for the purpose of getting his family, who in the meantime were living in Iowa. The summer of 1854 found the family en route to their new home. Arriving in safety, they established themselves at Wisconsin Hill, Placer county, where May 6, 1855, occurred the birth of George W. McCutchen, the third son. His older brothers are James B. and Warren C., the former a dairyman living at Old River in Kern county, and the latter an operator in the Maricopa oil field.

Besides these three older children five others were born during the residence of the family in Placer and Sacramento counties. They are named as follows: Edmund W., of Bakersfield; Mary A., wife of C. W. Johnson, who has charge of the Phoenix Distributing Company at Maricopa; Clara J., widow of W. G. Wallace, and a resident of Hanford, this state; Mrs. Harriet C. Scott, of Stockton; and Robert L., residing at Old River in Kern county. After the father had lived about four years in Placer county, meantime engaging in placer mining and running a dairy, in 1858, he moved to Sacramento county, settling at Georgetown, seventeen miles south of the capital city. Upon a tract of land he took up in its primeval state he engaged in ranching and his children were sent to the schools of that neighborhood. After leaving school George W. began to make a business of hunting, and with his brothers made several trips from San Francisco by steamer to Mexican ports, where he engaged in shooting birds of plumage. The feathers were marketed in New York. During 1871 he became interested in sheep-raising in Monterey county, and in 1877 went to Tulare county, where with his brothers he engaged in shooting ducks for the San Francisco market. Later, with his brothers, J. B. and R. L., he mined in Arizona for two years, thence came to Kern county in 1885 and took up ranch land at Old River. The ensuing years were devoted to farming and stock-raising, although in addition he engaged in hunting during the winter months and made several trips to Mexico. In 1898 he spent the summer in the Klondike, but his prospecting tours did not bring any reward, and he returned to California in October. During October of 1909 he was united in marriage with Mrs. Martha E. Colly, a native of Missouri.

Upon the opening of the Sunset field Mr. McCutchen and his brother, Robert L., located the north one-half of section 2, township 11, range 24, and the west one-half of section 1, township 11, range 24, also a fractional 26-12-24, and all of 32-12-24. Their own ten acres at 2-11-24 is undeveloped, but they control a leasehold on the same section, comprising twenty acres one-half mile north of Maricopa, also lease twenty acres to the Maricopa Queen Oil Company on 32-12-23. The new well, No. 7, brought in February 27, 1913, is a gusher and produces sixteen hundred barrels per day, while No. 6, after being re-drilled and cemented, is a twelve-hundred barrel per day well. The firm is composed of the four brothers, George W. and Warren C., of Maricopa, also Robert L. and James B., of Old River, this county. Their expectations have been rewarded by a large measure of success. They now have six producing wells with a net production of nine thousand barrels per month. Not only are they successful as oil operators, but in public affairs they have been prominent, in ranching enterprising, in their friendships constant, and in character conscientious, typical of our fine class of American citizenship.

RALPH E. GALLOWAY.—The superintendent of the Visalia Midway Oil Company, one of the pioneer concerns operating in the North Midway field, has been identified with Bakersfield and the San Joaquin valley since 1892, the year of his graduation from college. Practically all of his active life has been identified with Kern county, whose resources he has aided in developing through the aid of his own aggressive energy and optimistic faith. Illinois is his native commonwealth, but in boyhood he lived mostly in Wisconsin, where his father, Rev. John B. Galloway, an ordained minister in the United Presbyterian denomination, held pastorates in various towns in the southern part of the state. Throughout all of his life this devoted minister has labored with the greatest sacrifice for the welfare of the church. When a mere boy, in his native shire of Ayr in Scotland, he was trained to a knowledge of the Bible and a desire to become a minister of the Gospel. Scarcely fourteen years of age when the family crossed the ocean and settled at Sparta, Ill., he directed his studies toward theology and by his own unaided exertions paid his way through college, graduating from Monmouth College with the degree of A. B., and later taking a complete course in theology in an institution at Xenia, Ohio. Meanwhile the Civil war had cast its dark cloud over the country. Taking up the cause of the Union, he offered his services to his adopted country and was assigned to the One Hundred Thirty-second Illinois Infantry, in which he served as corporal until the end of the great struggle. Later, having completed his college course and entered the ministry of the United Presbyterian Church, he held pastorates in Southern Wisconsin. Since his retirement from the ministry he has made his home at Poynette, that state.

By the marriage of Rev. John B. Galloway to Matilda Kiddoo, who was born in Pittsburg, Pa., and died at Clarence, Iowa, in 1878, there were four children, all but one of whom still survive. The eldest, Ralph E., was born at Galesburg, Ill., July 1, 1872, and attended public schools in Wisconsin. After he had graduated from the Sparta (Ill.) high school he taught for two years in Waukesha county, Wis., earning the money with which he defrayed his expenses through Carroll College at Waukesha. Having received his diploma in 1892 from the scientific department of that institution, he left college to make his own way in the world and soon afterward arrived in Bakersfield, a small place at that time in comparison with its present metropolitan proportions. Brief experiences as a clerk in the Hirschfield store, as a law student under Judge Wiley and as a collection agent, made him familiar with conditions in the community. During 1894 he became a reporter on the Echo, which at the time was published weekly. When the daily was established he became city editor. Employment with the Californian for two years, during a portion of which period he engaged as city editor, was followed by his appointment as editor of the Labor Journal. This editorship he resigned at the expiration of two and one-half years. In 1910, with F. C. Noel as a partner, he founded the San Joaquin Valley Farmer, the circulation of which he built up to large proportions. Since selling his interest in that paper in April, 1912, he has acted as superintendent of the Visalia Midway Oil Company, a concern in which he has held stock from the start and which has developed into one of the best producing properties of its size in Kern county.

Since the organization of the Bakersfield Chamber of Commerce Mr. Galloway has been one of its active workers and interested members. Politically he has been independent from the time of casting his first ballot, favoring men and principles rather than any specified party organization. For years after coming to the west he remained a bachelor, but May 3, 1909, at Bakersfield, he established domestic ties, being then united with Mrs. Lulu M. Sanford, a native of Des Moines, Iowa. Of a genial, friendly temperament, he has found pleasure in an active association with various fraternities. Among the organizations of which he is a member we mention the following: Albuquerque Lodge No. 461, B. P. O. E.; Kern Lodge No. 76, K. of P., and Uniform Rank, in which he has served as an officer and has been a member of the Grand Lodge of California; Bakersfield Aerie No. 93, Order of Eagles; Bakersfield Camp No. 460, Woodmen of the World, and the Brotherhood of American Yeomen.

HON. ROWEN IRWIN.—Very early in the colonization of the new world the Scotch family of Irwin left their ancestral associations in the highlands and crossed the Atlantic ocean to Virginia, where they became capable planters. Some of the name removed to South Carolina and Isaac Irwin, a native of that commonwealth, established the name in Kentucky, where at one time he served as sheriff of Jefferson county which has Louisville as its county-seat. After a short time he crossed the Ohio river into Indiana and there spent his last years upon a frontier farm. His son and namesake, a native of Frankfort, Ky., and for years a resident of Putnam county, Ind., followed agricultural pursuits for a livelihood, while as a gratuitous offering to the cause of religion he preached in the Baptist denomination. For fifteen years he acted as pastor of one church, giving much of his time to its upbuilding and to the spiritual welfare of the congregation, doing all this work without thought of remuneration. In that pioneer era it was customary for the brainiest of the pioneer farmers in any community to serve as preacher, fill the country pulpit on Sunday, unite the young couples in marriage and read the last prayer over the dead. For such a task he was well qualified by his sympathetic heart, kindly disposition, splendid reasoning faculties and deep devotion to the cause of Christianity. During 1866 he removed to Nebraska and took up land on Elk creek, five miles south of Tecumseh, Johnson county, a district then beyond the confines of civilization. White settlers had not yet penetrated regions so remote from the east, but he did not lack for neighbors, the Indians being in close proximity and making frequent visits to his cabin in order to beg. At such times it was the custom for the Indian chief to come first, salute and appeal, while the others would remain at a distance. If his request was granted, a squaw would come to the cabin and carry away food or clothing that had been presented to them. Later white settlers began to arrive and the savages receded; improvements were rapidly made and the country took on an aspect of prosperity. It was the privilege of the pioneer preacher to enjoy some of the later prosperity and when he died in 1899 the country bore little resemblance to its aspect at the time of his arrival.

During the period of his residence in Indiana Rev. Isaac Irwin had married Jane Leatherman, who was born in that state and died in Nebraska during 1900. Her father, Rev. John Leatherman, a native of Germany and a pioneer of Putnam county, Ind., served in the ministry of the Baptist Church in that locality until his death. There were twelve children in the Irwin family and all but one of these are still living. Six reside in California, namely: Mrs. Avert and Mrs. Reynolds, of Hanford, and Mrs. Ball, of Los Angeles; John, now district attorney of Kings county; Washington, who follows the carpenter's trade at Taft; and Rowen, district attorney of Kern county. The last-named was born at Reelsville, Putnam county, Ind., May 13, 1858, and at the age of eight years accompanied his parents to Nebraska, where during three months of each year he attended the country schools. The balance of the year was devoted to hard manual labor on the farm. A seeming chance occurrence decided his destiny. When a mere lad he attended a murder trial at Pawnee City, Neb. It was his first observation of law cases and he became deeply interested, watching with peculiar interest the movements of the judge. When he learned that the jurist received a salary of $3,000 per year his interest deepened. Afterward he mentioned the matter to his father, who verified the report as to salary and encouraged the boy when he announced that some day he would be a lawyer. His ambition was realized by his own later efforts.

Upon coming to California during 1881 Rowen Irwin secured employment in Kings county, working with headers and threshing machines during the season. In the fall of the same year he began to study law at Hanford. The following summer found him again working on a header. In this way he continued until he was admitted to the bar in 1883. He won his first case and received a fee of $20. Admitted first to the superior court, he later was admitted to practice before the supreme court and carried on professional work at Hanford, where he served as district attorney from 1898 until 1902. During January of 1903 he came to Bakersfield, opened an office and engaged in the practice of law, which he has continued with increasing success. With him came to this city his wife, whom he had married in Portersville, Tulare county, and who was Miss Mildred Barnes, a native of Missouri. In fraternal relations he holds membership with the Eagles. Politically he has been a Democrat ever since he began to study public questions and as his party's candidate he served as member of the assembly in the state legislature during the session of 1909, also during two special sessions. As a legislator he aimed to promote the welfare of his constituents, but also gave staunch support to enterprises for the general good. The Democratic party in 1910 nominated him for district attorney and he received the verdict of popular approval at the election. Since he took the oath of office in January, 1911, for a term of four years he has devoted himself closely to the duties of the office and thereby has added prestige to an already enviable reputation. The office is one which calls for fearless honesty and more than ordinary ability. High as are its demands, he has proved equal to them and has met every crisis with a clear brain, accurate judgment and admirable reasoning faculties.

E. W. McCutchen

EDMUND W. McCUTCHEM.—The lineage of the McCutchen family is traced back through a line of honored ancestors in Scotland to one of the gallant lieutenants who served in the army of the illustrious Robert Bruce during the fourteenth century. The colonial period of American history found some of the name in the new world, established upon Virginian soil. Very early in the nineteenth century a member of the family left the Old Dominion and followed the westward tide of emigration across mountains and rivers into Missouri, where he took up new land and developed a farm. In the family of this pioneer was a son, Preston, born in Callaway county, Mo., and reared in Keokuk county, Iowa, where he took up agricultural pursuits. While living in Iowa he married Miss Jane Wilsey, a native of Utica, N. Y., and by that union were born five sons and three daughters, all still living, the fourth of these, Edmund W., having been born at Mokelumne Hill, Calaveras county, Cal., October 18, 1856, about six years after the arrival of the family in the west. It was during 1850 that the father had brought his family across the plains with wagon and ox-teams and had settled in Calaveras county, where he engaged in mining at Mokelumne Hill. Not finding the occupation as profitable as he had anticipated, he determined to devote himself to agriculture and accordingly moved to the vicinity of Sacramento, where he developed a grain and stock farm. Removing to Monterey county in 1872, he again took up general farming and stock-raising. Not far from the fertile Cholame valley he took up land and began to till the soil. For a long period he devoted his attention closely to farming at that place, but eventually the infirmities of age obliged him to relinquish manual labors and now at the age of ninety-three years he is living quietly and contentedly at Maricopa, Kern county. His wife passed away when advanced in years.

After having spent his boyhood days mostly on the home farm near Franklin, Sacramento county, Edmund W. McCutchen accompanied his father to Monterey county at the age of sixteen years and continued in the stock business there until twenty-one. From 1877 until 1880 he engaged in mining in Mohave county, Ariz. Upon his return to California he became interested in farming in the San Joaquin valley. Selecting a location near Hanford he devoted about one thousand acres to wheat, using headers in the harvesting of the crops. For ten years he continued in the same location, but in 1890 he came to Kern county and bought a ranch of sixty acres nine miles southwest of Bakersfield. The land was devoted to fruit and alfalfa, and it was not until ten years after he had bought the property that he discontinued such activities for oil operations, organizing the Superior Oil Company, with himself as a director and manager. Several wells were put down (Sunset field), the land was patented, and the investment proved profitable, but after a time the interests were sold to other parties. Next Mr. McCutchen became a member of the Eight Oil Company operating in the North Midway district and owning lands and wells of excellent value. In these he still retains a large interest. Besides his other enterprises he engaged in mining at Goldfield for two years with fairly satisfactory results. Successful in striking oil, he ranks among the best informed men that Kern county has contributed to this industry and his successful operations have brought him financial independence. Mr. McCutchen is developing the citrus resources of Kern county, having selected for his operations forty acres at Trevis, fourteen miles east of Bakersfield. He sunk a well three hundred and twenty-five feet and installed a pumping plant which supplies ample water facilities. On his ranch he has a nursery of orange trees, of which he makes a specialty. It is a fact worthy of mention that during the cold winter of 1912-13 not even his seed-bed stock nor young grafts were injured. About one-half of the nursery is set out to navel oranges.

With his wife, whom he married in Visalia, and who was Miss Kate Thompson, a native of Florence, Nebr., Mr. McCutchen is occupying his own comfortable residence, located on the corner of Seventeenth and D streets, Bakersfield. Having no children of their own, they have reared two of Mrs. McCutchen's nieces. Iris Taylor is now Mrs. C. W. Beatty, and Lizzie Taylor is the wife of R. V. Dorn, both of Maricopa.

MYRON HOLMES.—The genealogy of the Holmes family is traced back to an old family of England and a scion of that honored race founded the name in the new world when he crossed the ocean to New York. William J., a son of the original immigrant, was born in Schoharie county, N. Y., and early learned the rudiments of agriculture as conducted in that locality and era. Establishing a home of his own, he chose as his wife Miss Marcia Partridge, a native of Schoharie county and a daughter of Adelbert Partridge, for years prominent in the community as a manufacturing cooper. Hale and hearty notwithstanding their advanced years (for he is eighty-five and she eighty-one) William J. and Marcia Holmes now reside in Wellesley, Mass., surrounded by the comforts that have been secured through their own earlier, assiduous efforts. All of their seven children are still living, but the third, Myron, is the only one residing in California. Born at Richmondville, Schoharie county, N. Y., August 15, 1860, he received public-school advantages and upon leaving school gave his whole attention to farming. With a desire to be independent, he bought a farm adjacent to the old homestead and began for himself as a general farmer and stock-raiser, which occupation he followed in the same locality for a number of years.

Selling out his eastern interests in 1890 and locating in Bakersfield the following year, Mr. Holmes here bought the corner of I and Eleventh streets, built a house and has since made his home at the same place. Meanwhile he spent his first year in Kern county as superintendent of a farm owned by H. H. Fish and his second year as manager of the Kingsley dairy, after which he clerked for six months in a grocery. Since 1894 he has been a trusted employe of the Kern County Land Company. For a considerable period he was connected with the engineering department, but in 1900 he was promoted to be storekeeper for the company and since then has had charge of the company's stores, a position of great responsibility, for which duties he has proved eminently qualified.

Throughout his entire active life Mr. Holmes has been interested in the development of the free-school system and since coming west he served for eight years as a member of the Bakersfield Board of Education. During the period of his service additions were built to the Emerson and Lowell schools, making of the buildings modern structures with complete equipment for educational work. The Hawthorne school was erected during his service on the board and a block of land was bought on A and Eighteenth streets as a site for a new school. In his marriage Mr. Holmes became allied with a family deeply interested in educational affairs and he and his wife have worked in unison, striving to secure for their own children and for other children in the city the best advantages possible, in order that they might be qualified for the duties of life.

Mr. and Mrs. Holmes were married at Richmondville, N. Y., January 16, 1883, Mrs. Holmes having been Miss Lillie Mann, a native of West Fulton, Schoharie county, and a daughter of Almarien and Hannah (Chapman) Mann. Her father was a native of Vermont, but spent the greater part of his life in New York, where his death occurred and where his widow still makes her home. Of their thirteen children all but one lived to mature years and eleven still survive, Mrs. Holmes being the sixth in order of birth. All have engaged in educational work as teachers or superintendents of schools at some period in their lives, the youngest son, Manley Burr Mann, a graduate of Cornell University and a successful attorney-at-law, having taught in young manhood in order to aid in defraying his university expenses.

For a short time prior to her marriage Mrs. Holmes also taught school and she, too, was successful in the work. Of her marriage there are four children, namely: George Erwin, a graduate of the Kern county high school, now employed as electrical operator with the San Joaquin Light and Power Corporation; Marguerite, also a graduate of the high school, now engaged as stenographer with the Western Water Company; Myron Burr and Charles Raymond, members respectively of the high school classes of 1913 and 1914. The eldest son married Hattie L. Davis and has four children, Lillian, Roy, Maynard and Ernest. Not only are both grandmothers of these four children still living, but it is a noteworthy fact that three of the great-grandmothers still survive. The Holmes family is sincere in allegiance to the Methodist Episcopal denomination. For years Mr. Holmes officiated as a trustee of the First Methodist Episcopal Church and at the time of the erection of the present fine house of worship he was secretary of the board. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In 1902 he served as foreman of the grand jury and at other times he has held other public responsibilities. For many years he has been a member of the county central committee of the Democratic party and a local leader in that political organization.

LANE S. HARMAN.—An identification of more than twenty years with the material upbuilding of Kern county enables Mr. Harman to judge of values and forecast growth with an impartial judgment and keen sagacity. These qualities have proved helpful to him in the discharge of his duties as manager of the Kern City Realty Company, transacting a general business in real estate, dealing in property throughout the county, buying and selling on a commission basis and making a specialty of oil, orange and fruit lands. The company maintains an insurance department and underwriting is done in absolutely reliable organizations. In every department of the business a large clientele has been established. The company is doing its full share in advertising to the world the excellence of the climate, the fertility of the soil and the opportunities for agricultural and commercial prosperity. The manager is usually to be found at the office, No. 805½ Baker Street, East Bakersfield, where he has every facility for prompt investigation of lands and direct intercourse with possible buyers.

Mr. Harman is of eastern birth and lineage and was born in York county, Pa., March 24, 1854. Primarily educated in common schools, he later attended Mount Union College in Ohio and completed a commercial course of study. The family of which he is a member comprised three children, but one of these died in early years. A brother, Monroe, seven years older than himself, has become very prominent in the silver-mining industry in the state of Washington. Both had to make their own way unaided from youth. After he had taught one term of school Lane S. Harman became connected with a mercantile business at Wellsville, Pa., where he remained for two years. From 1877 until 1890 he made his home in Mansfield, Ohio, and Columbus, same state, and meanwhile in 1880 he married Miss Ada E. Carpenter, a resident of the former city. As a means of livelihood he worked as traveling salesman for agricultural implement houses and built up an enviable reputation as a specialist in that line, being indeed regarded as an expert judge concerning every kind of farm machinery.

Upon resigning from the road in 1890 Mr. Harman came to California and settled in Kern county, where since he has made his home. Joining the Rosedale colony, he bought forty acres of land covered with sage brush. To develop the tract from its primeval state required strenuous labor. For years he devoted himself diligently to the task of removing the brush, cultivating the land, providing irrigation, planting portions of the farm to fruit and bringing the entire acreage to a high condition of fertility. The task was one of great difficulty and brought many discouragements in its wake, but he had the cheerful co-operation of his wife and the assistance of the children, so that he was able to develop the property as he had desired. In order that his children might have the advantages offered by the city schools he sold the farm and came to East Bakersfield a number of years ago, since which time he has engaged in the real estate and insurance business, also has acted as notary public and conveyancer, having offices in the First Bank of Kern building. In politics he is a Republican with progressive sympathies, while in religious connections he and his wife are members of the Congregational Church of Bakersfield. Their family consists of ten children and it has been their greatest ambition in life to train and prepare their sons and daughters for whatever responsibilities may await their future years. The children are as follows: Emrie L., a carpenter, who follows his trade in Bakersfield; Will C., a bridge inspector on the Southern Pacific Railroad and a resident of East Bakersfield; Jeanette, wife of L. T. Peahl, of Bakersfield; Frances, who married Frank S. Wilson and lives at McMinnville, Warren county, Tenn.; Jo R., now Mrs. H. G. Spitler; Helen W., now Mrs. George W. Jason, of Bakersfield; Ada I., Monroe, Jr., Winifred and Alice, who are the youngest members of this interesting and popular family.

WILLIS W. BOGGS.—The genealogy of the Boggs family is traced to the colonial era of American history. During the early part of the nineteenth century Hon. Lilburn W. Boggs held an influential position in the public life of Missouri and he was serving as governor of that state at the time of the expulsion of the Mormons. By supporting the anti-Mormon element he incurred the hatred of the leaders of the sect, who afterward in a spirit of revenge sent one of their number back to the state for the purpose of killing the governor. Several bullets lodged in the head of the intended victim of their revenge, but he escaped fatal injury as by a miracle. When somewhat advanced in years he joined an expedition bound for California and shortly after his arrival in Sonoma he was appointed alcalde in place of John H. Nash, whose resignation had been asked for, but who, refusing to give up the office, was taken to San Francisco, thence to Monterey, in order that in his absence peace might be restored to the community. Ex-Governor Boggs died in the Napa valley at the age of sixty-three years.

During the summer of 1846 William Boggs, son of the ex-governor, came with his family to California. Being a man of resolute purpose, excellent judgment and commanding personality, he was chosen captain of the emigrant train. Arriving at Fort Bridger, a dispute arose as to the route to be taken. Captain Boggs insisted upon following the highway generally used by emigrants and he pursued that road with the larger number of the party, arriving in safety at his destination without loss of men or stock. About ninety insisted in taking the Hastings Cut-off. They found travel impossible through the mountains. The sad fate of the Donner party is a matter of history. Just before starting across the plains in the spring of 1846 Captain Boggs had married a young Missouri girl. Their child, Guadeloupe Vallejo Boggs, was the first white child born in California after the government was taken out of the hands of Mexico. A younger son, Angus M. Boggs, who at the age of sixty-three years is living at Highland Springs, Lake county, was a member of the stock commission firm of Boggs & Behler, with offices in San Francisco and Napa. His marriage took place at Santa Rosa, this state, and united him with Miss Sallie Northcott, a native of Missouri, who came to California in 1861. They are the parents of eight children, all living, namely: Mervin J., who spent eleven years in the Kern river oil field, meanwhile being foreman on the 33 and Imperial, later superintendent of the Fulton at Maricopa, and is now a rancher at Lindsay, Tulare county; Paul N., formerly general manager for the J. F. Lucey Company at Bakersfield and now general manager for the same concern on the Pacific coast, with offices in Los Angeles; Leland Stanford, of Napa, a traveling salesman for the clothing house of Newmark & Co., in Los Angeles; Kenneth E., agent for the Wells-Fargo Express Company at Eureka, Cal.; Willis W., who was born at Napa, Cal., January 24, 1886, and is now purchasing agent for the North American Oil Consolidated Company on section 15, township 32, range 23; Hugh F., who assists his father on the ranch in Lake county; Lawrence B., and Elizabeth, who also remain with their parents.

Shevartchen

Mrs. R. L. McIntchen.

Entering the sales department of the J. F. Lucey Company at Bakersfield in 1908, Willis W. Boggs continued with that concern for three and one-half years, meanwhile going from Bakersfield to Maricopa, thence to Shale, next to McKittrick and finally to San Francisco. During 1911 and a part of 1912 he also acted as local buyer for the North American Consolidated on section 15 and engaged as salesman at the Taft store of Fairbanks, Morse & Co. Re-entering the service of the J. F. Lucey Company, he continued with that corporation from February, 1912, to June, 1913, and on the 15th of the latter month he returned to the service of the North American Consolidated, for which he now acts as purchasing agent, a post entailing large responsibilities and necessitating a thorough knowledge of oil supplies and valuations.

ROBERT L. McCUTCHEN.—As a native son of California it has been the privilege of Mr. McCutchen to live through years marked by unparalleled growth along all lines of industry, in which, not content to be merely an interested observer, he has been a prominent participant and resourceful promoter. Although still in the prime of a useful existence, his memory is stored with historical data of value and his personal activities have brought him in touch with the remarkable development of the west. The course of business pursuits has taken him along the Pacific coast and into Mexico, so that he is thoroughly conversant with localities, soils, climates and opportunities. Years ago, when hunting geese and quail for the San Francisco market, he traversed the section of country now known as the west side oil fields, where frequently he saw owls and quail helplessly enmeshed in pools of oil and asphalt, but at the time no one realized the commercial importance of the discovery. Later developments proved the immense value of the hidden resources of the region and in the early progress of the oil industry he and other members of his family maintained an active connection, nor are his interests in the business less important at the present time.

A member of a pioneer family that always has stood for integrity, honor, truth and high morals, and a son of that influential citizen, Preston S. McCutchen, whose personal history in many respects is a history of the development of certain parts of the west, Robert Lincoln McCutchen was born in Sacramento, Cal., July 20, 1865, and at the age of seven years accompanied his parents to Monterey county, where he was reared on a stock ranch near Parkfield. During winter months he studied, first in the public schools and later under a private teacher, while in the summers he assisted his father in the care of the stock and the cultivation of the farm. Starting out for himself in 1882, he accompanied a brother, James B., to Arizona, where, joining another brother, G. W., he became interested in mining at the Tiger and Peck mines in Yavapai county. Returning to Monterey county at the expiration of two years, he remained there for a year, meanwhile being interested in farming.

Associated with his brothers, in 1885 Mr. McCutchen began to hunt game for the market. For a time he made his headquarters on the Tulare and Buena Vista lakes. The game was shipped to the San Francisco market, where it brought the highest prices. It was during the period of activity as a hunter that he came through Kern county on a number of trips and began to study the soil of this part of the state. The result of his investigations caused him to purchase in 1890 twenty acres of raw land in the Old River district. This tract he set out to vineyard, but the experiment did not prove profitable. After he had removed the vines he put the land under cultivation to alfalfa, which he has continuously raised from that time to the present. By later purchase he added sixty acres to his tract, so that he now owns eighty acres in one body, situated nine and one-half miles southwest of Bakersfield. With the improvement of the land he continued in his hunting expeditions and it was not until 1899 that he abandoned hunting for the oil industry, in which he since has been interested. From 1892 to 1895 he and his brothers engaged in hunting along the west coast of Mexico, where they hunted the heron and egret for their plumage, selling the same at from $10 to $30 per ounce. On returning from these expeditions he more than once carried $3,000 worth of plumes in a suit case. Ultimately, however, the business was destroyed by the natives, who ruthlessly slaughtered the birds, even killing them while they were nesting, and thus rendering a continuation of the business unprofitable.

After having developed and sold oil lands in the Sunset and Midway fields, during 1907 Mr. McCutchen with his brothers selected a location in the north edge of Maricopa, on section 2, 11-24, where they struck a seven-hundred barrel well of thirteen-gravity oil. This being the best well up to that time and one of the early gushers, attracted wide attention and created considerable excitement in the field. In addition the brothers located the famous section 32, 12-23, some of which is sold and the balance leased, twenty acres of the tract being now operated by the Maricopa Queen Oil Company, that struck a two-thousand barrel well in March of 1913. In the midst of his many other activities, Mr. McCutchen has continued to raise alfalfa and grain on his ranch, where in 1914 he completed a residence of twelve rooms, modern in every respect, equipped with every convenience and forming a most desirable improvement to the property. Besides the ranch he owns valuable real estate on Chester avenue, Bakersfield, and in Richmond, and further has a ranch of eighty acres in the Edison district where the possibilities of citrus culture are arousing wide interest.

While political questions have never been made matters of moment to Mr. McCutchen (who believes that the highest type of citizenship is expressed in the character and not in the opinions), he keeps alive to the issues of the age and has been steadfastly Republican in his adherence to party principles. Fraternally he holds membership with the Woodmen of the World in Bakersfield. By marriage he became allied with a pioneer family of Kern county. In the Old River district, November 30, 1893, he was united with Miss Lena Freear, a native of this district and a daughter of Henry T. Freear, an honored citizen of the county. Six children comprise the family of Mr. and Mrs. McCutchen, namely: Vernon Ingersoll and Irene Marie, who are respectively members of the senior and freshman classes of the Kern county high school; Harold, Ethel, Evan and Laverne. The influence of Mrs. McCutchen has been a benefaction in the family and the community. A resident of the same locality throughout all of her life, educated in its schools and reared in one of its finest homes, she is an honored native daughter and has a permanent place in the regard of many friends.

ALBERT W. FREEMAN.—The Freeman family comes of old English stock and was established in America by Henry Freeman, a native of Kington, county Kent, England, born February 28, 1828. From his birthplace, which was but a short distance from London, the family removed to the metropolis and in boyhood he had the advantages incident to schooling in that great city. It was his ambition from childhood to come to the United States and at the age of eighteen he left the scenes of youth, bade farewell to friends and relatives, and started on the voyage across the Atlantic. The sailing vessel on which he embarked ploughed its slow way over the waters and finally cast anchor in the harbor of New York City, whence he proceeded to Ohio and in a short time to Illinois. At Joliet, where he found employment, he met and married Emma Adeline Hart, a native of that city. When the first call came for volunteers for three months at the opening of the Civil war he offered his services, enlisted, was accepted and sent to the front. At the expiration of the three months he again enlisted, this time for three years, so that his entire period of active service covered three years and three months. Meanwhile he bore a brave part in many memorable engagements, including Shiloh, the Wilderness, Lookout Mountain, Chickamauga, Bull Run and Gettysburg. Under the leadership of Sherman he marched to the sea and took part in the numerous skirmishes and battles of that great campaign. With the defeat of the Confederacy he received an honorable discharge from the Union service and returned to his Illinois home. Removing to Kansas in 1870, he took up land in Butler county twelve miles from Wichita and on that farm occurred the birth of his seventh child, Albert W., April 15, 1872. After years of close attention to agriculture he retired in 1899, established a home in Wichita, and there remained until his death March 17, 1906. Since his demise the widow has continued to reside in Wichita. Like him, she gives earnest adherence to the doctrines of the Methodist Episcopal Church. All but two of their twelve children are still living.

At the age of eighteen years in 1890 Albert W. Freeman left Kansas, where all of his previous life had been spent, and went to Arizona, where for six months he was employed in the lumbering business at Flagstaff. From there he returned east as far as Manzano, Valencia county, N. M., where he found employment in lumbering. However, at the end of six months he returned to Arizona and resumed work at Flagstaff. In the fall of 1892 he came to Bakersfield, where for three years he was employed by different contractors in the building of ditches and canals. During 1895 he became a zanjero with the Kern County Land Company and continued as such until 1899, when he resigned in order to return to Arizona. Upon his arrival in that state he found conditions had changed since the period of his previous sojourn there. The outlook was unfavorable and at the end of six months he returned to Bakersfield, where he secured a position as clerk in the old Cosmopolitan hotel. During the spring of 1901 he resumed work with the Kern County Land Company. After a brief period as workman on the Calloway canal he was made foreman, also was given charge of the books, and continued steadily in the same place until February of 1910, when he was transferred to the charge of the Home ranch and made superintendent of the Kern island canal, his present post of duty. The many responsibilities incident to his position he discharges with satisfaction to all concerned.

In politics Mr. Freeman votes with the Democratic party. After coming to California he was made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. &

A. M., and in addition he united with the Bakersfield Lodge No. 202, I. O. O. F., while also he and his wife are identified with the Rebekahs. At Rosedale, Kern county, June 13, 1905, he married Mrs. Lucy (Cheney) Adams, who was born near Petaluma, Sonoma county, Cal., and by whom he has one child, Martha. Her parents, Return J. and Martha E. (Green) Cheney, were born in Bloomington, Ill., where their marriage was solemnized March 8, 1860. As early as 1856 Mr. Cheney had made a trip across the plains with ox-teams and was so pleased with the country that he determined to remain. Returning to Illinois in 1859 upon a visit to the old home, he married there during the spring of 1860 and then brought his bride via Panama to San Francisco, thence to Sonoma county, where he had taken up land. For years he operated one of the first threshing-machines brought into Sonoma county. In addition to his work as thresherman he developed a large tract of land in Sonoma county and was similarly interested in Tulare county, after his removal thither in 1886. From Tulare county he came to Kern county in 1892 and settled at Rosedale. Of recent years he and his wife have made their home at Coalinga. They became the parents of ten children who attained mature years and all but one of these still survive. Mrs. Freeman, who was the youngest of the large family, was given high-school advantages and received the careful home training which has made her a notable housekeeper and efficient assistant to her husband.

JOHN EDWARD HAMILTON.—The supervising principal of the Conley school district of Taft was born in New York City May 27, 1853, and is a son of Callaghan and Margaret (O'Connor) Hamilton, both of whom were natives of county Kerry, Ireland, but crossed the ocean in early life and were married in the city of Brooklyn. There were four children in the family, but two of these died in infancy, the present survivors being John Edward and Charles C., the latter an attorney in Oakland. During 1868 the family removed to California and settled in San Francisco, but four years later J. E. returned east in order to receive treatment for spinal trouble. For a time he remained in Indianapolis. Upon coming back to California in 1874 he settled in Mendocino county, where his brother was teaching his first term of school. As he wished to take up the same line of work, he began to study under his brother preparatory to taking the teachers' examination. February 8, 1875, he began to teach school at Willits, Mendocino county. In order the better to prepare for pedagogical activities he took a course of study in St. Ignatius College at San Francisco. Later he secured a scholarship in the Hastings College of Law, but instead of entering that institution he made a trip to Seattle and on his return to California settled again in Mendocino county. Until 1886 he taught school there. Meanwhile in 1882 he had married Miss Margaret E. Muir. By the union there are two children now living, Ethel M. and Charles I. After leaving Mendocino county he went to Santa Barbara county and for twenty-two years made that region his headquarters. Meanwhile for ten years he served as a member of the county board of education and for six years of the period he was honored with the presidency. For three years he acted as principal of the Los Alamos schools and for fifteen years he taught in Santa Maria.

A newspaper experience as editor of the Santa Maria Graphic for two years (1891-92) supplemented the work of Mr. Hamilton as teacher, but when he was elected principal at Santa Maria he abandoned journalistic activities. For thirteen years he served as principal at Santa Maria. Upon resigning in 1906 he went to Kansas City to act as eastern representative of various enterprises operating in the middle west and on the Pacific coast. Upon his return to California he came to Taft in November, 1911, and secured employment as bookkeeper for Lierly & Son. During January of 1912, the teacher in the North American school having resigned, he was prevailed upon to complete the unexpired term, at the same time maintaining charge of the books for the firm. In June of 1912 he was chosen supervising principal for one year and in June of 1913 he was re-elected for four years. As principal he has made a record for efficiency and progressiveness. Under his supervision the schools are keeping pace with similar institutions throughout the county and have become a source of gratification and pride to all public-spirited citizens. In addition to his responsibilities as supervising principal he has found leisure for the composing of songs and the writing of lectures. One of his compositions, a baseball song entitled "Baseball," has become very popular among the boys in Taft. As a popular lecturer he makes a specialty of literary subjects and while all of his addresses have been received with enthusiasm, "An Hour with Tennyson" is perhaps the favorite and has elicited the greatest applause from interested audiences.

L. F. Brute

LUCAS FRANKLIN BRITE.—As one of the most extensive cattle growers in Kern county and as a member of the board of supervisors Mr. Brite is well known throughout the entire length and breadth of the county where he has made his home from his earliest recollections. In his life work he follows the example set by his father, the late John Moore Brite, who for years engaged extensively in agricultural pursuits and at the same time was a prominent supervisor of Kern county. Born in Missouri, but from early life a resident of Texas and employed as a teamster and farmer near the capital city of Austin, the father crossed the plains with ox teams in 1854, accompanied by his family, arriving at El Monte, Los Angeles county, in September of that year. The same fall he located in the Tehachapi Valley, where he began operations in the stock business. On his arrival he built a log house a little below what afterwards became known as Greenwich, residing there until he made his location in the valley that now bears his name, residing there continuously with the exception of one year, 1857-58, spent in Walkers basin and nearly a year in El Monte. During the residence of the family at El Monte a son, Lucas Franklin, was born August 13, 1859. In the same year the father returned with his wife and children and settled in a small but fertile valley in the Tehachapi mountains, where he entered land and built an adobe house which is still standing, and continued in the stock business. As he was the first and principal settler in the region and as the entire district is now owned by some of his heirs, the name of Brite's valley appropriately was given to it. During the early days it was remote from any market and the large crops of farm products as well as the large herds of stock had to be taken long distances when sold, but eventually the Southern Pacific railroad built to within six miles of the farm house, and from that time the family found conditions less irksome.

Upon the organization of Kern county John Moore Brite was chosen a member of the first board of supervisors, which created the first county government and directed public affairs from the county seat, then known as Clear Creek, but later called Havilah. For the greater part of the next sixteen years he was a supervisor and during part of the time was honored with the chairmanship of the board, being an integral factor in the difficult task connected with the removal of the county seat to Bakersfield. With all of his work donated to the early upbuilding of the county, he did not neglect the management of his land or the care of his stock. His herds increased in size and his brand, a half-moon capital J, was known all over the county, while his possessions in land increased until at the time of his death, during April of 1893, he had about two thousand acres. He is still survived by his widow, who was Miss Amanda Emeline Duty, a native of Austin, Tex. Their family consisted of thirteen children. Of these Martha died in Texas at two years of age, Mattie died in Brite's valley when two, and Mary passed away when seventeen. The eldest sons, Joseph H. and James Moore, are extensive ranchers in Brite's valley. Lucas Franklin, of Bakersfield, was sixth in order of birth. Eliza Lee married W. T. Wiggins, of Brite's valley; William is living in the Imperial valley; John B. and Charles Richard live in Brite's valley, the last-named being with his mother at the old homestead; Chloe is the wife of E. A. Stowell, of Cummings valley; Clara married Henry O'Neal and lives at Stockton; and Cora is the wife of W. H. Adams, of Stockton. The mother, together with her sons, Joseph, James, Charles, Richard and John, also a daughter, with her husband (Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Wiggins) own all of Brite's valley.

The earliest recollections of Lucas Franklin Brite cluster around the valley which bears the family name. Early in childhood he was a pupil in a log schoolhouse two and one-half miles from the old homestead, next he attended school in a frame building at Oldtown, four and one-half miles from home, and finally he completed his study of the three R's in the Cummings valley school, four and one-half miles from home. From school he drifted into ranching and when he started out for himself he located on railroad land. When this came into the market he bought six hundred and forty acres at $2.50 and $3 per acre. The land was level and fertile, comprising some of the best acreage in Cummings valley. At this writing he owns five thousand acres in this valley and of the total amount eighteen hundred acres are level. The vast tract represents his own industrious application and self-denying perseverance. With the aid of his sons he manages his large holdings, devoting about fourteen hundred acres to grain and the balance to stock range. Alfalfa also is raised without the aid of irrigation, although he installed a pumping plant on his home farm, ten miles west of Tehachapi.

The raising of grain formed the largest agricultural interest of Mr. Brite for many years. During early days he utilized a header and stationary thresher. Later he operated five headers which elevated the grain to the wagons, nets being placed in the bed of the wagons. The wagons were then hauled to the thresher and the nets dumped on the table of the threshing machine. In the work as thus conducted thirty head of mules or horses were used on the headers, forty head were used on the ten wagons (four to a wagon), two head were used for the lifting of the derrick and eight head were carried as extras, for special needs. About twelve thousand acres of grain were harvested and threshed in two months. When the combined harvester came into use, Mr. Brite was quick to see its advantages and avail himself of its improvements over the old-fashioned methods. At one time his brother John arranged a plow with ten gangs hinged in the middle so that it was possible to turn the soil even in rough places or in hog wallows. Ten horses or mules were used on each plow and as many as five of the implements were kept in steady use during the season. The greater part of his land is located in the Tehachapi and Cummings valleys and is well adapted for grain and stock. Some very fine horses of the Percheron and French coach breeds have been raised on his lands, while his shorthorn Durham cattle, with their well-known brand of GB, have no superiors in quality throughout the entire county.

The marriage of Mr. Brite took place in Brite's valley, December 5, 1885, and united him with Miss Laura Smith, who was born in Cummings valley, Kern county, being fourth youngest among the eleven children of John and Amanda E. (Stark) Smith, natives of Texas. At an early period in the settlement of the coast country the Smith family crossed the plains with wagon and oxen and settled in Bakersfield after a brief sojourn in Los Angeles. Mr. Smith died in Cummings valley, while his wife passed away in Brite's valley. In the family of Mr. and Mrs. Brite there are five children, of whom the two eldest, John Perry and Lucas Vance, are farmers and stock-raisers at the old homestead. The third child, Bertha, is a student in the University of California. The two youngest, Bonnie and Ruby, are students in the Bakersfield high school. It was for the purpose of giving his youngest children the advantages of the Bakersfield schools that in 1910 Mr. Brite came to this city and erected a residence at No. 1819 Orange street, where the family since have spent the school year, returning to the ranch for the summer. In his home city Mr. Brite has a large circle of friends, while throughout the country he is well known and universally respected. From early life he has been a supporter of Democratic principles and it was upon the regular party ticket that in 1902 he was elected from the second district to the board of county supervisors. At the expiration of his first term in 1906 he was re-elected, and again in 1910 he was chosen his own successor. As supervisor he has favored all movements for the permanent advancement of the county, has given his support to needed improvements and been identified with the building of bridges and county buildings, including the addition to the county hospital, the new high school, manual arts building, Hall of Records and the imposing new court house, yet at the same time he has maintained a conservative policy and has guarded the interests of taxpayers with conscientious fidelity and keen discrimination.

THOMAS A. BROOKS.—The manager of the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company for Kern county has followed this line of business since the age of sixteen years and meanwhile has gained a varied experience of the utmost value to his present and future activities. Sent for the first time to Bakersfield during the early part of 1911 and for the second time in the spring of 1912, he has been closely in touch with the development of the business at this point and has forwarded with customary energy the interests of the company, which now reaches every important point in the county. The task has been and still continues to be one of no slight importance. The greatest tact and the highest intelligence are required in order to superintend the local interests with success. It speaks well for the manager that he has been able to satisfy patrons, enlarge the field of operation and at the same time advance the financial status of the company shareholders. The satisfactory growth of the business in the past betokens similar development in the future.

The elder of two children, Thomas A. Brooks was born in San Francisco June 20, 1886, and is a son of Thomas J. and Mary (Anderson) Brooks, natives respectively of Boston, Mass., and Bristol, England, who came to California, were married in Oakland, and shortly afterwards established a permanent home in San Francisco. In that city the mother died in 1911 and there the father still remains. Educated in the public schools until he had gained a thorough knowledge of the common branches, in October of 1902 Thomas A. Brooks began the task of earning his own livelihood. At that time he entered the employ of the telephone company as a solicitor in San Francisco. A year later he was given a clerkship in the city office. Later he was promoted to the division office in San Francisco as division commercial engineer. The splendid manner in which he discharged the duties of the position led to his promotion to the rank of commercial engineer in the general office. All of these promotions had occurred within a decade after his original identification with the business.

The interests of the business caused Mr. Brooks to be detailed for important duties at San Diego, Cal., and Portland, Ore., after which he was sent to Bakersfield in January of 1911. The result of his investigations in this city is apparent in the large new telephone building on Twentieth between I and Chester. During the process of construction of this building he filled a similar mission in the city of Los Angeles, from which place he returned to Bakersfield in March, 1912, to act as manager of Kern county for the company, which is profiting now, as it has profited in the past, by his far-seeing discrimination and keen insight into matters along the line of his specialty. Since coming to this city he has identified himself with the Bakersfield Club and with other organizations connected with the social and commercial life of the city.

CHARLES N. SEARS.—The identification of the Scotch family of Sears with the new world began during the colonial period of American history, the first immigrant of the name having established himself on a plantation in Virginia, and from the Old Dominion Enoch Sears removed to Ohio during the early portion of the nineteenth century. Several generations have made their home in Guernsey county, Ohio, where James and Mary Sears passed the early years of their lives. When the call came for volunteers in the service of the Union during the Civil war he bade farewell to his young wife and set forth to fight for his country, going to the front with an Ohio regiment of which he was a member. When the disastrous battle of Chickamauga was being fought he and three of his brothers were killed in action. The little community in Guernsey county where they had been born and reared mourned their tragic taking away, but revered their memories as heroes of the struggle. Surviving this one of the brothers was a son, Charles N., who was born at North Salem, Guernsey county, Ohio, January 13, 1861; he was also survived by his wife, who later became Mrs. Wyatt and is now living in Nebraska in the city of Minden. The only child in the family was taken from Ohio to Illinois at the age of thirteen years and afterward attended school at Roseville, Warren county, where he prepared for college. It was his ambition to acquire a thorough education and with that object in view he matriculated in Abingdon (Ill.) College, from which in 1879 he was graduated with the degree of A. B. and with a high standing for excellence of scholarship.

A desire to see more of the country and also to acquire cheap land led Mr. Sears with two companions to start for Nebraska. Buying a team and wagon and securing the necessary outfit, they drove overland to Phelps county and entered land near Holdrege. Later he took up a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres, to which in time he secured the title. To one of his energetic temperament the idle waiting for the expiration of his homestead period was impossible and he passed the time profitably and pleasantly in acquiring a knowledge of the law. For a time he read with a prominent attorney and jurist at Kearney, Buffalo county, and so well was his time passed that in 1887 he was admitted to the bar of Nebraska, after which he began to practice at Holdrege with W. P. Hall as a partner. In order to enlarge his professional knowledge, he took a course in the law department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, from which he was graduated in 1892 with the degree of LL. B. Immediately after his graduation he engaged in the practice of law at Benton Harbor, Mich., from which point he came to California during the fall of 1900 and in February of the following year established himself in practice at Bakersfield, where he is well known as a man of scholarly attainments, an attorney of ripened experience, a counselor of sagacious judgment, and a citizen of the most unquestioned patriotism. Besides his professional activities he also is interested in oil operations, while his deep devotion to and prominence in the Republican party gives him added influence in his home city. Paternally he holds membership with the Knights of Pythias. In Benton Harbor, Mich., occurred his marriage to Miss Alberta Putnam, who was born in Niles, that state, received excellent educational advantages and is a woman of culture and an earnest member of the Congregational Church of Bakersfield. The only child of their union is a son, Herbert Putnam Sears, a student in the city high school. The lineage of Mrs. Sears is historic, one of her ancestors having been a Revolutionary soldier, John Putnam, of Green Mountain fame.

R. L. Stockton

and a brother of that illustrious patriot, Gen. Israel Putnam, who, when news came concerning the opening battle at Lexington, left his plough in the field at Pomfret, Conn., mounted his horse, and the next morning was in Concord, later led some untrained patriots in a successful assault northeast of Boston, and from that led from one victory to another until he was recognized as one of the greatest men of his day.

ROBERT L. STOCKTON.—An epitome of the history of educational advancement in Kern County presents in brief a recapitulation of the life work of Robert L. Stockton, county superintendent of schools since January of 1903, also vice president of the Central California Teachers' Association and ex-officio secretary of the county board of education. In reviewing his identification with the educational advancement and present standard of scholarship in the county he might well exclaim, "All of which I saw and part of which I was." From the age of eighteen years he has given his attention with whole-hearted devotion to the tasks confronting an educator and no problem has been too vexatious for his patient consideration, no progress too great for his aspiring vision and no change too radical provided only that the welfare of students and the interests of the schools thereby are promoted. Since he entered upon the duties of county superintendent the school work has quadrupled entailing upon him duties far more weighty than those incident to the first months of his official incumbency. In addition to the county high school there are now eighty-eight districts, while about two hundred teachers are given employment in the grammar and thirty in the high schools, there being expended annually in the interests of county educational work an amount approximating a half million dollars, which includes not only salaries of teachers, but also expenditures in new buildings, repairs of old buildings, janitor service and the manifold lesser expenses connected with a work of such magnitude. The duties of the county superintendent have expanded to such proportions that two assistants now are given steady employment and the superintendent's office is a scene of busy activity during practically every season of the year.

County Superintendent Stockton is proud of the fact that he can claim California as his native commonwealth and that his father, Dr. I. D. Stockton, was one of the honored pioneers of Kern County. Born at Santa Rosa October 25, 1863, he accompanied his parents to Kern County in 1872 and afterward attended the schools here. Diligent in study, intelligent in application and keen in mental comprehension, he acquired a wide fund of information notwithstanding the handicap occasioned by poorly equipped schools. After he had taken a course in the Los Angeles Business College he returned to his home county and took up educational work, for which he possessed inherent ability and in which he has achieved signal success. From his first identification with the schools as an instructor he aimed to advance the standard of scholarship. He rejected as obsolete the inadequate theories of earlier days and injected into pedagogy the spirit of twentieth century progress. As a result of his efforts the schools soon gave evidence of more thorough work and the advancement thus begun has continued to the present with auspicious results. For many years he served as a member of the county board of education and even yet he retains a connection with that useful organization. As the Democratic nominee in 1902 he was elected county superintendent of schools after an exciting contest with the then incumbent, whom he defeated by a large majority. In 1906 he was re-elected and again in 1910, the latter time without opposition, but with the endorsement of all parties. There are now about eight thousand pupils in the public elementary schools of the county, besides about five hundred in the high schools.

In the management of educational work so large and important he has the hearty co-operation and helpful assistance of the board of supervisors and the county board of education, all of whose members have the welfare of the schools as their slogan.

It should be stated that the Kern County High school has more than quadrupled in attendance in the last ten years and its departments multiplied until the state superintendent of public instruction pronounced it the most complete course and best high school in the state. They have added courses in surveying, assaying, wireless telegraphy, manual training, domestic science and art and agriculture, and claim the unique place of having the largest agricultural farm of any high school in the state.

The marriage of Professor Stockton united him with Miss Frances Engle, a native of Kern County and a daughter of David Engle, a pioneer stockman near Granite. They are the parents of eight children, namely: Ralph, Denton, Warren and Marion, all of whom are graduates of the Kern County High school, and the two last-named are now students in the Hastings Law school in San Francisco; Irving and Jesse, who are attending the Kern County High school; Clara and Frank, pupils in the public schools. The oldest son is a mining man in Nevada and the second son is engaged in the stock industry in Kern County, where Professor Stockton owns a stock ranch near Granite, also an alfalfa ranch near Button Willow. On the former place a specialty is made of horses, mules and cattle, while on the latter tract alfalfa is raised both for hay and for seed. Besides being a member of the Bakersfield Board of Trade he is interested in other movements for the civic well-being of the community. Fraternally he holds membership with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World, but the duties incident to educational work are so engrossing that he has had little leisure to participate in the activities of any of these fraternities, although in the heartiest accord with their philanthropies and social amenities.

PAUL LORENTZEN.—The genealogy of the Lorentzen family is traced back through a long line of worthy ancestors identified with the political and religious history of Schleswig-Holstein and transplanted to American soil as a direct result of the revolution of 1848 in Germany. An unusual coincidence is found in the fact that the heads of three successive generations bore the name of Paul Lorentzen and each served as a minister of the Lutheran Church in Schleswig-Holstein. It was the third of these three Pauls who bore an active part in the great revolution and as a consequence was forced to leave the country. America appealed to him as a land of freedom of thought. Crossing the ocean to the new world, he had among his companions in the voyage Carl Schurz, later one of the leading German-American citizens of the United States. Well qualified for ministerial work through his graduation from Heidelberg College and his successful labors in the old country, he threw himself actively into the Lutheran ministry and held a number of important pastorates. Perhaps the most responsible of these was the work in the Lutheran Church at Eighth and Mound streets, St. Louis, and he continued in that city throughout his remaining years. After crossing the ocean he had married Anna Broises, who was born in Pennsylvania and died in Petersburg, Menard county, Ill. The Revolutionary participant was not the only member of the family to emigrate, for his father, the second Paul, also lived in Pennsylvania for some years and later settled in Illinois, in both commonwealths engaging in the ministry of his chosen denomination.

Out of a family of nine children, seven of whom are still living, Paul Lorentzen was the third youngest and he represents the fourth generation of the name of Paul. Unlike his ancestors, however, he did not enter the ministry, although he has been devoted in his allegiance to the Lutheran Church and a contributor to its missionary movements. Born at Mount

Carroll, Ill., September 16, 1857, he was reared at Petersburg, four miles from New Salem, that state, and in early boyhood attended public schools. At the age of fourteen he became an apprentice to the trade of carpenter. Having completed his time he went to Denver, Colo., in 1878, and secured employment as a carpenter. After two years as a day worker he was made a foreman in the bridge and building department of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad, which position he filled for three years. Coming to California in 1883 he entered the employ of the Southern Pacific Company on the Shasta division. Five months later the company sent him to Guatemala, Central America, for the purpose of acting as foreman in the building of the pontoon and laying of the track across lake Amatilan, also in the building of the track to Guatemala. At the expiration of two years he was called back from Central America to California, where he acted as foreman of carpenters in building the branch from Berendo to Raymond. Next he filled a similar position on the Coast line between Soledad, Monterey county, and Templeton, San Luis Obispo county. From that division he was sent to act as foreman in building a bridge across the American river at Sacramento, after which he had charge of construction work between Napa Junction and Santa Rosa. In 1888 he was foreman in construction work from Templeton to Santa Margarita and the following year he worked on the bridge across the San Joaquin west of Fresno, after which he engaged as foreman on the line from Merced to Oakdale, Stanislaus county. The company then sent him to Kingsburg, Fresno county, to take charge of building a bridge across the Kings river, after which he was a construction foreman between Fresno and Kerman.

Having engaged as foreman in the bridge and building department of the San Joaquin division until 1899, the Southern Pacific Company in that year transferred Mr. Lorentzen to Texas and stationed him in Galveston as general foreman of the Southern Pacific docks. The memorable flood and destruction of Galveston were personally witnessed by Mr. Lorentzen, who took an active part in the work of rebuilding the city and particularly the company dock. Returning to California in 1905 he here had the rare experience of a vacation of three months, after which he was appointed road-master of the Tehachapi division between Bakersfield and Mojave. Since March 10, 1906, he has served in that capacity and his difficult position has been filled with admirable energy and recognized fidelity.

The marriage of Mr. Lorentzen and Miss Pearl Hedgpeth, a native of Eureka Springs, Ark., was solemnized at San Lucas, Monterey county, Cal., and was blessed with five children, one of whom, Ray, died in Tulare at the age of twenty-one years, and Genevieve died in Tehachapi May 16, 1912. The survivors are Paul, Anna and Harold. Paul is employed at Needles. Since attaining his majority Mr. Lorentzen has supported the Democratic party. While living at Tulare he was a leading worker in the Fraternal Aid, also in Tulare Lodge No. 306, I. O. O. F., and Mount Whitney Encampment No. 82 of the same city. In addition he has been identified actively with Sumner Lodge No. 143, K. of P., in East Bakersfield. Mrs. Lorentzen is active in social and educational work in Tehachapi and is a member of the board of trustees at Tehachapi and clerk of the board.

J. H. STEVENSON.—The hotel Metropole at East Bakersfield, of which Mr. Stevenson has been one of the owners since 1905, deservedly occupies a high place in the estimation of the traveling public and has become a favorite stopping place for people of all classes, but particularly with miners, railroad employes and stockmen has its popularity been manifest and its prestige assured. The location of the building, at the corner of Baker and Sumner streets, furnishes every facility for the prompt accommodation of travelers on the Southern Pacific Railroad and many of the trains stop at this point for meals. Those desirous of quick service are accommodated at the lunch counter, while others find every facility for elegant service in the well-equipped dining room, with its large seating capacity and its supply of excellent food at moderate prices. The management prides itself on its model kitchen, equipped with every convenience for cookery, ventilated in accordance with the most modern systems and finished by experts understanding the laws of sanitation. The hotel maintains thirty-five guest-rooms neatly furnished and provided with modern conveniences, a number of them having private baths attached.

The senior proprietor of the hotel comes from Missouri, but has made Kern county his headquarters for fifteen years or more. He was born in Texas county, Mo., March 15, 1870, and was fourth in order of birth among ten children who lived to years of maturity. The father, John, died in 1904, and the mother, who bore the maiden name of Louisa Martin, still makes Missouri her home and is hale and rugged at the age of seventy-nine (1912). J. H., being of a venturesome disposition, fond of travel and change, considered it no hardship that he was forced to earn his own livelihood from boyhood. Work indeed interested him far more than schooling and he felt a special interest in mining, so it is not strange that at the age of thirteen he was working in quartz mines in Colorado. Ever since that time he has kept posted concerning mining of every kind and few men in Kern county are better posted than he concerning the details connected with the occupation. Upon leaving the Colorado mines in 1895 he went to Alaska, where he mined in the Klondike and the Yukon basin, remaining for eighteen months. Leaving the cold frozen north he came to California and later mined at Esmerelda, Calaveras county, at Pine Grove in Amador county, at Bodie in Mono county, besides other mining centers. In addition for three years he spent considerable of his time in Nevada mines. After having prospected in the Panamint range in Inyo county he was attracted to Randsburg, Kern county, and to the Mojave district, where he was one of the first to develop prospects. One of his best-paying claims, the Eleven, he sold to Dr. Nelson in 1900, after having developed it to a high degree of profit. For some time he was identified with the development of the Yellow Rover, and it was not until 1911 that he disposed of his interests there, the sale bringing him an excellent return upon his investment.

The first connection of Mr. Stevenson with the hotel business occurred in Caliente, Kern county, in 1902, when he purchased the Caliente hotel, but after having managed the property for two years he sold it and removed to East Bakersfield. For two years he conducted the hotel Metropole alone, but, realizing the need of co-operation in the large undertaking, he took into partnership James A. Bernard under the firm title of Stevenson & Bernard. Subsequent changes have made the title of the firm Stevenson, Woody & O'Meara, the other owners being A. J. Woody and P. J. O'Meara, well-known real-estate men of Bakersfield. The present management dates from April 11, 1911, and has been successful from the first, so that each member of the firm is receiving a deserved return for his time, labor and investment. While giving close attention to the hotel, Mr. Stevenson finds time to keep posted concerning politics, aids the Democratic party in local affairs and is public-spirited in every respect. Fraternally he holds membership with the Elks, Eagles and Knights of Pythias. During 1909 he was united in marriage with Miss May Gazzolo, a native of Coulterville, Mariposa county, this state. With his wife and two children, Athena and Regina, he has a comfortable home in East Bakersfield and finds a special delight in a happy and contented domestic life.

W. A. Howell

WILLIAM A. HOWELL.—From the age of thirteen years a resident of Bakersfield, Mr. Howell is thoroughly in sympathy with the educational, commercial and material upbuilding of this city and holds it to be, in point of possibilities, unsurpassed by any place in our great commonwealth. Born in New Orleans, La., December 11, 1863, he is the only surviving child of the late William and Mary (Heavey) Howell, natives respectively of Wales and Ireland. After having crossed the ocean during early life, the father settled in New Orleans and worked his way forward until he acquired the ownership of a mercantile business in that city. Seeking the advantages of the west, he came to Bakersfield in 1876 and, finding the outlook favorable, sent for his wife and children, who joined him in 1877, establishing a permanent residence in the county-seat town. Scarcely had he established himself in business here when in 1879 his life came to an end. Afterward his wife remained in this city until her death, which occurred in 1897. Meanwhile she had given her only remaining son an excellent education in the public schools and had trained him for the responsibilities of the workaday world. While yet a mere lad he became proficient in stenography. The correctness of his transcripts attracted attention. It was deemed little less than remarkable that one so young should be so skilled and accurate in the reporting of cases involving technical terms to which he was unaccustomed. Before he became of age he was by stipulation of the attorneys secured to report court cases for over three years, and after he had attained his majority he was regularly appointed by the judge of the superior court as the official court reporter. Ever since then he has filled the same position and it is said that he has the honor of being the oldest official, in point of years of continuous service, connected with the courthouse of Kern county. Nor has his identification with county work been limited to stenographic service, for in addition he has been a deputy at different times in nearly all the offices of the county, also for three terms of two years each he filled the office of county auditor, there as in all other positions displaying accuracy, fidelity, energy and wise judgment. Mr. Howell was one of the organizers of the Security Trust Company and has been a member of the board of directors since its inception.

The residence which Mr. Howell erected on the corner of H and Seventeenth streets and which he still owns and occupies, has for its presiding genius a woman of great capability, a native daughter of the commonwealth, formerly Miss Elizabeth G. Dugan, who was born in Amador county, but made Bakersfield her home at the time of her marriage. Two children bless their union, Genevieve and William A., Jr. Upon the organization of the Knights of Columbus in Bakersfield Mr. Howell became a charter member and later he held the office of district deputy for three years, besides which in other ways he has contributed to the interests of the order and to its local growth. For five years he has served as a member of the board of trustees of the Beale memorial library and at the same time he has promoted other worthy movements identified with the permanent prosperity of the city. The Democratic party receives his support in local and general elections.

ANTHONY B. OLSON.—Although of American birth and typically American in mode of thought and action, he comes from Scandinavian forbears and is a son of John Olson, a native of Vermland, Sweden, the founder of this branch of the Olson family in the United States. Skilled in merchant tailoring, he followed the trade after his arrival in the new world. Starting in with a very small tailor shop on Chicago avenue, Chicago, he gradually built up an important business and finally had forty workmen in his employ. The great fire of 1871 destroyed his shop and ruined his business. Forced to start anew, he removed to Michigan and opened a tailor shop at Muskegon, where in time he recuperated his losses and attained a fair degree of financial success. Upon giving up the work of a merchant tailor, he returned to Chicago and there he died in 1906. One year later occurred the demise of his wife, who bore the maiden name of Erliana Swensen and was a native of Sparta, Mich. Surviving them are four children, the youngest of whom, Anthony Benjamin, was born in Muskegon, Mich., May 11, 1887, and received such advantages as the schools of that city afforded. After having graduated from the Muskegon high school in 1905 he removed to Chicago and there occupied clerical positions with different firms.

Upon his arrival in California during May of 1908 Mr. Olson secured employment at Sanger in the office of the Hume-Bennett Lumber Company. A year later he was transferred to the work of a yardman and from that rose to be foreman of the yard, in which responsible position he proved efficient and trustworthy. Resigning January 1, 1911, he came to McKittrick as an employe of the King Lumber Company, which in September of the same year transferred him to their Bakersfield yard to take charge of the work there. During February, 1912, he returned to McKittrick in the capacity of manager for the King Lumber Company, in whose interests he since has served with conscientious devotion and encouraging results. While living in Sanger he met and married Miss Carrie L. Barr, who was born in Kansas, but passed her girlhood almost wholly at Sanger. After graduating from the Sanger high school she had taken a course of study in the San Francisco Normal and had fitted for educational work, in which she engaged with success prior to her marriage. In political allegiance Mr. Olson adheres to Democratic principles and fraternally he holds membership with the Masons.

MAJOR W. H. COOK, M. D.—The notable record achieved by Dr. Cook in sanitation and surgical work during the Spanish-American war and subsequent service in the Philippines duplicates in many respects the able and prominent identification of his father, the late J. A. Cook, M. D., with the Union army during the Civil war, in which as a surgeon attached to the Nineteenth Army Corps he had charge of hospital boats and hastily equipped surgical wards on Virginian battlefields. For such responsible tasks he was qualified by graduation from Rush Medical College and by long service as a physician and surgeon with a large private patronage. Himself a native of Tinton Falls, Monmouth county, N. J., he had married some years before the beginning of the war Miss Mary M. Harris, a native of Virginia, and they had established a home in Kendall county, Ill., where the eldest of their four children, William Harris Cook, was born at Fox, February 19, 1855. Following the Civil war, a home was made at Washington, D. C., but eventually the doctor removed to Kansas and engaged in practice at Humboldt until his death. The last days of the mother were passed in the home of her son, W. H., at McKittrick, where she passed away in 1912 at the age of eighty-three.

Subsequent to graduation from the Aurora (Ill.) high school and the Naperville (Ill.) branch of the commercial department of Northwestern University, at the age of eighteen William Harris Cook matriculated in Rush Medical College and completed the course in 1875, but, on account of not having attained his majority, he was not granted a diploma and the degree of M. D., until a year later, February 15, 1876. Meanwhile he had gained considerable experience as an assistant to his father in Aurora, Ill., but after graduation he removed to Kansas and opened an office at Larned, Pawnee county, where he remained for two years. Following a period devoted to recuperation in Colorado he returned to Illinois and opened an office at Elwood, Will county. The year 1880 found him a pioneer at Globe, Ariz., of which town he was a leading citizen and successful physician. On account of his familiarity with the language of the Mojave and Apache tribes he was chosen for two years to make the official count of the Indians at the White mountain reservation.

A pioneer of 1887 at Bakersfield, Dr. Cook engaged in practice in this then small town. On the organization of Company G, Sixth California National Guard, he was chosen the first captain and continued as such until the outbreak of the war with Spain. A commission as captain in that war bore date of May, 1898, and expired with his honorable discharge in December of the same year. Entering the medical department of the United States army as an assistant surgeon, he was dispatched to Fort Leavenworth and with the Thirty-second United States Infantry was sent to the Philippines. From assistant surgeon with the rank of lieutenant he was promoted in December, 1899, to captain with the rank of surgeon and in March of 1900 was commissioned surgeon, on the recommendation of General Wheeler, the immediate cause of the promotion having been the skill displayed in the command of the extreme left of the firing line at the time of the advance on Porac. Afterward he was assigned to civil service as deputy insular health officer under Major C. E. Carter, in which capacity he visited every province but one, established boards of health and instructed the same in the best methods of combating and preventing bubonic plague, cholera, leprosy and small-pox. Within less than ten months there had been over three hundred thousand deaths from cholera and one hundred eighty-five thousand deaths from bubonic plague. Such was the beneficent result of the fight against disease that contagious epidemics were almost exterminated.

After a year in the United States, during February of 1905 Dr. Cook returned to the Philippines with the Eighteenth Infantry and served as surgeon on the island of Samar. About a year later he resigned and returned to New York, but in March of 1907 came to California and opened an office at McKittrick, where he has since engaged in practice, meanwhile forming associations with the county, state and American medical associations. During his term of army service he became allied with the military order of Caribou and he is also prominent in Masonry, being connected with the Knights Templar, Scottish Rite Consistory and thirty-second degree. Mrs. Cook was formerly Lorena Williamson and was born in Brooklyn, N. Y. Her parents, S. Stryker and Mary E. (Hubbard) Williamson, were natives respectively of Brooklyn and Tinton Falls, N. J., and the latter traced her lineage to England, while Mr. Williamson was of old Knickerbocker blood, a member of a family that bore an honorable part in the Revolutionary war and in the activities of the colonial era.

HON. R. J. HUDSON.—The distinction of being a native son of the great west belongs to Judge Hudson, who was born in Napa county, this state, February 20, 1857, being a son of David and Frances (Griffith) Hudson, natives respectively of Missouri and North Carolina, the former now deceased, and the latter still a resident of California. It was the privilege of Judge Hudson, but a privilege largely resulting from his own determined energy and ambition, to secure excellent educational advantages. After he had completed the studies of the Napa high school he matriculated in the classical department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, where he took the regular course of study. Next he entered the law department of Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tenn., and in 1878 he was graduated from that institution. Returning to California he was admitted to the bar by the supreme court during the same year and immediately afterward established himself in practice in Los Angeles, where for a year he had Judge Anson Brunson as a partner. From 1880 to 1882 he served as district attorney of Los Angeles county. The failure of his health led him to seek a change of climate and he established himself in Lake county, this state, where he soon rose to prominence through the prompt recognition of his splendid abilities. After a year in private practice he was elected judge of the superior court of Lake county, which responsible office he filled for ten years, meanwhile regaining his health. When he retired from the judicial connection he removed to Hanford, Kings county, where he engaged in practice for six years, coming from there in 1911 to Bakersfield, where he is a member of the law firm of Emmons & Hudson, with offices in the Producers' Bank building. Much important litigation has been given over to his charge in the various places of his residence and he has fully proved his broad knowledge of the law as well as his ability to carry through to solution intricate cases involving large issues.

In 1882, at Napa City, Judge Hudson was united in marriage with Miss Panthea B. Boggs, a native of Napa county. They are the parents of two sons, the elder of whom, Howard, is a resident of San Francisco, while the younger, Marshall, is now in Dawson City. Ever since he became a voter Judge Hudson has supported Democratic principles.

ALVIN G. LUESCHEN, M. D.—To rise out of a condition of poverty, to earn self-support from the age of thirteen years, to secure an excellent education without aid and to develop into a successful professional man and a cultured citizen of his community, such is an achievement calling for superior ability and the most undaunted persistence of effort. That this is the record of Dr. Lueschen affords a silent but eloquent testimony as to a self-reliant personality. By dint of personal energy he paid his way through medical college and gained not only a thorough professional education, but also a broad knowledge on all subjects of historical, national and scientific interest, thus rounding out a mental culture of breadth and dignity.

A descendant of old Teutonic ancestry, Dr. Lueschen was born in Columbus, Platte county, Neb., in 1880, and is a son of Gerhard Lueschen, a pioneer farmer and rancher of Nebraska, and in the early days a chum of William F. Cody, better known as Buffalo Bill. The father, still a resident of Nebraska, possesses abundant health and vitality notwithstanding his early years of hardships. Born about 1848, he has seen much of the development of the west and has borne his own share therein. As previously stated, the poverty of the family forced Dr. Lueschen to become self-supporting when thirteen years of age and by dint of persevering energy he carried out a childhood ambition to become a physician. During the fall of 1900 he matriculated in Creighton Medical College at Omaha, Neb., from which he was graduated with the class of 1904. Returning to his native town, he opened an office and gained his initial experience as a practitioner, and in the same town in 1908 he married Miss Gertrude Elias, by whom he has one son, Alvin Gerald. The family came to California in 1910 and settled in Bakersfield, where the Doctor opened an office at No. 212 Producers' Bank building and about the same time erected a modern and beautifully appointed bungalow at No. 1917 Orange street at a cost of more than $3,000. In political faith he adheres to Republican principles and in religion he is a generous contributor to the Episcopal Church, of which his wife is an earnest member.

JAMES NICHOLAS NORRIS.—Very early in the colonization of the new world the Norris family became established in South Carolina and in that state David Norris owned and operated a large plantation during the early portion of the nineteenth century. The exact date of his migration to Missouri is not known, but it occurred early in the century named and thereafter he devoted his time to the difficult task of developing a productive farm out of a tract of raw land. Among the children in his family was a son, Abner, who became a man of such deep religious fervor and such intense spiritual zeal that he gave his services for years to the Baptist denomination without hope of remuneration or thought of financial returns. Indeed, he made his livelihood and that of the family through his work as a farmer and stock-raiser, but always he was ready to sacrifice his own interests for those of the church with the hope that thereby the cause of Christianity might be promoted. Cheerfully, willingly he gave his all to promote religion and the ideals that possessed him he endeavored to implant in the hearts and minds of his children. In early manhood he had married Jane Evans, who was born in Kentucky and had gone from that state to Missouri in company with her father, Samuel Evans, a pioneer farmer of the middle west. Sharing with her husband his self-sacrificing purposes, she cared for the farm and the family during his absences on preaching tours and desired no recompense other than the thought of duty done. When advanced in years she came to Bakersfield to the home of her son, James Nicholas, and here her death occurred at the age of ninety-six.

E. C. Smith

The youngest of the ten children of Rev. Abner and Jane Norris, James Nicholas Norris was born near St. Joseph, Mo., April 17, 1849. When the Civil war began he was too young to participate, but he recalls the anxieties and privations of that period of national trouble and individual distress. His schooling was meager, but he was trained well in agriculture and made that his occupation for some years in Dekalb county, Mo., after which he conducted a general mercantile business at Cosby, Andrew county. Leaving Missouri in 1883, accompanied by wife and children, he came to California and settled in Kern county, where for a brief period he devoted himself to ranching. However, for the greater part of his residence in the west he has given his attention to carpentering and building in Bakersfield. Not only has he taken contracts for many residences for others, but he has built a number of houses for himself and he still owns two in Bakersfield and one in Kern (East Bakersfield). In politics he is a Republican and in religion a member of the Baptist Church. For one term he served as superintendent of streets of Bakersfield. By his marriage in Dekalb county, Mo., to Sarah Lee, a native of Iowa, he had a family of two daughters and two sons, namely: Mrs. Lillie Gamble, of Bakersfield; Mrs. Lulu J. Adams, also of this city; Edward Garfield, one of the proprietors of the Kern Plumbing Company; and Herbert H., property man at the Bakersfield opera house.

HON. SYLVESTER CLARK SMITH.—The Smith genealogical records indicate an identification with American soil dating from the arrival in Massachusetts of John Smith of Puritan fame and continuing through all of the succeeding generations, each member stanch of purpose, earnest of soul and positive in achievement. The family remained resident in New England until finally the westward drift of emigration bore Sylvester Smith in its tide and planted him upon the then frontier of Northern New York. Nor did this represent the end of his journeyings. With true pioneer instinct he followed the star of empire in its course toward the prairies and plains of the west. When his son, Edward, a native of New York, was still a small child the family removed to Ohio and later traveled by wagon to Illinois. In that state Edward grew to manhood, rugged in body and resolute in character. The vicissitudes incident to frontier existence had developed within him self-reliance and independence and he was admirably qualified to contribute to the development of the middle west. As early as 1835, when Iowa was yet in the infancy of its agricultural progress, he removed to that state, where he met and married Celia Shockley, a native of Ohio. She, too, came of stanch pioneer ancestry. In infancy she had been taken from Ohio to Iowa by her parents, who became residents of the last-named state at a time when it was very sparsely populated.

Taking up land in the rich but undeveloped section of southeastern Iowa Edward Smith gave himself entirely to the task of changing the homestead into a productive and remunerative farm. As the years went by he and his wife had the capable assistance of their children, numbering five sons and three daughters. While riches did not come to them, they gained that which is more to be desired; the deep respect of acquaintances and the implicit confidence of all with whom they had social intercourse or business dealings. In type they were representative of the splendid element whose labors were the foundation of the ultimate agricultural development of Iowa and whose sincere characters reappeared in a later generation of practical, sensible daughters and talented sons.

The life which this narrative depicts began in the home of Edward and Celia Smith near Mount Pleasant, Henry county, Iowa, August 26, 1858, and closed at Hollywood, Cal., January 26, 1913. In early years there came ever and anon glimpses of the splendid mental endowment and resolute nature that were to bring subsequent national prominence, yet those years were far from eventful. More fortunate than the sons of many pioneers, he was allowed a term in an academy after he had completed the studies of the country schools. The few months spent in Howe's academy at Mount Pleasant aroused his ambition for higher educational opportunities and at the age of eighteen he began to teach in the spring and summer months in order to earn the money necessary for attending school in the winter. Coming to California in 1879 he secured a position as teacher in a school of Colusa county, where, May 7, 1882, he was united in marriage with Miss Maria Hart, a native of Franklin county, Mo., and soon afterward they removed to San Francisco in order that he might have the best advantages for the study of law. The summer of 1883 found them newcomers in Kern county, and from that time until his death the history of Mr. Smith was in many respects a history of the county itself, so intimately was he associated with its moral, educational and political growth. An ambition to complete his law studies led him to teach school at Tehachapi and Glennville in order that he might earn expenses during the course of his law education.

After having been admitted to the bar in October of 1885, Mr. Smith opened an office in Bakersfield. Chance directed that his fame should come in another field than that of the law. A great struggle was being waged between the riparian owners and the appropriators of the waters of Kern river. In 1886 the Kern County Echo was founded as a militant factor in the controversy and Mr. Smith became editor. The controversy ended, but the Echo, having established a place of its own in the journalistic field, has continued with increasing circulation and popularity up to the present time and now, as the Morning Echo, wields a high influence for good in every avenue of local activity. During the early years of the existence of the paper, when funds were low and the future prospects at times discouraging, the editor made his home on a claim at the extreme southern end of the Kern mesa, riding horseback to and from the editorial rooms in Bakersfield. Meanwhile he had become a member of the first company of the National Guard organized in this city, had helped to organize debating clubs and street improvement associations, and from the very first had been a local leader in the Republican party. Editorial work then, even more than now, necessitated the possession of both physical and moral courage, and that he possessed such qualities is evidenced by an incident that still is told among his friends. One evening a citizen, armed with a gun, rushed into the office exhibiting a clipping from the morning paper that had aroused his wrath. Presenting the gun at the head of Mr. Smith, he demanded that the editor literally eat the offending article. It was useless to argue with the infuriated man. Still covered with the weapon, Mr. Smith quietly asked a clerk to telephone for the sheriff. As he resumed writing at his desk, the angry man had time to become ashamed of his fury and the affair ended amicably. Nor was Mr. Smith less brave morally. Always he expressed his personal convictions in the paper, no matter how unpopular they might be or how much they might seem to augur his personal defeat. Indeed, his high moral courage was one of his most notable attributes, and while at times bringing him criticism, in the end it became the foundation and the root of his great influence. From the day the first issue of the Echo appeared until the last day of his life (a period of twenty-six years, seven months and twenty-one days) his name appeared at the head of the editorial columns of every issue. In addition he was the leading editorial writer during much of that time. Even when official duties kept him from the city he still directed the policy of the paper.

In every step of its advancement might be seen his quiet but decisive influence. Not only was he one of the oldest editors in the state in point of continuous service, but he also had the distinction of being one of the most able, forceful and influential.

The distinction attached to the career of Mr. Smith derives much interest from the public service of the man. Even more important than his labors as editor were his disinterested services in behalf of his state and country. Broad as was his field of usefulness as the journalistic head of a great paper, helpful as was his work on the Bakersfield Board of Trade and Board of Health, progressive as was his co-operation with many organizations of the community, he realized that there was need of reform movements in the commonwealth and he desired to aid in the legislative work of the state—hence his first campaign for the state senate in 1894. Elected not only then, but again in 1898, he served for eight years with honor and fidelity. Usefulness as a legislator paved the way for a later service in congress. As senator he was the author of a counties government act, the registration law of 1898, the constitutional amendment authorizing the use of voting machines, and (this he regarded as his most important public service) a bill establishing the state polytechnic school at San Luis Obispo. This institution became a pioneer in the field of manual training. The author of the bill had in mind a training in agriculture, mechanics, engineering, business methods, domestic economy and indeed all occupations except those dealing with the professional walks of life. When he first presented the bill in 1895 the senate passed it, but failure came in the assembly. In 1897 it was passed by both houses, only to be vetoed by the governor. Session after session he labored persistently until finally in 1901 it became a law and the school was established. His theory in urging so persistently the establishment of the school was that labor must be made more efficient and better trained, then it will be better paid and less irksome; and every trained worker, if industrious and frugal, may reasonably hope to support his family and educate his children, in turn preparing them to be trained specialists in some avenue of employment.

When he first announced himself as a candidate for congress in 1902 Mr. Smith was defeated in the convention on the forty-ninth ballot. The contest, begun in Sacramento and ended at Ventura, had been peculiarly strenuous and even bitter, but no trace of the bitterness lingered in the mind of Mr. Smith, for with characteristic enthusiasm he threw himself into the campaign on the side of his successful competitor, Captain Daniels, and the latter was elected. His own laurels came to him at a later date. August 25, 1904, he was nominated by acclamation and in November he was elected by a majority of more than ten thousand. From that time until the day of his death he continued to represent the Eighth California district. Meanwhile he had been recognized in congress as a ready debater and an excellent committee-worker. As a member of the original commission appointed to revise the banking and monetary system, he served until the loss of health necessitated relinquishment of such duties. The present postal savings bank bill is a monument to his labors, supplementing those of other congressmen. When the speaker of the house was shorn of much of his power, Mr. Smith was elected a member of the new rules committee, to which was given much of that power.

As was natural to one coming from Kern county, the interest maintained by Mr. Smith in the oil industry led him to make an effort to promote the permanent welfare of that business. A bill presented by him sought to extend to the taking up of oil land the essential provisions of the homestead law, varied of course to suit the different need. No provisions had been made to secure to a locator of oil land any legal right of possession until such time as he might make an actual discovery of oil. Before any such discovery it was necessary to spend thousands of dollars, which under the then law was jeopardized. The bill limited the amount of oil land which a man or company could acquire, but also insured peaceful possession of an oil claim during the time necessary to complete a well. However, although the bill passed in the house, it failed of the support of the senate, and before the next session the deluge of oil land withdrawals swept over every district of the west where the presence of oil was suspected. Then followed the Yard decision with its disastrous results; the visits of delegations of oil men to Washington; the presentation of memorials to congress; and finally, under a suspension of rules, the Smith remedial bill was passed in February, 1911, when Mr. Smith, so ill that he was supported by fellow-members and so weak that his voice could hardly be heard a dozen paces away, asked consent for the passage of the measure.

Another measure of importance presented by Mr. Smith prevents the monopoly of patented articles and processes by permitting any person to make use of an invention on the payment of a stipulated royalty to the inventor, and providing for government supervision of these royalties so that favoritism might be eliminated. Through his labors an appropriation of $2,000,000 was secured to protect the settlers in the Imperial valley from the ravages of the Colorado river. His highest honor in the congress came with his appointment in 1908 as a member of the national monetary commission. During 1910 he secured an appropriation of $20,000 for a site for a federal building in Bakersfield. Later a recommendation was made to appropriate $135,000 for the erection of a postoffice, and this will ensure the erection in the near future of a building here for federal use. In all of his official career his affection remained deeply rooted in Bakersfield. When he returned hither after an absence he noted with intense eagerness every phase of industrial development, every improvement made, whether in an electric light or sewerage system, in the residence district or the business center, in the streets, the paving or the roads. Along every line of civic activity he had pronounced and progressive opinions and he had studied park systems, fire departments and indeed every department of importance to a growing municipality. One of his ideas was the establishment of comfortable rest rooms in the lodging-house districts, where the men, necessarily idle at certain seasons of the year, might congregate in their old clothes without any feeling of discomfort, but with a genuine enjoyment of their own club room. Many of these men, disliking to loaf on the sidewalk or in the saloons, would greatly enjoy a plain but pleasant club room where they might meet their friends and enjoy conversation or games during the days of their unemployment. Parks also would aid in promoting the happiness of the people and give them healthful outdoor exercise, hence he earnestly advocated them.

Through a long illness Congressman Smith never lost touch with the world of progress and particularly with his own home county. The mails kept him in touch with Bakersfield and Washington, the two spots of his deepest interest. To his friends he sent the most encouraging messages. No word of discouragement was allowed to leave his room at the sanatorium, but in illness as in health he was brave, hopeful and dignified, always interested in others and constantly urging measures for the benefit of the people. In one of his last letters he urged better church equipment and pledged his full cooperation to that end. On his last day a public document called his attention to the fact that sixteen members of the sixty-first congress had passed from earth. Before the sun had risen he was the seventeenth. He had fallen with his armor on, with mind alert, with reputation at its highest and with honor unimpeached. Surviving him were his wife and two daughters, Mrs. E. S. Larsen, of Washington, D. C., and Mrs. A. W. Mason, of Bakersfield. Relatives and a delegation of friends accompanied the body from Hollywood to Bakersfield, where the magnificent funeral cortege with marchers representing military, labor, civic and fraternal organizations attested to his deep hold upon the affections of his fellow-townsmen. Thus passed into eternal silence one who had lived nobly and well and whose name will long stand in the annals of Bakersfield as that of a distinguished citizen, who climbed by sterling worth from obscurity into an honorable place in the councils of the nation.

Paul Galtier

Mariana Galtier

PAUL GALTES.—To present the biography of the pioneer merchant of Bakersfield is to depict in many respects a commercial history of the city itself, with the development of which he has been identified from the days when it sheltered only six families up to the present time with a proudly acclaimed population of almost seventeen thousand. A few shanties represented the business blocks of the village at the time of his arrival in 1871. The railroad had not been built and passengers had no means of conveyance aside from the stage or their own private vehicles. On every side the barren land stretched out toward the sun-stricken desert and only an optimist could have predicted the possibilities of irrigation. The following year, however, found the county-seat removed from Havilah to Bakersfield and the prosperity of the present dates from that period. Meanwhile the young Spaniard had bought a shanty with a frontage of twenty-five feet on Nineteenth between K street and Chester avenue and in the small building he stocked groceries to the amount of $600, for the greater part of which he had been given credit. It should be mentioned for the good of young people that one of the reasons that he was given so great credit was, as was stated by one of the prominent wholesale merchants of San Francisco of that day, that the mercantile agency book stated that Paul Galtes of Bakersfield never entered saloons nor played cards, hence his unlimited credit. From that time his rise was steady, his debts were met as promised, his credit became first-class and he entered into the financial independence whose later fruition has brought him every comfort of life as well as every possibility for rest, travel and recreation. In 1889 he returned to his native city in Spain to visit old friends and again in 1911 he made a trip to Barcelona, besides touring throughout Europe and into Palestine.

Mr. Galtes was born near Barcelona, Catalonia, Spain, October 25, 1840, being a son of Paul Sr., a blacksmith and a manufacturer of tools for farmers. After he had been given an excellent education in the Spanish language the son was taken from school and apprenticed for four years to the trades of locksmith and blacksmith. Builders' hardware also was among his specialties. In those days all hardware for buildings was made by hand and he acquired considerable skill in the art. At the expiration of four years, during which he had received no pay whatever, he began to work for wages and traveled as a journeyman throughout Europe. In 1861 he crossed the ocean to Cuba and secured employment in Santiago as clerk in a dry-goods store, where he remained for eight years. While favorably considering an offer of partnership in the business trouble arose with the mother country over the city of Independence, a revolution seemed imminent and, rather than take up arms against his native land, he decided to come to California. The attractions of the west had been depicted to him often and always with alluring eloquence, therefore he was prepared to find a country of great possibilities and unexcelled climate. Landing at San Francisco December 23, 1868, he found himself at great disadvantage by reason of lack of knowledge of English. On the advice of Archbishop Alamany of San Francisco, who had come from the same Spanish province as himself, he spent four months in language study at St. Vincent's College in Los Angeles. At the expiration of that time he secured work in a Los Angeles bakery. During the erection of the then leading hotel he was a hired workman and when the building was completed he received an appointment as steward, with full charge of all supplies. For fourteen months he filled the same position at $75 per month and this gave him a little sum to invest in business when he came to Bakersfield, where by 1874 he had accumulated $27,000 in general merchandise. During 1878 he erected the first brick block in the city. This cost $18,000 and was his business headquarters until he retired from the mercantile business in 1888. At the time of his retirement his stock was valued at $40,000 and his credit was the very best. His confidence in Bakersfield was shown in the erection of the first two-story brick block with plate glass front, a building which was burned in 1889, but replaced with a block equally substantial and expensive. In retiring from the mercantile business it was not with any desire to enter larger affairs, but in order that young men ambitious to become merchants might have a better chance to succeed. Since then he has built the Grand hotel on the corner of Chester avenue and Twentieth street and the Para theatre on Chester between Twentieth and Twenty-first, besides which he owns an elegant residence on Truxtun and F streets.

Upon the incorporation of Bakersfield and the election of the first board of trustees Mr. Galtres was elected to serve as trustee, but declined reelection at the end of the term. In politics he has been independent and has voted for the man or the principle rather than the party. For some years he has been a leading worker in the Kern County Pioneers' Association. In addition he is associated with the Knights of Columbus. At San Francisco in 1874 he married Miss Mariana Lexague, a native of Basses-Pyrenees, France. Seven children were born of the union and four are now living. The eldest son, Paul, Jr., a graduate of Santa Clara College, has entered the order of Jesuits and is now a priest in St. Louis, Mo. The younger son, Felix, also a graduate of Santa Clara College, is employed in the Security Trust Company Bank of Bakersfield. The elder daughter, Sister Mary Christa, is stationed at Santa Monica with the Sisters of the Holy Name. The younger daughter, Lucy, is the wife of Edward Helbling, of Bakersfield. Mr. Galtres is a member of the Roman Catholic Church.

W. S. LIERLY.—To make mention of commercial, financial or educational affairs in Taft and to omit therefrom the name of Mr. Lierly would be to do an injustice to one of the pioneers of the town, one of the up-builders of its permanent prosperity and one of the promoters of its school system, a man of clear brain, strong character, iron will and strict integrity. The importance of his identification with Taft may be inferred from the fact that as senior member of the firm of Lierly & Son he owns and operates two barns, known as the Midway stables, engages in house-moving and team contracting, sells and hauls sand and gravel, owns and conducts a well equipped blacksmith shop, also owns the Taft harness shop (an enterprise of no small importance), and is president of the company, incorporated for $25,000 and known as the Taft Ice Delivery, the purpose of which is to handle and deliver ice to stores and private customers. In addition the firm carries on an express and transfer business at Taft and owns nine small houses which are rented to tenants. All of this has been accomplished and developed since the arrival of Mr. Lierly at Taft March 10, 1909.

Twenty-seven miles east of Quincy in Adams county, Ill., W. S. Lierly was born and reared. His father, Elijah W. Lierly, was taken by his parents to Illinois at the age of only seven years and thereafter made his home in Adams county, where he died at Kellerville in March of 1913. Surviving him are two sons and the widow, Mrs. Sarah Margaret (Hargrave) Lierly, the latter still living at the old Illinois homestead. There were ten children in the family, but two of these died in early life and a sister, Nancy, died at about twenty-four years; she left a husband, Albert Huffman, and one child, Ansil Huffman, of Sacramento. William K., a well-to-do farmer, occupies the old homestead in Adams county. W. S., who came to California at the age of seventeen, spent his first year in the west with his grandfather, Wilson Lierly, on a ranch in Mendocino county. May 1, 1879, he arrived in Santa Maria, Santa Barbara county, where he worked as a farm hand for one year. Next with a partner he engaged in barley farming and cultivated about five hundred acres. On leaving the farm he embarked in the livery business in Santa Maria, where for fifteen years he conducted the Champion barns, bought and sold horses and established a market for his stock in Los Angeles. In order to secure feed and pasturage for his stock he became interested in agricultural undertakings and at one time leased two thousand acres. After he had sold the livery and retired also from ranching he became a special agent for the Equitable Life Insurance Company of New York, having charge of the work in Santa Barbara, San Luis Obispo, Kern and Ventura counties, and remaining in the business from 1900 to 1906. Meanwhile in 1902 he was tendered a fine gold watch, neatly engraved, this being the gift of the officials of the Equitable in recognition of his having written the greatest amount of insurance of any agent of that company in California. On two other occasions he won the second prizes in similar contests.

From 1906 to 1908 Mr. Lierly acted as manager of the Pacific Valley Lumber Company in Monterey county and he still owns a considerable amount of stock in that concern. While still in Monterey county he handled oil lands for the Standard Oil Company, making King City his headquarters, and during that period he made a trip of inspection to Taft, with the expectation of speculating to a small extent in oil lands in this field. An opening for a livery business seemed so favorable that he decided to establish himself at this point and he has had no reason to regret the decision, for he has prospered to an unusual degree. Practically his only oil interests now lie in four sections of land at Elk Hill. The express business, teaming and livery oblige him to keep about one hundred horses and mules, besides one Packard auto truck. A blacksmith shop is maintained for the shoeing of his own horses, although in addition considerable custom work is done for outsiders. As before stated, Lierly & Son own the Taft harness shop, a large block of stock in the Taft Ice Delivery and an express business and numerous cottages in town. One of their most important lines of business is the moving of houses. Each member of the firm owns a residence in Taft, while Mr. Lierly also owns a house at Santa Maria and large interests in redwood timber in Monterey county. While living in Santa Maria he married Miss Mary A. Blosser, daughter of L. W. Blosser, of that place. They are the parents of five children: Clarence E., a team contractor residing at Imperial, this state; Lorenzo William, who operates the Packard auto truck for the firm; Ray Lucas, a partner with his father in the extensive business interests of the firm; Irene and Nellie Margaret, both at home.

Fraternally Mr. Lierly holds membership with San Luis Obispo Lodge No. 322, B. P. O. E. Politically he is a staunch Democrat. Public education interests him deeply. No citizen of Taft has done more for its schools than he. Practically ever since his arrival in the town he has served as a member of the school board and he now fills the position of clerk.

HERBERT V. PROUTY, M. D.—In 1852 the Prouty family was established in California. In the summer of that year Christopher C., born in Ohio in 1839, crossed the plains with other members of the family, the long journey being made with wagons and ox-teams. Although only thirteen years of age, he supported himself from the time of his arrival in the west and contributed also to the family maintenance. Mining was his first source of livelihood, and later he took up farm pursuits. Eventually he became a large stock-raiser in the vicinity of Ione. Although now to a large extent retired from agricultural duties, he still lives at the old homestead. Some years after coming west he married Australia Bennett, who was born in Missouri and during the '50s came to California with her parents. Fourteen children were born of their marriage. Eleven of these are still living, the seventh in order of birth having been Herbert V., who was born near Lone, Amador county, February 20, 1878, and passed the years of boyhood on the home farm, meanwhile attending the country schools in the winter months. Later he was a student in the California School of Mechanical Arts in San Francisco. After his graduation in 1900 he matriculated in the California Medical College and in that institution carried on the regular studies of the course. In 1904 he received the degree of M. D., and became an interne in the City and County hospital of San Francisco, where he remained for two years in that capacity and as resident physician.

Professional interests of growing importance, first in San Francisco and then at Richmond, where he established and superintended a hospital, gave to Dr. Prouty a number of busy years prior to the failure of his health and his removal to another climate, and since June, 1912, he has engaged in practice with headquarters at McKittrick. Ever since leaving college he has kept in touch with professional advance and developments in therapeutics. Membership in the California State and National Eclectic Medical Associations keeps him in sympathy with the general progress of the profession. In an especial degree he finds surgery interesting and it is his ambition to keep abreast with the latest developments in that important art. Since coming to his present location he has engaged as surgeon at McKittrick for the Southern Pacific Railroad. In politics he votes with the Republican party and fraternally he is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America. His marriage was solemnized in San Jose and united him with Miss Dora Hughes, who was born in Kansas and by whom he has a daughter, Dorothy.

JAMES CHATHAM ROBERTS.—From the time of his arrival in Bakersfield during December of 1882 up to the present time, a period of about thirty years, Mr. Roberts has been a resident of Kern county and a contributor to the development of its agricultural and material interests. Prior to his removal to the coast he had called three states his home at different times, namely: Missouri, where he was born near Springfield December 7, 1855, and where he grew to manhood upon a farm; Illinois, where he engaged in general farming near Decatur from 1875 until 1879; and Texas, where he carried on a ranch near Pilot Point from 1879 until his removal to California. The family of which he is a member belongs to old Virginia and North Carolina stock, and his parents, H. B. and Frances (Duke) Roberts, were natives respectively of North Carolina and Tennessee, the former dying in 1861 while serving in the Confederate army under General Price. A son of his first marriage, Col. E. M. Roberts, came to California in 1874 and settled in Kern county May 1, 1876, since which time he has risen to prominence and influence. The family genealogy appears in his sketch upon another page of this volume.

Soon after settling in this county James C. Roberts bought eighty acres under the Johnson canal fifteen miles west of Bakersfield and there he engaged in raising alfalfa and stock. At the expiration of six years he sold the property. Meanwhile he had served as road overseer for four years. A trip back to Texas occurred in 1893, when he bought a section of land in Floyd county with the expectation of ranching, but his plans were changed and he sold the tract after three months, then came back to California and bought eighty acres under the Beardsley canal nine miles northwest of Bakersfield. For ten years he devoted his attention to alfalfa and stock-raising. Disposing of that place he bought ten acres three miles north of Bakersfield on the road to the oil fields and for seven years he made his home on his new purchase, after which he disposed of all of his ranch property by sale and retired to Bakersfield. In this city and in East Bakersfield he has erected eight houses and one of these, No. 397

J. C. Roberts

Grove street, is his residence. Near Decatur, Ill., January 4, 1877, he married Miss Elizabeth J. Allmon, a native of Webster county, Mo., and a daughter of William and Jane T. (Cowan) Allmon, who were born in Tennessee, but settled in Missouri at an early day. Mr. and Mrs. Roberts are the parents of two children. The son, Ernest, is engaged in farming and lives five miles northwest of Bakersfield. The daughter, Maude, is the wife of A. P. Offutt and resides at Glendale, this state. Although not a partisan, Mr. Roberts is a staunch Democrat.

FRANCIS ALLAN HAMLIN, M. D.—Not alone through his paternal forbears, but also by the ancestors of his mother, Dr. Hamlin traces his lineage to some of the earliest settlers of New England, whose names are linked with the material development of that region and whose heroism in the period of privation and wars entitles them to an honorable place in the annals of their several communities. For several generations the family has been represented in Maine, where Charles and Etta (Sylvester) Hamlin are now living at Topsham, Sagadahoc county, in the enjoyment of a material competency secured through years of arduous application to farming pursuits. The chief ambition of this couple was not the acquisition of wealth, but the education of their sons, Francis A., Truman L. and James A., and they considered no hardship too great that would promote the object of their desire. With manly enthusiasm their sons seconded their efforts. Working unitedly and harmoniously, each striving to help himself yet lending good cheer and sympathy to the others of the home circle, they rose to positions of recognized worth. The second son is now professor of mathematics in the University of Maine and the youngest son acts as principal of the high school at Oldtown, that state.

The eldest son in the family was born in Oxford county, Me., June 16, 1873, and attended the public schools of Maine between the years of six and fourteen, after which he attended the high school at Lancaster, Mass. The failure of his health forced him to give up his studies and in 1890 he came to California with the hope that the balmy air of the west would restore his strength. Joining an uncle, Francis Hamlin, in Sutter county, he began to work in the open air and persistently sought those occupations that would prove of physical benefit. For two years he remained in Sutter county or at Geyserville in Sonoma county, and then with renewed strength he returned to the old Maine homestead. After he had spent two years in the scientific course at Bridgton Academy situated in the lake region of Cumberland county he entered the high school at Brunswick, Me., where he graduated from the classical course. Matriculating in Bowdoin College he there continued until 1898, when he was graduated with the degree of A. B. During the next two years he held the principalship of Bridge Academy at Dresden Mills, Lincoln county, Me., and then for four years served as principal of the high school at Wilmington, Mass. Meanwhile he had married at Portland, Me., in 1900, Miss Gertrude E. Wilkie, a native of Michigan, who was reared in California and received excellent educational advantages in Napa College and the University of the Pacific.

Returning to California during the summer of 1904, accompanied by his family, Mr. Hamlin established a home in San Francisco and there entered Cooper Medical College, now the medical department of the Leland Stanford, Jr., University, from which he was graduated in 1908 with the degree of M. D. From 1908 until 1910 he took special studies under Prof. Adolphus Barkan, M. D., a specialist in diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat. During this same period he served on the staff of Lane hospital in San Francisco and also acted as instructor at Cooper Medical College in the department of the eye, ear, nose and throat. Since coming to Bakersfield in 1910 he has specialized in these diseases, acquiring a wide reputation and large practice.

With his wife and two sons, Francis Kenneth and Wilkie Sylvester, Dr.

Hamlin resides at No. 2120 B street. Since coming to this city he and his wife have identified themselves with the First Congregational Church. While living at Dresden Mills, Me., he was made a Mason in Dresden Lodge and now affiliates with Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., and King Solomon Lodge of Perfection No. 3, Los Angeles. Both he and his wife were leading officers in Acacia Chapter, Order of the Eastern Star, at Wilmington, Mass., and since removing to the west have placed their membership with the chapter at Bakersfield. While living in San Francisco he became a member of the Foresters of America. Although not active in politics, he is a staunch Republican and keeps well posted in national affairs. However, it is his profession that interests him most deeply. Upon it are concentrated the hopes and ambitions of a lifetime of resolute purpose. That he has been successful in large degree, his growing practice proves, as well as his high reputation as a member of the Ophthalmological Society of the Pacific Coast and the interest evinced in his contributions to various medical journals. In professional acquaintances he is not limited to the line of his specialties, but has a host of friends among the members of the Kern County Medical Society (of which he acts as secretary) and is likewise identified with the California State and American Medical Associations.

M. K. McKENZIE, M. D.—Through a long line of fathers and sons the clan of McKenzie led in the warfare that darkened the early history of Scotland and in times of peace tilled the soil according to the primeval methods common to those days. The founder of the name in America was one Douglas McKenzie, a true Scot in birth and breeding, but loyal to the welfare of his adopted country. The early American home of the family was on a farm in York state and Duncan, son of Douglas, was born near Lockport, N. Y., at the parental homestead, where he lived until his removal to Canada during young manhood. By his marriage to Elizabeth Burt, a native of Scotland, he became the father of fourteen children and it is a noteworthy fact that every one of the large family lived to years of maturity. The thirteenth in order of birth, M. K., was born in the province of Ontario, Canada, in 1855, and at the age of one year was taken to Michigan by his parents, who settled at Stockbridge, Ingham county. The father later returned to the old McKenzie homestead in Ontario, Canada, where he died at the age of seventy-eight, and the mother when sixty-eight years of age.

When a mere child M. K. McKenzie did a man's work at the plow and in the harvest field, where the old-fashioned method of cradling and binding grain by hand was still followed. Timber was plentiful in that country and he early became an expert woodman, swinging an axe with a skill and speed surpassed by few. With all of his hard work in woods and field and meadow he kept his mind as busy as his body and was constantly endeavoring to enlarge his store of knowledge. He seemed to have a natural talent for the medical profession and was quite young when he commenced to read with Dr. Simpson at St. George, Canada, later reading with Dr. Manwaring of the same town. There was, however, no well-defined purpose on his part to become a physician and his readings were pursued from the mere love of the healing art. When he left home at the age of seventeen years he began to make his own way in the world and devoted his leisure hours to the study of law under an older brother, continuing indeed until he was able to pass an examination for the bar, but his preference for medical work caused him to decide in favor of that calling. During September of 1878 he entered the medical department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor and studied there until his belief in the larger clinical advantages offered by the Detroit Medical College led him to pursue a course of study in the latter institution. There he became well acquainted with Messrs. Stanton and Brice and also with the wife of ex-Governor Bagley, trustees of the Woman's hospital and Foundling's Home, and by them he was accorded special privileges in connection with these institutions. In that way he laid the foundation of his splendid success in obstetrical cases and treatment of the diseases of women. After he graduated with the class of 1881 he opened an office at Plainfield, Livingston county, Mich., and there he engaged in practice for five years. From Plainfield he removed to Laingsburg, Shiawassee county, same state, where he continued until the fall of 1890, when the complete failure of his health forced him to seek another climate. About the time of his graduation he had married, March 31, 1881, Miss Millison Tyler, of Shiawassee county. Of their three children two survive, Misses Lois Janet and Florence H., both at home.

At the time of his arrival in Bakersfield in 1890 Dr. McKenzie weighed only one hundred and twenty-two pounds, but the climate of Kern county proved beneficial and he gradually renewed his strength. Even now, notwithstanding a long and arduous professional career, he is in almost perfect health. He has given efficient service as county physician and for fourteen months was superintendent of the county hospital. As guardian of the public health, he has fully merited his enviable reputation, while as a family physician he is known and loved by many whom he has guided safely through a critical physical ordeal or a lingering and dangerous illness. With true professional devotion he has given his life to his chosen calling and it has not been possible for him to engage in civic enterprises or public affairs. However, he has kept well posted concerning national issues and has given stanch allegiance to the Republican party. In fraternal relations he holds membership with the Masonic blue lodge and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

JOHN BRITTON DENIO.—Coincident with the early colonization of America began the identification of the French family of Denio with the pioneers of New York, where several successive generations lived and labored. The first to follow the tide of migration toward the west was William W. Denio, a native of Akron, Genesee county, N. Y., and a pioneer of Ingham county, Mich., where he cleared a farm in the oak openings and gave years of the most arduous effort to the improvement of the homestead. Eventually he sought a home in the milder climate of Missouri, where his last days were passed in retirement from agricultural cares. During young manhood he had married Miss Lucia Atkins, who was born at Elba, Genesee county, N. Y., and died in Kern county, Cal., at eighty-two years of age.

On the old homestead near Lansing, Ingham county, Mich., James G., son of William W. Denio, was born and reared. For about ten years he worked in the lumber woods in the Grand Traverse country of Michigan, and he also spent a number of seasons on the lakes in the lumber trade. During 1880 he removed from Michigan to Kansas and settled on a farm in Ottawa county, whence in 1887, he went to Cameron Junction, Clinton county, Mo., to take up farming pursuits in the more southerly location. The fall of 1891 found him in California, where he since has engaged in farming and poultry-raising in Kern county. At this writing he and his wife (who was Mary E. Bacon, a native of Sycamore, Ind.) own and have charge of a place of twenty acres located on the Rosedale road six and one-half miles west of Bakersfield. Their family numbers seven children, namely: John Britton, who was born at the old homestead near Lansing, Mich., September 30, 1878; Mrs. Daisy Stewart, of Rosedale; Truman and Hugh, of Rio Bravo; Charles, Esther and William.

The first years in the life of John Britton Denio were passed in Michigan, Kansas and Missouri, but since the age of thirteen he has lived in California, where he completed a grammar-school education in the Rosedale district, Kern county. From early life he has been interested in farming. From 1906 to 1909 he was employed by the Kern County Land Company on the Rosedale ranch, where he rose to be foreman, but resigned the position in order to engage in farming for himself. Having purchased forty acres of raw land under the Beardsley canal six miles northwest of Bakersfield, he at once entered upon the difficult task of converting the tract into remunerative property. Checking and leveling the land, he sowed it to alfalfa and now devotes his attention almost wholly to the raising of hay. In addition to managing his own place he leases hay and grain land from the Kern County Land Company. Politically Mr. Denio is a Republican.

Mr. Denio's marriage was solemnized in the Rosedale district November 7, 1903, and united him with Miss Bingie Kuhs, who was born in Worms, Germany, a daughter of Carl and Mary (Kraud) Kuhs, the father deceased, and the mother still living. A sister, Mrs. Nelson, and a brother, John Kuhs, having preceded Miss Kuhs in migrating to California, she joined them in Kern county, where she met and married Mr. Denio. They are the parents of two children, Mamie and Bessie.

FRANCIS GEORGE MUNZER.—When the Munzer family first became identified with the industrial development of America they established themselves in Connecticut and in that commonwealth, at Southington, Hartford county, the birth of Francis George Munzer occurred February 2, 1859, his parents having been the late John Bernard and Elizabeth (Balzer) Munzer. Both families are of German descent, the Munzer records being traced back to the fifth century in Germany, where Johan Bernard Munzer took an active part in one of the religious wars. Throughout the earlier years of his mature activities the father conducted mercantile enterprises at Southington, but eventually he became a resident of Ohio and carried on business at Edgerton, Williams county, near the Indiana line and not far distant from the border of Michigan. After the death of his wife, which occurred at Edgerton, he removed to Toledo and there he passed away in September of 1911. Of their thirteen children seven are still living. The eldest of these, Francis George, attended public schools in Southington and then spent two years in a private school in New York City, after which he continued his studies in Lewis Academy at Southington, from which in 1878 he was graduated with an excellent standing in every department. During vacations he had assisted his father in the mercantile business and he had the further advantage of one year spent in a clerkship in New York City.

Removing to Edgerton, Ohio, with his father in 1878, Mr. Munzer secured employment there as clerk in a drug store. After two years he resigned the position and removed to Illinois, where he was given charge of a general store owned by F. Menig at Danville. For five years he filled the position with characteristic energy and recognized efficiency. In order to engage in business for himself he resigned as manager. During the next year he owned and conducted a grocery business in Danville. Selling out in the spring of 1886 he came to California and made a tour of inspection through the state, eventually selecting Bakersfield as his home. Here he secured a very humble position with Carr & Haggin. Six weeks of persistent industry as driver of a four-mule buck scraper convinced his employers that he was capable of higher duties and they made him bookkeeper and foreman at the old Jackson ranch. Health considerations caused him to go to Mendocino county in April of 1887 and during the next six months he worked in the lumber camps, remaining outdoors as much as possible. In the autumn he resumed his former position in Kern county. Again in April of 1888 he went to the lumber woods of Mendocino county and spent six months in outdoor work, resuming his position on the Jackson ranch in the fall of the same year. In January of 1889 he went to the Santa Clara valley in old Mexico at the time of the gold excitement, but a prospecting tour of two months proved futile and he returned to the Jackson ranch. About that time he was also made foreman of the Poso ranch.

H. Munzer

Transferred to the headquarters office at the Bellevue ranch in May of 1889, Mr. Munzer was appointed payroll clerk for the north side ranch and continued at that place until October 1, 1890, when the company moved its headquarters to Bakersfield and incorporated the Kern County Land Company, with Mr. Munzer as chief clerk of the water department. For a considerable period he filled the position; meanwhile, in July, 1892, he resigned his position and went to Arizona, where he had charge as office superintendent of the Gila Bend Irrigation Company at Sentinel, Ariz. The Kern County Land Company, through S. W. Ferguson, the then manager, wired him requesting him to return at an increased salary, and on his return, in November, 1892, he was made assistant office superintendent and later he was promoted to office superintendent, in February, 1895, ever since which time he has filled the important position with marked ability and the utmost fidelity. Like the majority of the people living in Kern county, he is interested in oil and oil lands. In addition with W. J. Doherty as partner he owns the Breckenridge Lumber Company and has mills and timber on Mount Breckenridge.

December 20, 1892, at Bakersfield, occurred the marriage of Francis George Munzer and Mary Ellen Baker, a native of Missouri and a daughter of Melvin Baker, one of the pioneers of Kern county. They are the parents of two children, Frances Alice and Bernard Melvin. Interested in the growth of Bakersfield and a contributor to its progress, Mr. Munzer served for five years as a member of its board of trustees, is now prominently connected with the Merchant's Association and likewise officiates as vice-president of the San Joaquin Valley Water Problem Association. The Democratic party receives his stanch support at all elections. For many years he was an active member of Company G, Sixth Regiment of the California National Guard and finally retired with the rank of second lieutenant. Made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., he later rose to the chapter degree in this city and furthermore with his wife belongs to the Eastern Star chapter at this place. Other organizations having the benefit of his interested co-operation are the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, the Woodmen of the World and the Bakersfield Aerie of Eagles.

HON. JACK W. MAHON.—The family patronymic of Mahon indicates the Celtic origin of the race. The founder of the name upon American soil was Henry Mahon, a native of Ireland and for many years a planter in the vicinity of Raleigh, N. C., where he continued to reside until his death. Among his children was W. J., who was born, reared and educated in North Carolina and during young manhood entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. To the cause of religion he gave the deepest devotion of his splendid mind and the self-sacrificing loyalty of his noble character. In order that he might engage in ministerial work upon the then frontier, he removed from North Carolina to Tennessee and crossing that then sparsely settled state almost to the banks of the Mississippi river he took up raw land in Dyer county and became the founder of a church at Dversburg, the county-seat, where he labored with consecration for the advancement of Christianity. Under his able efforts his denomination made noteworthy advances numerically and spiritually. While he did not accumulate riches nor indeed a competency, he was successful in his labors for the uplifting of the race and the world was the better for his life of toil and sacrifice. During the Civil war he found an opportunity to engage in religious activities while serving as chaplain under Gen. Kirby Smith. Coming to California during 1875 he became a minister in San Francisco, but later as presiding elder became familiar with church needs in various portions of the state. For twenty years he officiated in that responsible position. Ultimately the infirmities of age obliged him to relinquish the responsibilities of ministerial work and after a retirement of five years he passed away at his home in Bakersfield. He had reached the age of eighty-eight years.

In the counsel and companionship of a capable helpmate Rev. W. J. Mahon was greatly blessed. During early manhood he had married Phoebe Gilbert Wood, who was born in Virginia, the daughter of George Wood, an Englishman identified with the early development of Virginia. The death of Mrs. Mahon occurred in Modesto at the age of seventy-six years. In their family there were four children but only two survive. One of her sons, Stephen Wood Mahon, an attorney by profession and for some years a justice of the peace, was officiating as city recorder of Bakersfield at the time of his demise. The youngest son, Kirby S., is now judge of the superior court of Sutter county, this state. Judge Jack W. Mahon was born at Dyersburg, Dyer county, Tenn., February 24, 1858, and in 1875 accompanied his parents to California, where later he was graduated from the Gilroy high school. At the completion of high-school studies he began the study of law under R. H. Ward, of Merced. Possessing a quick intelligence and receptive mind, he advanced rapidly in his readings and during 1883 was admitted to the bar of California. Immediately afterward he opened an office in Bakersfield, where he soon rose to a position of recognition as a promising young attorney, whose knowledge of jurisprudence was broad and whose devotion to the profession was intense. It soon became apparent that he was as well qualified for the bench as for the bar and during 1896 the Democratic party of Kern county nominated him for judge of the superior court. The nomination was endorsed by the Populists. The election brought him a handsome majority and in January of 1897 he took the oath of office. At the expiration of the first term in 1902 he was re-elected and again in 1908 he was chosen to be his own successor. The success of his official labors was shown in the fact that in the campaign of 1908 he had no opposition, all parties appreciating his able service to such an extent that they brought forward no other candidate for the office.

Reared in the faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, Judge Mahon has never swerved from his allegiance to the denomination so long honored by the faithful ministerial labors of his father. While not deeply interested in fraternities, he was won by the philanthropic tenets of the Masonic Order and entered its blue lodge, later rising to the Royal Arch degree. His marriage took place in Bakersfield and united him with Miss Rachel E. Nash, a native of Dyer county, Tenn., and a graduate of an educational institution in New York state. Of the union two children were born, the elder, Ruth Estabrook, being now the wife of Ernest Alston, of Los Angeles, while the younger, Jack Howell, is a student in the Vanderbilt University at Nashville, Tenn. It is said of Judge Mahon that no enterprise for the permanent progress of Bakersfield lacks his intelligent co-operation. On the contrary, he has been generous in his sympathetic assistance given to civic measures and has proved public-spirited and progressive in his broad comprehension of and tactful participation in movements of far-reaching value to permanent civic prosperity.

GRANVILLE L. BROWN, D. D. S.—The family represented by this well-known practitioner of Bakersfield comes from Kentuckian and Virginian ancestry and he himself claims Kentucky as his native commonwealth, having been born in Allen county, January 12, 1859. Likewise the Blue Grass state was the native home of his parents, Henry and Margaret (Patton) Brown, both of whom remained in the state throughout their lives, the father following the occupation of a farmer as a source of livelihood. Of this union there were four children, the third being Granville L., who was reared on the old Kentucky farm and received a fair education in local schools. For a time he engaged in teaching in the public schools and with the earnings of his labor he entered into mercantile enterprises with a brother at Scottsville, Allen county. It was not, however, his intention to devote his life either to pedagogy or to business, for he had early been interested in the profession of dentistry and had an ambition to enter its study and practice. Through a course in the dental department of the University of Tennessee he gained a fair knowledge of the profession and, not having the means necessary to complete the regular course, he entered upon dental practice before he had been graduated. Later he was able to return to the university, complete the course and finish the regular work, so that in 1890, when he was graduated with a very high standing, he received the degree of D. D. S. from the institution.

S. W. Wible

Prior to graduation Dr. Brown not only had practiced for two years at Burkesville, Cumberland county, Ky., but also had entered upon a very successful professional connection with the city of Glasgow, Ky., where altogether he practiced about ten years. Meanwhile he had met and married Miss Clara Dickey, who was born, reared and educated in that Kentucky town, and is a representative of a cultured old Southern family. Upon leaving Kentucky to engage in practice in California in 1892, the Doctor chose Bakersfield on account of its excellent prospects for material growth, its healthful climate and its professional opportunities, and he certainly has had no cause to regret his decision. At first he had an office in the Galtes building, but removed to the Scribner opera building, on the completion of that structure and when the Producers' Bank building was completed he leased a suite of rooms in it, his present location. With his wife and son, Arthur B., he resides in a comfortable home in East Bakersfield, the same having been planned and built by himself. Since coming to Bakersfield he has been a member of the Southern California Dental Association, in which his ability well qualifies him for a leadership which his characteristic modesty prevents him from claiming. In politics he votes with the Republican party.

SIMON W. WIBLE.—Born near Greensburg, Pa., Mr. Wible removed to Illinois with his father, Peter Wible, and had settled near Mendon, Adams county. The difficult task of transforming a raw tract of land into a productive farm had filled his boyhood years with strenuous labor and had prevented him from attending school regularly, although during the winter months it was his custom to study in a near-by log schoolhouse, which with its slab benches and puncheon floors presented a striking contrast to the educational equipment of the present generation. When old enough to start out for himself he determined to follow the tide of emigration to California and accordingly during the spring of 1852 he joined an expedition bound for the west, making the trip with wagons and oxen. Later he returned east and brought out a second wagon-train. During the summer of 1858 he piloted a third train through, but on that trip he met with trouble, for the Indians separated the train by a stampede and not only stole all of the stock, but killed a number of the emigrants. Forced to flee for his life and left without a horse, the young captain of the train, walked to Fort Laramie, where he found an opportunity to join another expedition and thus came through to the coast. For years he engaged in mining and, indeed, he never lost his interest in the occupation, for at the time of his death he owned and operated a valuable mine in Alaska. Meanwhile he picked up a thorough knowledge of surveying and came to be reckoned among the most efficient surveyors and civil engineers on the coast. Much of his work was done for the government.

It was about 1872 when Mr. Wible took up a homestead claim twelve miles west of Bakersfield and began to cultivate the land and raise crops suited to the soil and climate. From time to time he bought stock and finally he ranked among the extensive sheepmen of the county. Other interests filled his days with busy activities. The original work on the Pioneer canal was unsatisfactory and on that account it was turned over to him. Under his charge as superintendent an improvement was made. When Henry Miller came to Bakersfield to look up matters pertaining to the reclamation of the Miller & Lux lands, which some man had attempted to drain, but only with partial success, he sought out Mr. Wible and asked his opinion. Mr. Wible claimed the lands could be reclaimed and he could do it, providing he had the money. Instantly Mr. Miller responded that he had the money. Thereupon Mr. Wible made plans and these proved satisfactory to Mr. Miller, who appointed him to superintend the work. Under his supervision the dam and Buena Vista reservoir were built, an outlet or drainage canal was dug and levees made to turn the water in and out of the lake, also a canal to carry the water to the lake. The venture proved an overwhelming success. Farming land was made out of the once worthless tules. Seventy-five thousand acres were placed under cultivation as a result of this great feat of engineering. During the process of building Mr. Wible checked as desired against the Miller & Lux account without the necessity of any O. K.'s, being the only man ever permitted to do so. After the completion of this task he continued with the same firm as general manager of their ranches until about 1900, when he retired from active labors. However, he did not relinquish all interests, for he retained the management of his large mine near Sunrise on the Kenai peninsula in Alaska and each summer for eleven years he went to that region to superintend the operation of the mine. Upon his return from his eleventh trip of this kind he was taken ill and died in San Francisco September 13, 1911, at the age of eighty years.

The death of Mr. Wible marked the passing of one of the most influential pioneers of Kern county. Every line of activity had felt the impetus of his large endeavors. The Bank of Bakersfield was organized under his efficient supervision and he continued to serve as president as long as he lived. When in 1858 he joined Ione Lodge of Odd Fellows, he had the distinction of being one of the first to be initiated into that order in the entire state. The fruit industry numbered him among its progressive pioneers and his enthusiasm in starting an orchard and vineyard encouraged many others to follow his example. He was one of the very first to succeed in horticulture in Kern county and the orchard of four hundred and eighty acres which he planted continued under his personal oversight until it was sold during 1910. When the water works were in an embryonic phase of development he and W. H. Scribner took charge of the enterprise, developed the plant, built a complete line of mains into every part of the city, turned an uncertain project into a valuable system and he continued to act as president of the Bakersfield Water Company until its interests were sold to the Kern County Land Co.

DIXON DOUGHERTY.—Since the age of twelve years Dixon Dougherty has lived in California. Born at Old Vincennes, Ind., January 6, 1861, he was one of seven children, of whom only himself and his brother, C. A., are still living. The parents, both of whom died in Indiana, were Joseph A. and Palace (Horsey) Dougherty, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and Paoli, Orange county, Ind., the former a farmer for many years, but also for a time a merchant in Vincennes. J. P. was the first of the sons to come to California, and in 1873 C. A. and Dixon came together to join their older brother, with whom they spent a short time at Pleasanton, Alameda county. Next they went to San Diego with the intention of proceeding to Mexico and there embarking in the cattle business, but the fierce Apaches were on the war path at the time and the older brother advised against the expedition. Accordingly Dixon went to Sacramento and found employment. After his first trip to Bakersfield in 1875 he went to Los Angeles and from there to the suburb of Artesia, where with his brothers he engaged in farming for two years. Upon returning to Kern county in 1877 he found employment on a ranch owned by Charles Jewett and located in the Breckenridge mountains. After eighteen months on the ranch he was brought to Bakersfield by Mr. Jewett, who gave him employment as driver of an ice wagon and in that position he continued for two years. Meanwhile having married Miss Mary Kubovec, a native of Austria, he and his wife found a desirable opening for a hotel business and for three years operated the American Exchange on Eighteenth street.

Mr. Harry Quinn

An opportunity to secure a homestead took Mr. Dougherty back to the Breckenridge mountains, where he entered the southeast quarter of section 18, township 29, range 31, and established headquarters at Dripping Springs ranch. On the land he put up necessary buildings. The place was fenced and cross-fenced, so that he could handle his stock advantageously, and also that he might devote some fields to the raising of grain. For years he made a specialty of the shorthorn Durham breed of cattle and in stock-raising operations he was more than ordinarily successful. Meantime he had added to the original claim until his ranch comprised three hundred and twenty acres, besides using other ranges for his stock, bearing the 7L brand. After he and his wife had lived on the mountain ranch about five years he established a home for the family in East Bakersfield, in order that the two sons might attend the city schools, but he himself remained on the ranch and gave personal attention to the cattle. After he disposed of the property in 1913 he came to East Bakersfield to remain, and since has given attention to the supervision of his alfalfa farm near the city, and also to the care of the various residences he has built here, five of which houses still remain in his possession. His younger son, Joseph A., assists him in his various enterprises, while the older son, Charles R., has embarked in the stock business independently and now conducts a stock ranch at Adobe Station.

HARRY QUINN.—The Quinn family springs from Scottish ancestry and has an honorable history extending back to eras far antedating the religious persecutions in that country. About that time some of the name, forced to flee from their native land on account of their religious views, found a safe and permanent refuge in the north of Ireland, where, at Kilkeel, county Down, Harry Quinn was born on Christmas day of 1843 and where during boyhood he attended the national schools. He was the son of Thomas and Margaret (Donaldson) Quinn, the latter the daughter of William Donaldson, who was a wholesale baker and confectioner in Kilkeel. The paternal grandfather, William Quinn, was a farmer and also a linen merchant. In his family of ten children there were seven sons, all successful business or trades men. Thomas Quinn, the seventh child in order of birth, became a farmer near Kilkeel and resided there throughout the remainder of his life.

The necessity of earning his own livelihood sent Harry Quinn to Australia at the age of fifteen years and there he prospected and mined, but without success. After this experience he worked on stock ranches and thus was enabled to save an amount of money sufficient for another stake. While on his way from Melbourne to Queensland he heard of a new strike, but returning miners brought back discouraging reports and while waiting there he saw the American barque Penang, which, on account of the fact that it was Sunday, was displaying American flags. Mr. Quinn remarked to his companions: "Boys, there is my flag and my country," and the next day he not only purchased a ticket for himself to San Francisco, but also for three companions. Two of them afterward repaid him at the first opportunity, and the third paid one-fifth of his indebtedness. It was about May, 1868, that Mr. Quinn landed at San Francisco, a stranger in a strange land. Working his way from place to place he was able to see much of the state, but did not find a location or an opportunity suited to his condition. He had been reared to a knowledge of the sheep industry, so it was his desire to buy sheep and rent land for their pasturage, but at the time sheep were held at a figure far beyond his reach. As early as 1868 he came to Kern county for the first time, but did not locate here permanently then. In 1872 he found employment with Archibald Leitch, an extensive sheep-raiser and large land-owner in Stanislaus county, who, being pleased with the energy and ability of young Quinn, sent him into Kern county as pilot for his flocks, and at the end of two years took him into partnership. The connection continued with mutual profit until the death of Mr. Leitch in 1896, and afterward with the estate until 1906, whereupon the interest in the land and sheep was purchased by Mr. Quinn.

It was during the year 1873 that Mr. Quinn purchased one-half interest in twenty-two hundred head of sheep and also took up a pre-emption claim of one hundred and sixty acres where his residence now stands. Besides this he bought railroad land and also acquired large tracts from homesteaders who were unable to prove up on their claims. During the early days in the history of Kern county the Quinn farm was the only place in miles where a traveler could obtain water and hence emigrants headed for the ranch from every direction, watering their stock and resting awhile as they enjoyed the never-failing hospitality and cheerful welcome of Mr. Quinn. At his home the latch-string was always hanging out and no one was too humble or too poor to feel the hearty inspiration of his welcoming hand. His splendid hospitality made him known to and loved by early settlers throughout all this part of the country. At one time he owned as high as twenty-two thousand acres, but in 1906 he sold a large tract to a company of promoters and it is now being planted to orange trees. At present he still owns fifteen thousand acres.

While in the main successful in his enterprises and particularly so in his sheep-raising ventures, Mr. Quinn had his share of misfortune. During the serious drought of 1877 he was forced to seek new ranges for his sheep. With a flock of eighteen thousand six hundred and sixty sheep he went into Nevada and at first found abundant pasturage, but while at Fish Lake valley he was caught in a severe snow-storm and fifteen thousand sheep perished at one time. On his return to Kern county he had only twenty-seven hundred head of sheep and was $5,000 in debt. Undismayed by a catastrophe that would have discouraged most men, he started in anew and in a few years had paid off his debt, enlarged his flock and secured another foothold financially. For many years he was engaged in raising thoroughbred French merinos, and the high grade of the stock can be estimated when it is known that his sheep were not only shipped into all parts of the United States for breeding purposes, but also to Mexico, South America and Africa. After a long association with the sheep industry he sold the last of his flock about 1911 and since then has devoted his attention wholly to raising Short-horn Durham cattle. Not only was he the first settler on the plains east of Delano in Kern county, but besides he merits mention because he is one of the few successful men who have engaged in dry farming and stock-raising on the plains. The Quinn ranch is located ten miles east of Delano and lies principally in Rag gulch, although some parts of it lie in the Sierra Nevadas inside of the forest reserve. The ranch is well improved with a new, modern residence, which was completed in December, 1912, and is also equipped with the needed farm buildings and three pumping plants. The sons are now preparing to set out forty acres to oranges.

Several of the state conventions of the Democratic party have been attended by Mr. Quinn, who maintains a warm interest in political affairs. For years he has served as a trustee of the local schools. Fraternally he is a charter member of Porter Lodge, I. O. O. F., was made a Mason in Visalia Lodge No. 123, F. & A. M., is a member of Visalia Chapter No. 44, R. A. M., Visalia Commandery, K. T., Visalia Consistory, Scottish Rite, thirty-second degree, and is also a member of Islam Temple, N. M. S., of San Francisco. Mr. Quinn's marriage, solemnized in Robertson county, N. C., December 15, 1886, united him with Miss Katie Robertson, who was born in Robertson county, N. C., on the last day of the year 1858. Seven children were born of the union and to each has been given the educational training essential to a thorough preparation for life's activities. The eldest daughter, Marguerite, is the wife of Nelson Smith. The eldest son, John, who graduated with the class of 1912, University of California, at Berkeley, with the degree of B. S., is assisting his father in the management of the ranch. Tom, the second son, has charge of his father's stock. The third son, Archie, a graduate of the Bakersfield high school, class of 1912, is also assisting in the care of the stock. The youngest daughters, Mary and Mildred, are attending college at Oakland during the winter months, while in the summer they are with their parents on the ranch near Delano. The youngest son, Cletus, is attending the Kern county high school at Bakersfield.

HERBERT C. MOSHER.—The secretary and treasurer of the Torney & Jones Company, Incorporated, of Maricopa, has been a resident of California almost from his earliest recollections. Born in Georgia October 25, 1872, he was scarcely four years of age when in 1876 the family became residents of Los Angeles, where he received such advantages as the public schools then offered, supplemented by a course of study in the normal school. After his graduation from the normal in 1892 he began to teach in the schools of Goleta, Santa Barbara county, where he continued in the same school for two years, and then devoted the next two years to similar work in the Los Angeles city schools. Resigning his position and retiring from educational pursuits, he turned to an industry then newly inaugurated in the state. This was the raising of sugar beets. At that time Oxnard was the only center of the industry in the state and he took up land in Ventura county near the Oxnard factory, where he engaged in raising beets for a few years.

Coming to Bakersfield in 1899 Mr. Mosher began an active and prominent identification with the upbuilding of Kern county, an association that at first lent helpful aid to the making of good roads. Forming a partnership with his brother, J. W. Mosher, he organized the firm of Mosher Brothers, which in 1900, under the oversight of Supervisor H. A. Jastro, oiled the first roads in the entire San Joaquin valley. Their contract called for the oiling of about seventy miles of road and the results were so satisfactory that they were called to different parts of the state by those desirous of securing good roads in their communities. Eventually J. W. Mosher established headquarters for the business at Stockton and with that as a center he carries on a large business in the oiling of roads, an interest in the concern being retained by Herbert C. Mosher, who, however, of recent years has given over to the brother the active management of the entire enterprise.

The business identification of Mr. Mosher with the new town of Maricopa began in 1909, when he organized the Gate City Oil Company and purchased forty acres owned by the Maricopa Oil Company. After a period as manager of the Gate City he resigned in order to give his attention to other interests, but he still holds stock in the concern. As secretary and treasurer of Torpey & Jones Company, Incorporated, he is connected with a pioneer mercantile enterprise of Maricopa, having during June of 1909 purchased the interest of J. D. Jones in the firm. At that time the company occupied twelve hundred feet of floor space, but since then they have erected additional rooms and now use five thousand feet of floor space. The same company also supplies the town with water, controlling the stock in the Maricopa Water Company. Prior to the organization of that concern water was shipped in from Bakersfield and was consequently so expensive that its use was limited to the most stern necessities. Torpey & Jones conduct business upon the department system and each department is practically a complete store in itself. The groceries, dry-goods, ladies' and gent's furnishings, supplies for oil men, wines and hardware, are indicative of the lines carried in stock and of the quality of the same. The first president, F. T. Torpey, was the pioneer merchant of Maricopa and the remarkable growth of the business is largely due to the substantial foundations laid by him at the start. The firm passed through the disastrous fire of June 20, 1911, and aided in the work of rebuilding. They promoted the incorporation of Maricopa as a city, which occurred July 20, 1911, and since then all members of the company have given liberally of time and means to further civic projects, Mr. Mosher having served first by appointment as a member of the board of trustees, later elected to the position April 8, 1912, after which he was chosen chairman of the board, a position equivalent to that of mayor. He resigned from said board on account of very pressing business duties in May, 1913.

FRANZ BUCKREUS.—The superintendent of the Kern county hospital is of German birth and the descendant of a long line of honored Teutonic ancestors, his parents having been Dr. Michael and Babetta (Sauer) Buckreus, the former a graduate physician and the son of a Bavarian millwright. For a long period Dr. Buckreus engaged in professional labors in the prosperous village of Bamberg, lying along the banks of the Main river in Oberfranken, Bavaria, and there occurred the birth of his third child, Franz, November 30, 1845. After he had been given the advantages of the national schools and gymnasiums he was taken into the doctor's office and taught the principles of surgery as well as the treatment of disease. The death of the father in 1866 prevented him from gaining a comprehensive knowledge of materia medica and obliged him to work diligently to support the family. At first he engaged in nursing the sick and during the Franco-Prussian war he held a position in the sanitary department of the army. Coming to the United States in 1871 he followed the barber's trade in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut successively. January of 1875 found him in California and during March of the same year he came to Bakersfield, where he worked as a journeyman barber for six months, and then established a shop on Chester avenue on the present site of Scribner's opera house. Later he conducted a shop in the Arlington hotel, but in 1883 he sold out to accept the position of superintendent of the Kern county hospital, which had been established in 1881. Since then his own history has been practically that of the institution which he manages.

The early home of the hospital was on G between Thirteenth and Fourteenth streets and there it was conducted until the inadequacy of the facilities there afforded compelled a different location and larger quarters. During 1895 removal was made to Nineteenth and Oak streets, where there are six acres of grounds picturesquely adorned with trees and shrubs planted by the superintendent, whose good taste and artistic ability are reflected in the entire arrangement of the place. Under his trained judgment the grounds have been converted into an attractive park with permanent walks and lawn, beautified further by flowers and ornamental trees. However, the superintendent has proved more than a successful landscape gardener, for in the management of the institution he has been efficient, reliable and capable. The main building, two stories in height with a frontage of two hundred and twenty feet, proved too small, and in 1911 the company added a sixty-foot wing on the east to be utilized partly as a surgical ward and operating room. The capacity has been increased from seventy-five to one hundred patients. An excellent system of heating, lighting and ventilation has been introduced and the entire equipment bespeaks the oversight of a wise intelligence.

Christian Hattly

Mrs Christian Mottly

In the days when it was impossible for Kern county to pay a health officer Mr. Buckreus served in that position gratuitously. When the county was able to give him some recompense for his services, he was paid $25 per month. The service without pay lasted for six years and the service with pay covered eight years, at the expiration of which time the state legislature passed a bill requiring all health officers to possess medical diplomas. In politics Mr. Buckreus has been a Democrat ever since he became familiar with the national issues of his adopted country. For twelve years he officiated as county coroner and public administrator, having been appointed to fill a vacancy in 1890. At the expiration of that term in 1892 he was elected for two years. During 1894 he was elected for a term of four years and again in 1898 for four years, holding the office until January of 1903, when he retired. Upon the organization of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks in Bakersfield he became a charter member of Lodge No. 266, in the upbuilding of which he has maintained a warm interest. In addition he has been actively associated with the Knights of Pythias.

CHRISTIAN MATTLY.—A gratifying degree of success has rewarded the industrious efforts of Mr. Mattly, whose profitable management of a dairy industry in Kern county furnishes evidence as to the possibilities of the business in this part of the state and also bears testimony concerning his own abilities in that direction. The fact that he comes of a long line of Swiss ancestors, among whom were not a few famous cheese-makers and skilled dairymen, may account in part for his own talents in the same direction. When it is considered that he was only seven years of age when he lost his father and that he had no influential friends to assist him in getting a start in California when he landed here without means, his present high standing indicates his determination of character and energy of temperament. Born at Zillis, Canton Graubunden, Switzerland, March 30, 1852, he was a son of Leonard and Menga (Cayori) Mattly, natives of the same canton as himself and lifelong residents thereof, the father dying in 1859 and the mother in 1885. There were five children in the family and four of these are still living, Christian having been next to the youngest of the number. After he had attended school for some years he was apprenticed to the trade of a stone-cutter and from that time earned his own way in the world. During 1873 he came from Europe to the United States and settled at Gilroy, Cal., but after eight months of work he removed to Marin county and secured employment in a dairy at Point Reyes. Another six months were passed there and in 1874 he came to Kern county, where he pre-empted one hundred and sixty acres on Kern Island, fifteen miles from Bakersfield.

Six years spent upon the pre-emption claim were followed by employment with W. Canfield, owner of a dairy, in which Mr. Mattly engaged as foreman and buttermaker. Previous experience aided him in the work and he soon proved himself to be skilled in that occupation. Encouraged by his evident fitness for the calling, in 1885 he embarked in the dairy business for himself, buying three hundred and twenty acres fourteen miles southwest of Bakersfield and at once starting a herd of milch cows. The land was under irrigation and the raising of alfalfa was thus made possible. From the first he was prosperous. Industry and wise management brought their deserved returns. Skill in the manufacture of butter and cheese brought him a steadily growing business. As time passed he added to his possessions until he had acquired five hundred and fifty-three acres in one body, all under irrigation and well suited to alfalfa. All of the hay raised was fed to the stock during the winter months. A specialty was made of the shorthorn red Durham cattle and at times he milked as many as one hundred and twenty cows with the aid of his hired help. When he first settled on the ranch he manufactured butter in the old-fashioned way, but this soon proved to be too tedious and so he began to put in machinery and at the time he rented the dairy to others in 1903 he had it fitted out with modern conveniences of the most approved designs. Upon leaving that farm he settled four miles south of Bakersfield, where he had bought an alfalfa ranch of eighty acres. On the new farm he started another dairy and this he conducted until 1910 with continued success, eventually renting the property and then selling it to others. Retiring from the arduous labors that had filled his life from early manhood, in 1910 he erected an attractive and commodious residence on the corner of Eighteenth and B streets, where he and his family since have made their home. While residing on the big ranch he established family ties, the ceremony occurring April 6, 1896. His wife, formerly Nina Weichelt, is a native of the same part of Switzerland as himself and came in 1893 to California, where she was married in Kern county. Born of their union are three sons, Leonard, Gotlieb and Christian. The family are identified with the Lutheran denomination and Mr. Mattly has been a regular contributor to religious enterprises. Since becoming a citizen of the United States he has voted with the Republican party. Upon the organization of the Security Trust Company he was elected a director and since then he has continued a member of the board. Fraternally he is associated with the Knights of Pythias and the Uniform Rank, K. P. Both himself and wife are members of the Kern County Pioneer Society. Always interested in educational work and a staunch believer in the free-school system, for some years he officiated as director of the Old River school district and during that time of service he promoted the school work and advanced the grade of scholarship through his capable and constant support.

ANGUS J. CRITES.—The honored and influential pioneer family of Crites, founded in Kern county during the latter part of the '50s by Angus M. Crites and connected by marriage with another leading old family, that of Jewett, has lost none of its early prestige or long-time popularity through the commercial activities of the present generation, one of whom, Angus J. Crites, has acquired a wide reputation as a successful and efficient superintendent in the Kern river oil fields. It is said by competent judges that the Kern river district holds no better oil lease than that of the Peerless Oil Company, the high standing of which results from the able supervision of the manager. Having filled his present position since 1904, he has become familiar with the entire district and especially with the growing possibilities of the Peerless at Oil Center, which had thirty-four wells at the time of his original association with the company, but has increased its leases until in 1913 it has fifty-eight wells, all of them productive and remunerative.

Relative to the family history, it may be stated that Angus M. Crites settled at Kernville about the year 1858 and was one of the original miners at Havilah, then the county-seat. By his marriage to Louisa Jewett, he became a brother-in-law of Solomon Jewett, one of the most influential pioneers of the county. For years he engaged in ranching and stock-raising and at times had as many as five hundred head of cattle on his range. Having valuable water rights on Clear creek, he was able to engage in the stock business with more success than many. Among his children was Arthur Saxe, who as Colonel Crites has been prominently connected with the Second California National Guard and at this writing also fills the position of cashier of the First Bank of Kern. Another son, Angus J., whose name introduces this article, was born in Bakersfield April 26, 1874, and passed the years of boyhood on the family ranch near Tehachapi. When a public school was established at Keene he became one of the first pupils and there gained a practical education. In company with his father he engaged in mining in Caliente valley, also in the vicinity of Sageland and Red Rock. At the age of twenty-three he entered the employ of the Jewett & Blodgett Oil Company. During the seven years of his association with the company he helped to develop oil fields in the Sunset, Hazleton and Maricopa districts. When thirty years of age he became connected with the Peerless Oil Company, first acting as superintendent of their lands at Coalinga, then coming to the Kern river field as superintendent at Oil Center. The Peerless, which under his management has become one of the most profitable properties in the entire field, utilizes about twenty-four hundred horse-power day and night and has successfully installed an air-lift system as well as other modern improvements. The storage capacity has been increased until now it aggregates two hundred thousand barrels. Mr. Crites is a Republican and belongs to the Masons and Elks.

By Mr. Crites' marriage to Miss Mary Kirkpatrick, a native of Dry Run, Pa., he has two daughters, Dorothea and Catharine. The family maintain their residence on the Peerless lease. Mr. Crites is an enthusiast on the subject of good roads, and with such men taking hold of the project it is safe to say that Kern county will soon have first-class county roads.

THOMAS J. O'BOYLE.—Born at Scranton, Pa., October 19, 1853, he was the son of a poor miner who lost his life in the coal mines during 1863. The struggle to support the family, always most difficult, was rendered doubly acute by this catastrophe and the boy of ten years soon had to go into the mines, where he was employed in driving a mule and in picking the slate from the coal. The death of his mother left him wholly orphaned and dependent upon his own efforts for food and clothing. Needless to say that he suffered from the lack of necessities, yet he bore his hardships with patience and worked with the good cheer sometimes lacking in those older than he was at the time. At the age of eighteen he became an apprentice to the trade of a machinist in the shops of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad, where he remained until he had completed his time. During 1873 he became clerk in a dry-goods store and remained in that business for four years, after which he secured employment in the oil fields of Pennsylvania. Meanwhile the lure of the west had weakened the ties that bound him to his native commonwealth. Traveling by way of Cincinnati toward the west, he worked for a time in Arkansas and followed the machinist's trade as well as the dry-goods business.

Upon coming to California in 1879 Mr. O'Boyle first settled at Sutter creek in Amador county, where he found employment in a dry-goods store. Two years later he came to Bakersfield. His search for employment met with success in the machine shops of the Southern Pacific Railroad at Kern. From the first he was interested in local affairs. When the village of Sumner was incorporated as the city of Kern he was one of the enthusiastic supporters of the project and was elected a member of the first board of trustees, serving as such for six years. From 1887 to 1889 he engaged in the general mercantile business at Kern and later bought and started to conduct the Paul Gates store in Bakersfield, but in 1889 he lost everything by fire. Lacking the necessary capital to embark anew in mercantile pursuits, he took a position as bookkeeper and accountant. The Democrats of the town co-operated to secure the Kern postmastership for him during the administration of Grover Cleveland and he filled the position acceptably for four years, besides which he served as justice of the peace at Kern for some years. During the early period of his identification with Kern county he purchased the Cosmopolitan hotel from John E. Bailey and conducted the same for three years.

The department store of Heard & Painter was started at Taft during March of 1909 by J. W. Heard and C. C. Painter and Judge O'Boyle came to the village shortly afterward for the purpose of keeping books for the new firm. Later he was placed in the dry-goods department as a salesman. Upon the organization of the district in the fall of 1910 he was elected justice of the peace, which position he had filled previously by appointment. As an indication of his high standing it may be stated that in Midway precinct No. 2 only eight votes were cast against him out of a total of five hundred and fifty, while in the other precincts every ballot was in his favor. Since then he has given his attention to the duties of the office, which he has filled with an impartial spirit and a comprehensive knowledge of the law. He is a member of the Eagles and Foresters.

The first marriage of Judge O'Boyle took place in 1882 and united him with Miss Margaret Dugan, who died after a few years. Two of their children, Thomas and Monica, also are deceased, the sole survivor being Edward, assistant cashier of the First Bank of Kern. During 1890 occurred the marriage of Judge O'Boyle to Miss Nellie Moore, by whom he became the father of two children. The son, Thomas, is deceased. The daughter, Miss Mary, is now employed as bookkeeper in the California market.

REGINALD A. FERGUSSON, M. D.—The genealogy of the Fergusson family is traced back to the old Scotch clan of that name in Fergus Castle in Stirlingshire. In the midst of such picturesque but isolated surroundings was passed the early life of William Long Fergusson, M. D., whose professional skill and splendid Scotch qualities of mind and heart brought him a large circle of friends and admirers. For a considerable period prior to the memorable revolution that culminated in the execution of Maximilian in 1867 he had officiated as private physician to that ill-fated emperor. Upon returning to Great Britain he took up the practice of medicine in Claremont Square, London, where he remained until his death, meanwhile rising to professional prominence in the metropolis of the world. While living at New Granada he had been bereaved by the death of his wife, who was a Miss Chapman, of English birth and education. The only son of that union, Reginald Archibald, was born in New Granada in 1857 and received a classical education in England and Scotland. After having graduated from Oxford he took his medical course in the Royal College of Physicians in Edinburgh, from which he received the degree of M. D. Later he took a post-graduate course in London and then embarked in practice at Corn Hill Exchange in that city.

Coming to Southern California in 1881, Dr. Fergusson opened an office in Los Angeles. A year later he removed to Bakersfield, where soon his professional skill became recognized. A constantly increasing practice filled the ensuing years. Among his co-laborers his standing was the highest. It is said that he was without exception the leading physician of his day and locality, and combined with professional prominence was the prestige associated with culture acquired by association with people of the highest refinement and by travels throughout different countries. At the time of his demise, which occurred September 4, 1899, he held the position of president of the San Joaquin Valley Medical Society, besides being actively associated with the California State and American Medical Associations. While his profession had engrossed his energies and called forth the highest powers of his fine mind, he had found leisure for the amenities of society and for the pleasurable relations of fraternities, having been one of the founders and charter members of Bakersfield Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E., in whose development he retained a deep interest to the last.

The marriage of Dr. Fergusson was solemnized at Brighton, England, in 1880, and united him with Miss Bertha Maud Shriber, who was born in Calcutta, India, and received a classical education in England. Her parents were Dr. Edward and Eulalia (Alexander) Shriber, the former a native of London and a graduate of Guy's Hospital College with the degree of M. D., afterward a surgeon in the English army, stationed in India for many years. Upon his retirement he returned to England to spend his last days amid the scenes familiar to his youthful years. A year after her marriage Mrs. Fergusson accompanied her husband to the United States and since then has made California her home, having since the demise of the Doctor continued to occupy the family residence at No. 1521 Seventeenth street, Bakersfield, and giving her attention to the management of her varied business interests, the enjoyment of the society of warm friends of many years' standing and the benefactions of the Episcopal Church, to which she has given a devoted allegiance from childhood.

J. C. Heck

HECK BROS.—Established in June of 1910, almost simultaneously with the founding of Fellows, the history of the mercantile firm of Heck Bros. has been one of steady growth and progressive development. The erection of a suitable building followed the arrival of the two brothers in Fellows during December of 1909, and as soon as possible they put in the new building a suitable stock of goods, since which they have conducted a department store with ability and tact. The trade is not limited to Fellows, but in addition two teams furnish excellent delivery service to the territory within a radius of seven miles of Fellows.

Upon beginning business in their two-story building the Heck Bros. utilized the upper floor of their block for hotel purposes, while devoting the entire first story to their stock of merchandise and household articles. Upon the establishment of an office at Fellows for Wells, Fargo & Co., they were appointed to act as agents October 24, 1910. Numerous other private and public enterprises occupy some of their time, but they are men of such stirring energy and such indomitable perseverance that their work is their chief joy, and the busier they are, likewise the happier. Their pride in the growth of the community has been warranted by their efforts in its behalf. It is their ambition to continue to promote the progress of Fellows and to assist in its permanent upbuilding, so that from a commercial and social standpoint it may represent appropriately the rich oil section of which it is the center.

O. C. Heck is a native of Iowa and in January of 1898 married Miss Fannie Dustin, of Selma. E. P. Heck, a native of Missouri, was united in marriage in 1904 with Miss Ada Sturgis, of Kansas. During October of 1894 the brothers came from Fort Scott, Kan., to California and settled at Selma, Fresno county, where they engaged in farming and teaming. From that place they came to Oil Center and identified themselves with the oil industry on their own account, developing the Walker-Heck Oil Company. In addition they engaged in the mercantile business. Since coming to Fellows they have continued their mercantile and oil interests and have acquired oil holdings here and at McKittrick. Quite recently they have undertaken to develop all of section 6, township 29, range 22, and have officiated as directors in the Eagle Creek Company, of which O. C. Heck served as vice-president at one time.

W. L. CUNNINGHAM.—More of shadow than of sunshine surrounded the early years of Mr. Cunningham, who as the eldest son in a large family experienced many privations and made many sacrifices in order that the younger children might have an opportunity to secure educational advantages. When a mere lad he became self-supporting. However, it was not enough that he should support himself. With characteristic generosity he used his earnings to aid in the maintenance of the family, hence it has been only of recent years that he has recorded any individual progress, but it is sufficiently rapid to recompense for past delays and sacrifices. Now in the prime of manhood, he may look forward to long years of business and occupative activity, years that will enhance his reputation as a competent engineer and a successful production foreman in the oil fields.

A native son of the state, Mr. Cunningham was born at Lakeport, Lake county, February 3, 1880, and was the second child and eldest son in a family numbering nine children. When yet very young he accompanied his parents to Fresno and there attended the public schools as opportunity offered. At the age of seventeen years, after he had been self-supporting for a considerable period, he secured employment in the Copper King mine in Fresno county and there he became familiar with the work of an engineer. In this occupation he is said to be an expert. About 1908 he came to the Kern river oil field and secured work as a pumper on the Overland lease, whence in 1910 he came to the West Shore lease. Since then he has continued with the West Shore Oil Company and now is discharging the duties of foreman with characteristic fidelity and intelligence. At San Jose, on Christmas day of 1902, he was united in marriage with Miss Georgia Johnson of that city and they have a son, Wayland. The family formerly occupied a comfortable cottage on the company property on section 32, township 28, range 28, in the Kern river field, but now live on the home ranch south of Waits.

HUGH L. McNEW, M.D.—Born October 12, 1869, Dr. McNew is the eldest child of James H. and Olivia (Kincaid) McNew, parents of ten children. James H. is now a resident of Texas, his wife having passed away some years ago. Reared in Campbell county, Tenn., the place of his birth, Hugh L. McNew became interested in the study of medicine at an early age, and after diligent and patient work was graduated from the University of Tennessee with the class of 1888, receiving the degree of B.S., after which he entered the medical department of Columbia University, at Washington. He was later, in 1892, graduated from the Nashville Medical College, with the degree of M.D., and he immediately started in to practice, choosing as his field of labor Honey Grove, Tex., where he remained for ten years. During this period he found time to take post graduate courses in 1893 in the New York Polytechnic, in 1896 at the Chicago Polytechnic, and in 1898 at the New York Postgraduate school.

In Texas Dr. McNew married Miss Nannie A. Williamson, daughter of J. M. Williamson, a merchant and cotton planter there, and they moved to Dallas, where he practiced medicine, and held the chair of physiology in the Dallas Medical College for two years. The following two years he held the chair of professorship on the practice of medicine. In 1907 he came to Nevada, and then to Los Angeles, Cal., remaining two years, when he came to Bakersfield, to make it his home, and since that time has devoted his time and attention to real estate, in which he has become highly successful. He was instrumental in the organization of the Bakersfield Realty & Building Company, of which he is now vice president, the other officials being Joseph H. Tam, president, N. A. McNew, secretary and treasurer, and the company has offices at No. 3 Hopkins building, where its wide interests are handled. They laid out the following additions: Santa Fe, Sunset tract and Mayflower, which have nearly all been sold in lots. Individually Dr. McNew is also engaged in the real estate business in Los Angeles, having offices at No. 202 Mercantile Place, where he spends part of his time keeping in close touch with land values and where he has been very successful in increasing his record of big sales.

Dr. McNew has a fine residence on Nineteenth street, where he and his wife make their home, and they move in the best social circles of the city. He has invested largely in farm lands, and his interests in the county cover a large area.

C. B. COLBY.—A native of Iowa, born in Henry county October 18, 1866, Mr. Colby came west without means, but with an abundance of energy and determination and possessing a fine intelligent and well-trained mind that enabled him to lay the foundation for subsequent success. Since settling at Oakland, Cal., in the year 1899 he has witnessed the steady and interesting development of the state and has himself been a large contributor thereto, his great energy and broad intelligence having been directed toward movements, not alone for his own advancement, but also for the permanent well-being of the commonwealth. While attaining large wealth, at the same time he has been a constant factor in the material development of his chosen place of residence and his most recent project, the Western Water Company, already has proved of inestimable value to the oil regions, besides bringing to its promoters returns larger than their most optimistic hopes had anticipated.

Long association with the oil fields convinced Mr. Colby of the necessity of cheaper water than they had been able to secure. While acting as manager of the Columbian, M. & S., Lorenzo and Minnehaha Oil Companies, and the H. A. Oil & Water Company (all of which organizations were made successful through his efficient management and energetic supervision), he saw the need of a more adequate water supply for the west side oil fields. With him the first step was to see the necessity, the next step was to create an opportunity. The Western Water Company of Bakersfield was organized in April, 1911, and incorporated under the laws of the state of California. After months of strenuous activity they began to deliver water to customers December 18, 1911, and since then the demand for water has been twice what its promoters anticipated, although no more than they are prepared to supply. Exclusive of the office force, the company now employs twenty men. Having a private telephone system of its own, the officers and workmen can communicate with every plant in the system. Every modern facility has been adopted that will promote the success of the organization. Capitalized at $200,000, the company has two hundred shares at $1,000 each, and as the stock is almost wholly taken in Bakersfield, it is strictly a local enterprise.

Water is drawn from two deep wells, affording an unlimited supply of pure drinking water, used for domestic purposes and for the oil regions at Midway, Taft, Fellows and Maricopa. At the time the company began to pump water the oil fields were paying at the rate of ten to twenty cents per barrel, but this company is now supplying water to the same fields at about three cents a barrel. It is stated that $600,000 was expended on the water system to Taft from the district around Rio Bravo, fourteen miles. Water is distributed to all parts of the district through fourteen miles of twelve-inch line and forty-two miles of eight and six-inch line. Two five hundred-foot wells are pumped at station No. 1, where three two hundred and fifty horsepower gas engines are installed. Large high-pressure pumps force the water to Taft, where the Consumers' Water Company (which recently took over the Taft Public Utilities' Company's holdings of five miles of city lines) delivers the water for domestic use at a price of from four and one-half cents to nine cents per barrel. The Western Water Company is now handling forty thousand barrels a day, the capacity of its lines, and at a reduced price of from three cents to one and three-fourths cents on a sliding scale to the oil companies, a reduction of fifty per cent over what it was six months ago to operators and the cities. The engines of this company are run by steam at Taft and the boilers are fired by natural gas, the large gas engines at their station No. 1 being operated by gas supplied by the California Natural Gas Company. The four pumps (one electric and three steam) are driven by six one hundred-horse power boilers. On the highest point of the neighborhood the company has installed a steel tank with a capacity of fifty-five thousand barrels and this tank is utilized to conserve the surplus water pumped.

From Taft the distributing system runs twelve and one-half miles north and west and twelve miles south and east. The entire cost of the plant approximated $600,000, but enormous as was the outlay, the company is in a very prosperous financial condition and its shares of stock represent a safe and profitable investment, all of which satisfactory result may be attributed to the wise management of the company's president, C. B. Colby, admittedly one of the most talented business men of Bakersfield, a promoter of ability, a financier whose insight rises almost to genius and a leader who combines a conservative spirit with progressive policies. Realizing the vast resources of Kern county, he has not hesitated to promote local movements when once their need is apparent and their possible success made manifest. In every respect he ranks among the most influential, energetic and capable business leaders of Bakersfield. Early in 1912 he completed one of the most costly and elegant residences in Bakersfield and here he and his wife, daughter, Patricia, and son, Charles Bertram, Jr., have established a home whose refinement and hospitality has attracted a host of admiring friends. Mrs. Colby, prior to their marriage in 1907, was Miss Florence Nelson, of Bakersfield.

KATHARYN W. ELLIS, M. D.—When in 1890 she was graduated from the Cincinnati College of Medicine and Surgery it was with the highest honors of the class, her expenses at the institution being partially defrayed by her services as a school teacher. Wider professional knowledge came to her through a post-graduate course at the Women's Medical College of Cincinnati and the degree of M. D. also was conferred upon her by that well-known institution in 1893.

A member of the old Wadsworth family of New England, Dr. Ellis traces her ancestry to the illustrious Captain Wadsworth of Hartford, who in October, 1687, upon the appearance of Andros in Hartford at the head of a troop of soldiers demanding the surrender of the Connecticut charter, allowed the debate to continue until evening, then ordered all of the candles suddenly extinguished and in the subsequent confusion seized the charter from its box and hid it in a hollow oak on the grounds of Samuel Wyllys, one of the magistrates. Always afterward the tree was known in history as the charter oak. Some years later when Governor Fletcher, of New York, appointed to his office by King William and Queen Mary, attempted to usurp authority in Connecticut and appeared in person at Hartford with his troops for the purpose of reading his instructions, Captain Wadsworth commanded his troops to drum so loudly that the voice of the reader was completely lost in the tumult of noise, so that Fletcher was forced to retreat without having carried out his plan of usurpation.

The parents of Dr. Ellis are Henry and Statira (Goshorn) Wadsworth, natives respectively of Pittsburg, Pa., and Youngstown, Ohio, and now residing on their country estate near Falmouth, Pendleton county, Ky. During early manhood Mr. Wadsworth engaged in manufacturing enterprises, but later he turned his attention to farming and settled on a plantation near Gardnersville, Ky., where occurred the birth of his daughter, Katharyn W. the eldest of six children. From early life she displayed exceptional ability and a great desire for knowledge. At the age of sixteen she was graduated from the high school and at eighteen completed the studies of the scientific course at the Central Normal College at Danville, Ind. A portion of each year was then devoted to teaching school in order to add to the funds necessary for a professional education. Upon her graduation in medicine she opened an office at Covington, Ky., and while engaged in practice there she became the wife of James F. Ellis, an attorney-at-law. Afterward she built up an important practice at Butler, Ky., and later spent three years at Evanston, Wyo., where her clientele included patients for miles in every direction, the conduct of so large a practice entailing many physical hardships, yet bringing rich returns in the satisfaction of realizing a helpful service to humanity. During 1901 she came to Kern, now East Bakersfield, and opened an office on Baker street, where since she has conducted a general practice in medicine and surgery. Her only child, Leland Wadsworth Ellis, graduated from the Kern county high school, class of 1913, at the age of sixteen. Since coming to her present location she has identified herself with the Kern County and the California State Medical Associations and has acted as medical examiner for the women's auxiliary of the Foresters and the Ladies of the Maccabees. In religion she is a member of the Christian Church. Politically she supports Republican principles. In addition to having acquired valuable property in East Bakersfield she has invested elsewhere in California, her chief investment comprising an orange grove of fifty acres at Portersville, a property of great and growing horticultural importance.

Mr. Cuddeback

WILLIAM N. CUDDEBACK.—The early colonization of America attracted from all parts of the world men and women of resolute spirit and energetic temperament. The nation was still in the infancy of its history when the Cudaback family crossed the ocean from Holland and established themselves among the Dutch residents of Manhattan island. Some of the name (which it may be noted was spelled differently at that period from the present form) became early settlers of Orange county on the Hudson and there founded a village which to this day bears the name of Cuddebackville.

In the family of Peter Cuddeback of Cuddebackville, N. Y., there was a son, Grant Price, who was put to service as a tow boy on the Erie canal on boats owned by the earlier-day Vanderbilts, but finding the work difficult and illy-paid he ran away to seek his fortune in the then unknown west, of whose mysterious solitudes he long had dreamed with the hopeful visions of youth. The path to success proved a toilsome road. Many adventures befell him ere finally he had found his way to the Pacific coast. During the memorable year of 1849 he arrived in Kern county and took up land north of Tehachapi, developing the ranch now known as the old Hale place, besides which he improved a large ranch near the old Lake farm east of Tehachapi. Throughout the Tehachapi valley he was known as a warm friend of the Indians. Their interests were ever safe in his care. With wise counsel he directed many of their undertakings and they came to hold him with affectionate regard. By an Indian ceremony he was made a brother of Chief Phillipe, an adopted relationship that by the terms of the ceremony descended to his sons and daughters and to their descendants forever. Eventually he removed to Orange county and acquired one of the oldest orange groves in that locality, where his interests became very important and extensive. During February of 1905 death removed him from the sphere of his usefulness and terminated the activities that had crowned an honorable existence.

In his marriage Grant Price Cuddeback was united with Almira Hale, a niece of President Franklin Pierce and a descendant of Nathan Hale, the Revolutionary martyr, also connected by family ties with the two presidents, William Henry Harrison and Benjamin Harrison. There were five sons and three daughters in the family of Grant Price Cuddeback. None of these had college educations, for the western schools of their childhood were poorly equipped and inefficiently instructed. William N., who was born in San Bernardino county March 13, 1861, attended the Los Angeles schools for a time, but his present broad fund of information comes from self-culture and habits of close observation. When a babe in arms he was brought into the Tehachapi region, Kern county. For many years he and his younger brother, John P., were associated together as ranchers and cattlemen. When only thirteen years of age he began to be a wage-earner, starting at fifty cents a day, and working up until he earned $1.50 a day and therefore, aside from what his father left to him, he has become wealthy in his own right, nor has his brother been less successful. Their partnership was dissolved in July of 1908, at which time William N. bought the famous old Norboe Salt Lake ranch of thirty-two hundred acres, five miles east of Tehachapi. For a number of years he kept his herd of cattle on that ranch and also raised grain there in large quantities, besides shipping thousands of tons of salt from the lake. Some years ago the city of Los Angeles bought the greater part of this ranch as a site for a cement plant, the lake having proved to possess a bed of purest clay, exceptionally valuable for the making of cement. He used to graze his cattle in San Bernardino county and Cuddeback lake was named for him.

With the opening and early development of the Imperial valley Mr. Cuddeback, who had watched the vast enterprise with the deepest interest from its inauguration, purchased land which has been devoted to alfalfa, hog-raising and a dairy industry. The ranch proved a very profitable investment and was sold at a high figure. A few years later he bought from Hon. Fred Eaton, former mayor of Los Angeles, an alfalfa and hog ranch in Inyo county. He still manages two hundred and eighty acres of it with gratifying success, raising and feeding stock. During 1910 he became interested in the S. Watkins Live Stock Auctioneering Company and the old Fashion stables in Los Angeles, at the time buying an elegant city residence in the southwest district, where the family spend the winter months, returning for the summers to their residence in Tehachapi. Lately Mr. Cuddeback purchased five hundred and eighty acres of land in Palos Verdes valley, Riverside county, which he is developing into a large alfalfa farm. For about twenty-five years he ran a meat market in Tehachapi, but he now rents it. Fraternally Mr. Cuddeback is a member of Tehachapi Lodge No. 313, F. & A. M., in which he has held a number of offices. In politics he and his sons are stanch Republicans. May 10, 1883, he married Miriam Jane Chitwood, a native of Sonoma county and a daughter of Russell and Frances (Hubbard) Chitwood, of the Tehachapi valley, and a niece of the famous superior court judge, Hon. James E. Prewett, of Auburn, this state. Their family comprises eight children, all living, as follows: Cate M., Mrs. Bone-shell, of Orange, Cal.; Della, wife of A. J. Blackley, of Alhambra; Samuel G., who married Elizabeth Erbel, of Inyo county; Margie, who married Arthur Weldon, of Tehachapi; Bertha, Mrs. Victor Phillips, of Monolith; Ruth, wife of Wilson Easley, of Hayden, Ariz.; and Charles and Murray, who make their home with their parents.

A. D. FORBES.—The allied companies known as the American Oilfields, Limited, and the Midland Oilfields, Limited, operating respectively on section 32, 32-24, and section 32, 12-23, have as their assistant superintendent A. D. Forbes, one of the capable young men to ascend to an important place in the Sunset-Midway fields, having made good in a comparatively brief period of identification with the industry. Rapid promotion has resulted from the exercise of industry, intelligence, energy and perseverance. Practical experience in almost every department of work gives him a thorough knowledge of the oil business and qualifies him for still further advancement. While his work has been mainly confined to California districts, he has been outside of the state and has worked in connection with the drilling of wells for water and oil in Oregon not far from the city of Portland. To a large extent his life has been passed in California, but he was born in Nova Scotia at Truro, March 26, 1885. The earliest memories of life cluster around the Pacific coast country, for in 1887 his father, J. F. Forbes, brought the family to California, settling in Ventura county. Removal was made to Coalinga during 1891 and in 1906 he established himself at Orcutt, where he is now postmaster and an influential citizen.

The eldest of four children, all of whom remain in California, A. D. Forbes was educated in the public schools of Coalinga and in 1900 at the age of fifteen years he went to Bakersfield, from there proceeding to the Kern river oil field. For a year he worked as a pumper on the Kern River Oil Company's lease. From 1901 to 1903 he was employed at Fullerton. Returning to Coalinga, he found work in the oil fields there. June 27, 1907, he left Coalinga for Portland to take up the work of drilling water and oil wells.

The drilling for oil was in the nature of a wild-cat proposition. During 1910 he returned to California and later worked in various districts until June of 1912, when he first became associated with the American and Midland Oil-fields, Limited, which companies promoted him to be assistant superintendent July 20, 1913, by this promotion recognizing his efficiency and his ability to aid in the management of the two important leases controlled by the concerns. While giving his attention very closely to the arduous duties on the leases, he has found leisure to identify himself with the other oil operators in the field, has become popular among his co-workers and also has been active in Maricopa Lodge No. 831, Loyal Order of Moose.

GEORGE H. TODD.—In 1909 Mr. Todd came to California, and began to be interested in oil production and oil-well supplies. A member of an old Missouri family, he was born in St. Joe, February 14, 1876, and is a son of John H. and Martha (Frazier) Todd, natives of Missouri. The latter is deceased, but the former, hale and vigorous at the age of eighty-two, still makes St. Joe his home. The family numbered four children who attained maturity, namely: B. O., an electrician in Oklahoma; William M., a farmer at Savannah, near St. Joe, Mo.; George H., of California; and Nora, who married George W. Carter, an electrician, and at her death left one child, I. D. Carter. During the winters George H. Todd attended school in St. Joe, while in summer he helped his father, who was proprietor of a mercantile establishment. After he had graduated from the St. Joe high school with the class of 1892 he took a course of normal study in a branch of the Kirksville (Mo.) Normal. From 1893 until 1904 he engaged in teaching school in Missouri and established a splendid record for efficiency in instruction and discipline. Both in Andrew and Buchanan counties he is still remembered with affection by former pupils and old-time friends.

Engaging in the United States Indian school service in 1904, Mr. Todd continued in the employ of the government until 1909. For two years of this period he taught in the Grand Portage (Minn.) Indian reservation and for one year he acted as disciplinarian at the Crow agency in Crow, Mont., after which for one year he was principal of the Northern Cheyenne training school at Rosebud, Mont. The last year of Indian educational work was spent in Kansas as a teacher in the Kickapoo training school at Horton. Coming to Los Angeles in 1909, he soon became cost clerk for the Los Angeles Manufacturing Company. In their interests he came to Kern county, where he took charge of the Maricopa branch, later was transferred to Taft, where he is now a member of the Petroleum Club and one of the best-known men in the oil circles of the west side. While still living in Missouri he was married, at St. Joe in 1901, to Miss Maude F. Roberts, daughter of J. P. Roberts, president of the Rea Banking Company of Rea, Andrew county, that state. Since coming to Taft Mr. Todd and his wife have established a comfortable home in the company's residence and he has identified himself with the town as a public-spirited citizen and progressive business man. In his busy life there has not been much leisure for political or fraternal activities, but he is well posted in national problems, supports Democratic principles, and while still making his home in Missouri took an active part in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, belonging to the lodge at Whitesville, Andrew county.

F. F. HILL.—While much of the life of Mr. Hill has been lived in California, he is a native of Kansas City, Mo. (born January 5, 1876), and from 1878 to 1889 was on a cattle ranch near Bozeman, Mont., his father being both a merchant and a stock-raiser in Montana, but now a resident of Los Angeles. Coming to California in 1889 and settling at Santa Paula, Ventura county, he became a warehouse boy with the Union Oil Company when he was eighteen years of age, and from that time to the present he has been with the same corporation, with the exception of two years devoted to drilling and development work for himself at Newhall and for various companies in the Los Angeles and Santa Paula fields. It has been his privilege to witness the development of the Union Oil Company of California from a modest beginning to its present vast influence and enormous holdings, and with satisfaction he may view his own association with the concern, for which he worked in various capacities, including tool-dressing and drilling. Recognition of his ability and faithfulness came in 1903 with his promotion to be field superintendent and from that in 1912 he was assigned to the place of superintendent of development, since which time he has had his office in the Union Oil Company's building in Los Angeles and has had charge of all development work in the California fields, viz.: Fullerton, Lompoc, Santa Maria, Ventura county, Coalinga, Lost Hills, McKittrick, Midway, Maricopa, Sunset and the Kern river oil fields. His home is in Los Angeles, where he has erected and now occupies a residence at No. 709 South Hope street, and his family consists of his wife (formerly Miss Blanche Pitt, of Los Angeles) and their two children, Wayne and Wanda F. Hill.

EUGENE B. DUNCAN.—Among the bright and active young business men of Bakersfield whose splendid energy and modern methods have contributed not a little to the rapid development of the community is Eugene B. Duncan, who is now filling the responsible position of assistant cashier in the Security Trust Co. Bank of Bakersfield. The son of M. A. and Emma (Lehman) Duncan, he was born October 9, 1878, in Quincy, Adams county, Ill., where he was reared and educated. Taking a business course at Gem City College in order to further his business knowledge he was graduated therefrom and in March, 1899, came to Bakersfield to make his home. From that year to 1904 he worked with Sam Wible in the laundry business, filling the position of office foreman. In 1904 he took a position in the water department of the Kern County Land Co., and remained as one of their most trusted employes for seven years. Since the time of the organization of the Security Trust Co., on March 1, 1911, Mr. Duncan has been connected with it, being a stockholder in the company and now ably filling the position of assistant cashier. He is also director in the First Bank of Kern and has been actively identified with the financial business world of his community in the last few years.

In October, 1909, Mr. Duncan was married to Miss Caroline K. Duncan of Quincy, Ill., and they now make their home at No. 829 D street, where they have a beautiful and comfortable cottage. Mr. Duncan has a creditable military record, having served six years (1906-1911) as commanding officer of Company L, State Militia National Guard, being commissioned captain.

ALFRED RUPP.—It was as a driller that Mr. Rupp first became associated with Kern county. On New Year's day of 1900, when for the first time he came to Bakersfield and from here rode across the country to the Kern river fields, he found only six derricks in that entire district. The rapid development of the oil industry he witnessed with interest. As superintendent for the Dolton & Fuller Company he engaged extensively in drilling in this field and shortly after his arrival, becoming a partner in the company, he took contracts for drilling throughout all of the district, spending a little more than two years in the work in Kern county. Later he became superintendent for S. Pierson & Son and, acting in their interests, he conveyed an oil rig to Mexico and put down the first two wells in the state of Vera Cruz. After a year in that part of Mexico he returned to Bakersfield, where he has since made his home.

Born near Pitston, Luzerne county, Pa., December 17, 1870, Alfred Rupp accompanied his parents to Kansas at the age of seven years and settled with them on a frontier homestead in Hodgeman county, far from the railroad and remote from other homesteaders. The isolation of the family and the incessant labor necessary to the improvement of the land prevented him from having any special educational advantages, although he was sent to school whenever possible. The most of his time in boyhood was devoted to the tilling of the soil and the care of the stock. At the age of twenty years he started out to make his own way in the world, going first to Colorado and later to Utah, where he worked at any occupation that offered a source of income. Returning to visit the family in Kansas, he there came to a determination to locate in California and the spring of 1894 found him a new-comer in Los Angeles, where he found employment and remained for several years. From that city he went to Summerland, Santa Barbara county. There he first became interested in the oil industry and learned to be an expert driller. After three years in the oil business in that field he came to the Kern river field shortly after its first opening and here he experienced the hardships and successes incident to the industry. Since leaving this line of work he has been proprietor of the Midland hotel on Nineteenth street, Bakersfield. In addition he has mining interests in the Breckenridge mountains, where he and his partner, Arthur Worthington, own a number of valuable claims and have erected machinery at their principal mine, called the Crystal and Hercules, situated thirty-two miles northeast of Bakersfield. Mr. Rupp was married in San Diego to Miss Nora Forest, a native of Kansas. In fraternal relations he holds membership with the Eagles.

John P Cuddelback .

JOHN PRICE CUDDEBACK.—A family long known and honored throughout Kern county, particularly in the Tehachapi valley, has lost none of its prestige through the forceful business career of John P. Cuddeback, whose splendid energies and dauntless courage have enabled him to amass an independent fortune. He was born in this picturesque valley September 18, 1865, the son of Grant P. and Almira (Hale) Cuddeback, who came across the plains with their respective families in 1849, and were married in El Monte. Later they became the second permanent family to settle in the Tehachapi valley, where the elder Cuddeback followed cattle raising. He was also interested in mining in the Panamint mountains, being associated in this enterprise with John Narbo and Moses Hale, but the Indians proved so menacing that they were forced to leave the locality. What is now the site of Goler and Randsburg was the scene of their mining attempt. The following children comprised the parental family: Clinton; Celestia, Mrs. E. A. Honey; Bertha, Mrs. Chappel, now deceased; George G.; William N.; Mary, Mrs. Powell, deceased; John Price; David A.; Ernest and Alonzo, the last two mentioned also deceased. The mother of these children passed away in Los Angeles in 1872, while the father died in Orange about 1902.

In the valley where he was born, John P. Cuddeback still retains important property interests and worthily upholds a name as highly honored as it is widely known. It would, however, be doing an injustice to his rare talents and attractive personality to limit the influence of his life to any one county, for almost any portion of Southern California has been benefited by the fine business abilities of himself and brothers. He and his brother, Will N., have worked together from boyhood harmoniously and successfully. When John Price was about ten and Will N. about thirteen, their brother George sent them to deliver to a neighbor a bunch of grape-cuttings, stating that they should ask $10, but be willing to take $7.50. The boy of ten was so eager to sell that he promptly exclaimed: "We want $10, but will take $7.50." Needless to say that they received $7.50. The incident, which greatly amused the entire family, taught the child a lesson of self-reliance, and in later years, when planning his own operations, he learned to keep his prices to himself. Though educational advantages were limited, John P. Cuddeback continued to add to his store of knowledge whenever he could be spared from work, and his diligence and application have made him a man of broad education. The same penetration and readiness to learn exhibited in his youth are still shown in every phase of commercial, industrial, social, and educational development that comes before his notice.

Such is his fondness for his old birth-place that when the opportunity arose he purchased his father's old homestead which is now included in his large ranch. Although once and always a cattle man and rancher, having added section after section until today he is among the largest individual land owners and cattle growers in Kern county, it must not be understood that his activities have been limited to land and cattle. For many years he and his brother, Will N., were engaged in the butcher business in Tehachapi, and were also pioneer business men of Randsburg, when that camp was started. Many years before the placer mines at Goler and the ledge of the Yellow Aster were discovered, the Cuddeback brothers ranged their cattle over the region. It was necessary for them to dig wells at different places and put up windmills and horsepower pumps that their cattle might have watering-places. They were fortunate in finding water within twelve feet of the surface in places, thus demonstrating the feasibility of obtaining on the desert that which meant so much not only to themselves, but also to other cattle men for utilizing the abundance of dry feed. When they first began occupying that range, Panamint Tom still held sway and was the leader of the Panamint Indians. These frequently came to the brothers' camp, where they were fed and treated like the friendly Indians they had become. This was a good illustration of the change that had of necessity come to poor Lo since the time he had driven the elder Cuddeback and his companions out of the country. As the brothers were pioneers of that region, Cuddeback Lake, to the east of Randsburg, was named in their honor.

After the dissolution of the partnership, John P. formed a real-estate partnership in Los Angeles with Charles L. Cooper, whose daughter, Miss Ethel, who was born in Ventura, he married May 6, 1907. At Manvel, in the Searchlight district in San Bernardino county, he carried on the largest cattle ranch in the county, having as partners George Briggs and Dan Murphy of Needles. More recently he has associated himself with Lawrence B. Burke in the purchase of the Sacramento ranch of fifty thousand acres near Paso Robles, San Luis Obispo county, to the management of which he devotes the greater part of his time, and in so doing he is carrying out his pet project in breeding and raising Shorthorn and Hereford cattle and saddle horses.

To the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. John P. Cuddeback three children were born, Virginia Ethelwyn, Alzada Brooks, and John P., Jr. During the winters the family make their residence in San Gabriel, and the summers are spent at the country home on the ranch in the Tehachapi valley, where Mr. Cuddeback enjoys the refinements and luxuries rendered possible by his brilliant business career. In early youth he became identified with the Knights of Pythias at Tehachapi, and he still retains his membership in the order, besides being a member of the San Gabriel Country Club. When it is remembered that he started out to earn a livelihood at an early age without the aid of financial friends to assist him, his remarkable success in business and the position of influence to which he has risen prove the truth of the old adage to the effect that "What man wills to be he can be." Still in the prime of life, with many possible years of continued usefulness before him, already he has attained a commercial prestige and landed authority reached by few in long lives of capable endeavor.

HARRY A. HOPKINS.—Upon the incorporation of the Taft Ice Delivery Company, January 3, 1913, twenty-five thousand shares of stock were sold at par value of $1 each and these were bought by about thirty stockholders, all residents of this community. The officers and directors are: W. S. Lierly, president; S. J. Dunlop, vice-president; H. A. Hopkins, secretary-treasurer; A. I. Scott, A. B. Green, E. A. Henderson and F. W. O'Brien.

Regarding the personal history of Mr. Hopkins, it may be stated that he represents a family identified with America ever since the landing of the Mayflower. His father, A. A. Hopkins, a native of Springfield, Ill., and now a resident of Los Angeles, is a relative of Hon. H. A. Hopkins, of Aurora, Ill. Himself a contractor and builder, he is well known in Taft, where he built eight houses and a large proportion of the business buildings in the town. By his marriage to Elizabeth Shrader, who was born in Detroit, Mich., of German ancestry, he had a family of four sons, namely: Albert J., who died unmarried in 1903 at the age of thirty-one years; Benjamin F., proprietor of The Apparel Shop on Third and Hill streets, Los Angeles, and also owner of The Colton People's Store at Colton, this state; Harry A., of Taft, and Ray R., proprietor of the Puritas Tea and Coffee Company on Los Angeles street, between Third and Fourth streets, Los Angeles. The third son, Harry A., was born at Ogden, Utah, March 28, 1882, and was six years of age when the family settled in San Diego, Cal., only to remove thence in a short time to Los Angeles. In 1903 he was graduated from the Commercial high school of Los Angeles. Long before this, however, he had been earning his own livelihood. When only thirteen he had begun to learn the trade of printer. After school and on the Saturday vacation he learned to feed the press and to set type in the composing room of the American Typefounders' Company. For a time he worked in the printing department of the Los Angeles Daily Times and he also was with the Los Angeles Herald, earning in that way the money necessary for his high school course.

While with George Rice & Son, printers of the magazine supplement of the Los Angeles Herald, Mr. Hopkins was accustomed to go to work immediately after leaving school at three o'clock on Friday afternoon and he continued uninterruptedly at work until midnight Saturday. Notwithstanding this long period of constant work without rest or sleep, he was able to resume his studies on Monday and at the time he completed the high school course he was earning $18 per week. After his graduation he secured employment as a bookkeeper. For a time he engaged as tracing clerk and stenographer with the Santa Fe Railroad Company in Los Angeles. Later he worked for the Wilmington Transportation Company at San Pedro. In the interests of the Easton-Eldridge Company he engaged in selling acreage in the Hemet valley of Riverside county, after which he became an employe of the Barber Asphalt Paving Company of Los Angeles.

Arriving at McKittrick, July 10, 1904, Mr. Hopkins assumed charge of the Midway office of the Chanslor-Canfield Midway Oil Company. The present site of Taft then showed nothing but sage brush and jack rabbits. Water was hauled from Lake Buena Vista and cost $8 per barrel. During 1906 he spent seven months in the Indian Territory and engaged in drilling a number of wells as a partner of Cremins Brothers. Upon his return to McKittrick he took charge of the National Supply Company, with whom he continued for eighteen months. Later he was placed in charge of the Kern county business of the J. F. Lucey Company, with offices in the Producers' Bank building, Bakersfield. Meanwhile he had been interested in the land around the present town of Taft. Close inspection had convinced him that the place offered favorable openings for great oil development. Upon resigning his position in Bakersfield he came to the present site of Taft, where he opened the first general mercantile store and was commissioned postmaster, in July, 1909, under President Taft. The new town had been given the name of Moro. On account of there being a Wells-Fargo express office in San Luis Obispo county known by the name of Moro, considerable confusion resulted. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company, hoping to end the confusion of names, added an "n" to the word, making it Moron, but there being a post office of that name in Colorado the government objected, nor did the name satisfy the people. The question of another change of name was then agitated. Postmaster Hopkins then met Postmaster R. A. Edmonds of Bakersfield and discussed the matter. The office desk of Mr. Edmonds was graced by a picture of President Taft. Happening to glance at it, Mr. Hopkins immediately exclaimed: "Name it Taft," which suggestion was seconded heartily by Mr. Edmonds. These are the real facts connected with the naming of the now celebrated oil town.

In the great fire Mr. Hopkins, carrying only an insurance of thirty per cent, lost about $12,000 and the date of the conflagration, October 22, 1909, remains therefore indelibly impressed upon his mind as a time of the deepest discouragement. However, with characteristic courage he set himself resolutely to the task of recouping his losses. After the fire the Southern Pacific notified the business men that they must move to the north side of the track. There was some protest to the move. Some of the business men accepted the offer of J. W. Jameson and went on his tract south of the tracks, but a majority moved to the north side, where they could own property for themselves. In September of 1910 the buildings on the south side were destroyed by fire and this put an end to efforts for the upbuilding of that section.

After three months in the real-estate and oil-land business, Mr. Hopkins put up a building on the corner of Fourth and Center streets on the north side. The block is now occupied by the Mission Drug Company and other establishments. His next move was the starting of the Taft Public Utilities Company, a concern formed for the purpose of supplying water, which was shipped in tank cars from Kern, pumped into two tanks with a capacity of twelve hundred barrels and then distributed among consumers in Taft. Upon the organization of the company in October, 1910, J. P. Dooly was elected president, and Harry A. Hopkins secretary and manager. February 1, 1912, the company sold out to the Consumers' Water Company, which is still in existence. Returning to the real-estate business, Mr. Hopkins handled acreage in Mono county and became interested in an irrigation project in that county, retaining indeed at the present time considerable stock in the Mono Home and Canal Company. During December of 1912 he inaugurated a movement looking toward supplying the people of Taft with ice. The following month the company was incorporated. Since then it has rapidly developed into one of the leading business enterprises of the place. In addition to being the first postmaster of Taft, he has served as a city trustee since November, 1910, and has been identified with civic affairs to an important extent. As a Republican he has been influential in the political life of the community. Fraternally he is identified with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks at Bakersfield and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Los Angeles. His family comprises two children, Zuva Belle and Harry A., Jr., and his wife, whom he married in Riverside, this state, and who was Miss Zuva Tyler, daughter of William Tyler, a sergeant on the police force of Los Angeles.

CHARLES DRADER.—From the earliest recollections of childhood to the intelligent efforts of maturity Mr. Drader has been associated with the oil industry and thus has become familiar with every phase of the business. Even the name of his native village in the western part of the province of Ontario suggests his occupation, for he is a native of Petrolia, a well-known town in the oil fields of Canada, where his father, the late Ernest Drader, who died November 19, 1912, was one of the leading pioneers and owned extensive interests. In a home in the midst of such an environment his birth occurred March 22, 1874, and there he passed the uneventful years of youth. Under the keen oversight of his father he was taught every branch of the work and thus developed a judgment not always seen in young men of his years. It was this judgment and accuracy of discrimination that led a prominent English corporation to engage his services in the capacity of manager of their company, known as the Canadian Oil Fields, Limited, and he continued to fill the position with conspicuous energy and fidelity until the property was sold to other parties.

E. S. Shambler

Leaving his old Canadian home to inspect other oil districts, Mr. Drader visited Mexico and engaged in the industry at Tampico for a brief period, dating from December of 1910. While the oil in Canada has a paraffine base, he soon found that the Tampico oil has an asphalt base and the two therefore differed in mode of operation and in by-products. The work in Mexico he found as intensely interesting as that of Canada, but the enervating climate proved unhealthful and he came to the Kern river oil fields, where since April 1, 1912, he has ably served as superintendent of the Kern River Oil Fields of California, Limited. On coming to this district he brought with him his wife, who was formerly Miss Margaret Parker of Petrolia, Canada, and their two children, Lorna M., born in 1900, and Ernest O., born in 1906.

The Kern River Oil Fields of California, Limited, was bought in 1910 by a group of capitalists, mainly residents of London, England, and the new corporation engaged the services of Ernest V. Benjamin and W. W. Orcutt as members of the management committee, and subsequently employed Mr. Drader in the capacity of superintendent. The company was incorporated in London with a capital stock of $6,000,000, of which all but $1,000,000 has been paid in. Their holdings are very large and valuable, including six hundred and forty acres comprising section 33, township 28, range 28; all of section 1, township 29, range 28; four hundred and eighty acres on section 25, township 28, range 27; three hundred and seventy acres on section 19, township 28, range 28; also lands in the Santa Maria and other fields.

GUSTAVUS SCHAMBLIN.—The possibilities which Bakersfield offers to men of ability and integrity appear in the successful business career of "Gus" Schamblin, president and general manager of the Pioneer Mercantile Company, president and a director of the Barker Investment Company, vice-president and a director of the Successus Oil Company operating in the McKittrick field, and secretary and a director of the Mannel-Minor Petroleum Company operating a tract of two hundred acres on Bellridge front. The growth of the Pioneer Mercantile Company has been little short of remarkable and indicates the business qualifications of its promoter. When he opened the business in 1899 he rented a building, 12x14 in dimensions, on Chester avenue between Seventeenth and Eighteenth streets. Soon he was forced to seek larger quarters. His next location was on the corner of Twentieth and I streets. From there he soon moved to a larger place on Nineteenth between H and I streets. Forced to secure still larger quarters, in 1905 he secured space on I street between Nineteenth and Twentieth, double the size of his original space, the building being 66x80 feet in dimensions, with a basement 66x200 for storage purposes. Having again outgrown his quarters Mr. Schamblin found it necessary to secure larger space, and in March, 1913, concluded the lease of a new concrete building on the corner of Twentieth and I streets. Here he has the entire basement, first floor and mezzanine floor, the building covering a floor space 72x116 feet, and being equipped with every modern convenience and elevator service.

Born at Waldenburg, Switzerland, August 30, 1855, Mr. Schamblin and his sister, Mrs. Selina Tschude, now of Waldenburg, were the only children of the late Mathias and Eliza (Schneider) Schamblin, lifelong residents of that part of Switzerland, where for thirty-five years before his death the father served by continuous re-election as county clerk of Waldenburg. The only son was educated in the local high school and gymnasium and after graduating at the age of eighteen began an apprenticeship in a large watch factory at Waldenburg, but later he studied bookkeeping and business correspondence in German and French. Coming to the United States in 1877 he spent a year in New York City and there enlisted as a private in Company B, Twentieth United States Infantry. With his command he spent two years at Fort Gibson in the Indian Territory. From there he was transferred with his regiment to Fort Assinniboine, Mont., where he was detailed as adjutant's clerk with the rank and commission of sergeant. In 1883 he was honorably discharged from the army. From the fort in Montana he came to California and secured employment on the bay at San Francisco. The year 1886 found him a newcomer in Bakersfield, where for a number of years he filled clerical positions. During 1892 he entered the employ of the Kern County Land Company as warehouse man in the Sumner warehouse. The faithful discharge of duties led to his promotion to be foreman of that warehouse, from which he was raised to the position of superintendent of all the company's warehouses in the county. Resigning from the employ of the Kern County Land Company in 1899, he embarked in business for himself in a small room, then and there laying the foundation of the now prosperous Pioneer Mercantile Company, which he incorporated in 1911 with a capital stock of $150,000. The company now ranks among the largest and most successful of the kind in the county. Mr. Schamblin is interested in the First National Bank of Bakersfield, and since its organization has been a stockholder in the Security Trust Company.

The marriage of Mr. Schamblin and Miss Florence Smith, a native of Hollister, this state, was solemnized in Bakersfield and has been blessed with four children, Frank, Charles, Flora and Leo. The Merchants' Association numbers Mr. Schamblin among its leading members. Formerly he served as a member of the executive committee of the Bakersfield Board of Trade and he still maintains a warm interest in the welfare of that organization. Politically he votes with the Republican party. For some years he has been identified with Bakersfield Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E. While serving with the army in the Indian Territory he was made a Mason in Alpha Lodge No. 12 at Fort Gibson. Since coming to this city he has transferred his membership to Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., besides which he is connected with Kern Valley Chapter No. 75, R. A. M., Bakersfield Commandery No. 39, K. T., in his home city, and Al Malaikah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles, as well as Los Angeles Consistory No. 3, Scottish Rite.

WILLIAM S. BOGGS.—The genealogy of the Boggs family in America begins with the arrival of six brothers from Scotland and their subsequent settlement in Maryland, Alabama, Illinois and Missouri. The first of the name to establish himself and family in California was Hon. Lilburn W. Boggs, ex-Governor of Missouri, who shortly after the expiration of his term in the gubernatorial chair determined to identify his future interests with the development of the then unknown west. As chief executive of Missouri he had witnessed many stormy scenes and often had been in great personal danger, the principal cause of the trouble having been the colonization of Mormons in the state after they had been driven from Hancock county, Ill., where they had erected a temple at Nauvoo on the banks of the Mississippi. Not being desired in Missouri, they were notified to leave and apparently obeyed orders, but soon returned. Then it became necessary to use force in driving them from the state. In the skirmish Lieutenant-Governor Sterling Price was killed. In the excitement and turmoil that followed the governor was shot while seated in his office in the Missouri state capital. The wound, although painful, did not prove dangerous and he had fully recovered before he started for the west. After his arrival at Petaluma Mission, Sonoma county, he served as alcalde of the northern district of California and engaged in merchandising at Sonoma, then the county-seat of Sonoma county. His death occurred in 1863. After the death of his first wife, who was a Miss Dent, he had married Miss Panthia G. Boone of Missouri, a daughter of Jesse Boone and granddaughter of Daniel Boone, the famous Indian fighter, whose name is indissolubly associated with the history of both Kentucky and Missouri.

Among the children of Governor Boggs there was a son, William M., a native of Jackson county, Mo., who inherited the love of adventure and the fearlessness characteristic of his ancestors. Intrepidity of nature led him to the plains when only thirteen years of age. While acting as a guide and helper to Kit Carson he learned the different tribal languages of the Indians, gained a thorough knowledge of their customs and became an adept in circumventing their cunning devices. During the early days he was employed at Fort Laramie, Toas and Santa Fe, where his expertness with the rifle and familiarity with the tribal dialects brought him the friendship of the Indians. After his return to Missouri he married Miss Sonora Hickman, a native of Cass county, that state, and the daughter of William Hickman, who had been a large planter in Virginia prior to his removal to Missouri. Early in 1845 Mr. Boggs started with family and friends across the plains and en route overtook a party from Sangamon county, Ill., consisting, among others, of Jacob Donner with wife and seven children, and George Donner with wife and five children, who had left Springfield, Ill., April 15, 1845. The two parties traveled together with William M. Boggs as captain. The expedition reached the Little Sandy river on the 19th of July, 1846, and there a discussion arose as to the best route to follow. The Donner party had heard of a cut-off by way of the south end of Salt Lake and believed by taking it they could save over two hundred miles. Captain Boggs would not risk that route, but resolved to adhere to the Oregon trail. As the event proved, he chose wisely and well. When he found the Donner party determined to take the other road he divided provisions and equipment equally with them and brought his own party safely on to the old fort at Petaluma Mission, Sonoma county. Meanwhile the Donner party had met with misfortune from the moment of separation. Their cattle, some dead and others lost, were left on the desert. After a wearisome journey through Utah and Nevada they were imprisoned in the snows of the Sierra Nevadas, where many perished from starvation. When finally rescuers arrived George Donner was dying and his wife refused to leave his side, but bade her children a last farewell as they were carried away toward the far-distant haven of Sutter's Fort.

The Boggs family had been in California but a short time when hostilities arose with Mexico. As soon as Captain Boggs had settled his family in comfort he enlisted eight recruits and with them journeyed to the old Plaza in San Francisco, where the men were added to a company then forming and sent to Monterey, where the captain served as first sergeant. At the close of the war he was honorably discharged and thereafter was variously employed, acting as secretary to General Vallejo and as recorder of Sonoma county, also engaging in general farming and fruit-raising. Besides owning a part of the old Buena Vista grant, he owned a large tract in the Oak Knoll district, Napa county, where now stand Yountville and the Soldiers' Home. The comfortable dwelling-house, erected under his supervision, was located on that beautiful spot. After he had sold a portion of the large ranch to Mr.

Yount he established a home at Napa and there spent his last years, but died April 22, 1910, while visiting his son at Bakersfield. A Mason from early life, he had been a member of the old California Lodge at Sonoma. Prominent in the state councils of the Democratic party and a leader during the memorable Hearst campaign, he had at one time officiated as chairman of the state central committee and throughout the entire commonwealth he long wielded a large influence in his party. Nor was his ability limited to agriculture and politics. Notwithstanding his almost entire lack of early education, he became a man of literary talent and was well known by his contributions to the literature of his day. Particularly was he interested in early California history and his excellent memory, supplementing a fluent use of the pen, enabled him to give permanency to many early happenings that without him would have been unrecorded and forgotten. In Bancroft's history of California his contributions are especially numerous and interesting, and all his stories are told in a very interesting, realistic manner. For many years he served as president of the Sonoma County Association of California Pioneers and among its members he was highly honored and greatly admired.

The family of William M. Boggs comprised seven children, whose mother died in Napa county in 1902. The eldest child, Guadelupe Vallejo, born in June of 1847 at the headquarters of General Vallejo, is now a resident of Salem, Ore. Lilburn W. is living at Susanville, Cal., and Angus M. in Lake county. Mary Finley Boggs, a graduate of Napa College and Napa Ladies' Seminary, was for eighteen years librarian at Napa, dying in that city, where she was known as an artist of remarkable ability. Jefferson D. Boggs is now principal of the schools of Watsonville, this state. Sterling Price Boggs died when only eight years of age. The youngest member of the family, William S. Boggs, was born in the Yountville district, Napa county, Cal., August 19, 1864, and in boyhood was a pupil in the Oak Mound school, Napa. He is a graduate of Napa College and also took a course at Heald's Business College. After a brief period as a clerk at Napa he went to Portland, Ore., where he was employed as a bookkeeper and also engaged in merchandising. Upon his return to California in 1888 he engaged in business in San Francisco, but soon went back to Oregon and found employment at Salem, thence returning to Portland in 1891 and acting as bookkeeper in the East Portland Bank. When next he went to San Francisco in 1894 he engaged as accountant with the Iron Mountain Company, going to Shasta as manager of the purchasing department in their general offices. Later he held a position with the Sunset Telephone Company. When he came to Bakersfield in 1900 he took charge of the properties of the Imperial Oil Company and the 33-Oil Company in the Kern river field. Under his management the organizations were prospered and their wells became producers. When the properties were sold to an English syndicate he continued to manage them for two years, but in March of 1912 resigned in order that he might take charge of his individual interests. Previous to this he had promoted the Alturas Oil Company in the Kern river field; after one well had been developed, the holdings of this company were sold. In addition he organized the Boston Petroleum Company in the Kern river field, which developed twelve wells and then sold its holdings to Boston capitalists. Afterward he formed and promoted the Coalinga Eight Oil Company in the Coalinga field, which owns a tract of eighty acres and has developed three producing wells. Besides being vice-president of this company he acts as general manager and has been instrumental in its profitable development.

The family of Mr. Boggs comprises his wife, who was Miss Nellie Smith, a native of Shasta county, and their three children, Irma, Helen and William S., Jr. Upon the organization of the Bakersfield Club he was a charter member and afterwards served one term as president. After coming to Bakersfield he was made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., and later became identified with Los Angeles Consistory No. 3 of the jurisdiction of Southern California, Scottish Rite, thirty-second degree, and Al Malaikah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles. In politics he has been staunch in his allegiance to Democratic principles. For eight years he was a member of Company G, First Regiment of Oregon National Guard, and after returning to California he became identified with Company H, Second Regiment of National Guard, with which he served in San Francisco during the strike of 1894 when called out to assist in quelling the outbreak and restoring order.

Christian Ruedy

CHRISTIAN RUEDY.—In Zillis, Canton Graubunden, Switzerland, Christian Ruedy was born June 24, 1872, fourth in a family of five born to John and Anna (Thoeny) Ruedy, farmers, the former of whom passed away in 1889, and the latter in 1902. Christian Ruedy received good training in the public and high schools of his native place, all of which was received prior to his seventeenth year, for it was then that he left his native land and came to the United States. In April, 1890, he came to Kern county, and in Bakersfield he procured work in a dairy. Profiting by the experience which this employment gave him, in the year 1897, with Peter Gilli as a partner, he leased one hundred and sixty acres from Mrs. Chubb. In 1900, associated with his brother, John G. Ruedy, and his uncle, Anton Thoeny, he bought forty acres of land that forms a part of his present property, upon which he established a dairy business. Later the brothers bought out their uncle and in 1904 they bought eighty acres more. During this period, Mr. Ruedy with his brother John G., Peter Gilli and John Koch, organized the American-Swiss Creamery and built a modern creamery plant on his place operated by a steam engine. Here they engaged in the manufacture of butter for the Bakersfield market for about six years, when the dairy herd was sold and Christian Ruedy then engaged in raising mules. Ultimately he purchased his brother's interest in the property and he now owns the entire tract, comprising one hundred and twenty acres, which is all in a high state of cultivation, planted to corn and alfalfa. The raising of mules is also an important feature of the ranch income, Mr. Ruedy owning Blue Bird, a jack imported from Maltese Island, Spain. The ranch, which lies about nine miles southwest of Bakersfield, is all under irrigation from the Farmers canal, and is improved with a handsome residence and large farm buildings.

In Bakersfield, on October 2, 1907, Mr. Ruedy was married to Adeline Ursula Pesante, a native daughter born in Bakersfield, in December, 1890, the daughter of John and Adeline (Lehner) Pesante, both natives of Canton Graubunden, Switzerland. Mr. and Mrs. Ruedy are the parents of two children, John Christian and Vernon Lehner. Mr. Ruedy is widely known in fraternal circles, being a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Woodmen of the World and the Independent Order of Eagles. In their religious views Mr. and Mrs. Ruedy are Lutherans, while politically they favor Republican principles.

PERCY A. WILLIAMS.—In comprehensive grasp of technicalities and keen insight into the intricate problems connected with the oil industry the field superintendent of the Kern Trading and Oil Company has gained a reputation that is not limited to the particular field of his effort, but extends throughout the entire oil district and among men connected with other lines of business as well. The property of the company, usually known as the Southern Pacific lease, comprises four hundred and forty acres lying on section 3, township 29, range 28, located very close to the Ellwood lease on the Thomas A. Means farm where oil was first discovered. On the entire tract there are two hundred and seven producing wells which have been drilled as follows: Fifty-seven prior to 1906; seventy-three in 1906 and 1907; eight in 1910; thirty-four during 1911; and thirty-five in 1912. Well

No. 1 was completed December 8, 1899 and, although the oldest well on the lease, is still a producer.

Born at South Vallejo, Solano county, Cal., on Christmas day of 1881, Percy A. Williams is a son of Alton and Kate (Cuilom) Williams, natives respectively of New York and Pennsylvania. The father is an employe of the company store of the Kern Trading and Oil Company and here he and his wife make their home, the latter a woman of capability, energy and activity, and at the age of sixty-six physically and mentally well preserved. The son received his education in San Francisco schools. In youth he was a member of the state militia and in the spring of 1898 he enlisted as a private in Company B, First California Volunteer Infantry, which sailed for the Philippines on the 23d of May and landed at Cavite on the 2d of July. During the thirteen months of his service on the islands he took part in the siege of Manila, the insurrection of the Filipinos and other army affairs. When peace was restored he was mustered out of the service and arrived back in San Francisco September 21, 1899. Shortly afterward he entered the California School of Mechanical Arts, an institution affiliated with the James Lick Polytechnic College, in San Francisco, and upon the completion of the regular course he was graduated in 1901. Securing a position as draftsman in the office of Stetson G. Hindes, of San Francisco, he had six months of valuable experience there. In addition he engaged in drafting with the engineer of the City Street Improvement Company of San Francisco and for a time was under James T. Ludlow in the Vulcan iron works.

After his arrival in Kern county in November of 1901 Mr. Williams took charge of the 1901 Oil Company at McKittrick. During 1904 he became an office man with the Kern Trading and Oil Company and in 1906 he was placed in charge of the McKittrick field, which he relinquished in order to undertake the superintendency of the Kern river oil lease in 1909. Since then he has established a reputation for drilling more wells than any other foreman in the oil fields. The ingenuity which he possesses has found tangible evidence in a pumping-jack system by which as many as thirty wells are pumped from one central power-house. It is his present plan to introduce the same system throughout the entire field. His ability is unquestioned and being an indefatigable worker, with a thorough grasp of all details, he manages the property with a skill and tact that are little short of remarkable. Fraternally he is connected with the Masons and Elks at Bakersfield. In 1906 at McKittrick, he married Miss Gertrude Bishop, of Oregon, who died in 1909, leaving two daughters, Kathleen and Gertrude.

JOHN J. GALLMAN.—Through various changes and in different localities he gained a thorough experience with every phase and each department of the industry. In the early days of Taft he came to the Midway field, where since February of 1909 he has engaged as superintendent of the Fairbanks Oil Company, a corporation capitalized at $50,000 and operating a tract of forty acres with six producing wells. Under Ben Stroude, the first superintendent of the lease, one well had been drilled, but this is now abandoned, and the six wells in use, producing an average of ten thousand barrels per month, have been drilled under the personal supervision of Mr. Gallman, who in addition to being superintendent is also a small stockholder in the company.

Although he has lived in California for considerably more than twenty years, Mr. Gallman is a native of Iowa and a member of a German-American family connected with the agricultural upbuilding of the Mississippi valley. His father, John Jacob Gallman, a native of Germany and a pioneer of Iowa, enlisted in the Union army at the outbreak of the Civil war, was assigned to the First Minnesota Infantry, accompanied his regiment to the front and served throughout the war. Upon receiving an honorable discharge he returned to the northwest, took up land in Bremer county, Iowa, there married Miss Catharine Zimmerman, and for years devoted himself to agricultural duties. At his death he was survived by the widow, now a resident of Waverly, Iowa, and by three children, viz.: John J.; Ida and Anna, both of whom married farmers and are living in Bremer county. The only son was born in Bremer county September 25, 1869, worked on the home farm as soon as old enough to be of service and during the winter months walked between four and five miles to a country school. Leaving home in 1888, he came to California, where he successively had employment in lumber yards and with grading crews in Pasadena, on a dairy ranch at El Monte and as a laborer on a stock ranch at Puente. The owner of the ranch, Mr. Roland, in 1889 sent him to work as a roustabout for the Puente Oil Company in Los Angeles county and in that way he acquired his first knowledge of the oil industry. From roustabout he worked up to be pumper, then tool-dresser and finally driller. The company of which Mr. Roland was president engaged him to drill in the Puente field, but when the wells were shut down he was obliged to seek work elsewhere.

An opportunity to engage with Will Kellerman, a contract driller, took Mr. Gallman into a wild-cat venture in dry territory, but he continued with the same operator for perhaps seven years. Happening to meet Mr. Roland one day, he was asked to return to the Puente field, but intimated that he considered the chance for promotion there too meager, to which Mr. Roland replied: "Come back to me and you may yet get to be superintendent of the Puente." Accordingly, upon finishing a job at Newhall, he went back to the Puente field, where he was first drilling foreman and then superintendent. Two and one-half years later the Puente bought an adjoining oil lease and the management of the whole was given over to the superintendent of the company thus absorbed, whereupon Mr. Gallman became a real-estate dealer in Los Angeles. Not meeting with success, he returned to the oil business and for a time worked with the Union Oil Company near Lompoc and at Santa Maria. In the latter field he drilled on the celebrated Hartnell gusher. Next he operated a boarding house on the Union and Fox lease, after which he engaged in the restaurant business for six months in Los Angeles. The excellent profit made when he sold that restaurant was lost in the later operation of the Delmar Cafe at Long Beach. Forced to begin anew at the bottom, he returned to the oil fields and drilled at Santa Rosa and for the Paso Robles Oil Company. Since February of 1909 he has been superintendent of the Fairbanks Oil Company in the Midway field and meanwhile has become well known among the oil men of Taft, where he is an interested member of the Petroleum Club. His marriage took place at Fullerton, this state, and united him with Miss Myrtle Sprague, whose father was at one time engaged in the grocery business at Fullerton, but now engages in the manufacture and sale of monuments at Los Angeles. Mr. and Mrs. Gallman have one son, Woodley J. Gallman.

REUBEN A. EDMONDS.—The expansion of the Bakersfield postoffice since Mr. Edmonds was first appointed postmaster under the administration of President McKinley has been almost startlingly swift and has offered another evidence concerning the prosperity and material upbuilding of the city. When he took the oath of office for the first time, July 12, 1898, he found a postoffice of the second-class, employing two clerks and having annual receipts not exceeding $9,000. Since then he has continued in the office by appointments under Presidents Roosevelt and Taft and meanwhile he has witnessed and aided in the development of the local business, until now it affords him gratification to report that as a first-class office the annual receipts reach $65,000 and employment is furnished to thirty-two persons. Free delivery was established in the city in 1900 and four years later rural free delivery was started, there being now six routes out of Bakersfield, each one with a substantial list of patrons. The office was promoted to the first class in July of 1910, at which time the genial, successful postmaster was the recipient of merited congratulations from those familiar with his work and appreciative of his energetic application to official duties. There has lately been added the postal savings bank and the parcel post system, this postoffice being the depository for all the postal savings banks in Kern county.

Born near Eugene, Lane county, Ore., in 1859, Reuben A. Edmonds is a son of William and Adeline (Draper) Edmonds, and a grandson of Reuben A. Draper, an Illinois pioneer who, accompanied by relatives and friends, crossed the plains with wagons and oxen and settled in Oregon, where he developed raw lands in Lane county. Eventually he came to California and passed his last days in Sonoma county. William Edmonds, a native of Carlisle, Cumberland county, Pa., and a pioneer of Illinois, came to the Pacific coast with his father-in-law and settled near him in Oregon, where he developed a large farm. However, he was not satisfied with conditions in Lane county, so he packed his household effects, put his wife and children in a "prairie schooner" and drove along the coast route into California, crossing the mountains and settling near Sebastopol, Sonoma county. That was in 1867 and the next year his wife died at Sebastopol. Afterward he drifted into Nevada and followed mining pursuits. The same occupation engaged his attention when he returned to California. In 1906 he was accidentally drowned in the Kern river. Of his three sons the eldest, Reuben A., is the sole survivor; the others, William and Joseph, both died in Bakersfield. The three daughters were Mrs. Rachael Maio, Mrs. Lavina Kratzmer, both of Bakersfield, and Mrs. Mary Burgin, who died in Portland, Ore.

Reuben A. Edmonds accompanied the others from Oregon to California in 1867 and settled in Sonoma county, but during 1874 removed to Napa. In 1880 he was graduated from the Napa high school and the following year he completed the course of study in the commercial department of Napa College, after which he came at once to Bakersfield in 1881. Here he embarked in the dry-goods business on Chester avenue near Eighteenth street as a member of the firm of Hotz & Edmonds. The business continued with fair success until the great fire of 1889, which caused him a heavy loss. Forced to start anew, he secured employment as a bookkeeper and continued in that capacity until he was appointed postmaster at Bakersfield. Besides this office he also served as city assessor for one term. Fraternally he is a charter member of the Knights of Pythias in Bakersfield (in which he has served in important offices) and also belongs to the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. After he had established a home in Bakersfield he formed domestic ties, being united in marriage with Miss Lizzie L. Hallet, a native of Napa, this state. They are the parents of two children, Shirlie and Reubelle, both of whom are now students in the Notre Dame College at San Francisco.

JOHN A. GARDNER.—The Gardner family possesses qualities that bring success in the oil industry. A brother of John A., Eugene, is a tool-dresser for the Midway Premier, while their father, the late Daniel Gardner, was an expert driller and well-known oil operator, following the business principally in his native Pennsylvania, although often called temporarily to other places to aid in the drilling of wells. By his marriage to Margaret Mays, likewise now deceased, there were two sons and four daughters. Of these John A. was born in Emlenton, Venango county, Pa., March 20, 1873, and at an early age learned the oil business under the capable oversight of his father, with whom he worked both as a tool-dresser and driller in Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana. For seven years his father engaged with the Burmah Oil Company in India and during five years of that time John A. worked with him, going out to India in 1900 via Liverpool, Port Said and the Suez canal to Rangoon, and traveling inland a distance of five hundred miles. After five years of steady work as a driller, without rest or vacation, he returned to the United States, pleased to again identify himself with the business under more favorable conditions than existed in India. After an unsuccessful venture in the buying of wells at Geneva, Ind., in 1908 he came to California and engaged in drilling for the Standard Oil Company at Newhall, from which place in 1910 he came to the Midway. After having drilled two wells for the Midway Five Oil Company, he began to drill for the Midway Premier Oil Company and in 1911 became its superintendent, which responsible position he since has filled with credit to himself and most fortunate results for the company. His family consists of three daughters, Margaret, Edna and Mary, and his wife, whom he married in Toledo, Ohio, and who was formerly Miss Frances Cook, of that city.

Thomas A. Means

THOMAS A. MEANS.—A good history of California would not be complete without the name of Thomas A. Means, who, through his discovery of oil in Kern River field and his long identification with that industry, became known as the "Apostle of Petroleum." He owned a small ranch near Kern river, and being a man of much learning, natural intelligence and close observation, he early became convinced in his own mind that that territory was underlaid with oil. Accordingly he talked oil to everyone who would listen to him and was naturally ridiculed by many, but firm in his belief he continued to deliver himself of his convictions on the streets of Bakersfield and no argument would dissuade him from his ideas.

It was after some experience in the McKittrick field that Judson Ellwood came to Bakersfield, where a brother, James Monroe Ellwood, had a small woodyard. During a conversation on the subject of oil the latter told his brother that he had heard of the Tom Means ranch and how Means had for years foretold the coming great era of oil. Subsequently James Monroe Ellwood went to Mr. Means to talk about cutting some wood, but the latter immediately changed the subject to his favorite topic of oil, and so enthusiastic was he on the subject, that Ellwood leased a portion of the ranch for oil and induced his father, Jonathan Ellwood, to come to Bakersfield. The two then began to dig for oil, and that in the true sense of the word, as they were obliged to use the only tools they had—an ordinary shovel and a hand auger. In May, 1899, they started work on the north bank of the Kern river about seven miles from Bakersfield, beginning the rude well under the edge of the cliff. They went down with the hand auger seventy-five feet, when they struck good oil indications. Then they secured a steam rig and at three hundred and forty-three feet they drilled into oil, whereupon young Ellwood rushed to Tom Means and shouted: "Your prophecy has been fulfilled!" But Means only smiled and said, "I knew it was there." However, in that moment, through his faith and preaching, Tom Means had brought to California a new oil field, whose vastness and wealth have astonished the world.

Mr. Means was a native of New Brunswick, November 9, 1840, being the date of his birth. Receiving an excellent educational training in youth he possessed a special fondness for the study of languages, and he was able to speak all the Latin tongues, or as it has been said of him, he was able to keep silent in many languages. As early as 1868 he came to Bakersfield, which then boasted of one house, that of Colonel Baker, and one store, that of Mr. Chester. During 1871-72 he worked in Inyo county, but returning to Kern county he began to ranch and raise stock, acquiring later a farm of two hundred and fifteen acres. It was during the early '80s that Mr.

Means first discovered oil indications in Kern county on the south bank of the Kern river on section three, 29-28, and it was entirely due to his steadfast refusal to be discouraged in his endeavor to interest capital and promote enthusiasm that the oil industry was developed in this community. At the time of his death, which occurred in Mercy hospital August 4, 1912, Mr. Means owned considerable real estate in Bakersfield and San Francisco.

TERENCE B. McMANUS.—As early as 1876 Mr. McManus first came to the west and spent a short time in San Francisco. Again in 1902 he visited that city, but returned to his Minnesota home after a brief vacation. During 1912 he was called to Bakersfield by the demise of his brother, the late Thomas A. Means, and being himself the nearest surviving relative he was named as administrator of the estate. Having therefore business interests here and being pleased with the appearance of this lively, prosperous city he determined to bring his family hither and establish a home. Since doing so he has become interested in the real-estate business and also has acquired farming interests.

A son of Terence and Thirza (Brownell) McManus, T. B. McManus was born in Westmoreland county, N. B., May 22, 1849. During boyhood he attended the common schools and aided in the work on the home farm. After leaving home he became connected with a mercantile business and also engaged in contracting at Memramcook, N. B. Removing to Minnesota during 1883 he settled near Crookston, purchased land and improved a large farm in the Red River valley, where he engaged extensively in wheat-growing and passed many busy, useful years. Meanwhile in 1893 President Cleveland appointed him deputy collector of internal revenue for the Ninth congressional district, embracing a territory three hundred miles in length. For five years he discharged the duties of that responsible position. In 1905 Governor John A. Johnson appointed him a member of the board of grain appeal of Minnesota, with headquarters in Duluth. At the expiration of his first term in 1907 he was again chosen for the same post and in 1909 he was reappointed, the last appointment bearing date of September 13, 1909, having been the last official act of Governor Johnson before his fatal illness. After five years on the board he retired in July of 1910, leaving a record of creditable and honorable service to the farmers of Minnesota. Subsequent to his retirement he continued to make Duluth his home until April, 1912, when he came to Bakersfield on business matters and shortly thereafter he established a home in this city. His family consists of his wife, formerly Miss Helen Hachey, of New Brunswick, and their five children, Thomas W., Loretta, Lucile, Arthur and Charles, all yet remaining at home, and the eldest being now associated with his father in the real-estate business as T. B. McManus & Son, having established their offices in the Bank of Bakersfield building, where they already have a large clientele.

MRS. WALTER WRIGHT.—Mrs. Wright is the elder of two daughters of the late William Millen, a drilling contractor in the oil fields of West Virginia and at Marietta, Ohio. By his marriage to Mary St. Clair he became the father of two daughters, Agnes F. and Edith. The latter is the wife of Lloyd Halsell, a druggist at Jamestown, N. Y., where Mrs. Millen also makes her home. After having graduated from the Holy Angels' Academy, an institution for girls, at Buffalo, N. Y., Agnes F. Millen entered the Nurses' Training School connected with the hospital of the Johns Hopkins University at Baltimore, Md. The best professional opportunities awaited her there and of these she availed herself to the fullest extent. Having graduated from the training school with the class of 1902, she returned to New York state and engaged in professional work at Jamestown and Buffalo. For a time she was employed in the Sisters' Hospital at Meadville, Pa.

Another important position was held in the Municipal hospital at Jamestown. Later she engaged in private nursing at Bradford, Pa., and in that city formed the acquaintance of Walter Wright, to whom she was married at Olean, Cattaraugus county, N. Y. Ever since her marriage she has pursued her professional duties. During November of 1912 she came to Taft with Mr. Wright, who is a surveyor, now engaged in the Midway oil fields. Upon the opening of the hospital May 2, 1913, she became superintendent and general manager and since then she has devoted herself to the discharge of the duties of the position, which she fills with recognized capability and executive sagacity.

GENERAL HOSPITAL OF TAFT.—The General hospital of Taft, financed and erected under the supervision of M. W. Pascoe, M. D., and opened to the public May 2, 1913, has entered upon its history of useful service to humanity under the capable oversight of Mrs. Walter Wright as general manager. The modern equipment of the hospital, the sanitary conditions rigidly observed, the services of graduate nurses and of a trained dietitian bespeak a most earnest and sincere purpose to surround the patients with skilled attendants and scientific supervision. The building contains fifteen rooms and is so arranged as to furnish accommodations for twenty-five patients. For convenience and comfort a hall was built through the entire length of the hospital, rendering possible a free circulation of air that mitigates the heat of summer. On the left as the visitor enters the building is the reception room, furnished in mission style and decorated in soft shades of green and brown soothing and restful to the eye. The handsome clock on the wall of this room was the gift of A. T. Connard. On the right of the entrance is the operating room, finished in pure white and equipped with the most modern surgical appliances.

The spacious hall terminates in the dining room and diet kitchen, off which the nurses and hospital staff have their quarters. A screened porch, large enough for perhaps eight beds, will be used to accommodate patients who prefer the open air. In connection with the other conveniences there is a laboratory where all prescriptions are compounded. While the hospital was made possible almost wholly through the energy and progressive spirit of Dr. Pascoe, other physicians are invited to take their patients there and the utmost courtesy is shown to all. Besides Mrs. Wright there are three graduate nurses, Miss Julia Trabuca, Mrs. Catherine Spann and Mrs. Agnes Marlin. The two first-named are graduates of the Los Angeles city and county hospital, while Mrs. Marlin comes from the Post-Graduate hospital of Chicago. Mrs. Lora Dennison, of Santa Cruz, has been engaged as dietitian and prepares the food for the patients in accordance with the most modern laws of science and sanitation.

HIPPOLYTE SEINTURIER.—A resident of Kern county since 1901 and a prosperous sheepman since 1904, Mr. Seinturier was born at Ancel, Hautes-Alpes, France, in June, 1877, being the youngest in a family of eight children, six now living, whose parents, Martin and Hippolyte (Espitallier) Seinturier, have been lifelong farmers in France. As a boy he was taught the rudiments of agriculture as conducted in France. From an early age he was familiar with farming and stock-raising. Upon leaving home in 1901 he came to California and at Delano joined a brother, Joseph, who years before had established himself in Kern county. Under the oversight of the elder brother the young emigrant learned the sheep business as followed in this part of the world. For a year he helped the brother in the herding of a flock of sheep. Later he worked for other sheepmen. During 1904 he bought a small flock of sheep and started in the business for himself. Ever since then he has ranged his flocks in the vicinity of Delano and in the Tehachapi region. In the main he has been successful. His flock has increased in size and has been maintained in health, so that he is well satisfied with the results of his California venture. Since becoming a citizen of our country he has voted the Republican ticket. At Los Angeles, in June of 1908, he married Miss Marie Borel, who was born at Ancel, France, and came to Kern county in 1907. There are three children of the union, Berthe, Martha and Edna. During 1912 Mr. Seinturier bought a modern residence on the corner of Humboldt and Tulare streets in East Bakersfield and here the family have since made their home.

ROMULUS ORCIER was born in Bussard, Hautes-Alpes, France, where he received his education in the public schools, remaining on the home farm until 1890. In that year he migrated to San Francisco and the same year came to Delano, Kern county, where he found employment with his brothers, Fred and Theophil Orcier, who were owners of large flocks of sheep on Poso creek. Two years later he bought a band of sheep, ranging them in Kern and Inyo counties. He was successful in the venture, but in 1905 sold his sheep and the same year opened the Pioneer hotel at Famoso, of which he has since been the proprietor. He also built and opened a livery stable for the accommodation of travelers.

On August 5, 1903, in East Bakersfield, occurred the marriage of Mr. Orcier with Miss Marie Morel, a native daughter of Los Angeles, the daughter of Jullien Morel, a pioneer stockman of Southern California and afterwards of Kern county. Mr. and Mrs. Orcier are the parents of three children, Clementine, Julia and Romulus, Jr. Fraternally he is an active member of Aerie No. 93, F. O. E., in Bakersfield. He is a Republican.

CHARLES FRANK HABERKERN.—Although from his earliest recollections a resident of California, Mr. Haberkern claims Illinois as his native commonwealth and was born in Princeton, August 26, 1865. The death of his father, Charles, who had been an industrious farmer of that locality, occurred during the infancy of the son, who thereafter became the charge of his aunt, Mrs. George Zimmerman. The latter had accompanied her husband to California in 1850 and at the expiration of their tedious journey across the plains had settled in Sonoma county, taking up agricultural pursuits in that section. During 1865 they returned to Illinois for their orphaned nephew and in December of that year brought him to California, where he was reared partly on a farm in Sonoma county and partly in San Francisco. For some years he attended the Lincoln school, on Market and Fifth streets, San Francisco, and upon leaving school he began to learn the butcher's trade in that city, where he remained until he had acquired a thorough knowledge of the occupation. While following the trade he engaged to some extent in the buying and selling of cattle.

Coming to Bakersfield in 1888, three years later Mr. Haberkern became interested in the raising of grain and stock in the Tejon district and continued there until 1897, when he bought property on Kern Island. Although since 1908 he has maintained his residence in Bakersfield, he still owns the ranch and superintends it personally, this being possible through the fact that the tract of ninety acres lies only three miles from the city. Alfalfa is the principal product grown and this, instead of being sold, is fed to the horses and mules that are raised there for the markets. The excellent condition of the property and its profitable maintenance reflect credit upon the owner, who is considered a skilled stockman and capable farmer. Since coming to Bakersfield he became one of the original stockholders in the Security Trust Company. The Bakersfield Club numbers him among its well-known members.

A pioneer in the oil industry, Mr. Haberkern dates his connection with the Kern county fields from 1899. During that year he became interested in property at the present site of Maricopa. With others he formed a company that put down a well and struck oil in paying quantities at a depth of five hundred and nineteen feet, this being the first well brought in on the flat. Two other wells were then put down. The venture proved profitable and the company later sold at a profit. Since then Mr. Haberkern has continued in the development of oil lands in North Midway and from the organization of the Eight Oil Company has been a director and stockholder. While his success in oil operations has been excellent and now gives him financial independence, it is abundantly merited by his arduous labors during the incipency of the industry. When first he began to drill wells water was so scarce that it was the custom for the men to drive two miles with a team and tank and with buckets dip the water to fill the tank. It was then brought to the well, so that the work might be continued without delay. If any break occurred in the machinery he would start at once, night or day, for Bakersfield, a drive of forty-five miles, in order that repairs might be secured at once, and there were many times when he started on these long trips at midnight. Drinking-water was brought to the lease by their teams from the mountains, costing them about $1.25 per barrel. Those were days of hardship, privation and unceasing labor, but he has seen the reward of his efforts and is now enjoying the fruits of his toil.

Wm. M. Somers

WILLIAM MILES HOUSER.—The immediate cause of Mr. Houser's removal to this place from the Santa Clara valley, where he had enjoyed a long and successful identification with the Palo Alto ranch, was the fact that a brother, A. W. Houser, had become a resident of the place, had acquired a livery stable and hotel business here and was meeting with results so encouraging that the incentive to join him was sufficient to bring about his departure from the more northerly section of the state. Nor did he ever have reason to regret the decision to cast in his lot with Kern county, for as president of the Amber Oil Company, as supervisor of the first district and as owner of mines around Randsburg, he reaped the benefit of a prosperity that marked this section of the country and at the same time was instrumental in promoting the welfare of the people of his district.

Born in Pittsburgh, Pa., January 27, 1865, William Miles Houser came to California at the age of six years and settled with his parents at Stockton, where he attended school until fifteen years of age. The father, William, a native of Pennsylvania, had been a coal miner in that state from early life until the failure of his health necessitated a complete change of occupation and of climate. Thereupon he came to California, but he was benefited only temporarily. His death occurred in April of 1875. The mother, who bore the maiden name of Barbara Schwagard, was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., December 12, 1833, and still makes her home in San Joaquin county.

Upon leaving school and taking up for himself the problem of self-support, William Miles Houser secured employment on a stock ranch owned by G. W. Trahern, for whom he worked during the following six years. Meanwhile the care of stock, their needs and moneyed values became as an open book to him. As a judge of animals he established an enviable reputation in his locality and when the ranch where he had labored was sold to the trustees of the Leland Stanford University he was invited to remain in the capacity of stock-trainer and superintendent of one of the ranch departments, later as foreman of the ranch. In appreciation of his faithful and intelligent services he was paid excellent wages. For eighteen years he remained on the Palo Alto ranch, relinquishing the position eventually in 1900 that he might cast his fortunes in with those of the mining community of Randsburg, where the following year he bought the livery stable and leased the hotel owned by his brother, A. W. After he had conducted these two enterprises with success for two years, he gave up the hotel to continue the livery business and mining. Meanwhile he had acquired an interest in oil wells at Fellows, Kern county, and these wells by subsequent development became very valuable, so that he reaped financial benefit from an early and judicious investment. Besides acting as president of the Amber Oil Company, he was owner of the Houser group of mines, adjoining the Yellow Aster mine (the largest in the state of California). His holdings were further increased by the purchase of Easy Street mine at Randsburg. In addition he owned a tungsten mine in San Bernardino county and many other properties.

When only twenty-one years of age Mr. Houser became a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and later he enlarged his fraternal relations by identification with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks and the Eagles. As a staunch supporter of the Democratic party he was a leading local politician, while the larger interests of the county were promoted by his earnest service as supervisor of the first district, to which office he was elected in 1908. May 20, 1890, he married Miss Ella Goff, who was born at Stockton, this state, the daughter of Russell and Lucy (Phelps) Goff, natives of Michigan and Boston, Mass., respectively. In 1847, when a mere lad, Mr. Goff came via Panama to San Francisco. He remained in the state for a number of years after the discovery of gold, then returned east and in 1852 he again returned to California, becoming interested in mining and farming. He spent his last days with Mrs. Houser in Randsburg, where he died in 1907 aged seventy-seven years. Mrs. Goff came with her mother in 1852 via Panama to join her father, Capt. W. G. Phelps, who had brought a sailing vessel around Cape Horn to San Francisco in 1849. A man of force and determination, he became well known on the coast, especially in the vicinity of Stockton, where he had large ranch interests. Mrs. Goff who now makes her home in Los Angeles, was the mother of four children, all living. Mrs. Houser, who was the eldest, passed her childhood and obtained her education in the schools of Stockton.

To Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Houser were born eight children, namely: Ella May, deceased; Lillian, Mrs. F. E. Hill of Los Angeles; Ellen Geraldine, Mrs. F. P. Hill, of Los Angeles; M. Melvin, deceased; Edith Gertrude; William Miles, Jr.; Reginald Leland, deceased; and Wilma Elaine, who was born four months after her father's death. The death of Mr. Houser, August 11, 1912, removed from his community one of its most dependable citizens.

ANDREW C. SILVER.—Almost forty years intervened between the first visit of John F. Silver and his second removal to the western coast. During that long era many changes had been made. Railroads had spanned the continent, so that, instead of traveling with wagons and ox-teams, as in the first trip, he came speedily, surrounded by every comfort of modern travel. At the time of his first trip he was a young man and as yet unmarried. In the interim of his western trips he had married and reared a family, only one of whom, Andrew C., survives at the present writing. The father himself passed away in 1909 and his wife, who bore the maiden name of Mary Craig and was born in Indiana, now makes her home in Oklahoma, so that Andrew C. is the sole representative of the family on the western coast. The trade at which he is an expert, that of brick-laying, was the one which his father followed for years, first as a day laborer and later as a contractor. Not having gained a fortune in the California mines during the four years he engaged in that work, he returned to Michigan in 1853 and resumed the trade of bricklayer. He had removed to Michigan from his native New Hampshire and from Michigan he went to Illinois, where he became a brick contractor at Shelbyville. The next move took him to Kansas, where he settled at Winfield in 1879 and immediately became identified with the contracting business as a specialist in brick. From that place he came to California in 1887 and after two years in Los Angeles proceeded to Bakersfield, where he engaged at his trade as long as his health permitted.

The eldest among four children, Andrew C. Silver was born at Shelbyville, Shelby county, Ill., August 24, 1863, and remained in Illinois until sixteen years of age, meanwhile attending the grammar and high schools of his native city. During 1879 he accompanied his father to Kansas. His employment in that state was as a clerk. Going to Colorado in 1882 he learned the trade of bricklayer while employed with the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company. Two years later he returned to Winfield, Kan., to take up work at that occupation. With his father he removed to Los Angeles in 1887 and found employment in laying brick. During 1889 he became a resident of Bakersfield and here he since has built up an established reputation for skill in his chosen occupation. Entering the employ of C. J. Lindgren, he soon rose to be foreman and in that capacity he aided in the construction of a number of large buildings. Upon the removal of Mr. Lindgren to San Francisco in 1907 Mr. Silver purchased his outfit and ever since has engaged in contracting and building, meanwhile having charge of many important jobs, including the Sanger building, Druid's hall, Estribou residence and others. Ever since the organization of the Builders' Exchange he has been an interested worker, while politically he has maintained a warm interest in the principles of the Democratic party, which he always supports by ballot and influence. The family residence at No. 212 Eureka street is presided over by Mrs. Silver, who was Miss Adeline M. Jasper, a native of Santa Cruz, this state, but a resident of Bakersfield for a time prior to their marriage. They are the parents of four children, Andrew, Edna, Esther and Homer.

LEO G. PAULY.—The founder of the Pauly family in America was Antone, the son of a prosperous German merchant and himself of German birth and education, but after 1860 a resident of the United States and during the Civil war the proprietor of an omnibus line in Washington, D. C. The duties of his business necessitated his frequent travel through different sections of the country and in order that he might not be discommoded by delays he secured passes from General Miles and General Beauregard. With the aid of these indispensable papers, which now are in the possession of his only son, he was able to travel back and forth between the lines and at no time did he suffer delay or inconvenience. At the close of the war he sought the cheap lands of the Mississippi valley and was induced to settle at Nauvoo, in Hancock county, Ill., whence some years before the Mormons had been driven by citizens not in sympathy with their religious views. Before he had developed a farm into profitable condition he was obliged to leave owing to a pulmonary affection, for which physicians recommended the climate of California. Accompanied by his family he came to Los Angeles in 1869, but, securing no relief, he was advised to seek a higher altitude and in this way he first became associated with Kern county. The family secured a team and wagon and followed the customary path of travel to the Tehachapi pass, where, finding a suitable location at the desired elevation, they took up a tract of government land. Later adjacent property was purchased. Sheep and cattle were bought and a large industry developed, there being as many as three thousand sheep in the flock at one time. By thrift and wise management the father acquired seventeen hundred acres adjoining the village of Tehachapi and he laid out two additions to that town, where for five years he engaged in the butcher business. The climate enabled him to regain his health. He enjoyed many seasons of agricultural and business activity and became a man of note in his community. Finally, at an advanced age and after a life of usefulness, he passed away November 18, 1893. For many years he was survived by his wife, whose death occurred January 7, 1911, in Kern. Born and reared in Kulmbach, Germany, and known by the maiden name of Catherine Zink, she came to this country in young girlhood and was married at Washington, D. C.

Out of the nine children forming the parental family only three are now living, the two daughters being Mrs. Clara Parks of Los Angeles and Rose, Mrs. H. F. Keeler, of Lancaster, this state. The only son, Leo G., was born at Tehachapi, this county, July 26, 1875, and received his primary education in that village. During November of 1895 he was graduated from the San Jose State Normal, after which he became principal of the Tehachapi school and continued in the position for two years. When twenty-two years of age, in 1897, he was offered the principalship of the Kern school and accepted the post. At that time there were five teachers in a building of six rooms. As principal he advanced the standard of scholarship and made the school as thorough as any in the county. Other buildings were erected during his tenure of the office, including the Lincoln school of four rooms and the addition of four rooms and an assembly hall to the Washington school. When finally he resigned in March of 1909 he was at the head of a successful educational force of fourteen teachers with modern equipment and every facility for thorough work. Since June of 1896 he has been a member of the county board of education and for twelve years of this period he officiated as president of the board. Upon the consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern in July, 1910, he was chosen a member of the city board of education and at the regular election in April, 1911, he was again placed in this position.

Since relinquishing his educational work Mr. Pauly has been connected with the Ardizzi-Olcese Company of East Bakersfield, an incorporated concern and the oldest mercantile establishment in Kern county. Entering as manager in March of 1909, at the expiration of the first year he became financially interested and was elected secretary of the corporation.

The marriage of Mr. Pauly and Miss Essa Davis was solemnized in Tehachapi and has been blessed with three children, Harold, Leo A. and Catherine. Mrs. Pauly was born in Los Angeles county and grew to womanhood in Bakersfield, her father, J. L. Davis, having been a pioneer farmer of Kern county. In national politics Mr. Pauly votes with the Republican party. Fraternally he holds membership with Bakersfield Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E., and has been a prominent officer, being Past Exalted Ruler. Upon the organization of the old volunteer fire department in Kern he became a member, realizing the great need of adequate fire protection. At the time of the consolidation he was serving as chief of the department and he still retains his interest in its equipment and management. The old homestead of seventeen hundred acres still belongs to the family, but for years has been leased to tenants for farming purposes.

JAMES FREDERICK HYDRON.—A responsible position with the Kern County Land Company is filled by Mr. Hydron, who has been a resident of Bakersfield since 1894 and an employe of the company for practically the same length of time. Chance attracted him to the great west. When twenty-one years of age he had the good fortune to visit the World's Fair in Chicago and made a careful study of state exhibits. The old mission building occupied by the California exhibit drew him to a careful inspection and he noted with amazement and admiration the wonderful array of citrus and deciduous fruits, and of grains, vegetables and other products. For the first time his attention was directed to the Pacific coast and it was this exhibit which caused him to come to California the following year, since which time he has made Bakersfield his home and the scene of his business activities.

A. W. Klipsch

Mrs H. W. Keipateini.

Born at Louisville, Ky., February 11, 1872, James Frederick Hydron is a son of William and Mary (Roman) Hydron, members of old southern families, the former a native of Cincinnati, Ohio, and the latter born near Louisville, Ky. For a considerable period the father engaged in the carriage-maker's business at Louisville and during the Civil war he enlisted from that city with a Confederate regiment of soldiers, serving at the front until the expiration of his term. During the '70s he removed to Indiana and established a business at Jeffersonville, where he continued to make his home until his death in 1903 at the age of sixty-seven years. All of the children, four sons and two daughters, are still living and their mother also survives, making Louisville her home at the present time. The fourth among the six children was James Frederick, the only member of the family in California. After he had received a common-school education in Jeffersonville he aided his father until he came to California in 1894 and settled in Kern county. Immediately he found employment with the Kern County Land Company. His first task was that of driving mules and a scraper. Soon he was transferred to the surveying department, where he remained for two years. During his connection with the surveying corps he helped to survey the tunnel at Kern river canyon. Later he served on the street-car line as a conductor and continued with the land company in that capacity for three years. April 15, 1906, he was placed in charge of the Bakersfield warehouse owned by the company and since then he has filled the difficult position with efficiency. In every capacity he has proved himself a man of sterling worth and integrity. Politically he votes with the Democratic party. For some years he has held office as banker of the local lodge, Modern Woodmen of America, in the work of which he has been influential and active. Some years after coming to Bakersfield he married Miss Cora Cowing, a native of Kern county and a daughter of John Cowing, a California pioneer, identified for a long period with the agricultural development of this county, but more recently a resident of Moneta, Los Angeles county. Mr. and Mrs. Hydron have an only son, Harry Edward.

HENRY W. KLIPSTEIN.—The genealogy of the Klipstein family is traced to an ancient and noble race in Germany, where a coat of arms proclaimed their distinguished lineage and honorable station. The history of the family can be traced back to George Klipstein, a citizen and turner of Eisenach, who had a son Hans, a forester of Einhaus, and the latter a son Casper, of Hesse-Darmstadt, who was chief forester of the principalities of Battenburg, Reidenkoff and Itter. Casper Klipstein had a son John Casper, who was preceptor and organist at Gladenbach, and his son, John Conrad Theodore, was a forester. The son of the last-mentioned, Philip, was born in Hesse-Darmstadt and became a surgeon of note. In the capacity of surgeon he came to America with the Hessian troops and served in the Revolutionary war. When peace was declared he was honorably discharged and settled down to the practice of his profession in Winchester, Va. This Philip Klipstein was the great-grandfather of our subject. The grandfather, Philip Augustin, was a native of Virginia, born in 1791. He was a minister of the old "Ironside" Baptist denomination, preached the Gospel in the Old Dominion and held high rank among the people of his faith. The next generation was represented by Thomas E. Klipstein, who lived and died in Virginia. His marriage to Mary Frances Hampton brought him into connection with a distinguished family of his state, whose most noted member was Gen. Wade Hampton. In the family of Thomas E. Klipstein there were five children, of whom four grew up; Sallie, Mrs. A. R. Bartenstein, of Fauquier county, Va.; Eliza Peyton, Mrs. W. G. Bartenstein, who died at Virginia Colony, Kern county; Catherine Hampton, Mrs. Basey, of Virginia Colony; and Henry W.

The home of the Klipstein family was in Fauquier county, Va., and there February 13, 1852, occurred the birth of a son, Henry W., who being a mere lad at the time of the Civil war could not enter the army, yet witnessed much of the horrors of warfare. The family home, only forty miles from Washington, was often threatened by opposing forces and its inmates were in peril of their lives as the fierce struggle waged around them. In their immediate neighborhood occurred the sanguinary contests of Bull Run during 1861 and 1862. The community became disrupted by strife and schools were closed, so that the young lad studied his lessons at home under the careful oversight of his mother. When the war had ended and schools again opened for study, he took up educational work and finally obtained a common-school education, after which he began to make his own way in the world.

The marriage of Henry W. Klipstein took place in Virginia in April, 1876, and united him with Miss Martha Jennings Rixey, the daughter of Smith H. and Catherine E. (Triplet) Rixey. The father was a planter in Culpeper county, Va., where Mrs. Klipstein was born. She is a near relative of Congressman John Rixey of the Old Dominion and also of Dr. Preston Rixey, physician to President McKinley and also Surgeon General of the Navy in the McKinley and Roosevelt administrations. For a number of successive generations the Rixey family has been prominent in the annals of Virginia, whose advancement has been promoted by their patriotic efforts and progressive spirit. A member of a family including seven children (six daughters and one son), Mrs. Klipstein was reared in the home of an aunt, Martha Rixey, and while still a young girl became the wife of Henry W. Klipstein, whom she accompanied to California in 1888, his ill health having been the cause of their removal to the genial western climate. Arriving at Bakersfield on Christmas day, they at once sought a means of livelihood and began in the dairy industry. Being given an opportunity to buy the dairy then owned by the Kern County Land Company, they availed themselves of the chance and were prospered by the undertaking. As his means permitted, Mr. Klipstein began to buy land and cattle. At this writing they own the Klipstein ranch of about twelve thousand acres, located near Maricopa, and also about three thousand acres of the old Waggy ranch and farm, and on account of the location of the ranches they control about seventy-five thousand acres of government range land. In the land and cattle business he is in partnership with his sons, Henry W. and Phil A., and on their ranches range more than three thousand head of cattle. The move to the west proved fortunate to him, as he has regained his health and also has been greatly prospered in ranching and stock-raising. For years he has been closely connected with the Kern County Land Company in business matters. Besides his vast landed possessions, comprising the cattle ranches with their commodious ranch houses, he owns improved and unimproved property in Bakersfield and here has a modern residence at the foot of Dracena street built on a natural mound at an elevation of about twenty feet above the surrounding country.

Nine children comprised the family of Mr. and Mrs. Klipstein, of whom seven grew up and six are still living. The eldest, Thomas E., a successful oil operator and formerly connected with the Kern County Abstract Company, is well and favorably known in Bakersfield and represented elsewhere in this volume. The eldest daughter, Kate Hampton, deceased, was the wife of J. H. Hillard, of San Francisco and at her death left one child, Ramona Frances, now living with Mr. and Mrs. Klipstein and attending the Ramona convent. The two youngest sons, Henry W. and Phil A., are energetic young ranchers and excellent judges of stock, their specialty being cattle. The former is first lieutenant of Troop A, California National Guard. Eugenia is the wife of G. E. Ruckstell, formerly of San Francisco, now proprietor of a garage at Maricopa. Mildred M. married J. H. Bacon and lives at Fellows. The youngest member of the family circle, Mattie Rixey, resides with her parents. Politically Mr. Klipstein is a Democrat.

E. L. WILLOW.—The discovery of gold proved the attraction that brought to the west Elias Willow, a Pennsylvanian by birth and a cooper by trade. At an early age he had accompanied his parents to Ohio and had settled in Sandusky. The even tenor of his life was changed by the news concerning the discovery of gold in California and as soon as possible he started for the coast. Joining an expedition that made the trip with wagons and ox-teams, he crossed the plains during the summer of 1850 and arrived in due time in Eldorado county, where he engaged in placer mining. As no special fortune rewarded his efforts he turned his attention to merchandising in the same county. As he not only conducted a general store, but also acted as postmaster of his little village and as agent for the Wells Fargo Express Company, he formed the acquaintance of the people throughout all that section of the country. During the early days he knew by name practically all of the pioneers of his section and by all of them he was regarded as a friend. More than one was indebted to him for timely help. Indeed, his benefactions in those days of frontier existence were often in excess of his means, but his nature was so kindly that he could turn a deaf ear to no appeal for assistance. When he decided to leave Eldorado county he loaded his household necessities in a wagon, put his wife and children in the vehicle, and drove south until May 13, 1874, at which time he arrived at Bakersfield. Here he established a permanent home. For ten years he had the contract for sprinkling the streets, using for that purpose a water-wagon of his own manufacture. After he discontinued that business he became secretary of the county board of horticultural commissioners and at his death in 1891 he was still filling that position. As road overseer for several terms he had charge of the highways of his district, while in addition for many years he filled the office of school trustee.

The marriage of Elias Willow united him with Miss Ann Eliza Pavey, who was born in Coldwater, Mich., April 26, 1843, and died at Bakersfield in October, 1909. Her father, Henry Pavey, had crossed the plains for the first time during the summer of 1850. After he had remained long enough to investigate conditions he decided that he would like to settle permanently in the west, therefore he returned to Michigan for his family, who accompanied him across the plains in 1852, making the trip with ox-teams. For many years and until his death he engaged in the horticultural industry and also conducted a nursery business in Eldorado county. There were but two children in the family of Elias Willow, the daughter being Mrs. Flora Ellen Stanley, of Fairbank, Ariz. The son, E. L., was born in the village of Mud Springs, Eldorado county, Cal., May 14, 1864, and has been a resident of Bakersfield since May 13, 1874, during which year he entered the public schools of this place. After he had completed the studies of the local schools he entered the commercial department of the University of Southern California in Los Angeles, where he remained until his graduation. As early as ten years of age he began to learn the furniture business, his employer having been J. Neiderauer, of Bakersfield. During early life he learned the trade of a cabinet-maker. In starting out at the trade he earned $8 per week, but in one month his wages were raised to $9. After his graduation he returned to the Neiderauer store and continued to work as a cabinet-maker, but in a short time began to learn the embalming business, of which in due time he acquired a recognized proficiency.

The firm of Willow & Kelsey started in the furniture and undertaking business in January, 1889, on Twentieth street and Chester avenue, the present site of the Bank of Bakersfield. During July of the same year the store burned to the ground and the entire stock of goods was destroyed.

entailing an almost total loss. Next Mr. Willow engaged in the cabinet-making business at No. 1219 Nineteenth street. From boyhood he had been active in the old volunteer department as a member of the Eureka Engine Company. Upon the organization of the Alert Hook & Ladder Company he became a charter member and was elected foreman. Later he became chief of the volunteer fire department. When the paid department was organized he was chosen the first chief of the department, receiving sixty out of sixty-one votes cast. For sixteen years he continued in this responsible position. Meanwhile the signal 'phone alarm system was introduced and other improvements made. All of the horses in the department were personally trained by him and they knew his voice so well that even now, when he speaks to them, they instantly recognize him. During April of 1907 he resigned as fire chief, having previously purchased the furniture business which he has conducted ever since. To show how much he was appreciated by the men in the department it is a significant fact that at the time he tendered his resignation every man in the department excepting two also handed in their resignations. The Willow building, erected in 1904 at No. 1227 Nineteenth street, extends one hundred and thirty-two feet on Nineteenth street and has a depth of one hundred and fifteen and one-half feet on L street. The location is unexcelled for building up a large trade, but the patronage is not limited to Bakersfield itself, for Mr. Willow has customers from all parts of the county. From the organization of the Merchants' Association he has served as its treasurer and he also has been a prominent member of Kern county board of trade. In national politics he votes with the Republican party. His marriage took place at San Francisco and united him with Miss Frances A. Foran, who was born at Mariposa, this state.

HENRY BOHNA.—The name of Bohna is of peculiar interest to the people of Bakersfield by reason of the fact that Christian Bohna, who arrived here February 1, 1860, built the first house on what is now the town site. When he brought the family to this region he found conditions most unattractive. By reason of the numerous swamps covered with willow trees the location was most unhealthful and during 1860 the family suffered constantly from sickness. The first step which he took after his arrival was to secure a shelter for wife and children. The house which he built was constructed of cottonwood timber, with a roof of flag-tule, and were it still standing, it would be an object of great interest to the present large population of the city. After he had provided a home for the family he cleared ten acres of the land and planted a crop of corn, from which he gathered as many as one hundred and ten bushels to the acre. Encouraged by the success of the undertaking, he cleared more land and in 1861 planted a large field of corn, from which he secured a good crop, but the great flood of 1861-62 was so huge that he became entirely discouraged and moved away as soon as the water went down. There were few to suffer from the reverses that overtook him, for at the time his nearest neighbors (only two families being at that place) were nine miles distant.

In many respects Christian Bohna was a remarkable man. One of his striking characteristics was a love of travel and adventure. It did not satisfy him to remain for years in one location, no matter how dear might be the friends there nor how promising the opportunities. He wished to see all of our great country and as facilities for travel were limited in those days he spent large sums of money in taking his family from one state to another. Had he been less fond of travel, more willing to remain in one place, undoubtedly he would have accumulated a fortune, but as it was he left little means for his family. However, he did leave something more to be desired, the respect of acquaintances and a reputation for integrity and the highest principles of honor.

Henry Bohra

Born in Saxony, Germany, December 28, 1805, Christian Bohna followed the usual procedure among the youth of his country, viz.: attendance at school until fourteen, apprenticeship at a trade until eighteen and then three years of service in the army of his country. After having been honorably discharged from the army at the age of twenty-one he came to the new world, prepared for work by a thorough knowledge of blacksmithing, which he followed in New York City. With a desire to see the country he traveled through Ohio, Missouri, Arkansas and Texas, besides making brief stops in intervening states. Meanwhile his trade earned him an honest livelihood. When he started across the plains in the spring of 1853 he had his wagon fitted out with blacksmith's tools of every description and thus he was enabled to earn his way as he traveled toward the west. Landing in Calaveras county he set up a shop and made considerable money by his trade, but invested the most of this capital in mines in that locality. During the fall of 1856 he returned to Arkansas and settled in Pike county, where he took up farm pursuits. Soon, however, he found himself dissatisfied, eager to return to the west. Accordingly in 1859 he sold the Arkansas farm and came to the west, arriving at El Monte in the fall of 1859, and from there coming to what is now Bakersfield, February 1, 1860. The mishaps of the next two years have been recorded previously and furnish the reason for his removal to Oregon. From that state he soon moved to Idaho. In both places he engaged in farming and mining. The year 1867 found him back in Kern county, where he settled at Woody, retiring to some extent from active labors. He passed away in 1872 and was interred in the cemetery of Linn's valley.

During the residence of Christian Bohna in Pike county, Ark., his son, Henry, was born October 15, 1842. By reason of the frequent removals of the family and their isolation in remote mining camps, he was deprived of educational advantages. His entire attendance at school was limited to three weeks, when he was a pupil in a subscription school. During 1859 he arrived in El Monte, Cal., with his parents, and in February, 1860, he came with them to the present site of Bakersfield. In 1862 he began to mine in the White river district, where he took up a mining claim. In November of 1863 he joined his parents in Idaho, where he engaged in mining in 1864 and 1865. The fall of the latter year found him in Montana, where he bought a claim at Last Chance gulch and engaged in mining. Returning to Oregon in the fall of 1866, he spent a few months in and near Portland and in 1867 returned to Kern county with his father, settling at Woody. Up to 1872 he devoted his attention to mining, but after that he engaged exclusively in farming and stock-raising. He had taken up and improved one hundred and sixty acres, but in 1882 the railroad took one-half of the tract from him. During 1882 he took up a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres in the Greenhorn range and moved to the land in 1883, but again in 1892 the railroad took eighty acres from this tract. While living in the mountains he purchased from settlers title to six hundred and forty acres, which he used as a summer range for cattle. This place, which is known as Shiloh, he still owns. During 1904 he bought the old Maltby tract of four hundred acres at Woody, and in 1905 he moved to this place. In the meantime he has purchased three hundred and twenty acres adjoining and now owns and successfully operates eight hundred and eighty acres of well-improved land. Being profusely wooded with native oak the place has been appropriately named Oak Lodge.

Since the age of twenty-one years Mr. Bohna has been an active worker in the local ranks of the Democratic party. During 1894 he was elected supervisor of the third district and in that responsible position he served with the greatest efficiency for four years. Elected a trustee of schools in the Blake district, he was clerk of the board for six years. From early life he has been a member of the Christian Church and a generous contributor to its maintenance. His marriage took place in Woody February 16, 1876, and united him with Miss Annie E. Rutledge, who was born in Tuolumne county, Cal., September 7, 1856, being a daughter of Paschal and Mary Ann (McElroy) Rutledge. Her father was born at Greenville, S. C., July 15, 1823, and during the great excitement of 1849 joined an expedition bound for California, where he was a pioneer tinner in San Francisco. After a time he added a stock of hardware and carried on an extensive trade in his line. September 24, 1846, he had married Miss McElroy, who was born in Philadelphia, Pa., January 1, 1824, and who came alone to California, making the trip via Panama. After having lived temporarily in various parts of the state Mr. Rutledge removed to Woody, Kern county, and here his body lies buried; this also is the last resting place of his wife, who passed away in 1893. The family of Henry and Annie E. Bohna comprises nine children, the eldest of whom are high-school graduates and three of the daughters have taught school with success. Paschal married Miss Birdie Morse December 25, 1899; Christine M. taught school for a time, and February 8, 1903, became the wife of F. H. Jameson; Evelena Paralee taught school for some years, and August 15, 1909, became the wife of Henry B. Gardette; Clara J. married Harvey Bufington November 15, 1905; Marianna, after completing high-school, took up teaching with energy and intelligent application; Roy H. now manages the ranch in the Greenhorn mountains; Alice Muriel, Thomas Hugh, and Lillian Rae complete the family.

JULES RUFENER.—Where the foothills stretch from the Jura range of the lofty Alps westward toward the sunny slopes of France lies the thriving Swiss city known as La Chaux de Fonds, Canton Neuchatel. In that place Jules Rufener was born July 24, 1865, there he passed the uneventful years of childhood and there also he learned the tedious lessons so indispensable to educational or occupative progress. The family for several generations was noted for skill in watchmaking. The men of the race seemed to possess a natural talent for the delicate mechanism so essential to the trade and they therefore gained local prestige in a calling requiring exceptional delicacy of touch and accuracy of vision. Jacob, the father of Jules, was born at Interlocken in the Alps and has devoted his entire active life with success to the manufacture of watches. Even now, although he has reached the age of seventy-three, he is still regarded by the people of La Chaux de Fonds, where the firm of Rufener & Co. wields the influence due to long identification with the business of the city, as the leading watchmaker and most competent jeweler in the entire community.

The marriage of Jacob Rufener united him with Barbara Gertsch, who at her death in 1911 was survived by seven of her ten children. It is a noteworthy fact that four sons became very skilled watchmakers. Of these the second child, Jules, was the only one to engage in business in America. Fritz until his death in 1910 carried on a large business as a watchmaker and jeweler in Bombay, India, while Charles, also identified with business in India, is a wholesale dealer in watches and jewelry in Lucknow. The only one of the sons continuing in business in his native city is Alfred, a manufacturer of watches, well known throughout Canton Neuchatel. At the age of sixteen Jules was apprenticed to his father and later was sent to a factory in order that he might become familiar with every department in the trade of watchmaker. Coming to the United States in 1890, he first engaged at his trade in Johnson, Nemaha county, Neb., and later in Niobrara, Knox county, same state, whence in 1897 he came to California and secured work at his trade in San Jose. The following year he arrived in Bakersfield, where he had no difficulty in securing a position suited to his ability. From 1901 to 1906 he engaged in business on Beacon street, San Pedro, where he still owns two residences close in. Upon selling the business at that point he returned to Kern county and secured a position in East Bakersfield. In April of 1908 he bought a one-half interest in a business established by his cousin, H. Oppliger, and later known as the Kern Jewelry Company. When in 1910 he bought the interest of his partner he changed the title of the business, which is now conducted under his own name, occupying a convenient location at No. 818 Baker street. After coming to East Bakersfield he married in 1901 Miss Marie Louise Nougier, who was born in Hautes Alpes, France, and by whom he has one son, Jules Eli. He is a Republican and belongs to the Tribe of Ben Hur and the Woodmen of the World.

BEDELL SMITH.—The first American representatives of the Smith family, which is of mingled Scotch and English lineage, lived on Long Island and even to this day many of the name remain in that portion of New York. Benjamin Smith, the son of a native of Queens county, was likewise born and reared on Long Island and remained there until death. For eight years under the presidential administrations of Franklin Pierce and James Buchanan he held a position as keeper of the Fire Island light-house, retiring to a farm in 1861 and dying three years afterward. In young manhood he had married Miss Hannah Bedell, a native of Queens county and a descendant of Teutonic ancestry. According to the family traditions three brothers came from Germany in a very early period of the American colonization. One brother settled on Long Island, another went into the northern part of New York and the third migrated as far west as Ohio. From the Long Island settler Mrs. Smith was descended and she passed her entire life in that part of New York, dying there about 1866. Of her marriage there had been born ten sons and two daughters, of whom the daughters and six of the sons attained maturity, and at this writing four sons and one daughter survive. The third from the youngest and the only one of the large family to settle in the west was Bedell, whose birth occurred at the family home near Freeport, Queens county, N. Y., November 1, 1851, and who was given the name of his mother's people. From 1853 until 1861 he lived at the Fire Island lighthouse, after which he was taken by the parents to a farm near Freeport and sent to the schools of that Long Island town. When he was thirteen he lost his father and two years later his mother passed away, leaving him without a home and thrown upon his own resources for a livelihood. Immediately he secured employment as clerk in a general store at Freeport. In that position he learned his first business lessons. At the age of nineteen he went to New York City and secured a clerkship in a tea store on Eighth avenue, where he remained until sickness caused the loss of the position.

June of 1874 found Bedell Smith a newcomer in St. Paul, Minn., and eight months later he arrived in Denver, Colo., where he found employment in business. During 1875 and 1876 he spent one month visiting with relatives and friends in the east and on the 15th of January, 1876, he boarded the Acapulco in New York harbor, with the Isthmus of Panama as his first destination. From there he traveled across to the Pacific coast, then shipped on the Colorado to San Francisco, where he landed on the 11th of February. In the same year of 1876 he saw Bakersfield for the first time while making a trip of inspection through the valley. Later he was engaged as a clerk in the New York Exchange hotel at San Jose for four years, and upon resigning the position he spent two years in travel through Utah, Idaho, Montana and Nevada. Returning to San Francisco, he then proceeded toward the southwest and traveled through Arizona and New Mexico. After his arrival in Texas he secured a position as clerk in a store in El Paso, where he remained for eighteen months. Next he went to Los Angeles and secured work as clerk and bookkeeper. March 14, 1890, he arrived in Bakersfield with the intention of becoming a permanent resident. For nine years he engaged in a restaurant and hotel business. Since January, 1899, he has served as deputy county clerk and as clerk of department No. 1 of the superior court. Meanwhile he has been a warm supporter of Democratic policies and has served as a member of the county central committee. In San Francisco he married Miss Maggie Larkin, who was born in Ireland and during 1875 came from New York to California via Panama. Six children were born of their union, but only two of the number attained mature years, these being Millicent and Edna, the former now the wife of Lawrence Lavers, editor of the Wasco News, of Wasco, Kern county, and the latter the wife of E. F. Britton, attorney at law, of Bakersfield.

WALTER JAMES.—The irrigation project developed by the Kern County Land Company into a system famous throughout the entire world owes much of its remarkable success to the genius and skill of Walter James, who came to Bakersfield during 1871 and secured employment as civil engineer on the vast estate that eventually was merged into the holdings of the organization named. To him belongs the distinction of having been at the head of the irrigation system that has made the county famous. From the inception of the enterprise he planned and superintended the construction of the greater portion of the works, which were the first in the entire country to be instituted upon so large a scale. Everything connected with the plans originated in the minds of the men having the enterprise in charge, Mr. James having been foremost among these. That his ability has been recognized admits of no question. The works have been visited by engineers from every country in the world where irrigation is practiced. In addition they are mentioned at length in almost every book that has been published bearing upon the subject.

Born near Marion, Ohio, April 22, 1837, Mr. James can scarcely recall a time when he was not interested in engineering and matters pertaining to the subject, and surveying as well. At the opening of the Civil war, during 1862, he enlisted as a member of the Ninety-sixth Ohio Infantry and was assigned to Company E. Later he was transferred to the signal corps and served in that position until the war had been brought to an end. On the 4th of July, 1865, he was honorably discharged at New Orleans, and he then returned to his home in Ohio, where he was united in marriage with Miss Lauretta G. Gillespie, of Marion, that state, and they became the parents of a daughter, Dora, who married Charles M. Clark, of Los Angeles. Mrs. James, who has been a resident of the west since 1865 and of the county since 1871, is one of the pioneer women of Kern county and has given of her best efforts to enhance its educational, literary and social advancement. She is the daughter of Noah and Emily (Owens) Gillespie, and was born in Marion, Ohio, where she completed her education in the high school, and later followed teaching until her marriage in November, 1865. Of late years Mr. and Mrs. James have resided in Los Angeles, having a comfortable home at No. 1050 West Forty-eighth street. Mrs. James is a member of the Unitarian Church.

Immediately after the close of his army service Mr. James and his wife came to California by way of the Isthmus of Panama, and he at once entered the employ of his brother, I. E. James, with whom they made their home. The latter was a civil engineer employed on the Comstock lode, and while working with him Mr. James acquired some valuable experience in railroading and other engineering works. In partnership the two brothers became interested in a mining enterprise in Eldorado county, Cal., and later engaged in farming in the San Joaquin valley near what is now Newman, Stanislaus county. In 1871 Mr. James began farming in Kern county on what is still known as the James ranch, now a part of the Bellevue, and he has ever since been identified with the county. Some years later, in 1874, he was employed by the firm known as Carr & Haggin, predecessors of the present Kern County Land Co., entering upon his long and successful association with that company, whose irrigation works bear silent but eloquent testimony as to the splendid resources of his mind, the wisdom of his judgment and the original nature of his ideas. The irrigation system was installed and promoted by the Kern County Land Co. and its predecessors at a large cost. The investment has proved to be profitable, and its success has encouraged other companies seeking in a similar manner to conserve the use of fertile soil in dry countries. Water for irrigation in Kern county is almost entirely taken from Kern river, which has its source at Mount Whitney, the highest peak in the United States and covered with perpetual snow. With the Kern river as the channel and conveyer, the water passes into canals and ditches and thence is brought to each tract at stated intervals. The importance of the enterprise to the agricultural development of Kern county cannot be overestimated, for the availability of water at a reasonable price has been the basis of all improvement of lands and profitable cultivation of farms.

Walter James

Although Mr. James' time was given very closely to business affairs he nevertheless served as county surveyor for one term, from 1873 to 1875. Fraternally he is identified with Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., Kern Valley Chapter No. 75, R. A. M., was one of the early members of Bakersfield Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E., and is a member of Hurlburt Post No. 127, G. A. R., of which he is a past commander.

CHARLES FREDERICK OFF.—Ancient and honorable Teutonic lineage appears in the genealogy of the Off family and it is worthy of note that six successive generations have had male representatives bearing the name of Charles Frederick. Three generations of the family have been associated with Los Angeles: The late Rev. Charles Frederick Off, formerly a leading minister in the German Evangelical Church of North America; Charles Frederick (more commonly known as Charles), who is superintendent of the celebrated Lakeview Oil Company and in the discharge of official duties spends much time in the Sunset-Midway field; and Charles Frederick, the youngest son of the oil superintendent and a bright boy now attending the city schools.

From early life the German Evangelical minister showed fine mental qualities. Born at Canstadt, Wurtemberg, Germany, and educated at Basel, Switzerland, he engaged in educational and ministerial work throughout much of his career. At St. Joseph, Mo., he married Miss Louise Meister, who was born at Zurich, Switzerland, and crossed the ocean to the United States in 1850 with her parents, settling in Missouri. Her death occurred in 1903 at Stockholm, Sweden, and since that time the minister, having retired from professional labors, has made his home with his eldest son in Los Angeles. For years he was a man of great influence in his chosen denomination. Following a service of eight years as a professor of music in Elmhurst College near Chicago, he was given charge of the missionary work of the Iowa and Nebraska synod of the German Evangelical Church, and while serving in that capacity and temporarily stationed in Hardin county, Iowa, a son, Charles Frederick, was born May 13, 1866. There was one child older than he, a daughter, Louisa A., who died at the age of thirty-three years. The other members of the family are as follows: John W. A., a retired capitalist residing in Los Angeles; Julia Maude, a teacher of music; Theofil R., who died in childhood; and Edward T., of Pasadena.

Although he did not attend school after the age of thirteen, Charles Frederick Off is a man of unusually broad information and is well educated in both German and English, besides having considerable knowledge of both piano and organ. When only thirteen he began to be self-supporting. For three years he engaged as a clerk in a general mercantile store at Plymouth, Sheboygan county, Wis. On resigning that position he removed to Denver, Colo., where he was employed for three years in a music store. January 1, 1884, he came to Los Angeles with his mother and sister, who were invalids. Since then he has made his home on the northeast corner of First and Union avenue, where he owns a residence. Shortly after his arrival in Los Angeles he purchased a stationery store at No. 148 North Spring street and from the first he met with a fair degree of success in the business. In 1895 he made the acquaintance of Miss Grace Maude Bemis, formerly of Evansville, Wis. Their marriage was solemnized in 1897 at the old homestead under an arch where three older sisters had previously stood as they took the marriage vows. Four children bless the union, Lillian Merle, Howard J., Teddy R. and Charles Frederick.

The Pacific Truck Company, started by Mr. Off as a ten-cent delivery, developed into a large incorporated concern that made a specialty of heavy trucking and hauled the stone for the City Hall, Court-House and Phillips Block. As the business grew with startling rapidity and as the president, Mr. Off, was obliged to devote his time very closely to the books and office work of the company, his health began to be impaired by the confinement and in December, 1889, he sold his interest in the business. In order that he might have outdoor occupation, he bought land near Whittier, east of Los Angeles, and began to raise standard-bred horses and milch cows. Unfortunately a serious drought soon came on, feed became scarce and horses valueless, thus entailing a heavy loss in the venture.

As a contractor in the well-drilling business in the Whittier district, Mr. Off retrieved former losses. In addition he engaged in leveling lands and planting trees for others under contract. In 1895 he left the Whittier district and put down his first oil well in the Los Angeles field, Thomas O'Donnell and Max Whittier doing the work of drilling. After having put down about six wells in the city he leased eighty acres of oil land at Whittier, where he drilled wells under the incorporated title of the Whittier Crude Oil Company. At this writing he still serves as manager of the company, which owns twelve wells in operation. Having completed the work of drilling these twelve wells, he went to the Santa Maria field as organizer of the Rice Ranch Oil Company at Orcutt and there he had charge of the drilling of seven wells. Desiring to extend the company's interests in 1908 he came to Kern county on a tour of investigation. After an inspection of the Sunset-Midway field he leased the property now controlled by the Lakeview Oil Company. From the first he was convinced of the value of the property, but when he submitted the details to the directors of the Rice Ranch Oil Company he found a majority of them decidedly against investing in a new field. However, the president of the company, R. D. Wade, of Los Angeles, joined him in forming the new company and through the assistance of F. E. Dunlap of Los Angeles a twenty-year lease was secured from the locators.

Under the management of Mr. Off drilling was begun at wells Nos. 1, 2 and 3. Financial necessities forced the management to sell fifty-one per cent of the stock to the Union Oil Company. Under the contract the management remained with that company for three years, from June 1, 1909, to June 1, 1912. At the latter date the management was again returned to the minority and Mr. Off was chosen superintendent. Under his supervision two wells, Nos. 9 and 10 are prospective successful pumpers, and No. 11 is now nearing completion and it is the expectation to begin drilling on No. 12. Lakeview No. 1, popularly known as the Lakeview gusher, is probably the most famous well in the entire country. During the period of the gushing, from March 15, 1910, to September 12, 1911, it is conservatively estimated to have produced ten million barrels. Such an enormous output naturally gained world-wide attention and the success of the well permanently placed the Sunset-Midway field upon the map of the world's oil industry. At great expense Lakeview No. 1 was re-drilled and was brought in as a forty-barrel per day pumper, with a strong flow of gas sufficient to fire eleven boilers and equal to one hundred and fifty barrels of crude oil per day, besides furnishing natural gas to about twenty private families. The association of Mr. Off with this famous property on section 25, township 12, range 24, has been long and intimate.

S. A. Woody.

STONEWALL A. WOODY.—The auditor of Kern county traces his lineage to a colonial family of Old Virginia. As the tide of migration drifted toward the west one branch of the name became established in Missouri and from there Sparrell W. Woody, M. D., crossed the plains to California during the exciting period of '49, identifying himself with the permanent growth of the then unknown coast country. Born in Virginia in 1826, he was taken to Missouri by his parents in 1835, and had endured the vicissitudes of frontier existence while aiding in the clearing and improving of a tract of raw land in Boone county. After he had received his degree from the St. Louis Medical College he engaged in professional work in Missouri for a year, but plans for a quiet continuance of his practice gave way before the more alluring visions offered by the unknown west. During the summer of 1849 he crossed the plains with wagon and oxen and upon his arrival in California began to mine on the American river, later, however, turning his attention to the management of an hotel and livery stable in Auburn. At the expiration of seven years he sold the business and spent a year in the Hawaiian Islands. Returning to San Francisco he came on to Kern county in 1860 and settled on the present site of Bakersfield, where he engaged in raising grain, corn and potatoes. The great flood of 1862 brought him losses that would have discouraged a less optimistic pioneer and he was further handicapped by ill health. However, his was not the spirit to be depressed by adventitious circumstances. The flood taught him the necessity to ranching on higher ground, so he removed near the present site of Woody, and when later the village was started it was named in his honor. Soon he regained his health and recuperated his losses. Eventually he acquired a grain and stock ranch aggregating four thousand acres, the ranch house standing three miles from the town of Woody, which still affords a convenient market for many of the farm products.

While the demands of his large landed possessions were so great that Dr. Woody had no leisure for professional practice and only responded to calls when there was no other physician near and the suffering of the patient was intense (in all of which cases he made no charge whatever), it must not be inferred that he fell into a narrow groove of exhausting agricultural labors. On the contrary, no one was more interested than he in the growth of the county and the development of its resources. Every progressive project received the benefit of his calm judgment and sagacious counsel. Discerning the need of good educational facilities, he assisted in the building of the first schools in Kern county, and often served as a school trustee in order that he might promote such work. Religion also entered into his character and implanted in his soul its own lofty ideals. From early life a member of the Christian Church, he assisted in the building of a house of worship at Woody and generously supported all missionary movements of that congregation. Fraternally he was a Mason. When the first grand jury was convened at Havilah (then the county-seat) he was chosen its chairman and his impartial judgment aided the body in its deliberations. Fond of the best books, he was himself a scholar and a man of unusual mental attainments, an honor to the citizenship of Kern county, and in his death, which occurred September 2, 1910, he was deeply mourned.

Where the city of Bakersfield now stands Dr. Woody was married in 1861, his bride being Miss Louisa Bohna, who was born in Arkansas and died in Kern county in 1909. Her brother, Henry Bohna, is a resident of Woody, and her father, Christian Bohna, who died here, crossed the plains twice during early days, his first trip having been made shortly after the discovery of gold, at which time he followed the southern route and settled in Kern county. His second trip was made in 1858, when he brought his family in a prairie schooner drawn by oxen, a journey of six months. His daughter, Louisa, then thirteen years of age, was one of twelve children, and made her home with her father on Kern Island until her marriage. She was a woman of lovable disposition, kindly traits, and a strong character, always looking to the high moral uplift of the community, and during all her life showed a true charitable and Christian spirit, exemplified in the fact that she reared two orphaned families besides her own, and during her whole life was a conscientious member of the Christian Church. Later Christian Bohna became a pioneer of Oregon, but after having made his home in that state from 1862 until 1870, he returned to Kern county to spend his last days. In the Woody family there are three daughters and two sons. The eldest daughter, Eugenie, married Alexander Carver and lives near Delano, Kern county. The other daughters, Nettie, Mrs. W. H. Howard, and Victoria, Mrs. Clark Green, reside at Dinuba, Tulare county. The two sons, Stonewall A. and Elmer, own the old Woody ranch of four thousand acres. To this they have added until they now have about sixty-five hundred acres and engage extensively in raising grain and stock, the younger brother residing at the old home ranch, while the older, a citizen of Bakersfield since 1907, erected and now occupies a modern residence on the corner of E and Twenty-second streets. Born at the old homestead near Woody June 6, 1869, Stonewall A. Woody attended the country schools and in 1890 was graduated from Heald's Business College in San Francisco. Upon his return to the ranch he assisted his father in the cultivation of the land and the care of the stock. At the age of twenty-one he took up a homestead not far from the parental home and in due time proved up on the land, after which he bought adjacent property and railroad land. Until the death of his father he continued to raise grain and stock in partnership with him and used the brand TD.

When only twenty-one years of age Mr. Woody became a member of the county central committee. Under his father's supervision he had been trained in the Jacksonian Democratic policies and in early youth he was able to give a concise, clear and positive reason for his political views, while now he is regarded as one of the best-posted Democrats in the entire county. In recognition of his able services in behalf of the party, in 1906 the Democrats nominated him for county auditor and he was duly elected, taking the oath of office in January, 1907. During 1910 he was re-elected, to serve until January of 1915. As a county official he has proved prompt and painstaking, enterprising and efficient, and his popularity has not been limited to members of his own party, but extends to all those who appreciate conscientious, honorable devotion to the business affairs of the county. In fraternal relations he holds membership with the Woodmen of the World and the Native Sons of the Golden West. During 1900 at San Jose he married Miss Odile Enderlin, a native of Idaho, and the daughter of Frank and Hannah (Gay) Enderlin, natives of France and Philadelphia, Pa., respectively. Her father served in the Civil war in an Eastern regiment, subsequently coming to California. Here he met and married Miss Gay, who had come to California by way of Panama. Her parents died in San Jose. Mrs. Woody is a graduate of the Santa Rosa Normal School. Her excellent education was utilized for some years as a teacher, and she proved well qualified for educational work. Since her marriage she has joined with Mr. Woody in social affairs and in the support of movements for the benefit of their home city and county, believing with him that this part of California is unrivalled in resources and alluring in possibilities.

GEORGE B. EDWARDS.—Influential among oil men is George B. Edwards, superintendent of and a heavy stockholder in the Midway Northern and the Maricopa Northern Oil Companies, whose properties lie on section 32, township 12, range 23, the former consisting of eighty acres lying due west of a tract of equal size operated by the Maricopa Northern. An investigation of the properties convinced Mr. Edwards of their value and with characteristic quickness of decision he purchased an interest in the concern, since which time he has devoted himself to the work of superintendent. The Midway Northern has three producing wells, one well drilling; the last well came in as a gusher June 27, 1913, and is now making over fifteen hundred barrels per day, 24.7 gravity oil. Well No. 1 was brought in as a gusher with a record of fifteen thousand barrels per day, but naturally this high average could not be maintained, the production of the two wells being now in the neighborhood of fifty thousand barrels per month.

Since coming to Kern county in 1909 Mr. Edwards has been associated with the Sunset field, and on the 15th of January, 1912, he became superintendent for the two companies previously named. The company's residence on the Midway Northern lease furnishes a comfortable home for himself and wife, the latter, whom he married at Los Angeles December 8, 1912, having been Miss Rose Gonzales, member of a pioneer family of that city. He himself is of eastern birth and education and was born on Christmas day of 1865 in the city of Buffalo, N. Y., where his father, Alfred B. Edwards, at one time was a leading merchant. The family consisted of three children, George B., Mary L. and Dollie. The mother, who bore the maiden name of Jane Ann Falloon, was born in Ireland, but at an early age accompanied her parents to Canada and settled in Toronto, where she was reared and educated. Her death occurred in 1876, twenty years before the demise of her husband.

The management of a mercantile business did not limit the business activities of Alfred B. Edwards, who as he found himself financially prospering began to be interested in the oil industry. However, his first experiences were far from profitable. Indeed, he was practically ruined by investments in fields that proved worthless. Instead of becoming discouraged by the failure he gave himself to the acquisition of a practical knowledge of the industry and through this means he retrieved some of his losses. About 1869 he moved to Venango county, Pa., and became associated with the Shamburg oil fields, but later he was also interested in other fields, continuing in the east until his death. Meanwhile the family had experienced hardships subsequent to his financial failure and the only son, who otherwise would have been reared in luxurious ease, now found it necessary to earn his own livelihood. Self-reliance was thereby developed. His success in the first instance has been due to industry and determination. With courage and sagacity he has invested the proceeds of his endeavor back into the same industry. Exceptional insight aided him in achieving success in the occupation. Long experience in the various oil fields of the United States has given him a thorough knowledge of the business in all of its departments. Meager educational advantages have not lessened his usefulness in the world. During early boyhood he secured work in the oil fields at Tidioute, Warren county, Pa., and later he was successively employed in McKean, Venango, Butler, Clarion, Washington and Allegheny counties, that state, after which he worked in the oil fields of West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Oklahoma and Wyoming.

A first trip to California, where he arrived in September of 1902, gave Mr. Edwards an opportunity to investigate the oil fields of the state. For a short time he engaged as a driller in the Los Angeles fields with the Union Consolidated Oil and Refining Company of New York. Leaving California for Oklahoma, he became a pioneer driller at Cleveland and brought in seven excellent wells, the first one of which (the second well drilled in the Cleveland field) proved to be a gusher, and the seven wells had a record of thirty-five hundred barrels per day. From 1903 until 1909 he remained in the oil fields of Oklahoma. He owns undeveloped oil lands in two different fields, viz.: at Newhall, Cal., and the Spring Valley field, Wyoming. Returning to California in 1909, he engaged as a driller with the Standard Oil Company at Newhall and thus enlarged his scope of information in regard to conditions for discovery and drilling of wells in the west. This broadened knowledge he utilized through an investment in the stock of the companies for which he now acts as superintendent and whose properties under his intelligent oversight have been put on a paying basis. While making his headquarters in Cleveland, Okla., he identified himself with the Knights of Pythias at that place. In politics he asserts that he is a Lincoln Republican and a Bryan Democrat, which today in a time of progressive politics has a definite meaning and puts him in touch with the forward movement in our national history. He was elected mayor of the city of Cleveland, Okla., in April, 1909, defeating Dr. George W. Sutton, president of the First National Bank of that city.

WILLIAM H. WEAVER.—Since coming to California in October of 1907, Mr. Weaver has engaged in contracting and building in the Maricopa district, at first as a member of the firm of Weaver & Schultz and later alone. Scores of oil derricks have been built under his capable supervision. A number of frame buildings have been erected by him, among them the residences of Dr. Page, Postmaster E. E. Brown, F. M. Train and Guy Ball, a block of four buildings since destroyed by fire, all the carpenter work on the Coons & Price large brick store building, besides the Gates City Pharmacy and many other public buildings.

Born in the vicinity of Memphis, Tenn., William H. Weaver was an infant when his father returned to Pennsylvania with the family and he was less than four years of age when that parent died. The mother, who bore the maiden name of Sarah Kaanan and was born in Tennessee, afterward married again, becoming the mother of eight children by the second union. Of her first marriage there were three children, those besides William H. being Lizzie and George W., the latter following the oil business in Venango county, Pa. The daughter married C. D. Mattison, a pumper employed on 25-Hill in the Midway field, in Kern county. Beginning to support himself at a very early age, William H. Weaver was only fifteen when he was made superintendent for Manning Bros., oil drillers at Oil City. In that capacity he had charge of the production of sixty-three wells.

Going to Pittsburg at the age of eighteen Mr. Weaver secured work as locomotive fireman with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. For six years he continued as a fireman and meanwhile crossed the Alleghenies almost daily. At first he made the run from Pittsburg to Cumberland, Md., on the Pittsburg division and then he was transferred to the Cleveland division. In recognition of his fidelity and efficiency he was promoted to be a locomotive engineer and as such continued for three years, eventually leaving the railroad service in order to remove to the west. Immediately after his arrival in Kern county he engaged at the trade of rig-builder, which he had learned during boyhood, and as a partner of William Schultz he also carried on general business in contracting and building. Their co-partnership, begun in 1908, continued for fourteen months, after which Mr. Weaver continued alone, and since then he has engaged in building frame structures of all kinds. As a carpenter he is reliable, skilled and popular and he is usually kept busy in the district lying near his own home. Politically he votes with the Democratic party and fraternally he is a member of the Eagles. While living in the east he was active in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers. When he came to California he brought with him his young wife, whom he had married in Lorain, Ohio, and who was Miss Reba Bills, daughter of L. D. Bills, of that city. Two children blessed their union, Kenneth and Gertrude. The latter died in 1911 at the age of eighteen months and in 1912 occurred the death of the wife and mother.

James Curran

JAMES CURRAN.—The identification of the Curran family with the United States began in the year 1842, when James Curran, Sr., accompanied by immediate family and other relatives, crossed the ocean to the new world. County Tyrone, in the north of Ireland, had been his home and the environment familiar to his entire life that had been passed at Stewartstown in the vicinity of Lough Neagh presented a striking contrast to the surroundings of his last days, passed in the then small but thriving village of Dixon, Ill., where he opened and conducted stone quarries. The next generation was represented by Daniel Curran, who was reared in Illinois and engaged in the building business and the manufacture of brick from an early age, holding a position as a foreman in New York City from 1856 until 1862. Returning from the east to Dixon, he took up brick-making in the place of his former residence and became known for the superior quality of his product as well as for the high character of his citizenship. For a long period of helpful service he was a member of the board of aldermen of Dixon and his death occurred in that city in 1902 when he had reached the age of sixty-three years. While living in New York in 1860 he had married Catherine Donahoe, who was born in county Tyrone, Ireland, and died at Dixon during January of 1873. The four sons and one daughter are still living, the eldest of these being James, who was born in New York City March 14, 1862, and is now engaged in the brick-manufacturing business at Bakersfield. Charles P., of Pomona, Cal., is proprietor of a lumber yard. Frank holds a position with a lumber firm in Los Angeles and W. H. is assistant superintendent of the coast division of the Southern Pacific railroad.

When nineteen years of age, having completed the studies of the Dixon schools, James Curran was eager to earn his own way in the world, but was so afflicted with asthma that he found it difficult to continue steadily at any work. A physician advised him to seek the inland regions of California. Crossing the continent in 1881, he soon proved to his own satisfaction that the coast region did not benefit him and after a sojourn of six months in San Francisco and a later residence in Los Angeles he sought the inland sections advised by medical authorities. Meeting Mr. Brower and referred by him to Mr. Colton, he secured employment with the Kern Island Canal Company. The day that he crossed the Tehachapi range the asthma left him, to return no more. For three years he worked on the canal and during that time he was obliged to ride at least thirty miles every day. During 1886 he was elected justice of the peace. In the same year he sent east for a machine to be used in the manufacture of brick. This arrived in 1887 and was the first machine of the kind in Southern California, all brick prior to that time having been made by hand. The sandstone brick which he began to make was the first of the kind on the Pacific coast. During 1903 the Bakersfield Sandstone Brick Company was organized with the following officers: W. S. Tevis, president; Charles J. Lindgren, vice-president; First National Bank, treasurer; and James Curran, manager, which position, together with that of a director, he has since filled with recognized ability. The company occupies twenty-six acres in East Bakersfield. The clay here found is admirably adapted to the manufacture of the finest brick and the plant has a capacity of ten million brick per annum. The newly completed office building is a model of its kind, while the warehouse, kilns and entire yards are also modern and adequate to every need of the business. The products of the plant wherever used have proved equal to the demand. Since the organization of the company in 1903 they have furnished the brick for every large building in Bakersfield.

In addition to the management of this important undertaking, Mr. Curran has been interested in agricultural affairs and realty enterprises and with Mr. Lindgren built the Western and Kern hotels, besides which he has platted a subdivision to Bakersfield, has erected a substantial residence in the city, and has been interested in oil development in the county. During the early period of his residence in the west and after the incorporation of Kern, he was elected a member of its board of trustees and served as president of the same. Later he became a director of the Bakersfield Board of Trade and a member of the Merchants' Association of this place. Fraternally he holds membership with the Knights of Pythias. Ever since attaining his majority he has supported men and measures of the Republican party. On one occasion, in 1896, his party asked him to accept the nomination for the state legislature and he consented to make the race, although the district usually gave so strong a Democratic majority that a campaign offered little hope of success. However, he came within one hundred and eighteen votes of being elected, which proved that he not only held his own party, but won many votes from the other side. Frequently he has acted as chairman of the county Republican central committee and at this writing he is still a member of that organization. During 1911 he accepted an appointment from Governor Johnson as a member of the board of trustees of the Fresno State Normal.

The marriage of James Curran took place at Rosedale ranch in 1887 and united him with Miss Mary G. Swain, by whom he is the father of eight children, namely: Mrs. Sibyl L. Chenoweth, of Bakersfield; Charles S., Valentine, Arthur, Roland, Hugh, Rosalind and Robert. Mrs. Curran was born at Loda, Iroquois county, Ill., and is a sister of Arthur Swain, receiver of the United States land office at Visalia. Her parents, Thomas Howland and Sarah (Arthur) Swain, were born on Nantucket Island. The father descended from an honored English family, identified with the Society of Friends, and represented among the very earliest settlers in the new world. Succeeding generations bore an active part in the material upbuilding of New England. The first to seek a home in the Mississippi valley was Thomas Howland Swain, who became a pioneer of Iroquois county, Ill., and took up raw land near the village of Loda. Throughout the remainder of his useful life he carried on general farming in that locality and from there in 1879 his widow removed to California, where she spent her last days with her children.

AMOS E. WARREN.—The eldest of seven sons and two daughters, Amos E. Warren was born in Orange county, Ind., September 16, 1883, and was reared in Kansas, the family having moved to that state in his early childhood. In education he was limited to a somewhat brief attendance in country schools. It was necessary for him to become self-supporting as soon as possible and hence he was deprived of all higher advantages. Upon leaving home in 1901 he went to Colorado and for a year worked in the oil fields near Florence, for seven months was employed as a tool dresser at Fort Collins and also engaged as a cowboy on a cattle ranch near Greeley. After three years in Colorado he came to California in 1904 and secured work as a pipeman in the Kern river fields. After perhaps five months with the Standard Oil Company he went over to the Imperial Oil Company, for whom he worked one year as a roustabout. Leaving this locality for the Santa Maria field in Santa Barbara county, he entered the employ of the Union Oil Company as a roustabout and tool dresser. Within one-half year, however, he was back in the Kern river fields and working as a tool dresser with the West Shore Company for several months.

G. A. Minor

Emily Daniels Minor.

Under J. L. Bruce, then the foreman of the drilling department of the Associated Oil Company, in October of 1907 Mr. Warren secured a position as tool dresser. During the fall of 1908 he began as a driller with the same organization and continued in that capacity until February of 1911. At that date he became assistant to J. A. Jones, foreman of the San Joaquin division of the Associated Oil Company, and June 1, 1912, he was promoted to his present position, that of field foreman of the Green and Whittier division of the same company, a responsible post in which he is giving satisfaction. He has established his home in the oil fields and with his wife, formerly Miss Tina Orton of Bakersfield, and their only child, Esther, has a comfortable cottage whose hospitality is always extended to other workers in these fields.

THEODORE HENRY MINOR.—As president of the Paraffine Oil Company, the Arcata Oil Company and the Mannel-Minor Petroleum Company, Mr. Minor's identification with the development of the oil industry in Kern county has continued throughout an important period of local history. Mr. Minor traces his lineage to remote English ancestry, but he belongs to a family that has been represented in America since the colonial period of national history. The early home of Revolutionary forebears was in Connecticut, but later generations became established in New Jersey and Samuel Minor, a native of the latter Commonwealth, transplanted the family name to Pennsylvania, where he earned a livelihood through the tilling of the soil. Isaac, son of Samuel, was born near Uniontown, Fayette county, Pa., and came to California via Panama during 1851. For a brief period he engaged in mining and by chance he was in Sacramento at the time of the great flood. Going to Humboldt county immediately after the Trinity river mining excitement of 1852, he there formed the acquaintance of Hannah Nixon, who was also born near Uniontown, Pa., and who became his wife and shared his responsibilities and anxieties through a long and happy wedded life. To her loyal companionship was due much of his later success. In sunlight and shadow she walked beside him, his adviser and helpmate, and not until her death in 1906 was their helpful co-operation broken. Of eastern birth and parentage, she was a daughter of Capt. Isaac Nixon, who was an early settler of Iowa from Fayette county, Pa., and started from Iowa, settling among the pioneer homesteaders of Humboldt county.

Various interests, all of them important, filled the active years of Isaac Minor. At different times he was proprietor of a mercantile store and a transportation business, farmer and stock-raiser, also a manufacturer of lumber and builder of four different mills in his home county. When advancing years and the accumulation of a competency rendered further labors unnecessary and undesirable, he retired to private life and has since enjoyed the comforts provided by the incessant labor of younger days. Of his twelve children only six remain and the eldest of these, Theodore Henry, was born at Arcata, Humboldt county, Cal., August 31, 1856. Primarily educated in Arcata schools, he later attended the California Military Academy at Oakland until his graduation in 1872, after which he assisted his father in tallying lumber. For a time he was bookkeeper in the sawmill, then assisted in the management of the mills and lumber business. After his father sold all of the lumber interests to the children in 1896, he organized the Minor Mill &

Lumber Company and continued the manufacture of lumber and shingles for shipment to San Francisco. A decade of prosperity followed his installation as president and manager of the company. Meanwhile he had acquired oil interests and during 1907 he sold his milling interests to a brother and sister, at the same time removing to Bakersfield in order to take charge of his oil holdings on the west side.

As early as January 23, 1901, the Paraffine Oil Company had been incorporated by A. W. Gilfillan, under whose supervision the first well on the Temblor lease, McKittrick, had been sunk, but the venture proved a failure. A contract was then obtained by Mr. Gilfillan personally, to drill on the north-east quarter of section 25 on 25-Hill, it being agreed that if he struck oil he was to receive a deed to forty acres. This contract he turned over to the company, but they were discouraged and the funds for this work were furnished personally by Mr. Minor. As soon as a good well was struck the deed to forty acres was turned over to the Paraffine Oil Company, and since then the company has put down six wells on the forty acres and all are producers, thus giving financial success to the concern. It is said that this was the second oil company on 25-Hill to pay dividends. Since 1905 Mr. Minor has officiated as president and since 1908 he also has acted as manager.

Taking a lease on property one mile south of their former location, Messrs. Minor and Gilfillan drilled and struck a small output of oil, after which they bought adjacent property. At the time there was no sale for oil. Later it brought thirty cents per barrel. During 1906 this lease was incorporated as the Arcata Oil Company and since then Mr. Minor has served as president and manager of the organization, which now operates on the North McKittrick front. With F. E. Mannel as partner in 1912 he organized the Mannel-Minor Petroleum Company and leased two hundred acres on the northwest Belridge front, seven miles from the Belridge wells and ten miles from the Lost Hills wells. The first oil was struck at a depth of four hundred feet, but they continued to drill to a depth of seven hundred feet. A second hole went to a depth of two thousand feet and gave them an exceptionally profitable well of twenty-five gravity oil. At this writing the first well is being deepened under the management of Mr. Mannel, who is vice-president, Mr. Minor being the president of the company. Besides all of these important oil interests he owns mining claims in Inyo county, Cal., is further interested in hydraulic mining on New river in Trinity county, this state, and has built a mill and concentrating plant at his tungsten mine near Tucson, Ariz. In addition he owns farm lands and real estate in Kern county. Ever since coming to Bakersfield he had maintained his office in the Hopkins building. At present he serves as treasurer and member of the executive committee of the Kern County Oil Protective Association, an association formed to guard against the encroachment and percolating of water into the oil sand and securing legislation to that end.

In politics Mr. Minor is a Republican, while fraternally he holds membership with Eureka Lodge No. 652, B. P. O. E., and was made a Mason in Excelsior Lodge No. 166, F. & A. M., at San Francisco. While living at Arcata he married Miss Emily Daniels, a native of that city, the daughter of Hibbird S. and Ann (Hawken) Daniels, who were natives respectively of New Hampshire and England. Mr. and Mrs. Daniels came from Illinois to California in 1853, making the way via Panama and locating in Uniontown, now the city of Arcata, Humboldt county, where Mr. Daniels engaged in farming. Upon retiring from active life they located in Los Angeles where Mrs. Daniels died her husband passing away in Fullerton. Mrs. Emily (Daniels) Minor was a graduate of Humboldt Ladies' Seminary in Eureka and is a woman of rare taste and refinement. Two sons were born to Mr. and Mrs. Minor, namely: Henry Samuel, who is engaged in the manufacture of lumber; and Herbert Hibbard, who is interested with his father in the oil industry and mining claims.

A. W. Gilfillan

The family hold membership with the First Presbyterian Church of Bakersfield and Mr. Minor is giving most efficient service as chairman of its board of trustees, besides serving as a member of the board of elders. While he was chairman of the board the new Gothic structure was erected at the corner of H and Seventeenth streets, costing $25,000. It has a seating capacity of five hundred and is so arranged that the large Sunday school department may be separated into sixteen rooms for class purposes. The basement is fitted up as a social hall and equipped for a gymnasium. The plan had been the wish of Mr. Minor for years, and he and his co-workers feel amply repaid for their efforts. Mr. Minor was selected by the San Joaquin Presbytery one of six commissioners to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America held at Atlanta, Ga., May 15 to 24, 1913. Accompanied by Mrs. Minor he attended and took part in the important proceedings of that assembly.

ADAM WILLIAM GILFILLAN.—Of English birth and ancestry, A. W. Gilfillan was born at Greenwich, England, during the year 1854, but was brought to the United States in early childhood and passed the years of youth at Troy, N. Y., where he attended the public schools. When seventeen years of age he began to work in the oil fields of the Bradford district in Pennsylvania. He seemed to possess natural ability in the oil industry. With keen judgment and energetic resourcefulness he quickly grasped every detail of the business and while yet a young man came to be known as one of the shrewdest oil operators in his district. Upon leaving the oil fields of Pennsylvania for those of California he became identified with the Puente district and there put down the first well for Rowland & Lacy, the head of that firm having been Hon. William R. Rowland, ex-sheriff of Los Angeles county. When the work had been completed successfully and promptly in the Puente district he went to the oil fields of Northern California and put down a well in Humboldt county, but that enterprise did not prove a success. A later connection with the mining industry on the Mother Lode in Tuolumne, Calaveras and Mariposa counties also proved unsuccessful. In 1900 he came to Bakersfield and became one of the pioneers of the oil industry in Kern county and the first to operate in the Midway district. After he had taken contracts for drilling and had struck oil, he then promoted the Paraffine Oil Company, on section 25, Midway district, and of this he was acting as general manager and vice-president at the time of his sudden death June 9, 1907.

The marriage of Mr. Gilfillan took place in San Jose, this state, and united him with Miss Mary Moore, who was born at Holton, Kan., and is a graduate of the normal department of the University of Kansas at Lawrence. By ability and temperament Mrs. Gilfillan was well qualified to be a helpmate to her husband, whose ventures she promoted by her constant encouragement and whose hopes she fostered by her cheerful sympathy. In addition, she is the possessor of business ability of an high order. When the sudden death of her husband threw his large interests into her care, she proved equal to the most trying emergency and since then has managed the estate with tact, energy and discretion. In inheriting his property, she became the largest stockholder in the Paraffine Oil Company, which ranks as one of the most successful oil concerns along the coast. Of this company she is vice-president and a member of the board of directors. From her husband she also inherited a one-half interest in the Arcata Oil Company, but this has been sold to the Santa Fe Oil Company. In addition she was largely interested in the Lost Hills district, where she was a fortunate seller of oil land at $1,000 per acre. She has lately become interested in horticulture and has purchased three hundred and twenty acres at Edison, which she will devote principally to the growing of citrus fruits. It has been demonstrated that the region is one of the most successful for the cultivation of oranges in California and she is planning to use her means and time to develop the horticultural resources of her adopted county, where she has met with such gratifying success. While giving her attention very closely to the management of the important interests bequeathed her by Mr. Gilfillan, she has kept in touch with political problems and always has maintained a sympathy with Democratic principles, as did also her husband; besides these and other interests she has occupied an enviable social position in Bakersfield, has been identified with the Woman's Club in its civic projects and public-spirited enterprises, and has manifested a deep devotion to the permanent progress of her home city.

HAMILTON FARRIS.—The secretary of the board of health of Bakersfield, who also fills the position of health officer, has witnessed the development of Kern county through a considerable period of progress and with others originated the movement that resulted in the consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern, a decidedly forward step in local upbuilding. Although not a native Californian, nor indeed a native of the United States, he is most patriotic in impulses, loyal in sentiment and true to every measure making for the advancement of his adopted home. Of Canadian birth and parentage, he was born at Arcona, Ontario, February 19, 1869, and was the eldest among three children comprising the family of George and Sarah (Mellen) Farris. While yet a young woman the mother was taken by death from home and children and Hamilton was only thirteen when his father, a skilled blacksmith and man of honorable principles, passed away, leaving the children with little means. Friends, however, came to their aid. The eldest child was taken from school and apprenticed to the trade of a blacksmith at Arcona, where he continued for three years. Being then free to make his own plans for the future, he entered railroading and secured employment as checker in the freight office of the Grand Trunk Railroad. Later he became a brakeman with the same company. Four years were spent with the Grand Trunk Railroad, after which in 1889 he came to California and found work as a brakeman with the Southern Pacific, having for a time a run between Bakersfield and Lathrop in San Joaquin county.

Securing a position as clerk in the old Central hotel in Kern in 1894, Mr. Farris left the road, but at the expiration of three and one-half years in the hotel he went to work in the Southern Pacific freight house as night foreman. At the expiration of one year he resumed work as a brakeman and continued in the same work until 1902, when he was elected marshal. On two separate occasions he was re-elected marshal. During 1907 he resigned that position to become deputy county clerk and continued as such until the spring of 1910, when he went to the Kern river oil field as a foreman for the Associated Oil Company. Resigning and returning to East Bakersfield in October of 1912, two months afterward he was appointed health officer and secretary of the board of health, since which time he has devoted his entire time and the closest attention to the careful discharge of every duty connected with the responsible place. In politics he always has supported Democratic principles. Fraternally he holds membership with the Knights of Pythias. His marriage was solemnized in Chicago, Ill., and united him with Miss Matilda Parkinson, who was born in Ontario and died in East Bakersfield November 14, 1912, leaving three children, namely: Clifford, now employed by the Associated Oil Company in the Kern river field; Floyd, an employe of the Wells-Fargo Express Company in Bakersfield; and Olga, who since the death of her mother has presided over the family home and ministered to the comfort and welfare of her father.

W. R. LEAKE.—From his earliest memories Mr. Leake has been familiar with the oil industry in all of its phases. Nor have his experiences been limited to one field or to one state. On the other hand, he has been employed in fields in various parts of the country, notably in Pennsylvania, where his boyhood years were passed, and in California, where for more than a decade he has been associated with the development of the business. With the early history of the industry in the Midway field he became connected through his arrival in September, 1909, at Taft, then known as Moron. The West Side Oil Company, a close corporation with five principal stockholders (all residing in Los Angeles), selected him to take charge of their lease of eight acres, situated on section 25, township 32, range 23, and for that purpose he came from Los Angeles to Kern county at the time mentioned, since which he has had charge of three producing wells that form the holdings of the small but prosperous corporation.

Near Bath, Steuben county, N. Y., W. R. Leake was born February 11, 1869, being the only son of William H. and Amanda (Beebe) Leake, natives of New York state. The two daughters in the family are India and Inez A., the former married to Charles Hanks, a prosperous oil operator of Ohio and Pennsylvania. During the Civil war William H. Leake served for four years and four months and received an honorable discharge at the close of the struggle, after which he became interested in the oil business. When his son, William R., was an infant the family removed to Pennsylvania and settled in Butler county, later going to the Bradford field in the same state. In fact, the father visited almost every eastern oil field at some period and he became a very successful producer, besides owning some wells in Ohio. Nor did his activities lessen with advancing years. At the time of his death, which occurred when he was seventy-four years of age, he was at Beaumont, Tex., as superintendent for the Higgins Oil Company at Spindletop.

Educated in the grammar schools of Butler county, Pa., followed by a business course in the Tidioute high school in Warren county, that state, Mr. Leake became a regular worker in the Pennsylvania oil fields when he was eighteen years of age. His first work as a production man was with the Clinton Oil Company. For ten busy years he was an operator in the West Virginia fields and for two years he was associated with the development of the oil field near Boulder, Colo., whence in 1902 he came to California and sought the Coalinga field. After a long term of service as superintendent first with the K. C. Oil Company and then with the New Era Oil Company, he came down to Taft during September of 1909, since which time he has engaged as superintendent of the West Side Oil Company. A most capable assistant in his counsels and business enterprises is his wife, whom he married in Elk county, Pa., May 5, 1891, and who was Miss Martha M. Parker, daughter of W. H. Parker, a prominent oil operator in Pennsylvania. Thousands of acres of oil lands were held by the family. By the marriage of Mr. Parker to a Miss Hilliard, a native of Clarion county, Pa., there were seven children, namely: Alice, whose husband, Charles Brick, is superintendent of the National Gas Company at Youngstown, Ohio; W. O., a contracting driller at Dewey, Okla.; Martha M., Mrs. Leake; May, wife of Alfred Williams, of Youngstown, Ohio; Stella, who married F. B. Long, a driller now living at Waynesburg, Pa.; Charles S., a plumber engaged in business in West Virginia; and John, who has charge of an oil company's lease at Junction City, Ohio. Mrs. May Williams was first married to J. M. Leyman, a successful oil man, who for twenty years engaged as superintendent of the Jennings Oil Company and who held the confidence of operators in that industry throughout the east. The only child of Mr. and Mrs. Leake, Irene Romain, is the wife of Wade S. Fitch, of Los Angeles, and the mother of a daughter, Frances Irene Fitch.

CHARLES EUGENE DAY.—To the people among whom Mr. Day has lived since the year 1877, and who have learned to appreciate his splendid traits of character as a man and his tact as an official, there comes a feeling of pride in any recital of his achievements as a marksman, for in tournaments and contests in this part of the state he carried the record for years and made the best score ever achieved by crack shots. With one shell he has killed seventy quail and inside of seventy-nine days he shot eleven thousand. In one day with twenty-two shots he obtained four hundred and forty-six quail, following the next day with four hundred and fourteen, while on the third day he brought down three hundred and forty. His hunting expeditions have not been limited to Kern, Tulare, San Luis Obispo and Santa Barbara counties, but have extended as far south as the line of Mexico, and in the early days he made a specialty of shipping deer and quail to the San Francisco markets.

If skill in marksmanship may be denominated a matter of heredity then it may be said of Mr. Day that he inherited his expertness as a shot from his father, who was one of the noted hunters of his day and locality. A member of an old family of New York and himself during early manhood a farmer in Wyandot county, Ohio, the father, John Day, served in an Ohio regiment during the Civil war and became known among members of his company for his skill with a rifle. At the expiration of his term of service he received an honorable discharge, returned to his home in Ohio and at once made preparations to cross the plains to California. During the progress of the trip, which was made with wagons and ox-teams in 1864, he supplied the camp with an abundance of game and many a bear, buffalo and antelope fell as a tribute to his unerring marksmanship.

Some years prior to the removal of John Day to the west he had married Miss Harriet Bristol, a native of Wyandot county, Ohio, and a daughter of William Bristol, for years employed there as railroad and express agent. They became the parents of four children, the three daughters being Mrs. Della Griffin, of Oakland; Mrs. Alice Simpson, who lives near Bakersfield, and Mrs. Clara Knight, of Rosedale. The only son, Charles E., was born in Ohio March 18, 1862, and was three years of age when he was brought by his mother to California via Panama, joining his father on a farm near Lakeville, Sonoma county. During 1868 the family removed to a large farm on Marsh creek near Brentwood, Contra Costa county, where the father undertook grain farming on a large scale. At first he met with unusual success, but two years of continuous drought caused him a loss of all the accumulations of years. Removing to Calistoga, Napa county, in 1874, he engaged in hunting in the mountains and shipped deer and bear to the San Francisco markets. During the fall of 1876, with the assistance of his only son, he began to hunt quail for the city markets, and on this expedition he traveled through Ventura and Los Angeles counties, then came up to Kern county, where he found surroundings so greatly to his liking that he located at Bakersfield April 25, 1877. Soon afterward he bought forty acres five miles south of town under the Kern Island canal and there he began to raise fruit and alfalfa, afterward enlarging the tract by the purchase of another forty. In addition to farming he still engaged in hunting for game in the hills. February 28, 1882, when about fifty years of age, the team which he was driving ran away, threw him into the canal and he was drowned. Some years later his widow was married to J. W. Fitzgerald and at this writing she lives in East Bakersfield.

After the death of his father Charles E. Day took charge of the home farm in the interests of his mother and sisters and for twenty-one years he operated one place. Besides engaging in farming and stock-raising he hunted deer and quail to ship to the San Francisco markets. From young manhood he has been a stanch Democrat. During 1894 his party nominated him for county tax collector. Duly elected, he took the oath of office in January of 1895. In 1898, 1902, 1906 and 1910 he was re-elected, the last time without any opposition whatever. His present term will expire in January of 1915. While giving due attention to the responsibilities of the office he also continued farming until 1910, when he disposed of his interests in the county. The residence which he erected and occupies in East Bakersfield is presided over hospitably by Mrs. Day, formerly Miss Susie Dragoo, who was born, reared and married at Martinez, Contra Costa county, being the daughter of a pioneer physician of that village. The only child of the union, Leona, is married to Palo Autrand and lives in East Bakersfield. The fraternal associations of Mr. Day are numerous and important and include membership in the Knights of Pythias, in which he has been a leading officer, besides being with his wife connected with the kindred organization of Pythian Sisters. In addition he belongs to the Woodmen of the World, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Eagles, Independent Order of Foresters, Fraternal Brotherhood and Ancient Order of United Workmen.

Charles Eugene Day.

GORDON WALLACE WATSON.—The lineage of the Watson family in America is traced back to the Gordon clan, inseparably associated with the early history of the highlands and illustrious in many of the ancient wars of Scotland. In leaving his native city of Aberdeen to cast in his fortunes with the new world, Gordon Wallace, Sr., gave up associations endeared to him from earliest memories and from the family traditions concerning bygone centuries. Shortly after his marriage to Miss Annie White in London, England, he had migrated with his young wife to Canada and later came to the States. For years he engaged in contracting and building at Jersey City, N. J., where both he and his wife passed their last years. The eldest of their five children, born at Jersey City, N. J., December 8, 1868, was given the name of his father, thus carrying into another generation the old Scotch patronymics of ancestral associations. During infancy he was taken to Toronto, Canada, but at the age of six years accompanied his parents in a permanent removal to Jersey City, where he attended the public schools and also learned the trade of carpenter.

During a trip to Europe in 1901 Mr. Watson formed the acquaintance of Miss Janetta Haley in Leeds, Yorkshire, England, and they were married in March of the following year. Mrs. Watson was born in Yorkshire, being a daughter of Henry and Eliza Margaret (Eastwood) Haley, residents of Bramley, Leeds, where Mr. Haley engaged in business as a woolen manufacturer. The Haley family traces its lineage to Celtic ancestry. As early as 1675 some of the name removed from Ireland to England, where later generations engaged in business pursuits and were among the first manufacturers of woolen goods at Leeds, beginning with the old hand looms and gradually growing into an extensive business with the largest and most modern machinery for the manufacture of woolen goods. The family accumulated great wealth and a high social position.

The month after their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Watson arrived in Jersey City and established a home at that place, where he engaged in carpentering. During 1905 they came to California for the first time and found the west attractive and alluring. Establishing a home in Bakersfield, Cal., in November of 1907, Mr. Watson followed the trade of carpenter, also was identified with different branches of the building trades and assisted in the organization of the Building Trades Council, of which he served as business agent for two years. For some time he has been engaged in the building business in Bakersfield, where he has a reputation for reliability as a contractor, progressive spirit as a citizen and dispatch as a worker. Although an active worker for the benefit of the Democratic party, he has never sought office nor has he been willing to accept political positions. In religious faith he and his wife are Episcopalians. Devoted to the welfare of their adopted city, they have the utmost faith in its material growth and promising future. Since coming to this city they have purchased a number of residence lots and have erected and still own five bungalows of a modern and attractive type of architecture. Their family consists of three children, Margaret Rutherford, Gordon Bruce and Donald Keith.

J. THOMAS JOHNSON, M. D.—Professional connection with the United States navy in the capacity of surgeon with the rank of lieutenant-commander gave Dr. Johnson a wide experience in the practice of materia medica and brought to him an important responsibility in the management of naval hospitals in the east. The selection of his life work was happily made. Natural qualifications adapted him for skill in therapeutics. From the beginning of his practice he has exhibited skill in the diagnosis of disease and efficiency in the selection of remedial agencies. Since he came to Kern county and opened a hospital at Fellows, he has risen to a high rank professionally in this new town, the "gem of the foothills." Much of his early life was passed in Chicago, where he was born May 18, 1882, and where his father, Thomas Johnson, was a member of the livestock commission firm of Johnson & Wilson, at the Union Stock Yards. He spent considerable time in Iowa while a young man and when the Spanish-American war broke out he was living at Des Moines, from which city he enlisted in Company B, Fifty-second Iowa Volunteer Infantry. He went into camp at Chickamauga Park, Ga., and later was transferred to Company D, Forty-ninth Iowa Volunteer Infantry. With this regiment he went to Cuba and remained until the close of hostilities.

From early youth he had felt a drawing to the medical profession and after he had received his honorable discharge from the army he determined to take up the study of pharmacy. He entered the Highland Park College of Pharmacy at Des Moines, Iowa, and graduated from there in June, 1901. After he had received actual experience in drug stores, at various places for a while, he opened up a drug store at Story City, Iowa, which he ran successfully and sold out to advantage in time to matriculate at the medical department of Drake University at Des Moines, Iowa, in the fall of 1903, and thus carry out his cherished plans to become an M. D. He continued two years at Drake University and finished up by taking the last two years of a four-year medical course at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, from which he graduated with the degree of M. D., class of 1907.

To one of his ambitious and aspiring mind, the completion of a medical course did not signalize a cessation of study. On the other hand, he became very solicitous in enlarging his medical knowledge so that he might be better qualified to practice with success. For a time he served as an interne in the Philadelphia hospital and for two years he had the advantage of experience in Bellevue hospital in New York City. About 1909 he was commissioned surgeon in the United States navy, and assigned to duty at the naval hospital in Philadelphia. Soon he was transferred to Washington, D. C., and during his leisure hours in that city he took a post-graduate course in a medical school. Next he had a brief experience in the New York City naval hospital and from there was transferred to the battleship Mississippi, after which he was assigned to recruiting duty in Chicago. From there he was ordered to San Francisco and there in May, 1911, resigned his commission.

Immediately after he resigned as surgeon in the navy Dr. Johnson came to Fellows and opened an office for practice, also acquired the pharmacy establishment known as The Fellows Drug Company's store. Since he arrived here in June, 1911, he has won the confidence of the people, who recognize in him a surgeon of unusual skill and an experienced physician. While his practice is general and includes the treatment of disease in every form, he has specialized in the treatment of diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat, and surgery. The need of a local hospital led him to interest himself in that work shortly after he had located here and he organized a hospital association of eight hundred members, of which he is now the president. The concern was incorporated in January, 1912, and the hospital was opened on the 10th of February, affording to the people of the vicinity a modern institution equipped with every convenience for the care of the sick. Before coming to the west Dr. Johnson joined the Knights of Pythias at Des Moines, also Des Moines Lodge No. 98, B. P. O. E., and the blue lodge of Masons. He is a member of the Fellows Chamber of Commerce.

J Temple Taylor

JOHN TEMPLE TAYLOR.—When the colonial wars were calling for the stalwart young men of the new world to assist in the defence of their adopted country among those who responded were several members of the Taylor and Temple families, representatives of the F. F. V's of Virginia and imbued with the patriotic loyalty characteristic of every generation back to the English progenitors. The outbreak of the Revolution found the men of that generation eager to respond to the call of the colonies for help and willing to sacrifice money, time, and, if need be, their lives to aid in securing independence for their country. In the later years of peace the family prospered and acquired large Virginian plantations. On one of these estates lived Richard and Elizabeth (Temple) Taylor, whose son, John R. Taylor, M. D., was born and reared at the old homestead in Hanover county and was given exceptional educational advantages that culminated in a course of study in that famous Philadelphia institution, the Jefferson Medical College. Upon receiving the degree of M. D. from that college he returned to Virginia and purposed to devote his entire life to professional labors, but more and more the management of his lands began to engross his attention and finally he retired from practice in order to give his time to landed interests in different parts of Virginia. For years prior to his demise he made his home at a picturesque old plantation, Fall Hill, situated near Fredericksburg, Va., overlooking the Rappahannock river. On that place occurred the birth of his son, John Temple, February 16, 1845. There too were born the five other children comprising the family and there also the mother spent her last days, so that the endearing associations of both happy and sad memories clustered around the old homestead. Three of the children are still living. Of the five sons four bore arms for the Confederacy during the Civil war and one of these, Capt. Murray F. Taylor, a member of the staff of Gen. A. P. Hill, after the war came to California, secured employment in Kern county, rose to be superintendent of the Stockdale ranch and some years later returned to Virginia, where he died.

Attendance at the Virginia Military Institute at Lexington, Va., was brought to an abrupt close in 1862, when John Temple Taylor abandoned the practice work and drills on the college campus for actual service in the field. At the time of his enlistment in Company B, Ninth Virginia Cavalry, he was a youth of seventeen years, courageous and enthusiastic, glad to enlist in the cause of the south where his life had been passed and where generations of his ancestors had lived and labored. The regiment to which he was assigned and in which he continued until the close of the war, served around Richmond and in other parts of Virginia, taking part in the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, the Shenandoah valley, Petersburg, etc. In several battles he received saber wounds, at Ashland he was wounded by a bullet in the right shoulder and at Five Forks his horse was shot from under him, but he escaped by securing and mounting a riderless horse. Upon the close of the war he returned to the Fall Hill plantation, but in the fall of the same year (1865) he moved to the Hayes plantation in King George county, on the Rappahannock river, twelve miles below Fredericksburg. This plantation he owned throughout life, although for years it was leased to other parties.

Coming to California in 1875, Mr. Taylor joined a relative, Dr. George F. Thornton, the general superintendent for J. B. Haggin. This relative gave him employment as a foreman. One year later he was made superintendent of the Bellevue ranch, which property he developed and put under cultivation. On account of failing health in 1883 he went to Contra Costa county to recuperate and while there he engaged in farming. With strength renewed in 1887 he returned to Kern county and again became an employe of J. B. Haggin. In 1891, when his brother, Capt. M. F. Taylor, returned to Virginia, he became superintendent of the Stockdale, Bellevue, Buena Vista and McClung ranches. Later he was tendered a similar position on the Canfield ranch. Upon the formation of the Kern County Land Company he was retained as superintendent of all of these various ranches. At the same time he himself became a property owner and invested in valuable residential sections of Bakersfield and Los Angeles. Mr. Taylor's son, Wallace Temple, is a railroad and general contractor with headquarters in Los Angeles. Through all of his life John Temple Taylor was stanchly devoted to Democratic principles. Some years ago he was chosen a member of the county Democratic central committee and his service in that capacity, as in every other association of political or business life, reflected his own strength of character, energy of temperament and high ideals of citizenship. Bakersfield mourned the loss of one of her most dependable citizens when John Temple Taylor passed from earth August 23, 1913. His remains were buried in Bakersfield cemetery by the side of his brother, Capt. Murray F. Taylor.

GEORGE MOLIDOR.—The rotary disc bit, which was invented through the combined efforts of T. F. Litaker and George Molidor in 1910 and later covered by patents in this and foreign countries, is a device that will work quickly and successfully in all formations, thus rendering unnecessary the changing of bits when another formation is struck. October 15, 1912, the Rotary Disc Bit Company was incorporated, the two hundred shares being held by the gentlemen named, together with R. U. Harris and W. J. Holland. Arrangements have been made whereby the Oil Well Supply Company of Los Angeles will undertake the manufacture of the bit on a royalty basis and as this concern has about one hundred and fifteen branch stores in the various oil fields of the world, it would appear that the bit will soon become well-known among oil operators everywhere.

Since the organization of the company its president, Mr. Molidor, has traveled as a salesman introducing the bit into different oil fields, and he finds that oil men are interested in the device by reason of its simplicity of construction and the fact that there are no delicate parts. The discs and pins are the only parts upon which there is any wear, and these can be replaced quickly and at small expense. The discs are made of manganese steel and are so constructed that they keep a cutting edge. As the discs revolve on their pins they have over sixty inches of cutting surface. Another advantage of the rotary disc bit is that it uses only one-third the amount of steam required for a fish tail. This means there is very little strain on the drill pipe and the danger of twisting the pipe is reduced to a minimum. In drilling with the bit it is necessary to feed slowly or the pumps will be choked. On the LaBelle lease on section 4, 32-23, near Fellows, at a depth of three hundred and thirty-seven feet, in ten hours and ten minutes of actual drilling, a soft formation was struck and the drillers put in a fish tail, which ran through the formation, struck coarse gravel and lasted only thirty minutes. The disc bit was again used and made nine feet in boulders in one hour and thirty minutes. As the discs and pins were worn the disc bit was taken out and the fish tail put in, which made ten feet in fifty minutes and then had to be dressed. The formation consisted of sand and gravel, two hundred and seventy-four feet; gypsum, thirty feet; soft clay, twenty feet; and boulders, twenty-two feet.

The president of the company is of American birth and German parentage and belongs to a family noted for rugged physique and sturdy constitution. His father, Henry G., a native of Hanover, Germany, crossed the ocean at the age of twenty-one and settled in Ohio, where he followed his trade of merchant tailor. After a few years he moved to Springfield, Ill., and followed the same trade. Later he went to Kansas and bought a farm southeast of Independence. While living in Ohio he was married at Radnor to Miss Katherine May, a native of the Buckeye state. Both he and his wife are deceased and their farm, which still remains intact as an estate, has become valuable oil land, since about 1904 oil having been pumped daily from three wells. The parental family consisted of five sons and three daughters. The second son, George, was twenty-one at the time of the removal to Kansas. After two years on the farm near Independence he went to the mountains and engaged in prospecting for gold. Four years were spent near Leadville. Upon his return to Kansas he engaged in ranching and also with two brothers and another gentleman engaged in operating a threshing machine. Meanwhile he had married Miss Mary Hayes, of Independence, who died on the farm near that town in 1909, leaving six children, namely: Gertrude, George A., Paul A., Nellie, Katherine and Genevieve. The elder son, George A., now in school, has devoted his vacations to the driving of a transfer wagon at Fellows and to employment in the Jones drug store, but is especially fond of mechanical work and intends to take up work with machinery upon leaving school. The second son, Paul A., is now employed in the Jones drug store. In 1911 Mr. Molidor married Miss Nellie Mills, who was born and reared in London, and of that union there is a daughter, Frances Irene, born in December, 1912.

A most serious disaster befell Mr. Molidor with the burning of his buildings in Fellows on Christmas eve of 1911, when he and his family were left without means and with almost no clothing. Encouraged by his wife and children, he took up transfer work and anything that it was possible for him to do, but in the meantime he had been interested in the rotary disc bit and now devotes his entire attention to its sale. For five years he worked in oil fields and by actual experience he has become familiar with every phase of that industry except drilling. Inventive ability has been one of his characteristics from early life. While living in Kansas he invented a combination can-opener, meat and vegetable chopper and ice shaver, and sold one-half interest in the invention for an amount that enabled him to put up a factory building at Independence in 1890. Other inventions are also to his credit and it is his chief ambition to erect a factory wherein several of his inventions may be manufactured. The ambition may be unrealized for a few years, but there is every reason to believe that eventually his hope will be realized. From early years he and his wife have been identified with the Catholic Church, and while in Kansas he was an active worker in the Knights of Columbus at Independence. In that town he was likewise prominent among the Woodmen of the World.

JOHN T. GREEN.—It was in Tulare, Cal., that J. T. Green was born March 12, 1884. He entered school when seven years old and when he was nine he was taken by his parents to Lemoore on their removal to that town. There he was graduated from the grammar school and devoted a year to high school attendance, and in 1904 he was duly graduated, at the end of the prescribed course of study, from the San Francisco business college. That same year he came to Kern county and for four years thereafter he was employed in the motive power department of the Southern Pacific railroad. In 1908 he came to Wasco to become manager of the Hayes & Murray general merchandise store, which he bought a year later and conducted until 1911, when he disposed of it in order to engage in the real estate business. He was appointed postmaster of Wasco May 27, 1909, and has ably filled that office ever since. He established the first barber shop in Wasco, encouraged the opening of the first butcher shop there and was instrumental in the installation of the first newspaper plant in the town, that of the Wasco News. He is the commercial agent for the Universal as well as the Associated Oil Companies. Another of his activities is his energetic management of the Wasco Land Company. It will be seen that not only as a real estate man, but in numerous other ways he has done much for the upbuilding of Wasco. He owns four residences in the town, his home lot consisting of two and a half acres, as well as three business lots. In 1912 he erected a large brick building, 60x70 feet, occupied by two stores and the postoffice, which is located centrally on the main business street. Since 1909 Mr. Green has held a commission as notary public.

On November 5, 1909, Mr. Green married Miss Pearl S. Lobb, who was born at Traver, Tulare county, Cal., August 25, 1887, and they have one child, Gwen Adell Green. Fraternally he affiliates with Delano Lodge, F. & A. M., with the Bakersfield Lodge, I. O. O. F., and with the local organization of the Modern Woodmen of America, of which latter he was a charter member.

EDWARD W. CRAGHILL.—Three generations of the Craghill family have been identified with the material development of California and the manager of the King Lumber Company at Fellows represents the third generation, being a grandson of Charles Craghill, the founder of the family on the shores of the Pacific. That gentleman, who was a native of London, England, but a citizen of the United States from early life, engaged in agricultural pursuits in Iowa prior to the Civil war. With characteristic loyalty to the country of his adoption he enlisted under the stars and stripes and rose to the rank of quartermaster in an Iowa regiment of infantry. Receiving an honorable discharge at the close of the war, he returned to Iowa, but in a short time disposed of his holdings in that state and came to California accompanied by his wife and children. Selecting a location near Santa Cruz, he turned his attention to the tilling of the soil. In the community he rose to a position of considerable local influence and the highest reputation for probity and intelligence. For twenty years he gave impartial service in the office of justice of the peace. His life was prolonged to old age and he passed away in 1911 after an intimate and interested identification with his section of the state.

When the family came from Iowa to California Thomas E. Craghill, a native of the former commonwealth, was a small child, hence the greater part of his life has been passed in the west. During young manhood he engaged in teaming at Santa Cruz. For many years he raised stock and grain on a ranch near San Luis Obispo, but at this writing he operates a cattle ranch in Tulare county near the village of Corcoran. By marriage to Vianna McLaughlin, a native of Santa Cruz, he became connected with another prominent pioneer family of the western country. In a very early period of California colonization her father, Daniel McLaughlin, a native of Maine, crossed the plains with ox-teams and wagons and became a pioneer of the vast undeveloped regions of the west. Somewhat later he married at Santa Cruz Miss Helen Rice, who had accompanied her parents across the plains and, like himself, claimed Maine as her native commonwealth. After their marriage they engaged in general farming, with a specialty of horticulture.

Andrew. Freiligh

The eldest of the seven children of Thomas E. and Vianna Craghill is Edward W. Craghill, born on the ranch in San Luis Obispo county March 24, 1887, and educated in country schools near the old home. After leaving school he clerked in San Francisco for a short time, then went to Corcoran to assist his father in the cattle industry, but soon became an employe of the Cross Lumber Company. After two years with the concern, during a portion of which time he served as assistant manager, he came to Fellows in September of 1910 as an employe of the King Lumber Company. In a short time he was transferred to Wasco to act as manager for the company at that point, but in April, 1912, was sent back to Fellows, where he since has been manager of the yards. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce.

ANDREW FRELIGH.—Coming to California in 1870 with the hope that the change of climate might benefit his impaired health, Mr. Freligh arrived in Kern county during 1876 and settled during 1880 upon the ranch where he still lives and labors. The interim has been devoted to the stock business. Up to the year 1882 he specialized with sheep, but a number of heavy losses led him to dispose of his flocks and devote his attention to hogs, horses and cattle. At this writing he owns six hundred head of stock. His quiet, retiring disposition impels him to find his highest pleasure on his home ranch and in the care of his stock.

Born on the bank of Seneca Lake, in Seneca county, N. Y., September 12, 1850, Andrew Freligh received a public-school education and upon leaving school went via Michigan to Prairie City, Kans., where he found employment on farms and remained for two years. Ill health caused him to come to the Pacific coast in 1870 and from San Francisco he moved to Alameda county, where he worked as an orchardist at Haywoods for two years, concentrating his attention upon the raising of deciduous fruits. Concluding then to engage in the sheep industry, he started in business at Jones' Ferry, Fresno county, at first having about three hundred head of sheep. In order to secure range for the flock he went into different parts of Fresno county and traveled through that district when there was not a single house on the present site of the flourishing city of Fresno. He saw the town started and attended the first Fourth of July celebration. With the intention of finding suitable range for his sheep he came into Kern county in 1876 and four years later he settled on his present ranch, where in partnership with an uncle, George Kinnie, he bought eight hundred acres, sixteen miles west of Bakersfield. The uncle deciding to leave in 1884 sold his interest in the land to Mr. Blodgett and since then Mr. Freligh has run the ranch, raising and selling horses, hogs and cattle, and making a specialty of raising draft horses of the Norman strain and Durham cattle. Six hundred acres of the ranch are under irrigation and in alfalfa.

JOSEPH J. MARSHALL.—An early identification with American development along the Atlantic seaboard is attested by the Marshall family genealogy, which also indicates patriotic loyalty to country and a courageous participation in many a fiercely contested battle. During the Civil war George Marshall, a native of New York City, offered his services to the Union and was assigned to service in the One Hundred and Third New York Infantry, with which he went to the front and aided in the quelling of the rebellion. During the early '70s he became an employe in the St. Louis postoffice and the efficiency of his services is shown by the fact that he has remained in the department from that time to the present, being now with two exceptions the oldest employe in that great office. He and his wife, formerly Mary M. Francis, who was born in Davenport, Iowa, have a family of eleven children. The second of these, Joseph J., was born in the city of St. Louis, April 4, 1875, and received an excellent education in the public schools and Christian Brothers College. Immediately after leaving college he became an apprentice to the trade of carpenter. Inheriting the military spirit of his ancestors, he entered the army in 1895 and was assigned to Troop I, Second United States Cavalry, with which he served at Fort Logan for three years. Within fifteen minutes after his honorable discharge in April, 1898, he had re-enlisted in the same troop for service in the Spanish-American war. Under general orders he received an honorable discharge at Huntsville, Ala., in January, 1899, after which he returned to St. Louis and completed his trade. In that city occurred his marriage to Miss Louise Rathert, who was born, reared and educated there, and who shares with him the good-will of the people of their home town.

An experience as carpenter in Mexico gave to Mr. Marshall some knowledge of conditions in that country, where he worked first at Mazatlan and later at Empalme in the state of Sonora. From 1907 until he came to Fellows in 1910 he spent much of the time in Mexico, as foreman of the construction department for buildings erected by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. When he came to the oil fields he was well equipped for successful work in the building business. At Fellows he aided in the erection of some of the first buildings and became a member of the firm of Ramage & Marshall, the first partnership of builders in the new settlement. The partnership was later dissolved and in January, 1912, with L. H. Moon, he started the M. & M. Construction Company, which has had the contracts for the improvements on twenty or more leases, has erected houses and improved business property, and has built the largest bunk-houses in the oil fields of the west side, including Maricopa, Taft, Fellows and McKittrick. Besides keeping busily employed at his trade, Mr. Marshall is interested in the Fellows Sutorium and is a worker for the Chamber of Commerce as well as other local organizations of merit. The Republican party has received his ballot in all general elections.

M. A. DUNCAN.—The Duncan family comes of a long line of sturdy, law-abiding people, who founded family pride upon unsullied lives and patriotic service and who cherished an altruistic spirit in all the relations of life. The fine qualities of the race came to them from a long line of Scotch forebears and when Willis Duncan, a native of Scotland, established the family name and fortunes in the new world there were transplanted in this country the sturdy honesty and irreproachable integrity characteristic of elder generations. From Willis the line is traced through his son, Gavin Bennett Duncan, to the next generation, represented by M. A., of Bakersfield, the latter being a grandson through his mother, Eliza, of Joel Frazier, long a resident of Kentucky, but a native of Ireland, being a member of a family that fled from Scotland to Ireland at the time of the religious persecutions. Ten children formed the family of Gavin Bennett and Eliza (Frazier) Duncan. One of these, the youngest and the last survivor, M. A., was born on the home farm in Adams county, Ill., August 24, 1850, there made himself useful in the care of the stock and the tilling of the soil as soon as large enough for such work. In that locality he met and married Miss Emma Lehman, likewise a native of Adams county. Four children were born of their union, namely: Alta Lelah, wife of Edward L. Hougham, manager of the store of M. A. Duncan & Co., in Bakersfield; Eugene B., also of Bakersfield; Nellie Lenora, Mrs. Arthur S. Crites; and Anna Bertram, at home.

Arriving in Bakersfield December 21, 1899, Mr. Duncan immediately made preparations to embark in the grocery business. From the first he retained as manager his son-in-law, Edward L. Hougham, formerly manager of a wholesale and retail grocery business at Manhattan, Kan. The establishment has been conducted along lines of honor and integrity and success has been its portion. In point of years of active business as a grocer Mr. Duncan has been considered the pioneer in the city, his only predecessor in the place having been A. Weill, whose store is somewhat different by reason of being conducted upon the department plan. The establishment of M. A. Duncan & Co., (of which, notwithstanding the "Company," Mr. Duncan is the sole owner), has given steady employment to five experienced salesmen, who under the efficient supervision of the manager fill every requirement of customers with dispatch, care and keen attention to details. The central location at 1801 Chester avenue has been an aid in the building up of a permanent trade and securing a large patronage; but even more important than the location has been the reputation for the observance of the pure food laws.

Thos. A. Metcalf

After coming to California and settling in this city Mr. Duncan became a leading worker in Masonry and a prominent member of the Royal Arch Chapter. In addition he also identified himself with the Modern Woodmen of America. Having the efficient supervision of his son-in-law in the store, it became possible for him to relax from business tension and enjoy the social amenities of life. Early in his citizenship he won his way to the confidence of the people here and gained many friends. Like many other prominent and successful business men he found his automobile a source of recreation and pleasure, but he was unfortunate in an experience in driving a new car August 6, 1912. In crossing the track the automobile was struck by a Santa Fe engine and he was seriously wounded, the cranium fractured so that it was necessary to remove a large piece of the bone. He was taken to the hospital in a very serious condition and for a while lingered between life and death, but a strong constitution stood him well in hand and his recovery was good, and he is now back attending to business.

THOMAS ALEXANDER METCALF.—The earliest records that can be traced concerning the Metcalf family indicate their identification with North Riding, Yorkshire, England, several centuries ago. From there some of the name crossed the Irish sea into Ireland and established the family in Inneskillen, from which point William Metcalf immigrated to America during the colonial era of our national history. Curtis, son of William, was born in Lancaster county, Pa., and devoted his entire life to agricultural pursuits there. The next generation was represented by Thomas Metcalf, a native of Lancaster county and in very early youth a soldier of the Revolution, enlisting from Pennsylvania. For a long period after the close of that historic struggle he engaged in farming in his native county, but when advanced in years he removed to Ohio and spent his last days in Belmont county. Among his children was a son, William G., born near Westchester, Pa., and for years a farmer in Belmont county, Ohio, but later a pioneer of Illinois, where he developed farm land in the vicinity of Mendon, Ill. Although far beyond the limit of military service at the time of the Civil war he became an ardent supporter of the Union and was accepted as a private in Company G, One Hundred and Eighteenth Illinois Infantry, whose hardships he endured with a fortitude not surpassed by those younger than he. While living in Ohio he married Jane McMillan, a native of St. Clairsville, Belmont county, and a daughter of Alexander McMillan, who during early years had crossed the ocean from his birthplace, Glasgow, Scotland, and had settled in Ohio. For years he followed the occupation of a merchant tailor at St. Clairsville and there his death occurred. Both William G. Metcalf and his wife spent their last days in Illinois. Of their ten children all but one attained maturity and there now survive four sons and one daughter. One of the sons, Isaac, was a soldier in Company K, One Hundred and Nineteenth Illinois Infantry, and now makes his home in Texas.

The oldest member of the family circle, Thomas Alexander Metcalf, was born at St. Clairsville, Belmont county, Ohio, May 25, 1844, and at the age of twelve years accompanied the family to Illinois, settling among the pioneers of Adams county, where he attended public schools during the intervals of farm work. During 1863 he enlisted in Company B, Forty-fifth Illinois Infantry, and was mustered into the service at Springfield, Ill. With his regiment he participated in numerous of the most important battles of the war, being at Chattanooga, Missionary Ridge and Kennesaw Mountain, taking part in the siege of Atlanta and the engagement at Jonesboro, accompanying Sherman on the famous march to the sea, bearing a brave part in the siege of Charleston and the battle of Goldsboro, where he was wounded in the left leg. For a time he was a patient in a hospital at Louisville, Ky., and in June of 1865 he received an honorable discharge with his regiment. Returning to his Illinois home he took up school-teaching. After several years he entered the employ of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad as an agent on their line in Illinois and at Coatsburg, Adams county, he also served as judge of the police courts. Coming to California in 1883 and settling upon a ranch near Bakersfield, he became identified with the early upbuilding of this community. After a time he established his home on the corner of C and Dracena streets in the city itself and here engaged in contracting and building until the death of his brother-in-law, S. W. Wible, when he became administrator of the estate and since then has devoted his time to its affairs, necessitating trips to Alaska each summer to look after the mining properties of the deceased.

The marriage of Mr. Metcalf and Miss Elizabeth J. Wible took place in Mendon, Ill., and was blessed with two children, Simon Hubert and Modena May, the former an electrical engineer employed in Spokane, Wash., and the latter a teacher in the Bakersfield public schools. Mrs. Metcalf was born in Johnstown, Pa., and removed to Illinois with her father, Peter Wible, who became a pioneer farmer of Adams county. Further reference to the family history appears in the sketch of her brother, Simon W. Wible, presented on another page. Mrs. Metcalf's demise occurred February 20, 1912. The family hold membership with St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Bakersfield, in which Mr. Metcalf officiates as senior warden. While living in Illinois he was made a Mason in Benjamin Lodge No. 227, A. F. & A. M., at Camp Point, Adams county. Upon the organization of Hurlburt Post No. 127, G. A. R., in Bakersfield, he became a charter member of the organization and afterward for several years he was honored with the office of commander of the post. It was largely through his effort that the supervisors set aside a room in the new court house for the exclusive use of the Grand Army of the Republic and its allied societies, and it has been furnished and fitted up by the Post. It is the consensus of opinion that it is today the most elaborate and beautiful Grand Army Memorial Hall in California if not in the entire Union. This was all accomplished while he was commander and, being a builder, the arrangement was left to him. The altar is his own design and the only one of the kind. He has served several terms as an aide on the staff of different commanders of the department of California and Nevada. For the past two years he has been aide de camp on the staff of the commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic.

EDWARD L. HOUGHAM.—The manager of the grocery establishment of M. A. Duncan & Co., to whose able supervision the credit for much of its popularity may be attributed, is Edward L. Hougham, a native of the state of Kansas, born at Manhattan, November 30, 1874. As a boy he attended the public schools and later he attended the Kansas State Agricultural College in his home city, taking a full course of four years in the institution. It was not, however, his intention to enter the field of agricultural activities, for his tastes inclined him toward a commercial career. Upon leaving college he secured a position with the wholesale and retail grocery firm of Whitney & Hougham at Manhattan and advanced from one post to another until eventually he became the manager of the large and important business. When he resigned his position in 1899 he came at once to California and settled at Bakersfield, where in December of the same year the grocery house of M. A. Duncan & Co. was established.

James Ogden

Both comfort and culture are apparent in the attractive home of Mr. Hougham at No. 2129 Dracina street, Bakersfield. The presiding genius of this home is Mrs. Hougham, who prior to her marriage in Quincy, Ill., was Alta Lelah Duncan, her father being M. A. Duncan, the pioneer grocer of Bakersfield. Of her marriage to Mr. Hougham there are four children, namely: Edward Bennett, Theodore Sylvester, Mary Eleanor and Martha.

JAMES ARMSTEAD OGDEN.—Very early in the history of the Virginian colony the Ogden family became established there. Not only were they among the oldest families of that state, but among the most prominent and popular as well, and for years after his return from the Revolutionary war one of the ancestors managed his plantation with a diligence that brought prosperity. Among the children of the Revolutionary soldier was a son, Henry, who lived upon a plantation in Bedford county and remained in the Old Dominion throughout all of his life. The next generation was represented by Champ Ogden, likewise a native of Bedford county near the thriving city of Lynchburg, but from early manhood until 1862 a planter in Virginia. In 1862 he removed to Pike county, Mo., where he died March 21, 1864, at the age of forty-one years. When he removed to Missouri he was accompanied by his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Henry Ogden, a Virginian; born and reared in the Old Dominion, she survived her husband thirteen years, dying in 1877 at the Missouri homestead. Of her seven children, James A. was the youngest and he alone, of the four now living, has established a home in California. Born near Bowling Green, Mo., March 4, 1864, he has no recollection whatever of his father. After his mother's death at the age of thirteen years he was taken from Missouri to Virginia, where he became an inmate of the home of his aunt, Mrs. Harriet Matthews, in Rockbridge county, and under her careful oversight he was given a public school education at Lexington. When he had completed the studies of the town schools he settled in the country and took up general farming.

Coming from Virginia to California in 1887 and settling first in Tulare county, Mr. Ogden entered upon farming activities. From the first he was a close student of the soil. No department of agriculture was beyond his interest. When he left Tulare county and came to Kern county in 1893 he already had gained a broad knowledge of farming in all of its diversified forms and was well qualified to fill acceptably his new position as foreman on the Button Willow ranch for Miller & Lux. For eight years, beginning with 1893, he continued in the same place. The ability manifested in every department of the work and the resourcefulness evident in every emergency won recognition for Mr. Ogden, who in 1901 was appointed superintendent of the entire division of southern ranches, including Button Willow ranch in Kern county (where he makes his headquarters, his home, however, being on Chester avenue, Bakersfield), Panama and Lake ranches in Kern county, Cuyama stock ranch in Santa Barbara county, Carissa rancho in San Luis Obispo county and the swamp range in Kings and Tulare counties. The three ranches first-named have splendid facilities for irrigation with a modern system of canals and reservoirs. Altogether he superintends over six hundred thousand acres, the greater part of which is utilized as range for stock, although large tracts are devoted to the raising of grain and alfalfa. Shipments of produce and stock are made from Kern county to San Francisco. For some years the superintendent drove the teams and buggies from one ranch to another, but this proved too slow and he now utilizes an automobile in his frequent trips into Kings, Tulare, San Luis Obispo and Santa Barbara counties.

The marriage of Mr. Ogden occurred in Tulare, Cal., December 31, 1891, uniting him with Miss Elmina Maples, who was born in San Benito county, Cal., daughter of Thompson W. and Elizabeth (Merritt) Maples, who were born in Liverpool, England, and Jefferson county, Ohio, respectively. Mr. Maples was of Scotch-Irish parents, and came to California via Panama in 1851, when he was seventeen years of age. He followed farming during his active years, and now makes his home with Mrs. Ogden. Mrs. Maples came in a sailer around Cape Horn in 1861 and passed away in Berkeley, October 13, 1909. Mrs. Ogden received a broad education in our western schools and is a woman of culture and a devoted member of the Congregational church. The only son in the family, Laurence Armstead Ogden, a graduate of the Bakersfield high school in 1910, is now attending Leland Stanford University, class 1915. The only daughter, Miss Edith, is a member of the Kern county high school, class of 1914, in Bakersfield, where the family own and occupy a modern residence. In fraternal relations Mr. Ogden holds membership with Bakersfield Lodge, No. 266, B. P. O. E.

JAMES B. MCFARLAND.—A native of Ohio, J. B. McFarland was born in Woodsfield, Monroe county, December 26, 1861, and his parents were Andrew and Catherine (Harmon) McFarland, natives of that county, and farmers there. The father died in Wilsonville, Nebr., and the mother makes her home with her children, being now seventy-six years of age. Genealogical records show that Mr. McFarland is of Scotch and German descent.

When he reached the proper age Mr. McFarland was sent to public school and later was a student at the normal school at Sardis, Ohio, until he was seventeen. He became a teacher and when eighteen was principal of the Mount Zion (Ohio) school. In 1880 he removed to Nebraska and continued to teach, also farming near Palmyra, and in 1882 he taught school west of Lincoln in Lancaster county. At the same time he engaged in farming in Lancaster county and in 1884 he raised the first herd of Hereford cattle in that state. In 1886 he removed to near Burlington, Colo., where he was in the cattle business and also taught school until 1893, at which time he was attracted to Oklahoma by the opening of the Cherokee Strip, and participated in the townsite fights at Enid with the Chicago & Rock Island Company. This was one circumstance when the people won out against the railroad company. At Enid he prospered as a druggist until 1895, when he engaged in mining at Cripple Creek, Colo., where he delved for gold and silver with varying success for four years. Then, locating at Colorado Springs, he devoted the ensuing four years to the lumber trade. In 1904 he came to California, settling at Anaheim, Orange county, where he engaged in horticulture and devoted himself chiefly to the growing of walnuts for the market. In 1907 he had become the owner of one hundred and sixty acres of unimproved land in Kern county, the present site of McFarland, associating himself with W. F. Laird. In December of that year they laid out the town of McFarland and began building. Laying out a subdivision they planned a town at the Hunt switch, twenty-six miles northwest of Bakersfield, which has now become a place of three hundred population and of considerable commercial importance.

Mr. McFarland was the father not only of the town but of its schools as well and they boast of a splendid new grammar school. His own ranch has been improved. He put in the first pumping plant in the town site and demonstrated the success of raising alfalfa by that form of irrigation, raising from ten to twelve tons to the acre. He is interested in the dairy business located one mile southwest of town, where he has a herd of Holsteins and Jerseys.

J. B. McFarland

Extending his activities Mr. McFarland established a lumber mill in the Green Horn range in Kern county. With others he incorporated the McFarland creamery, the plant of which, located at McFarland, makes twelve thousand pounds of butter per month. The butter produced at this establishment took the first prize, a gold medal, at the California State Fair in 1911. The company also manufactures ice for local consumption. Mr. McFarland has sold more than a hundred thousand acres of land and is the owner at this time of one hundred acres, all under cultivation. A five-horse-power motor engine affords him sufficient water supply for the irrigation of his own place, and his dairy is also equipped with an electric pumping plant. He is also engaged in raising Percheron Norman horses. Since the organization of the First National Bank of McFarland he has been a member of the board of directors.

In St. Clairsville, Ohio, in 1884, Mr. McFarland was married to Miss Martha L. Hart, also a native of Monroe county, Ohio, and they have seven children: Lenora, Mrs. A. E. Sherwood, of McFarland; Ethel, Mrs. M. Schumacher, of Los Angeles; Bessie, wife of T. L. Runyon, residing near McKittrick; Gladys, Myron, Marie and Francis. After coming here the father became a member of the board of trustees of the Lone Tree school district and with his usual vigor and ambition worked faithfully until they succeeded in having a grammar school second to none in the county. In national politics Mr. McFarland espouses the principles of the Republican party.

FRED WRIGHT.—The Wright family history shows that William Wright, a native of Ireland, came to America at an early age and during young manhood married Anna Rowley, who was born in Connecticut. For some time they lived on a farm in Minnesota, but the rigorous climate of that northern state proved unhealthful and they decided to seek a more southerly location. As early as 1878 they became residents of Texas, where Mr. Wright for a time followed the stock industry and later gave considerable attention to the contracting business. His death occurred in Texas and afterward the widow came to California to establish her home, since which time she has resided in Los Angeles. The family comprised four sons and one daughter, the eldest of the five having been Fred, who was born near Austin, Minn., August 12, 1873, and was a child of five years when the family removed to Texas. The public schools of Tyler, that state, afforded him fair educational advantages. At sixteen years of age he began an apprenticeship to the trade of machinist in the shops of the St. Louis & Southwestern Railroad Company at Tyler. On the completion of his time he traveled as a journeyman and worked in many sections of the south. It was during this period that he married in Pine Bluff, Ark., Miss Lottie Woodland, a native of Charles City, Iowa, and daughter of Joseph and Mary (Wright) Woodland, the former a native of England, but a resident of the United States from a boy. Mr. Woodland served in the Civil war as member of an Iowa regiment, and he and his wife are now residing near Bismarck, North Dakota. Six children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Wright, Francis, Robert, Mary, Anna, Margaret and Mildred.

During 1908 Mr. and Mrs. Wright came to Bakersfield and he entered the Bakersfield Iron Works as a machinist. The quality of his work was so satisfactory that he was promoted to be foreman of the pump department. Later he held a similar position with Sprague Bros., resigning from the employ of the last-named firm in order that he might establish a partnership with Christian Nelson, and they started the East Bakersfield Garage and Machine Company and developed a splendid trade. Both being skilled mechanics and having a thorough knowledge of machinery gave them an important advantage and they met with success. However, in March, 1913, upon being tendered his old position as foreman of the pump department of the Bakersfield Iron Works, he was prevailed upon to accept it, and he is now actively engaged in looking after his manifold duties. With his family he resides at his comfortable home on the corner of Sixth and R streets in Bakersfield.

CHARLES WILLIAM JACKSON.—Born at Fort Worth, Texas, March 12, 1851, Charles W. Jackson was a son of Thomas Jackson, who was a native of Tennessee and removed to Texas, where he married Cecelia DeWitt, who was born in New Hampshire. He was a cattle man in northwest Texas, where both parents died. Their family consisted of five children of whom Charles William was the second.

Reared on the frontier Mr. Jackson was deprived of the advantage of an education in the free schools as there were none in that locality, and he lived part of the time a hundred and fifty miles from the nearest neighbor. Each full of moon the family went to Pa La Ponte and forted up. Orphaned at the age of ten he was early taught a knowledge of farming and cattle raising, as a mere lad being thoroughly fitted for the career that was before him, and he has always been more or less successful as a rancher and cattleman in different parts of the country. For a time he was employed as stage driver in Guatemala, Central America, and drove the first six-horse stage from the city of Guatemala to San Jose de Guatemala, a distance of ninety miles, and his activities in other out-of-the-way places have been noteworthy. On his way to Guatemala he went by vessel to Livingston, then to Pt. Isabelle, from which point they crossed the country on mule back, bringing a hundred and fifty head of mules to Guatemala. He remained there for three years, when he came to Kern county, Cal., in February, 1876, and entered the employ of Haggin & Carr, now the Kern County Land Company, as teamster on the Stockdale ranch under Captain Taylor. Later he became the vaquero on the ranch and then was made foreman of irrigation, then foreman of haying and harvesting at different times. In 1884 he was established as superintendent of the ranch on the north side of Kern river known as the Jackson ranch, and later was made superintendent of the Collins, Jackson and Poso ranches. Since 1886 he has made his residence on the Poso ranch. This property consists of about one hundred thousand acres. Seventeen thousand acres of it is in alfalfa; five hundred and sixty acres of it is in orchard, and fifteen thousand head of cattle are shipped from the ranch yearly.

When Mr. Jackson came to this part of the state the country was new and sparsely settled. His connection with the Kern County Land Company has covered the entire period of its history. He assisted in the construction of the Calloway canal in 1877-'78, and in 1879 began putting in an irrigation system. He has seen the country improve from a dry desert until it is one of the most fertile countries in the world. Fraternally he affiliates with the Knights of Pythias and in political principles is a supporter of the principles of the Democratic party.

Mrs. Jackson, who was Mary Lillian Rogers, was a native of San Francisco. She was graduated from the Berkeley schools. By a former marriage Mr. Jackson has two sons, George G. and Claude B.

JAMES HORACE ARP.—The first representative of the Arp family in America came from Germany during the colonial era and settled in the south, where Frederick M. B. Arp, a native of Wilkes county, N. C., gave his services to the patriots during the war of the Revolution. Next in line of descent was Benjamin Arp, who, exhibiting the loyal spirit that had characterized his father, enlisted in the war of 1812, served with self-sacrificing patriotism and bore a gallant part under General Jackson in the memorable engagement at New Orleans. The war ended, he returned to North Carolina, but later crossed the Great Smoky range of mountains into Tennessee and engaged in planting in Monroe county near the eastern border of the state. The martial spirit characteristic of the grandfather and great-grandfather became an inheritance of the father, James Addison Arp, a native of Wilkes county, N. C., and a captain in the Federal army during the Civil war. He and his comrades had many narrow escapes while making their way through the mountains of Tennessee to join the Union army. After the close of the struggle he returned to farming pursuits in North Carolina, where also he served as a justice of the peace and in addition carried on a tannery, sawmill and gristmill operated by water power. For many years he lived at Murphy, the county-seat of Cherokee county, in the southwestern corner of North Carolina, near the Georgia-Tennessee state lines and within the shadow of lofty mountain peaks. During young manhood he had married Miss Mary Grayson, who was born in Sweetwater, Monroe county, Tenn., and died in North Carolina. Her father, William Grayson, a native of Wilkes county, N. C., served under General Jackson at New Orleans in the war of 1812 and was so seriously wounded in battle that the amputation of a leg was necessary. After his honorable discharge he settled in the eastern part of Tennessee and acquired an extensive plantation near Sweetwater, where he remained until death.

A. W. Jackson

The family of James Addison Arp comprised nine children, all but one of whom survive, James Horace being next to the youngest and the only member of the family on the coast. Born at Murphy, Cherokee county, N. C., April 28, 1867, he had only limited educational advantages, and at an early age began to work in his father's sawmill. In addition he gained a thorough knowledge of carpentering and also studied the lumber business. Going to Tahlequah, I. T., in 1890, he worked as a carpenter for Mr. Thompson, the representative of the Cherokee nation. The year 1891 found him in Bakersfield. For four years he had charge of a ranch south of town owned by General Shafter and Captain McKittrick, after which he spent six months lumbering at Fort Bragg, in the redwoods of Mendocino county. Upon returning to Bakersfield he was employed by H. F. Condict, then the agent for the Standard Oil Company. Later, when Mr. Arp held the same position himself, he built the first tank for the company at this point and later increased its capacity to thirty-five thousand barrels. At the time oil operations began he was engaged in buying and moving houses. About that time he was boycotted by the unions because he employed Mr. Hawkins, a non-union man, with whom the union men refused to work. The boycott advertised him widely and proved the foundation of his later success. He had employed only four men, but in thirty days he jumped to forty-four workmen and within three months it was necessary for him to open a plumbing shop, paint shop, paper store, etc., in order to push forward his contracts with the promptness desired. Two years of growing success swiftly passed. Then Mr. Lindgren asked to buy one-half interest with him in the business, stating that he had a shop at Fresno, but not sufficient business. The two combined and organized the Quincy Plumbing Company.

Shortly after the earthquake and fire in San Francisco Mr. Lindgren sold his interests at Bakersfield and moved to that city, where there was great demand for workers in his line. About the same time the union ceased to oppose Mr. Arp and he consented to give their members employment. His interests were large and contracts for every kind of structural work were consummated with accuracy and dispatch. Among his contracts may be mentioned those for the Brodek building, the Mascot apartments with disappearing beds and other built-in furniture, the Harding building, St. Regis hotel, Alicia apartments (he owns the latter), and Beale avenue school in Kern, the Bakersfield Garage, Willis building and others equally substantial. Besides owning and erecting the James Arp building, a three-story brick structure 50x122 feet, at No. 1919 I street, he also built his own unique modern residence in Bakersfield.

Besides his large contracting and building business, Mr. Arp utilizes the largest house-moving outfit in Bakersfield. Perhaps his most important contract in that line was for the removal of the Santa Fe freight depot a distance of five hundred feet, a difficult feat which he accomplished without stopping for even a day the handling of freight or the sending of telegraphic messages. In addition to other important interests, he has been a large promoter of subdivisions. The southern addition to Bakersfield, comprising about twelve blocks, he laid out and sold in lots or improved with residences, some of which latter he still owns. The James Arp subdivision along the oil field road he also platted. Some years ago he bought the Sweetbrier ranch and at this writing he still owns forty acres of the tract, which contains a walnut grove, the only one in Kern county, and is adorned with a row of palms around the entire place. After buying the E. M. Roberts ranch of three hundred and thirty-five acres one and one-half miles from town, he subdivided a portion of the farm into tracts running from one to five acres and in this way he sold off about one hundred and seventeen acres at a handsome profit. The North Bakersfield subdivision of twenty acres was also laid out and platted under his ownership and control.

The Bakersfield Board of Trade and Builders' Exchange number Mr. Arp among their more forceful members. In politics he has supported the Republican party. Fraternally, besides being associated with the Modern Woodmen of America and the Woodmen of the World, he has been a Mason since early life in North Carolina and is now connected with Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M. After coming to Bakersfield he was united in marriage with Miss Anna Tracy, who was born near Galt, this state, and in January of 1890 was graduated from the San Jose State Normal School, after which she taught in Bakersfield until her marriage. From early life she has been a devoted believer in the doctrines of the Congregational Church and has contributed to the missionary projects of the denomination. Of her marriage there are four children, Tracy Ferdinand, Eva Virginia, James Addison and Alice Martha. The family of which she is a member traces its lineage to old eastern stock. During the early half of the nineteenth century her grandfather, Edward V. Tracy, removed from Connecticut to Wilkesbarre, Pa., but later went to Ohio and afterward became a pioneer of Chickasaw county, Iowa, finally coming west as far as Utah, where he died. Her parents, Edward Vernett and Mary (Dix) Tracy, were natives, respectively, of Pennsylvania and Chickasaw county, Iowa, and the latter died at Galt, Cal. The former, after crossing the plains during 1856, became identified with farming interests in San Joaquin county, where he made his home for years near Galt, Sacramento county. At the opening of the Civil war he offered his services to the Union and was assigned to a California regiment, of which he remained a member until the close of the war, when he returned to the San Joaquin valley to resume ranch activities. Eventually he removed to Kern county and here he since has made his home.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK.—This institution has been most essential to the best progress of the town of Taft, for the officials of the bank have devoted their time to conserving the interests of the oil operators and customers in lines of business connected therewith. When the bank was established, it was because a number of citizens of Taft realized the imperative need of such an institution. Results have proved the wisdom of the step which they took when they started to organize and incorporate a concern, with a capital stock of $25,000.

The checking department by no means represents the limit of the usefulness of the First National Bank of Taft. In addition information is furnished concerning investments and business conditions; banking advantages are offered in the mail department, for those unable to visit the institution personally; self-identifying travelers' checks are furnished, available throughout the world, money is telegraphed and drafts issued to any given city in the whole world, so that the institution is metropolitan in its sphere of service, and by its outside affiliations brings to Taft the banking service of the country. The officers have devoted their entire attention to the study and practice of banking and they do not rest content with the providing of unsurpassed local facilities, but use their financial strength and moral integrity to place their customers on a basis of thrift and orderly knowledge.

J.E. Gray

By affiliation and co-operation with the First National Bank of Bakersfield, the Producers Savings Bank of Bakersfield and the First National Bank of Maricopa, the First National Bank of Taft has increased its own strength and enlarged its sphere of useful service. Clinton E. Worden has been the capable and successful president from the first. The vice-presidents are W. E. Benz and L. P. Guiberson and in the sketch of the latter will be found additional facts concerning this bank, of whose remarkable growth he is justly proud. The cashier is C. L. Shirk, and the assistant cashier, J. M. Williams. While the officials serve as directors, they are reinforced by other stockholders, namely: J. J. Wilt, Cyrus Bell, E. D. Gillette, E. M. Brown and J. S. Henton.

JONATHAN ELMER GRAY.—The president and general manager of the J. E. Gray Oil Company has the distinction of being the oldest living oil operator in the Kern river field, where aside from his company interests he is the owner individually of two hundred and fifty-five acres under lease south of the Kern river, including ninety-five acres of the original quarter section known as the Thomas A. Means land, the original site of oil discovery in this district and county. For the period since 1899 a record of his life would be in many respects a history of the oil industry and development in these fields, now well known throughout the whole world. While yet the number of the wells here could be counted on the fingers of one hand he explored the entire district and made a map marking the sections which in his judgment were oil producing. It is a singular fact and testifies highly to his experience and judgment that this map, made in 1899, is absolutely accurate at the present time, for in every spot indicated a well was drilled with excellent results.

From his earliest recollections Mr. Gray has been familiar with the oil industry. His father, James Gray, a pioneer oil man of Venango county, Pa., was one of the first to embark in the oil business on Oil creek, that county. Later he became a prosperous contractor and finally retired from active cares to spend his last days in ease, dying in March of 1911 at the age of eighty-four years. About the time of his demise occurred that of his wife, March 8, 1911, at the age of seventy-six. They were the parents of nine children, namely: Mary, Margaret Catherine, Nancy Jane, John Wesley, Jonathan Elmer, Samuel A., Martha Ellen, Arra F. and Ramsey E., the last-named being now engaged as a driller for the Kern Trading and Oil Company at Coalinga, Cal. Three sons, J. W., S. A. and R. E., and a nephew, G. W. Gray, are connected with our subject in oil operations in the Kern river fields. Jonathan E. Gray was born near East Brady, Clarion county, Pa., June 4, 1862, and attended school for a few years in childhood, but as soon as old enough he began to assist his father in contract work. Often, after a day of hard work, he would spend the evenings far into the night over his books and would also practice writing from copy. In that way he laid the foundation of a common-school education. At the age of fifteen he began to work for wages and the following year he assisted in drilling wells at Duke Center, McKean county, Pa., later working in Warren county. By the time he had reached the age of nineteen years he was recognized as a professional driller. During the Balltown excitement he went to Forest county, Pa., and thence moved on to Butler county at the time of the Thorn creek excitement. Next he worked near Iron Bridge, Monroe county, Ohio, and thence proceeded to Sistersville and Nannington, W. Va., later going to Indiana, where he drilled near Reservoir. His services as a driller were next called into requisition at Robinson, Ill., and later he was employed in Kansas and Oklahoma. An idea of the extent of his operations may be gained from the fact that he drilled for water in New York City and Omaha and for oil, not only in the places before mentioned, but also in Wyoming, the Dakotas and Nevada.

Arriving in Los Angeles June 17, 1897, Mr. Gray began to drill for oil in the Los Angeles oil field and acquired some oil interests at Newhall, that county. For a short time he drilled at Coalinga and in the Parkfield district, Monterey county. When news reached him concerning the discovery of oil in the Kern river field he came at once to Bakersfield and formed the acquaintance of Judd F. Elwood, who held an oil lease with Thomas A. Means. With Mr. Elwood he inspected the entire district and then began to drill on the central point lease on section 4, where, as soon as they had drilled into the oil sand, they were offered $43,000 for their interests. In order to secure money for future development work they accepted the offer. At that time there were only three wells in the entire field and Mr. Gray mapped out the land, indicating the location of wells with a remarkable accuracy, as shown by the map, now in the possession of Mr. Elwood.

Investing in such companies as he believed would prove profitable, by the end of a year Mr. Gray was worth $75,000 and subsequent investment has increased his fortune. On the west side he drilled several wells by contract. For the J. E. Gray Oil Company he has drilled twenty-six wells and on his individual lease seventeen wells, the former producing four thousand barrels per month and the latter one thousand barrels per month. By means of a lease he secured control of ninety-five acres of the Thomas A. Means quarter-section, the original place of oil discovery, and he also acquired the Thomas A. Joy lease of one hundred and twenty acres and forty acres in the South Kern lease. In October, 1912, he became interested in the American Union Oil and Refinery Company, a corporation capitalized at $25,000, which bids fair to become a very important industry in Tulare, where the refinery is located. Mr. Gray is now a large stockholder, president and general manager of the company. The refinery went into operation May 1, 1913. The plant is equipped with the Trumbull system and has a capacity of one thousand barrels of crude oil every twenty-four hours. The products manufactured are gasoline, kerosene, cylinder oil, engine oil, distillate, fuel oil, road oil and asphaltum. In his judgment as to oil wells and the entire industry Mr. Gray has few superiors and he is often sought for advice by those whose experience has been of briefer duration or less successful than his own. With his time and attention given closely to the industry he has not had leisure for participation in social or fraternal organizations, although he has identified himself with the Union League Club in San Francisco and when in that city usually avails himself of the advantages offered by the club. In politics he voted the Republican ticket for years, but his principles lead him to support reforms and he has allied himself with the progressive element of the old party organization.

HARVEY A. VAN NORMAN.—Although a native of Victoria, Tex., born October 5, 1878, Mr. Van Norman has lived in Southern California from his earliest recollections and his only lengthy period of absence from the state occurred during his service in the Philippines. The family of which he is a member has ever been loyal to country and brave in battle. During the Mexican war his grandfather, J. M. Van Norman, who was a native of Pennsylvania and a planter in Tennessee, enlisted in the service and went to the southwest to fight for his country. Travel showed him the greatness of the undeveloped prairies of Texas and on the expiration of his time he sold out his Tennessee property, removed to Texas, took up land and embarked in the cattle business, which industry likewise engaged the attention of his son, J. M., Jr., a native of Tennessee and a soldier in a Texas cavalry regiment during the Civil war. The latter in 1881 brought his family to California and settled on a farm near Santa Ana, but now lives retired at San Gabriel. In Texas he married Martha M. Halsel, a native of that state and the daughter of a Scotchman, who had served in the Mexican war.

C. H. Quincy

The fifth in a family of nine children, Harvey A. Van Norman was three years of age when the family removed from Texas to California. When the Spanish-American war broke out he had completed a course in the Los Angeles high school. During May of 1898 he enlisted in the Third United States Artillery and was sent to the Philippines on the transport Ohio, which landed there in July of the same year. In a short time he rose to the rank of first duty sergeant. Besides the battle of Manila he participated in twenty-seven engagements with the insurgents. By a special order he was mustered out and honorably discharged in September, 1899, after which he returned to California. Since then he has been identified with engineering and electrical work. During 1901 he was made engineer in charge of the Pasadena plant of the Los Angeles Railway Company. Transferred to the electrical construction department as assistant to electricians in 1903, he soon rose to be superintendent of the electrical department of the railroad. In 1906 he became superintendent of construction for the Los Angeles Gas and Electric Company, but the following year he resigned the place in order to engage with the Los Angeles aqueduct as electrical constructor. Upon the completion of the hydro-electric stations in the Owens valley he was placed in charge of the construction of the Owens valley division of the aqueduct. On finishing that task, he was transferred to Mojave as division engineer in charge of construction work there. When the entire aqueduct had been completed he was placed in charge of the maintenance and operation of the entire aqueduct, and as such superintends the system whose magnitude and splendid engineering feats have attracted the admiration of the greatest engineers in the world. Mr. Van Norman married Miss Bessie C. Ross, a native of Chicago, and they make their home in Los Angeles. For some years he has been prominently connected with the National Association of Stationary Engineers. Fraternally he was made a Mason in South Gate Lodge No. 320, F. & A. M.

CHARLES H. QUINCY.—The Quincy genealogy is traced to Revolutionary stock and back of that to the historic Mayflower. The family name is connected with the early records of various portions of New England, but particularly with the western part of Maine near the New Hampshire line. Several bore an honored part in the Civil war and among them was one who served as captain of a company in a Maine regiment. A brother of the captain, likewise a Civil war hero, Nathaniel Haley by name, was born and reared in Cumberland county, Me., and there engaged in the manufacture of lumber and the tilling of the soil for many years, but eventually removed to Massachusetts and there passed away March 22, 1911, at the age of eighty-three years. When the Civil war began he offered his services to the Union and was accepted as a private in a Maine regiment. Upon the expiration of his term of service he re-enlisted in another regiment from Maine and remained at the front until the end of the Rebellion. Meanwhile he had married Miss Martha Freeman, who was born in Maine and died there. The Freeman family traces its lineage to the earliest settlers of New England.

The family of Nathaniel Haley Quincy comprised four children and three of these are still living, one, Horace, being now superintendent of the Boston Mutual Life Insurance Company. The eldest of the family, Charles H. Quincy, was born at Bridgton, Cumberland county, Me., March 27, 1855,*and passed all of his early life in the western part of Maine in Cumberland and Oxford counties. Ambitious in temperament, he worked his way through the Bridgton high school and prepared for Bowdoin College. In order to secure the means necessary for a complete college course he taught school for about four years, but meanwhile other interests claimed his attention and he relinquished all hopes of further study. Instead, he earned a livelihood as head clerk in a mercantile establishment in Maine. After a time the confinement caused a failure in his health and hoping to be benefited by a change of climate he came to the west.

Arriving in Los Angeles, January 29, 1888, Mr. Quincy remained only a few days, coming to Bakersfield February 2. Here he was employed with the Kern County Land Company as a carpenter for six months and then entered the employ of A. J. McLeod and for eighteen months worked at carpentering, while Mr. McLeod devoted his entire attention to the lumber business. At the expiration of that time he began to take contracts for residences and business houses, building among others the Tevis residence and the Methodist Episcopal Church South and completing the old O. D. Fish building. As prospects were most encouraging from a business standpoint he was stricken with typhoid fever and it was more than a year before he was able to resume work. His next enterprise was trading for a plumbing establishment. The business soon became large in that line in the oil fields. With restored health, he took up building operations again. Since then his career has been remarkably successful. During 1905 he sold his plumbing business and removed to Los Angeles, where he now resides at No. 822 West Thirty-sixth Place. The corner of I and Twentieth streets, Bakersfield, where for years he had his plumbing business, he improved in 1911 with the Quincy building, a substantial three-story brick structure that is an ornament to the city and source of gratifying annual income to the owner. During 1909 he built the Fabian hotel on Humboldt street near Baker avenue, East Bakersfield, which he still owns, and in addition he owns the Hunter & Wilson building, also of brick, in East Bakersfield, as well as other valuable property both in Bakersfield and Los Angeles, where he continues the building and real estate business upon an extensive scale. Of late his attention has been given principally to the real estate business, having offices in the Hollingsworth building, Los Angeles.

Fraternally Mr. Quincy is a Mason, having been initiated in the order in Pythagorean Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M., at Fryeburg, Oxford county, Me. In politics he supports Democratic principles. While living in Maine he married, at Fryeburg, Miss Myra E. Harnden, a native of Denmark, that state, and a descendant of an old New England family. Well educated in the schools of Maine, she is a woman of culture and refinement. In religious connections she holds membership with the Congregational Church. There are two daughters and a son in the family, the eldest being Mildred, wife of Charles T. Metcalf, of Bakersfield. Ralph is a cornice maker in Los Angeles, and Ethel resides with her parents in that city.

JOHN RIPLEY.—Familiarity with frontier conditions from earliest recollections developed in Mr. Ripley self-reliance, patient endurance of hardships and an ability to overcome obstacles by sheer force of character. The farm where he lived in boyhood was situated near Sun Prairie in the town of Bristol, Dane county, Wis., and was at no great distance from Madison, where now the art of landscape gardeners and the wealth of a community has transformed a frontier environment into a region of great beauty. The first member of the family to settle in Wisconsin was his father, William Henry Ripley, a native of New York state and for years a farmer of Dane county, but from 1868 until his death a resident of Vernon county, Mo. By his marriage to Alcena Davis, who died in 1849, he had four children and three of these are still living. One son, Horace, who served for three years in the Seventh Wisconsin Infantry during the Civil war, is now a resident of Vernon county, Mo. Another son, Lewis, who served in the Seventeenth Wisconsin Infantry, is now living at Mitchell, Iowa. The youngest of the sons, John, who was born at the old homestead near Sun Prairie, Wis., May 22, 1847, and was only two years of age at the time of his mother's death, left school at the age of seventeen, in August, 1864, in order to enlist in the Union army. Accepted as a private and assigned to Battery F, First Illinois Light Artillery, he served under General Thomas in the battle of Nashville. During November of 1864 he was transferred to Battery I, mounted, in the same Artillery as before. With this regiment he continued until June, 1865, when he was honorably discharged at Eastport, Miss., returning thence to his school studies in Wisconsin for one term. He then went to work at farming in Wisconsin, spending his winters in the lumber woods and one winter (1866-67) trapping in Minnesota. In 1868 he located in Missouri, where he bought a tract of wild land in Vernon county, secured three yoke of oxen and with their aid broke the first furrows ever turned in that soil. For some years he engaged in raising corn and wheat on the Missouri farm. Seeking a new location in 1880, he left Vernon county, Mo., and went to Glorieta, Santa Fe county, N. M., where he contracted to haul ties and piling for the Santa Fe Railroad. After eighteen months in that work he went to Silverton, Colo., where he engaged in freighting and hauling ore. The year 1883 found him in South Dakota, where he bought a farm near Menno, Hutchinson county. The soil was well adapted to wheat and of this crop he made a specialty, but also raised flax and corn. Finally he sold the farm and came to California, settling at Caliente in 1891, and taking a contract to get out wood. It was his intention to complete the contract and then seek a different location, but at the expiration of four months he was induced to begin freighting. With a six-horse outfit he hauled to the mines in the Amelia, Piute, Havilah and Bodfish districts. Soon he purchased another outfit and used two eight-horse teams in freighting. Meanwhile he had started a livery stable, feed yard and corral. The need of such an enterprise was such that he soon used four barns for his vehicles and horses. In addition he built a blacksmith shop and gave steady work to four skilled blacksmiths. The great fire of June, 1909, which almost wholly destroyed the business portion of Caliente, wiped out his barns and shop and destroyed his wagons and outfits. For that reason he discontinued freighting and built the Ripley House, the largest hotel in Caliente, a building with a frontage of one hundred and eight feet and containing the postoffice and public telephone station. This hotel he sold in January, 1913, since which he has been retired from business.

Appointed postmaster at Caliente in 1898 and re-appointed every four years, Mr. Ripley discharged his duties faithfully and well through a long period of service. In January, 1913, he resigned the office and in June of the same year, upon the appointment of his successor, he relinquished the duties of the place. Through all of his life he has been a stanch Republican. For two terms he served as constable at Caliente. He was made a Mason in Tehachapi Lodge No. 313, F. & A. M., and is also connected with Hurlburt Post, G. A. R. While living in Vernon county, Mo., he married Miss Clara M. Albright, a native of New York state and a woman of gentle disposition, energetic temperament, large charity and kindly spirit. Cheerfully she aided Mr. Ripley in his enterprises. With unfailing optimism she encouraged him to surmount every obstacle and meet every discouragement. At her death in March, 1913, many testimonials were given concerning her womanly attributes and her devotion to family and friends. Surviving her are five children, namely: Mrs. Hattie Colton, of Bakersfield; Ella, wife of Warren Rankin, of South Fork; Mrs. Maude A. Walton, of Bakersfield; Edward, who is living in Oregon; and Clayton, now engaged as cattle superintendent on a large ranch in the South Fork country.

THOMAS A. BAKER.—Not alone through the interesting fact that he is the son of Col. Thomas Baker, founder of Bakersfield, but also by reason of his own intimate identification with public affairs and his own successful incumbency of important positions, Thomas Alverson Baker worthily has a permanent place in the list of progressive men of Kern county. At this writing he fills the office of sheriff, a post for which he is well qualified by reason of his fearless nature, inflexible determination to enforce law and order, and wide acquaintance with the country and its people. The office of sheriff has developed of recent years along with every other department of public work in the county.

From Visalia, Tulare county, Cal., where he was born July 22, 1859, Thomas Alverson Baker came to the present site of Bakersfield in 1863 with other members of the family. Although so young at the time, he vividly recalls incidents connected with the journey and has not forgotten the appearance of the now flourishing city as their wagon and teams were halted at the destination. His father being a believer in educational advantages sent him to the public schools and also to Washington College at Irvington, from which he was graduated in 1880 as valedictorian of the class. The salutatorian of the class, Maurice Powers, became a prominent attorney of Visalia and for years served as district attorney of Tulare county.

Immediately after completing the college course Mr. Baker returned to Bakersfield, where he has since resided with the exception of a brief sojourn at Globe, Ariz., during the copper excitement at that place. Besides being employed as a clerk he served as assistant postmaster and had entire charge of the postoffice for one year. An experience as bookkeeper for the Kern River flouring mills qualified him for successful work as an accountant. Prior to 1882 the offices of sheriff and tax collector had been combined, but they were then separated and a well-known citizen was elected tax collector at a salary of $1,000 per annum. The pay was far too small for the work involved and the gentleman elected refused to qualify. Thereupon the supervisors cast about for a man who would be willing to take the office at the small salary, furnish a bond of $100,000 and do the heavy work promptly and efficiently. Taxes were due. It was necessary to act with dispatch. An appeal was made to Mr. Baker, who acceded to their wishes and entered upon the duties of the office. At the expiration of two years he was regularly elected to the position. Next it was annexed to the county treasurer's office and he was elected to both positions, which necessitated the furnishing of bonds of $222,000. For three terms of two years he held the two offices, his work proving satisfactory to all concerned. Induced by his friends, he became a candidate for sheriff in 1894, but was defeated by forty-two votes. During 1896 he was elected the first city marshal of Bakersfield upon its incorporation. At the expiration of the term of two years he refused to become a candidate for re-election. From January of 1899 until January of 1903 he served variously as deputy county assessor, deputy tax collector and deputy county auditor, and in 1902, when J. W. Kelly was elected sheriff, he chose Mr. Baker as under sheriff, a position that he filled with conspicuous success for eight years, resigning only to enter upon the duties of sheriff. In the fall of 1910 he was nominated for sheriff on the Democratic ticket. In the primary he won by seven votes and at the regular election he had a majority of five hundred and eighty-three. During January of 1911 he took the oath of office for a term of four years.

L P Griberson

From young manhood Mr. Baker has been staunch in his allegiance to the Democratic party. His elections to various offices have come through the regular party channels and he also has been a leading member of the county central committee. Fraternally he is connected with the Eagles, also ranks as past chancellor commander in the Knights of Pythias and as past exalted ruler of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, in which he is a charter member. His marriage took place in Florence, Ariz., and united him with Miss Ann Smith, who was born at Keyesville, Kern county, but grew to womanhood at Azusa, Los Angeles county. At one time her father, J. M. Smith, owned the old Keyesville mine. Of her marriage there are four sons and one daughter, namely: Thomas Tracy, a graduate of the Bakersfield high school and now employed as a bookkeeper; Francis H., who is serving in the United States navy, at present on the steamship Connecticut; Roy J., teacher of piano; Edwin A. and Ellen.

LORRAINE PARR GUIBERSON.—The genealogy of the Guiberson family is traced back to Scotch and Norwegian blood, but indicates an identification with the new world dating back to the pre-Revolutionary period and shows a long line of ancestors prominent in the professions and in business circles. Following the westward drift of migration, each successive generation left further behind it the Atlantic seaboard and the limitations of the east. The first to seek the unknown possibilities of the Pacific coast regions was Samuel Allen Guiberson, a native of Ohio and in early life a farmer in Iowa. A love of adventure and a desire to see the west led him to join an expedition of emigrants in 1858. The most eventful occurrence of that long journey across the plains occurred during a brief halt at Fort Laramie, Wyo., where he was united in marriage with Miss Mary Ellen Greene, a lineal descendant of General Nathaniel Greene and of General Stark, of Revolutionary war fame. Arriving at their destination the young couple settled on a ranch in Napa county, but about 1868 moved from there to Ventura county and resumed agricultural pursuits in the new environment. Fairly well prospered by his long and sagacious activities as a farmer, Mr. Guiberson is now living retired in Ventura county and bears well the weight of his seventy-six useful years. His wife died in Ventura county at the age of about sixty-five. Eight children formed their family, the eldest of these being Lorraine Parr, born in Napa county September 27, 1863. The second son, Hon. J. W. Guiberson, an extensive dairyman and rancher in Kings county, residing at Corcoran, is a member of the California state legislature of 1913. The third son, Nathaniel Greene, prominent in the oil industry and a dealer in oil-well supplies, has traveled throughout the world and is now in South America in the interests of his business. The fourth son, Samuel Allen, Jr., now living retired in San Francisco, was for years one of the best known oil operators in the Coalinga field. The fifth son, William Richard, a resident of Los Angeles, formerly engaged in the oil business, but more recently has devoted his attention to the invention and development of a smudge pot for raising the temperature in orange groves. The three daughters of the family are as follows: Zuleika, wife of R. S. Hazeltine, manager of the British Consolidated Oil Company, of Coalinga; Carrie Luellyn, who resides with her father at Fillmore, Ventura county; and Blanche, who married John B. McNabb, the president and a large stockholder of the Sespe Land and Water Company.

When five years of age L. P. Guiberson was taken to Ventura county by his parents, who sent him to the country schools there and trained him wisely for the practical affairs of life. In order that his educational advantages might go beyond the curriculum of the home schools he was sent to the University of Southern California and while a student there he formed the acquaintance of Miss Frank M. Fry, likewise a student in that institution. The young couple were married in July, 1887, at Bakersfield, the home of her parents, the late John A. and Mattie J. Fry. In the early history of Kern county Mr. Fry had been a well-known figure. For several years he engaged with Messrs. Haggin and Carr as superintendent and he continued in the position when the interests of those gentlemen were merged into the Kern County Land Company. Mr. and Mrs. Guiberson are the parents of two daughters, Ramona and Ellen Bernice. The elder daughter, now a student in the University of California at Berkeley, has had the advantage of a thorough musical training under Hugo Mansfeldt, the celebrated pianist of San Francisco.

After two years in the drug business at Santa Paula and three years in business in the east, Mr. Guiberson returned to Santa Paula and engaged in ranching near that town. However, he soon sold the ranch in order to identify himself with the educational profession of Ventura county. For two years he engaged in teaching. While engaged as principal of the Bardsdale school in Ventura county the summer vacation of 1895 afforded him two months of leisure. More as a matter of diversion and recreation than with any intention of changing his occupation, he took his wife and infant daughter up to the mountains in Ventura county and pitched his tent at a point overlooking the Old Tory oil field. Soon he became intensely interested in the matter of oil production and secured employment as roustabout for the Union Oil Company in the Old Tory oil field. Before the vacation of two months had ended he was engaged as tool-dresser on the Union property and was making more money than was possible in teaching. Thereupon he resolved to continue in the business at least one year. It is worthy of note that he has remained at the work up to the present time and has lost only two days in all the years of his identification with the industry; furthermore, in changing positions he has always gone from a good to a better one. By the end of his first year he was a driller. For four years he remained with the Union Oil Company and then resigned for the purpose of drilling a wild-cat well for Clark & Sherman of Los Angeles. The well was drilled on the Chaffee ranch adjoining the Troy, but no oil was found and the enterprise proved futile. Entering the employ of the Modelo Oil Company in the Peru field in Ventura county, he thus became identified with the oil interests of W. H. Crocker and associates of San Francisco. For three years he was engaged as a driller and for two years as superintendent, after which he became superintendent for the 28 Oil Company at Coalinga, also for three adjacent leases.

Resigning after seven months with the 28 Oil Company, Mr. Guiberson became superintendent of the California Monarch and the California Diamond Oil Companies, in which responsible posts he continued for five years. During 1910 he became superintendent for the Petroleum Properties Syndicate, Limited, whose successor, the British Consolidated, Limited, continued him in the same position of trust. These two concerns were controlled by boards of management, but when the latter company sold out to the Indian and Colonial Development Company, Limited, December 1, 1911, the ownership of the properties passed into the hands of another corporation organized under the laws of England, but by power of attorney Mr. Guiberson was given control of all matters pertaining to the development of the lease. This is said to be the only instance in all California where a large corporation has given full power of attorney, as well as complete management, to one man. The fact bears evidence as to his judgment and ability.

Judson H Jordan

The Indian and Colonial Development Company, Limited, owns one hundred and twenty acres on section 22 and a similar acreage on section 23, 32-23. The lease is completely equipped with electrical power for pumping. Twenty-two wells have been completed and well No. 23 is now being drilled. The average depth of the wells is about one thousand feet. Eighteen wells are producers, turning out an oil of fourteen degrees gravity, and averaging a monthly production of thirty thousand barrels. The location of the company main residence was personally selected by Mr. Guiberson and affords a most enchanting view and an inspiring outlook.

In social and public matters Mr. and Mrs. Guiberson are prominent and the latter has been a leading member of the Women's Improvement Club, which provided and now maintains the public library of Taft. In religion they are of the Methodist faith. Fraternally Mr. Guiberson is a Royal Arch Mason and in politics votes with the Democratic party. Since he came to his present location in March, 1910, he has witnessed the remarkable growth of Taft and has seen a city spring into existence as if by magic. In the work of upbuilding he has been a factor. The Petroleum Club numbers him among its charter members and organizers. Another enterprise that commanded his warmest support was the securing of a school building on section 26, township 32, range 23, now known as the Hill school of the Conley school district. With other progressive citizens, he bore a part in organizing the First National Bank of Taft in 1911 with a capital stock of $25,000. From the first he has been a director and in January, 1913, he was elected vice-president. The institution has been successful in a remarkable degree and already has deposits aggregating $500,000. Upon its organization the directors bought the building and fixtures of the Taft branch of the old Oil and Metals Bank of Los Angeles, but during 1912 a more suitable structure was provided by the erection of a substantial bank building on the corner of Fifth and Center streets.

JUDSON H. JORDAN.—The vice-president of the Bakersfield Abstract Company descends from an honored family of colonial Virginia, whose splendid record in the professions and as cotton planters has been excelled only by their military achievements in the early French and Indian struggles, the Revolution and the war of 1812, the Mexican war and that sanguinary contest of the '60s between the states. Genealogy fails to give the exact date of the emigration of the first American representative from England, but it is known to have been shortly after the first attempt at colonization in Virginia. Keen, forceful mentality has characterized every generation, as evidenced in the lives of John H. Jordan, a planter of the Old Dominion, and his son, Rev. John C. Jordan, an influential and prominent minister in the Baptist denomination and a graduate of the Philadelphia Theological University. Shortly after the young Baptist clergyman entered upon his ministerial career he married Miss Lucy H. Tyler, an own cousin of John Tyler, the tenth president of the United States. In eastern pulpits he won distinction and accomplished much for the spiritual uplifting of humanity. An opportunity for enlarged ministerial usefulness led him to bring his family to California in 1884 and here he accepted the pastorate of the Fresno Baptist Church. During the five years of his ministry in that city he had charge of the erection of a substantial house of worship. A later pastorate at Bakersfield covered a similar period and also witnessed the erection of an edifice for the congregational worship. Upon leaving Bakersfield he was sent to Alaska to oversee the spiritual interests of the Baptists at Skagway, where he had charge of the construction of the handsome, substantial edifice that now ranks among the finest buildings in the city. After several years in Alaska he returned to the United States and entered upon the pastorate of the Baptist Church at Dillon, Mont., where he largely increased the membership and placed the congregation upon a permanent basis of useful service in the cause of Christianity. A later pastorate at Fallbrook, San Diego county, Cal., resulted in the erection of a house of worship for the Baptists at that point. Since his resignation from that charge he has been retired from active ministerial labors.

There were eight children in the family of the Baptist clergyman and all of these are still living. The third member of the family circle, Judson H., was born at Manchester, Chesterfield county, Va., May 9, 1876, and at the age of eight years accompanied his parents to California, where for five years he was a pupil in the public schools of Fresno. When only fifteen he studied law for a time, but he soon gave that up for a salaried position in an abstract office. Turning his attention to the oil business about 1900, he became identified with an industry in which he has been interested continuously up to the present, sometimes with other men and at times alone. Individually he still owns valuable oil lands in different fields. Shortly after the opening of the Jewett & Blodget wells in the Sunset field he with others formed the Occidental Oil Company, of which he became vice-president. After two producing wells had been obtained by the company, they sold out to the Spreckels interests. Later he was a member of different companies that developed oil and owned lands in the principal fields.

With the co-operation of J. B. Batz and George Hay, Mr. Jordan organized the Bakersfield Abstract Company in 1903 and since then has held the office of vice-president. With the same gentlemen he organized the Bakersfield Land and Development Company, dealers in agricultural and oil lands. Of this concern he is secretary, George Hay being president and J. B. Batz vice-president. They also incorporated the Kern County Realty Company, of which Mr. Jordan is the treasurer, the company owning valuable tracts of real estate in the county. In addition he holds office as secretary of the Blue Jay Mining Company in Trinity county, this state, where the company operates the noted Blue Jay mine, celebrated on account of the $42,800 nugget taken out of it during 1897. The company also operates the Morrison gulch mine, an hydraulic mine in the same section. The important interests connected with increasing business responsibilities necessitated the removal of Mr. Jordan from Bakersfield to San Francisco during 1901 and the family still maintain a residence in that city, although for the past year or more he has made his headquarters again in Bakersfield, resuming the management of local interests.

Prior to his removal from the city in 1901 Mr. Jordan was a member of the Bakersfield Club, which he had assisted in organizing and whose early growth was largely due to the efforts of such progressive leaders as himself and other young men of like enterprise and civic devotion. After he had established a residence in San Francisco he became a member of the Olympic and Southern Clubs and also entered San Francisco Lodge No. 3, B. P. O. E., to all of which he still belongs. Politically, although not active in public affairs and in no sense of the word a partisan, he has been stanch in his allegiance to the Democratic party. His family consists of wife and two children, Daisy M. and John Stanley, the former having been Miss Daisy M. Batz, a native of Kernville, Kern county, and a daughter of J. B. Batz, one of the honored pioneers of the county.

GUSTAV POSCH.—Extended travels throughout the old country as well as in the United States have given to Mr. Posch a broad outlook upon life and have made of him an independent thinker, familiar with the problems which the world is facing today and particularly solicitous concerning the material upbuilding of California, the chosen home of his adoption. In his identification with Bakersfield he has not been limited to the management of a tailoring business, but has associated himself with many local movements of note and in connection with Messrs. William H. Scribner and Paul Galtès built the Grand hotel, hence must be taken into consideration as one of the persons contributing to the material upbuilding of the city. During early life he was a resident of Neiderlausitz, Germany, where he was born January 21, 1867, and where he received a fair education in the German language. At the age of fourteen years he left school and entered upon an apprenticeship to the trade of a merchant tailor, which occupation he has since followed with deserved success. When only seventeen he had acquired a practical mastery of the trade and his skill was so marked that he had no difficulty in securing employment in any town. Being restless as a lad, eager to see the world and fond of travel, he had no difficulty in working his way from one point to another until he had seen much of the old country. Traveling as a journeyman, at the end of two years he landed at Amsterdam and in that interesting city he spent eight busy and enjoyable months. Illness caused him to return to Germany when about nineteen years of age, but soon his socialistic ideas brought him into conflict with the national police and he went to Copenhagen, Denmark, to follow his trade. Shortly returning to Germany, he set sail from that country for the United States when he was twenty years of age. In the new world, as in the old, he encountered no difficulty in finding employment as a skilled tailor. For a time he worked in Buffalo, N. Y., but later he went as far west as Toledo, Ohio, and next we find him working as a tailor in Leadville, Colo., whence he came to Bakersfield.

J. P. Sullivan

For a considerable period Mr. Posch has occupied a portion of the Galtès block for his tailoring shop and here he has built up a large patronage. Meanwhile he has exhibited his faith in the future of city and county by investing in property here, not only aiding in the building of the Grand hotel, but also having bought a particularly fine quarter section of land near Kern, which he still owns. Since he became a citizen of our country he has been a Republican. He is a member of the Germania Society and belongs to the Woodmen, Eagles, and Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

TIMOTHY P. SULLIVAN.—Near the city of Cork in Ireland, Timothy P. Sullivan was born June 29, 1845. The difficulties surrounding the school system of that day on the Emerald Isle prevented him from receiving an education in that land but he always has been quick to observe, fond of reading and alert in mental vision. In 1859 he arrived in Boston, Mass., his total capital limited to a six-pence, but he was able to obtain work on a farm without any delay. After a time he left the farm to learn the trade of butcher. At no time was he without employment and while his wages were very small they were sufficient for his modest needs. It was during this time he paid his tuition in night school in Boston, applying himself most diligently to acquire the education that had been denied him as a boy. Coming to California during 1872, he followed the butcher's trade for one year in San Francisco. Then he became a Southern Pacific employe at Elk Grove, Sacramento County, where soon he was made foreman of the section. Later he held a similar position at Banta and then at Bethany, San Joaquin County. For three years he was employed as foreman of switches in the Oakland yards and superintended the putting in of switches throughout that city.

On being assigned to duty in Kern County Mr. Sullivan spent eight years of faithful service as foreman of the Sumner yards (now East Bakersfield), after which he was promoted to be roadmaster of the Colorado division between Mojave and Needles, with headquarters at Fenner. When the road was sold to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe he was made roadmaster of the Tulare division with headquarters at Sumner for seven years. At the expiration of that period he was chosen to work in the mountain division, where his long experience made his services especially valuable to the company. During the period of his retention in that post he made his headquarters at Keene. Since his retirement from railroading in 1904 he has lived retired at Tehachapi and on the incorporation of this city he was honored by being elected to serve as a member of the first board of trustees. Here too he has been prominently connected with St. Malachy's Roman Catholic church. In earlier years he supported Republican principles, but more recently he has become independent with a leaning toward Democratic doctrines.

The first marriage of Mr. Sullivan took place in Boston, Mass., in October of 1871 and united him with Miss Ellen Healey, a native of county Cork, Ireland. Some years after her death he was married in Tehachapi to Miss Mary Hickey, who was born in county Claire, Ireland, and came with her parents to the new world, settling first at Boston, Mass., and then at McKeesport, Pa., but since 1891 a resident of California. May 15, 1911, Mr. and Mrs. Sullivan started on a trip to the old country. Their journey took them to all of the boyhood haunts of Mr. Sullivan, who thoroughly enjoyed visiting with such of the old friends as still remained in county Cork. Their travels took them to many interesting points in their native land, but they returned to California more than ever pleased to remain permanently in the great west.

While making his home in Tulare, Mr. Sullivan, having faith in the land and an optimistic view as to the future rise in values, bought six hundred and fifty-two and one-half acres for $2.50 an acre about 1890, and this property he sold in 1912 for $80 an acre.

UNION ICE COMPANY.—The Union Ice Company, whose headquarters are in San Francisco, entered Bakersfield during 1902 and erected the large building which has since been the center of a growing business. The present superintendent of the plant and local representative of the company, Hugo F. Allardt, whose identification with the business dates from 1908, was born at Cleveland, Ohio, June 29, 1881, and during 1905 came to California, where he engaged as cashier with the Fresno Consumers' Ice Company, remaining at Fresno until the larger opportunities offered in Bakersfield induced him to remove to this city. Here he has at No. 2109 Park way a comfortable and attractive residence, graciously presided over by Mrs. Allardt, who prior to their marriage was Miss Rosalie Hamilton, of Oakland.

The Union Ice Company and its kindred organization, the Bakersfield Ice Delivery, furnish employment to forty men during the busy season, so that the business is a valuable industrial asset to the community. The rapid growth of the concern necessitated the erection in 1911 of an additional building, in which ice-making is also carried on, and during the summer months both of the large compressors are running at their full capacity. Besides supplying the city trade the company furnishes ice for Taft, Fellows, Maricopa, McKittrick, Delano, Wasco and other outlying towns. In addition the Southern Pacific Railroad Company have a switch to the plant, whereby they are enabled to ice all of their refrigerator cars as desired. A part of the business is the manufacture of distilled water for drinking purposes.

In a large building immediately west of the ice factory there are five large rooms devoted to the cold storage business, each of these rooms having a capacity of two car-loads. The Bakersfield Ice Delivery has one motor truck, thirteen regular route wagons and two distributing stations, one on Wall street between G and H in Bakersfield, and the other on the corner of Sumner and Tulare in East Bakersfield. Mr. Allardt has recently taken over the Oil Center ice delivery, the supply for which is taken from a twenty-ton store-house, and one truck auto and five wagons are used. The large ice plant, located at Thirty-third street and Chester avenue, is equipped with an outfit of modern refrigerating machinery of two hundred and twenty-five tons daily capacity. Under the sagacious and progressive management of Mr. Allardt the company has kept pace with the growth of the city, has extended its service as the need arose, has enlarged its plant to meet the increasing demand for its products and storage accommodations, and has proved fully worthy of the liberal patronage accorded by the people of the county.

Horace R. Freear.

HORACE ROBERT FREEAR.—Those who by experiment, study and experience have proved the adaptability of alfalfa to the soil of Kern county are most enthusiastic believers in the possibilities of the product from the standpoint of profits. The labors of Mr. Freear in this department of agriculture have not been less gratifying than those of other ranchers. By conscientious care and indefatigable industry he has developed a valuable alfalfa ranch, from which, by cutting the hay five times a year, he is enabled to secure an average of six or eight tons per acre. It has been his invariable custom to cut and stack the alfalfa with the greatest care, later bale the hay and then sell in the best markets and to the greatest advantage. The ranch which he now owns and cultivates is a tract of one hundred and sixty acres under the Stine canal, situated nine miles southwest of Bakersfield and improved with suitable buildings, including a modern, substantial residence erected in 1910. The whole forms a place attractive to the eye, interesting to the stranger and profitable to the owner, whose energetic supervision appears in even the smallest details connected with the ranch.

From the age of seven years Mr. Freear has considered Kern county his home and he has lived here through all this time with the exception of three years spent in Mexico. A native of Nebraska, he was born near Lincoln, Lancaster county, June 25, 1869, and is a son of H. T. and Mary Freear, who also are represented in this work. Immediately after the family came from Nebraska to California he was sent to the Kern county public schools, where he took the regular course of study in the ensuing years. At the age of twenty he was graduated from the Stockton Business College and for six months afterward engaged as a bookkeeper in Bakersfield. Being accustomed to an outdoor life, he soon found sedentary employment too confining, therefore gave up his position and aided his father on a farm. With his brothers he next engaged in the cutting of wood in the Panama district. When finally three hundred and forty cords of wood had been cut he had earned an amount sufficient to justify an investment in land.

Upon acquiring the title to twenty acres on section 29 in the Old River district, Mr. Freear put the land in vines, intending to specialize with grapes, but these he found unprofitable. Meanwhile, in order to earn a livelihood, he had gone to Chiapas, Mexico, as an employe of an uncle on a sugar plantation. A portion of the three years in Mexico was given to hunting for plumed birds along the west coast. On returning to California he purchased twenty acres adjacent to his first tract, so that he owned forty acres in one body, all under cultivation to alfalfa. Upon selling the place to a brother he bought one hundred and sixty acres located nine miles southwest of Bakersfield and on this ranch during 1910 he erected a modern residence that is considered to be one of the finest country homes in the district. In addition to operating the home place, the larger part of which has an unusually fine stand of alfalfa, he and his brothers, Charles H. and Joseph, in 1912 leased five hundred acres from Miller & Lux. The large tract being under cultivation to Egyptian corn, their success was so gratifying that they leased about one thousand acres the following year and their efforts resulted in a bumper crop, demonstrating that the soil and climate make Kern county a leader in the production of Egyptian corn. While the care of so great an acreage necessitates constant labor and untiring energy, the returns have justified the procedure and at the same time have added further proof concerning the crop possibilities of the county.

The principles of the Republican party receive the support of Mr. Freear, whose intelligent advocacy of progressive measures marks him as one of the public-spirited men of his community. His marriage took place in the Old River district July 2, 1908, and united him with Miss Bertha Weingartner, a native of the vicinity of Tully, Onondaga county, N. Y., and a daughter of Albert and Nancy (Barrett) Weingartner, also natives of New York state. When eight years of age Mrs. Freear came to California in company with other members of the Weingartner family. During girlhood she was a pupil in the public schools of Tehama and Glenn counties and since her marriage she has co-operated with her husband in an earnest adherence to principles of justice and progress, generously sustaining movements for the material, educational and social upbuilding of the district.

JOHN M. JAMESON.—The history of the Jameson family in California dates back to the era of the discovery of gold, while in America the genealogy is traced to colonial Virginia, John M. Jameson, Sr., having been the founder of the name to the west of the Old Dominion and having lived for years among the frontier population of Missouri near the city of St. Louis. While yet a mere lad his son, William T., had served in the Mexican war and had gained an enlarged comprehension of the riches of our vast domain during the period of his service in the southwest. Soon after the expiration of his term in the army with his father he crossed the plains in 1848 with "prairie schooner" and oxen. The trip into California aroused in him a desire to locate permanently in the west, hence after a brief sojourn in Amador county he returned to Missouri via Panama, interested others in an expedition, secured the necessary supplies, procured a mule-team and carriage for his mother and sisters, and taking every precaution against attacks from Indians, slowly made his way across the plains with a large following of emigrants. For a time after his arrival he engaged in mining, but later took up agriculture and during 1874 he became a resident of Kern county, where after a year at Glennville he settled in Bakersfield. The little village was unattractive in appearance and in prospects, but he discerned its possibilities and decided to remain. There being no house to rent, he secured an old blacksmith shop, repaired the building and made it the family home for several months until it was possible to erect a small cottage to shelter wife and children. With fair success for years he engaged in teaming, carried on general farming, operated a ranch on the Cottonwood road and owned a cattle ranch on Mount Breckenridge. During the '80s he served as county treasurer for two years. His death occurred at his homestead near Kern in February of 1909 when he was eighty years of age. After coming to California he had married in Amador county Miss Annie Kendall, who was born near Portsmouth, Ohio, and died in 1888. Her father, R. A. Kendall, a native of Ohio, brought the family via Panama to Amador county, but later removed to Sutter county, where his last days were passed.

The family of William T. and Annie (Kendall) Jameson comprised ten children, of whom six are now living, four being sons. Of these E. R. resides in San Francisco, J. R., in Graham, Tex., and F. H., in Glennville, Cal. John M., who is next to the eldest among the surviving sons, was born at Fairplay, Eldorado county, Cal., August 31, 1863, but has been a resident of Kern county since 1874. His education was secured in the public schools of Kern. After three years as clerk in a store at Kern and a similar period as superintendent of a ranch owned by Sol Jewett he drifted into farming and stock-raising and acquired the title to a ranch on the Cottonwood road comprising three hundred and twenty acres. On that land his father lived, while he gave his attention to general contracting and teaming for a long period. From 1890 until 1894 he served as deputy under County Assessor Lightner. For the first time in 1898 he was elected county assessor on the Democratic ticket and in January of the following year he assumed the duties of office. At the expiration of the term of four years he was re-elected. After having served from 1898 to 1906 he was again chosen his own successor and in 1910 he was re-elected without opposition, a fact that bears eloquent testimony as to the value of his services and the appreciation in which they are held. To indicate the growth of Kern county, the first assessment of the county made under his official regime was about $15,000,000, and the last which includes the public service corporations, aggregated over $73,000,000. Besides owning the residence on the corner of Twentieth and B streets, Bakersfield, he still retains farm lands and also owns oil interests. Upon the organization of the Security Bank of Bakersfield he became one of its principal stockholders and was chosen a director, in which capacity he has continued to the present. For one year he also officiated as a director of the board of trade. In 1913, associated with Messrs. Parker and O'Brien, Mr. Jameson purchased the Southern Hotel and incorporated the Southern Hotel Company. Since then the hotel has been remodelled and partially refurnished.

Harrison Ross Peacock.

The marriage of Mr. Jameson united him with Miss Charlotte E. Baker, by whom he has two sons, Myron and Kenneth. Mrs. Jameson, who claims Bakersfield as her native city, is a daughter of Col. Thomas Baker and possesses exceptional ability and a winning personality. The Woodmen of the World, Ancient Order of United Workmen and Eagles enjoy the benefit of his intelligent co-operation and in addition he is past exalted ruler of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. Years ago he was made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., and later he was raised to the Royal Arch degree in Bakersfield Chapter. He was made a Sir Knight in Bakersfield Commandery, K. T., while more recently he became affiliated with Al Malaikah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles, and is a member also of the Bakersfield Club.

HARRISON ROSS PEACOCK.—The Peacock genealogy is traced to a long line of English ancestry, but the family became established in New York state during the early period of American history and Joseph Peacock, who was born and reared near Rome, N. Y., was the first of the name to identify himself with the development of the Pacific coast. Coming by Panama to San Francisco in 1852, he engaged in placer mining near Yreka, Siskiyou county, where with alternate successes and reverses he continued to operate as a miner until 1864. In that year he went as far south as Solano county for the purpose of engaging in general farming and stock-raising. Not understanding thoroughly the conditions appertaining to titles and claims, he settled on what proved to be a Spanish grant, so had to give up his claim. Next he entered a tract on Suisun creek in the same county. When he removed in 1874 to what is now Kings county he profited by his previous experience and instead of taking a claim and fighting for it, like many of the early settlers, he bought land from the railroad. Later events proved the wisdom of his act. He was superintendent of the 76 Land and Water Company's canal during its construction and for a period of seven years after its completion. For a long period he engaged in the improvement of his farm, but finally the infirmities of age obliged him to relinquish manual labor and he retired to Hanford, where he died in 1910 at the age of eighty years. From the time of casting his first ballot he was a supporter of Republican principles and he was one of the first twelve Republicans to vote in Siskiyou county. While preferring not to be a candidate for office, he consented on one occasion to run for supervisor and, although in a Democratic district, he was defeated by only forty-nine votes. Some years after coming to California he married Hannah Bonham, who was born in Illinois and lives now at Selma, Cal. Early in the '50s she crossed the plains with her father, Elisha Bonham, who brought a herd of cattle through to Oregon and took up land in that state, but eventually came to California and continued the stock business in Solano county until his death.

The parental family comprised five sons and five daughters. All are still living, Harrison Ross being the eldest of the number and a native of Solano county, this state, born in Green valley, near Vallejo, April 14, 1865. During 1874 he was taken by his parents to Kings county and settled on a ranch near Hanford, where he attended the public schools. At the age of twenty-one years he embarked in the livery business at Traver, Tulare county, and while thus engaged he took a commercial course in Fresno Business College, of which he is a graduate. In addition he served as deputy sheriff under Dan Overall, the first Republican sheriff of Tulare county. Meanwhile he had acquired unimproved land lying between Dinuba, Tulare county, and Reedley, Fresno county, where he became interested in raising alfalfa. At Traver he opened and operated the first creamery in the village, also was interested in the first creamery at Hanford. Possessing a keen faculty for business of all kinds, he seemed particularly well adapted for the creamery industry. Seeing an excellent opening at Bakersfield, in 1902 he embarked in the occupation at this point. His success has been so great that Peacock's creamery is favorably known throughout all this section of the state. There is an increasing demand for Peacock's butter and ice-cream, the latter manufactured by the brine system operated by electric power.

The management of the creamery does not represent the limit of Mr. Peacock's activities. His fine mental qualities enable him to superintend various interests easily and effectively. At this writing he owns and manages the Peacock stock and alfalfa farm located nine miles south of Bakersfield, under the old Kern Island ditch. The ranch embraces two hundred and forty acres of fertile land that by the aid of irrigation produce excellent crops of alfalfa and grain. A specialty is made of the stock industry. The thoroughbred Poland-China hogs kept on the farm are as fine as may be seen anywhere in the county. There are also one hundred and thirty head of milch cows, some full-blood Jerseys and other grades of superior quality, the whole forming one of the largest dairies in Kern county and one of the most profitable as well. Besides owning this property Mr. Peacock has an interest in an alfalfa ranch of sixteen hundred and twenty acres on Kern Island, owned by the Panama Land Company, of which he is a director. His interests in oil operations embrace the presidency of the Tejon Oil Company, a producing concern operating nine wells in the Kern river field and owning eighty acres of land. Besides his association with the creamery, with oil interests and agricultural affairs, he has entered the realm of finances and since the organization of the Security Trust Company, of which he was one of the promoters, he has acted as first vice-president and a director.

The marriage of Mr. Peacock was solemnized in Lake county, Cal., and united him with Miss Harriet M. Wayne, a native of Illinois, a lady of education and culture, and a sincere member of the Congregational Church. By this union there are three children, Wayne, Ross and Geraldine. While engaging in business at Traver Mr. Peacock was made a Mason and now holds membership with Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M.; Bakersfield Chapter No. 75, R. A. M.; Bakersfield Commandery No. 39, K. T.; and Al Malaikah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles. The Woodmen of the World and the Bakersfield Club also number him among their members.

While he has limited his attention and investments in the main to his home county, he has not been neglectful of excellent opportunities elsewhere, has invested in lands in the Imperial valley and also has kept in touch with the upbuilding of all sections of the west. Here he has been associated with the Merchants' Association and at one time served as president of the Board of Trade, in which capacity he was able to promote many movements for the local upbuilding. In national politics he is a Republican.

CHARLES H. SMITH.—The discouragements and obstacles incident to existence in a new, undeveloped country fell to the lot of the Smith family when they became pioneers of California, but the father, John Foster Smith, a Kentuckian by birth, was a man of such resolute purpose and such indomitable will that he never faltered when repeated adversities wiped out his all. Early in life he had removed to Texas and there had served in Indian fights as a member of the celebrated Texas Rangers, where his courage was put to many a severe test. Nor were the trials of pioneer farming less depressing than those of the army. Both in Texas and in California he lived a life of great privation and continued self-sacrifice. While living in Texas he married Amanda Stark, a native of Kentucky, where likewise occurred the birth of her father, Robert E. Stark. After having sojourned for a time in Missouri and Arkansas, during 1853 Mr. Stark brought his family across the plains to California and took up a claim at Fort Tejon, where he engaged in ranching and raising stock.

During the summer of 1859 the Smith family, which then consisted of father, mother and two children, left Texas via the southern stage route for California, where they arrived on New Year's day of 1860 at Tejon canyon. With a brother-in-law, Jesse Stark, as a partner Mr. Smith began to raise stock, his specialty at first being cattle and sheep. For a time he was prospered, but in 1877 he lost the savings of years of difficult labor and self-sacrifice. Later he retrieved himself to some extent and farmed on a large tract near Bakersfield. Later he took up land in Bear valley. After he had once again achieved a fair degree of success and had invested everything in a large drove of hogs he lost heavily through an epidemic of cholera that wiped out his entire drove. While operating his ranch in Bear Valley, about 1894, he was accidentally killed by the fall from a horse. His wife passed away in 1900. Their children were as follows: Mrs. Mary Shackelford, now a resident of Bakersfield; Susie, who died in Kern county; Louisa, Mrs. Haupt, of Tehachapi; Elma, who is married to Bruce Tungate and is living near Bakersfield; Laura, Mrs. L. F. Brit, of Bakersfield; Mrs. Ella Cunningham, who died at Tehachapi; Charles H., deputy sheriff of Kern county; and Oliver, now in the Palos Verdes Valley.

When the family were developing a ranch at the head of Fort Tejon canyon Charles H. Smith was born at the ranch-house March 20, 1870. At the age of ten years he accompanied the family to Tehachapi, where he attended the grammar school. Later he began to work as a rancher and farmer. For some years he was employed as manager of the Rock Springs Land & Cattle Company. Later he engaged in the stock business for himself. In September of 1909 he was appointed deputy sheriff under J. W. Kelly and at once he established his residence at Bakersfield, where he still remains, although he had erected and still owns a residence at Tehachapi. When Thomas A. Baker became sheriff he was continued as deputy and is filling the position with energy and intelligence, displaying the same fearlessness that characterized his father years ago in fighting with the Texas rangers against the savages.

While living in Tehachapi Mr. Smith married Miss Mary Addie Haigh, who was born in Tuolumne county, this state, and died at Bakersfield July 28, 1910, leaving three children, Alvin, Laura and Emmett. Mrs. Smith was a daughter of George Haigh, a pioneer who came to the west during the period of mining activity and himself had some thrilling experiences in the mines, but not finding there the wealth he had hoped to acquire he settled down to a quiet existence as a rancher. At an early day he settled at Tehachapi and here he still makes his home. In politics Mr. Smith votes with the Democratic party. Fraternally, besides being connected with the Modern Woodmen of America, he was made a Mason in Tehachapi Lodge No. 313, F. & A. M., and later also identified himself with Tehachapi Chapter No. 218, O. E. S.

DAVE CRICHTON.—The mining interests of California are of such importance that they have been written of pretty generally whenever the advantages of the state have fallen under consideration. Many a large fortune and numerous snug little competencies have been dug out of the soil of Kern and some of her sister counties. A leading mining operator of Kern county is Dave Crichton of Mojave, who is also interested in the liquor business and is the owner of considerable real estate.

It was in Ontario, Canada, that Mr. Crichton was born December 20, 1861. There he lived until in 1870, attending school and learning useful work. He was fifteen when he laid down his educational books and was in his sixteenth year when he was taken by his parents to St. Johns, Mich. There he lived until 1888, working for his father, later farming on his own account. He then went, in 1889, to Butte, Mont., where he engaged in mining. In 1891 he went into the business of running diamond drills. It was Mr. Crichton who utilized the diamond drill in the operation of the Hope mine at Phillipsburg, Mont., in 1893. He came to Kern county in 1894 and located at Mojave where he was employed by the old Atlantic & Pacific, now the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company. In 1901 he associated himself with William Concannon in the liquor trade, in which they have achieved success. He is engaged in mining in Inyo county and is the owner of and has built up many houses in Mojave. From 1897 until 1902 with George Roper he operated the Bobtail mine in Soledad Hill, Kern county, when it was sold to Los Angeles people.

February 24, 1902, Mr. Crichton married Miss Eva Underhill, who was born at Phoenix, Ariz., in 1878. As a citizen he is helpful and popular and in all his relations with his fellowmen he has shown himself upright, progressive and public-spirited.

JAMES EDWARD DICKINSON.—Born in Newman, Douglas county, Ill., August 6, 1874, James Edward Dickinson, of Bakersfield, came to Kern county January 18, 1891, at which time his parents settled here. His father, Samuel Dickinson, a native of Indiana, served as sergeant of an Indiana regiment in the Civil war. On coming to Kern county he located on eighty acres of land on what is now the oil field road, and there for a time engaged in melon raising. Subsequently he sold off a portion of the land and on this has since been built up the town of Waits. The father met an untimely death in 1911, when he was killed by a Southern Pacific train at the Chester avenue crossing. He was seventy-eight years of age. His widow, who was in maidenhood Martha J. Danely, survives him, making her home with her son James E. The parental family included five children of whom three are living, James E. being the eldest.

After completing his education James E. Dickinson continued farming and raising melons until his enlistment for service in the Spanish-American war in 1898 in Company G, Sixth California Volunteer Infantry. His service extended until the close of the war, when he was mustered out in San Francisco. After his return home he was employed for two years with the Kern

Elmer H. Hoody.

County Land Company, following this by eight years as foreman of carpenter work for the Petroleum Development Oil Company, after which he went into business for himself as a general contractor and builder, operating in Bakersfield and vicinity. Although much of his skill has been employed in building cottages and apartment houses, he has also done much work in the oil fields in the construction of rigs and buildings. Associated with him in business is M. A. Dugar, a man of large practical experience as a builder.

May 26, 1906, Mr. Dickinson married Miss Mabel Clara Poole, who was born in Nebraska, September 9, 1886, and they have three children, Erwin, Laura and Robert. Fraternally Mr. Dickinson affiliates with Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., and with a local division of the Woodmen of the World. He is also a member General Shafter Camp, Spanish-American War Veterans.

ELMER HENRY WOODY.—The genealogical records indicate an early identification of the Woody family with colonial Virginia. Several successive generations lived and labored there, the majority of them being planters by occupation. In the family of one of these planters, whose specialty was the raising of tobacco, there was a son, Sparrell Walter, born at the old homestead near Rockymount, Franklin county, Va., March 10, 1826, and reared amid the cultured surroundings characteristic of his day and locality. The best of educational advantages were made accessible to him in youth. After he had acquired a fair classical education he took up the profession of medicine and from 1845 to 1848 studied the science under the friendly preceptorship of Dr. W. E. Dillard, of his home county. Later he attended lectures in St. Louis and received the degree of M. D. from the medical department of the University of Missouri. Scarcely had he begun the practice of his profession in Missouri when news came concerning the discovery of gold in California. With all the eagerness of youth and with the love of adventure characteristic of him, he made immediate plans for removal to the west. During the summer of 1849 he crossed the plains with an expedition of Argonauts and joined the great throng of men endeavoring to find a fortune in the mines. For three years he remained in Placer county, but his earnest and long-continued efforts brought him little of the gold of which he had dreamed. Finally it seemed desirable to seek other lines of enterprise, and accordingly he engaged in the hotel and livery business, which brought him fair financial returns. However, an eagerness to see more of the world led him to give up the business and go to the Sandwich Islands in 1858. Securing employment in the government custom house at Honolulu, he remained for some months, but in 1859 returned to San Francisco, content to settle in that city for the time being. Later, after a brief sojourn in Visalia, Tulare county, he came to the present site of the city of Bakersfield in the fall of 1860, and made an earnest endeavor to engage in farming, but the disastrous floods of 1861 and 1862 entailed a complete loss and forced him to seek a new location. In this way it happened that he settled in 1862 in the district that now bears his name.

The marriage of Dr. Woody took place in Kern county May 20, 1861, and united him with Miss Sarah L. Bohna, who was born at Warsaw, Benton county, Mo., June 13, 1845, but had been brought to California by her father, Christian Bohna, during the era of mining excitement. Her death occurred March 3, 1909, in the district where for so many years she had been a beloved resident, and here, too, her husband passed away September 2, 1910. Their memory is revered not only by their children, but also by the warm personal friends, who will never cease to bear in mind their many virtues and by future generations who will learn with interest of their association with the pioneer history of the county.

Elmer H. Woody, son of Dr. S. W. and Sarah Woody, was born at Woody, Kern county, July 10, 1880, and received a public-school education, supplemented by attendance at Woodbury's Business College in Los Angeles, from which he was graduated in the spring of 1900. After his return home from the college he began to improve and develop a quarter-section adjoining his father's estate and for five years he remained on the new tract, meanwhile devoting his attention to farming. Until the death of his father he carried on a partnership with him in the livestock industry and since the death of his parents and the division of the estate he and his brother own in partnership about six thousand acres of land devoted to the cattle business, the Short-horn Durham breed predominating. The ranch lies on the west side, at the foot of Blue mountain and at the head of Rag gulch. It is well watered by numerous springs and is thickly studded with native oak, such as water and white oak.

On August 27, 1911, Mr. Woody was united in marriage at Bakersfield with Miss Frances J. Weringer, a young lady of education and refinement, the daughter of Joseph and Lucy Weringer. After her graduation from the Western Normal school at Stockton she was engaged in teaching until her marriage. One child has blessed their marriage, Ward Sparrell. In politics Mr. Woody has always given his support to Democratic doctrines.

SERAPHIM POURROY.—The Pourroy family had generations of representatives among the farmers in Hautes Alpes, France, where Joseph Pourroy passed his life as a stock-raiser at the old homestead near the Pondus Fose river. Both he and his wife, who bore the maiden name of Emelie Richau, remained on the home farm until death gave them rest from their labors. Of their five children four are yet living, the youngest of the family being Seraphim, born at the old homestead September 21, 1876, and reared to a knowledge of agricultural duties under wise parental training. His brother, Theophile, came from France to California in 1881 and settled in Kern county, whither he also came in 1884 with the hope of securing advantages impossible in his native land. The voyage was made via steamer from Havre to New York City. Thence he traveled across the country to Sumner (now East Bakersfield). For three years he herded sheep for his brother, of whom he then bought a small flock with which to make his start in the business. On the range in this part of the country he pastured his flock of seven hundred head. At first he was greatly prospered and after he had formed a partnership with his brother they owned five thousand head in their combined flocks. Just as their affairs seemed to be established upon a firm basis the panic of 1893-95 developed and prices dropped to such a point that both brothers were bankrupted.

Forced to begin again as a wage-earner, Seraphim Pourroy became a sheep-herder on the ranges of the San Joaquin valley. At the expiration of six years of the most arduous and untiring effort he was in a position to buy another flock of sheep and he took this step, undismayed by the results of his former venture. Forming a partnership with M. Plantier, he assumed the management of the flock and for four years made his headquarters on the O'Neil place. This time he was prospered in his undertakings and when the partnership was dissolved he was in a position to invest in land. Since 1906 he has owned and operated forty acres seven miles south of Bakersfield between Union avenue and Kern Island road. At the time of purchase the land was unimproved. It was no small task to make all the needed improvements, but with characteristic energy he has kept at the work until now he has a comfortable house, a substantial barn, irrigation facilities from the Kern Island canal and the land leveled, sowed to alfalfa and productive of profitable crops of hay. Mr. Pourroy is proud of his farm, but he is even more proud of his family, which comprises his wife and three children, Gertrude, Seraphim and Emma. Miss Fanny Geraud was born in Hautes Alpes, France, in 1875, and is a daughter of Jean and Rosalie (Bertrand) Geraud, the former a farmer by occupation. During 1900 Miss Geraud came from France to California and settled in Bakersfield, where March 12, 1904, she and Mr. Pourroy were united in a marriage that has proved of mutual happiness and helpfulness.

A. A. Goode

ALBERT S. GOODE.—In 1853 James M. Goode, a Kentuckian by birth and ancestry, crossed the plains with his parents in a "prairie schooner" drawn by oxen. The record of his subsequent hardships and privations does not differ materially from the history of other pioneers of sterling worth and unwearied energy. In the land of the golden west he met and married Susan H. McPhetridge, who in 1856 had crossed the plains from her native Missouri with her parents. The young couple settled in Santa Barbara county, took up land, developed a ranch, made a specialty of stock-raising and eventually attained a degree of success more than merited by the painstaking industry of years. When the acquisition of a competency and the oncoming of old age rendered further labor on the ranch undesirable they came to Bakersfield and have since lived in retirement in this city.

The family of James M. Goode comprised eight children, all but one of whom are still living. The fifth in order of birth, Albert S., was born at the old homestead near Santa Maria, Santa Barbara county, this state, January 26, 1879, and received his education in local schools. After he had entered the high school of Santa Maria the family removed to Bakersfield and here he completed his studies in the excellent high school of the city. Two years after he came to Kern county he started out to earn his own way in the world. Since that year (1901) he has engaged in the dairy business. His rise in the industry has been rapid in an exceptional degree. Beginning with one cow, he delivered milk to private customers in Bakersfield. The business was well received. Others desired to be added to his list of customers. That rendered necessary the buying of other cows. By the end of five years he owned seventy-five cows. During 1906 he contracted to supply milk and cream to all the eating houses on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad in the states of California, Arizona and New Mexico. In addition he supplies milk and cream to all the Pullman dining cars on the same railroad as far east as Chicago.

The Goode dairy, located on six hundred and forty acres four and one-half miles south of Bakersfield, has become well and favorably known throughout the county, where it is by far the largest plant of its kind. The proprietor of the dairy maintains every modern convenience and desirable equipment for the management of the business. Since leasing the Kerr and Aspinwall ranches in 1910 he has kept his herds here and has built three large silos for ensilage, also has provided other improvements necessary to a modern and sanitary dairy. A cold-storage plant gives evidence concerning his adoption of modern ideas. Intensified farming has been adopted, thus rendering possible a large yield of alfalfa and grain. It is a source of pride to him that he owns the finest herd of dairy stock in the west. Every head has been selected under his personal oversight. Altogether he owns three hundred head of cattle and of these about two hundred are full blooded milch cows of the celebrated St. Lambert strain of Jerseys and combine finest quality and best breeding.

One of the most important of Mr. Goode's business enterprises was the laying out of forty acres known as the Goode tract, the same forming the first large subdivision district in Bakersfield. Since the tract was subdivided in 1910 it has been sold in lots, bringing a fair return to the original owner. At the present writing Mr. Goode owns an alfalfa ranch of one hundred and twenty acres on Kern Island, where he is extensively engaged in the stock business. With H. R. Peacock and others he organized the Ve-seven Cattle Company, engaged in breeding and raising cattle, feeding, buying and selling stock, and shipping the same to the markets of the north and south. Since the organization of the company he has served as its secretary. So closely have his interests tied him to business matters that he has had no leisure for participation in public affairs, but he has formed a number of fraternal associations and is very popular among the Woodmen of the World, Elks Lodge No. 266 and the Elks Club in Bakersfield. Although identifying himself to some degree with social functions he leaves such activities largely to his wife, formerly Miss Cornelia K. Hansen, who was born, reared and married in San Jose and who is a woman of culture, a leading member of the Woman's Club of Bakersfield and a participant in many important movements for the educational and social upbuilding of the city.

WILLIAM MENZEL.—It is characteristic of the native sons of California that they evince the utmost interest and put forth generous efforts toward the welfare of their commonwealth, and this, coupled with the natural enthusiasm and sturdy powers of energy and effort of his Teutonic ancestors, has accomplished much to make William Menzel the prominent citizen he is to-day. He is the son of one of the earliest miners of Kern county, his father, William Menzel, being a native of Hamburg, Germany. When a lad of fourteen he ran away from home to seek the gold fields of California, reports of which had reached him in his far-away home. Working his way across the Atlantic and on to California he arrived in San Francisco in 1849 when the mining excitement was at its greatest, and he immediately began mining. In 1851 he drifted into the Kern river placers soon after the first discoveries and followed mining around Keyesville and Kernville and also on the Piute mountains. He identified himself conspicuously with Kernville by starting the first butcher shop there, at the same time raising stock. Afterward he sold this business to become head amalgamater at the Big Blue Mill, but in 1884 removed to Havilah to become proprietor of the Golden Gate hotel which he conducted until his demise in 1896. A short time after his arrival in California he made a trip back to his old home where he renewed his acquaintance with a young lady who later, in 1871, came to California and married him in Visalia. Her maiden name was Johanna Godenrath, and she survives him, residing in Long Beach, Cal.

Of the four children born to his parents William Menzel was the eldest and to him was given the best educational advantages afforded by the local schools of Kernville and Havilah. When seventeen he began to do for himself, having charge of the stage stables at Havilah for Judge Sumner, who had the Caliente-Kernville mail contract. Thirteen months later he bought a team and wagon and some cattle and sheep and embarked in the stock business. Establishing the brand he had purchased (two quarter circles, joined points downward), he continued the stock business, and he is today still using that brand. His cattle range for a time was on the Breckenridge mountains with headquarters on the old Welch ranch adjoining Havilah on the north. In October, 1908, he purchased sixty acres about seven miles south of Bakersfield on the Kern Island Road, and removing to this place, he has since made it his headquarters. The ranch is under the Kern Island canal and is devoted to grain and alfalfa. His sheep are ranged on the plains and in the Kern National Forest.

Mr. Menzel was married in Hanford, Cal., to Mrs. Ella (Walsh) Kincaid, who was born in Walkers Basin, Kern county, the daughter of Martin and Bridget (Welch) Walsh. Her parents were early settlers of Kern county, the father following the vocation of miner in the early days. Then he engaged in cattle raising and owned a farm known as the Walsh ranch, just north of Havilah, continuing there until his death. The mother is making her home with her daughter, Mrs. Menzel. One child was born to Mr. and Mrs. Menzel, Gladys. By her former marriage to Mr. Kincaid Mrs. Menzel was the mother of four children, Martin, deceased, Joseph, William and Myrtle Kincaid. Mr. Menzel is a staunch Republican in political sentiment.

Thomas M Young

THOMAS MILTON YOUNG.—The identification of the Young family with the Pacific coast country dates back to the era of gold discovery and indicates an honorable association with the entire period of agricultural development as well as with other occupations scarcely less important than that of agriculture. The first to seek the unknown opportunities of the west, Thomas J. Young, a native of Massachusetts, made the long journey from the old Bay state by way of Panama and for a time after his arrival tried his luck in the mines. Later he turned his attention to the hotel and livery business at Sutter creek. Meanwhile he had married Elizabeth Hinkson, who was born in Missouri and during the '50s crossed the plains with her parents, the family settling in Amador county. Five children were born of the union and the third of these, T. M., is a native of Drytown, Amador county, this state, born December 19, 1868. During 1869 the family removed from Amador to Stanislaus county, where the father took up land in the vicinity of Modesto. From a small beginning he enlarged his holdings until he had accumulated five thousand acres. In the midst of his great holdings, about three and one-half miles from Modesto, he made his home for years in a comfortable ranch-house, but about 1900 he retired to Stockton, where he has since lived in the enjoyment of a competency and leisure amply merited by past years of toil. Always a staunch Republican, he twice was nominated for sheriff of Stanislaus county, but the party being greatly in the minority in that county, he suffered defeat at both elections. He is a citizen of great worth and the highest standing. The changes of sixty years he has witnessed in the commonwealth of his adoption and his name is entitled to lasting remembrance in the annals of pioneer history.

For some years in early life T. M. Young engaged in the dairy business and during that period he paid his way through the San Joaquin Valley College at Woodbridge, remaining a student until the close of the junior year. At Woodbridge, January 23, 1895, he married Miss Odessa Riley, a native of Indiana and a graduate of the San Joaquin Valley College. Of the union there is one son, Hobart Nading Young. Upon selling the dairy business Mr. Young entered the employ of the Southern Pacific Company, which soon afterward sent him into Kern. During June of 1893 he was made a clerk and operator in the freight department at Bakersfield, from which he was promoted to be cashier and assistant agent, and later he held positions in the passenger department and the superintendent's office. February 16, 1907 he resigned to accept a place as chief clerk with the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad at Stockton, but that important place he was forced to resign owing to ill health, his resignation taking effect on the 30th of May. Returning to Bakersfield he embarked in the oil industry and assisted in organizing the Emerald Oil Company, of which he became secretary and manager. Besides being interested in this company in the Kern river field he had other holdings of stock. With the organization of the Topaz Oil Company in the Sunset field in June, 1908, he became secretary and manager.

The water supply on the west side was inadequate, of poor quality and very expensive. For the purpose of securing better quality and larger quantity Mr. Young helped to organize the Kern Midway Water Company, of which he was chosen secretary and manager and which shipped water in cars by rail to the Midway field for domestic as well as boiler and general development use. During March of 1909 he assisted in organizing the T. W. Company in the Midway field, of which he was chosen secretary and manager. April of the same year found him actively promoting the organization of the W. T. & M. Company operating in the Midway and of this he also became secretary and manager. During June of the same year he organized the Carbo-Petroleum Company, operating in the Midway, and in this he was made manager and secretary. In February of 1910 he became secretary and manager of Los Pozos Oil Company in the Midway field. May of the same year witnessed the organization by him of the 23 Water Company, of which he was chosen secretary and manager, and which engaged in distributing water for operating purposes in the Midway field. Another Midway concern, the S. F. Midway Oil Company, was organized by his efforts in August, 1910, and he became secretary and manager. January 1, 1911, he was chosen secretary and manager of the Railroad Water Company Association, another distributor of water in the Midway field. A later enterprise was the organization, in June of 1911, of the M. G. & P. Company, operating in the North Midway, with himself as secretary and manager. In all of the before-mentioned organizations, excepting the Railroad Water Company Association, he officiated as a director. In October, 1913, with associates, he organized the Midway-Simi Oil Company developing an oil property of two hundred and fifty acres in the Simi valley, Ventura county, of which company he is secretary, treasurer and manager. In November, 1913, with associates, he went to Oklahoma and Texas, leasing nine thousand acres in Jefferson county, Okla., and twelve thousand acres in southeastern Texas, and the development of these properties has been begun. Aside from these companies he is interested in and a stockholder in various other oil companies. Upon the incorporation of the Western Water Company he became a director and assistant secretary and since then he has been connected actively with this concern, which furnishes water to the Midway and Sunset fields. Since the organization of the Consumers Water Company he has been secretary and a director and has had charge of the company's business of delivering water for domestic use to the town of Taft. The Kern County Oil Protective Association was formed for the purpose of controlling and preventing the percolation of water into the oil sand and to encourage the proper drilling of wells. From the first he was deeply interested in the movement. In order that he might promote its helpful influence he consented to serve as secretary and vice-president. At this writing he is a director in the Independent Oil Producers' Agency. Besides being connected with the Merchants' Exchange Club of San Francisco, he holds membership with the Bakersfield Club, the Bakersfield Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E., and the Independent Order of Foresters. The interests of Bakersfield, where he has made his home for more than two decades receive his co-operation and encouraging assistance, and with genuine public spirit he has stood ready to promote any measure for the permanent benefit of city, county or commonwealth.

CYRILLE ANDRE.—The example of wise and frugal parents on a small, well-cultivated farm in France gave to the early years of Mr. André the advantages of a training that proved of inestimable value to later days of hardship, toil and hope delayed. More extended mention of the family appears in the biographical sketch of André André. Suffice it here to state that their father, Ambroise, spent ten years in California, but in 1885 closed out his sheep interests in this state and returned to France to spend his declining days in the midst of associations endeared to him by every tie of affection and intimacy. Cyrille himself left the old homestead near Gap, Hautes Alpes, where he was born in June, 1862, and sought the opportunities of America at the age of less than nineteen years, since which time he has considered California his home.

Arriving in this state during the spring of 1881 Cyrille André learned the sheep business as conducted in the west and his period of employment under his father and older brother proved of great assistance to him in his efforts to acquire a thorough familiarity with the country, the language and the people. As early as 1882 he herded the flocks of his brother in Kern county. About 1886 he invested his savings in a flock of his own, and these sheep he ranged in Kern county. Selling out his holdings in stock he returned to Los Angeles in 1890, but in a short time he again was the possessor of a little flock which he ranged in the vicinity of Cucamonga. In a search for more satisfactory range he brought his sheep over the Tehachapi mountains into Kern county during 1895 and here he ranged them on the plains and in the mountains until 1903, when he disposed of the flock in order to give his attention exclusively to farming. Having made a close study of land in the San Joaquin valley he decided that the vicinity of Bakersfield afforded excellent advantages to farmers. Accordingly he bought sixty acres six miles south of Bakersfield between Union avenue and the Kern Island road, where an abundance of water from the Kern Island canal gives exceptional advantages for the successful raising of alfalfa and corn. In the midst of a very busy life he has found time twice to revisit the old scenes in France. During 1902 he spent about six months at the old home place and in 1910 he again crossed the ocean to France, where in November of the same year he married Miss Marie Barthalmy, a native of Hautes Alpes. With Mrs. André and their little daughter, Marie, he has a happy and comfortable home on the ranch near Bakersfield and is surrounded by evidences of his thrift, foresight and enterprise. Truly American in his type of feeling and loyalty, he supports the Republican party and its candidates. He is a member of the Catholic Church.

N. P. Petersen

NIELS PETER PETERSEN.—In Llesso channel between the Cattegat and Skager Rack lies the small island of Leso, a portion of the kingdom of Denmark, where Niels Peter Petersen was born October 10, 1841, the son of a government official who also owned an ocean vessel and engaged in the coasting trade and fishing business. On the ship owned by his father he became familiar with the life of a sailor. At the age of fourteen he shipped from Copenhagen as a cook on a schooner bound for England. In the spring of the following year he shipped from Olberg as an ordinary seaman on a vessel bound for London. His next voyage took him to the Mediterranean on a Danish vessel and later he shipped from Hamburg on an old Danish frigate, the Ada, that had been condemned and discarded from the navy, then converted to the merchant marine service. On this vessel he rounded the Cape of Good Hope to Bombay. On the return voyage the ship sprung a leak. By manning the pumps and working with desperate haste, the crew managed to bring the disabled ship into the harbor of Marisus, where the old craft was condemned.

In order to reach his original destination the young sailor shipped on an English vessel to Bristol. His next voyage, made as an able seaman on an iron barque, began at Swansea, Wales, took him around Cape Horn, thence up the Pacific to Callao, Peru, from which point return was made to Swansea. The last long voyage associated with his life on the high seas began at Hamburg and took him in a brig around Cape Horn and up the Pacific to the harbor of the Golden Gate, where anchor was cast in March, 1862. Liking the appearance of the country, he deserted his ship at San Francisco and went inland to Sacramento, where he found employment on a Sacramento river scow for three months. Next as able seaman on a barque, he engaged in the coasting trade as far south as San Diego. Returning to San Francisco, he enlisted in the United States navy April 14, 1863, for a term of one year, which was spent on the Shoobrick, stationed at Black Point, just inside of the Golden Gate, as coxswain of the first cutter, or the boat of the lieutenant. Upon the expiration of his time he was honorably discharged from the service.

Ever since first landing at San Francisco there had been in the mind of Mr. Petersen a desire to engage in mining, and this was gratified through the friendship of his first lieutenant, who was a stockholder in the Big Blue mine at Whiskey Flat, Tulare county (now Kernville, Kern county). Upon the recommendation of the lieutenant he was induced to come to this part of the country in May, 1864, after which he found employment at the Big Blue mine for a year. During 1865 he prospected at Havilah for two months and then spent two years as engineer in a quartz mill. Upon returning to Kernville he spent another two years in a quartz mill at that point. During 1873 he bought property and built the Kernville hotel, of which he continued as proprietor for ten years. Going to Shasta in 1884, he leased a mine in French Gulch and operated it for eight months, then sold out his interests and in 1885 returned to Kernville.

About this time Mr. Petersen purchased one hundred and sixty acres forming the nucleus of his present large ranch in the South Fork valley. By subsequent purchase he has become the owner of twelve hundred acres, besides having two ranches on the Greenhorn mountains where he ranges his stock in the summer months. The home property has been improved with several sets of buildings and with ditches bringing water from the river for the irrigation of the alfalfa. Grain is raised in large quantities. A specialty is made of raising cattle, hogs and horses. The ranch lies midway between Isabella and Onyx, between which points Mr. Petersen runs a stage line, besides a line between Kernville and Caliente. As early as July, 1890, he began to run a stage, using four four-horse teams. Upon the advent of the automobile he bought three cars and he now uses motors not only for the carrying of mail and passengers, but also for the operation of the express line. Besides his immense land holdings he owns residence and business property in Kernville, Havilah and Caliente.

The marriage of Mr. Petersen took place in Kernville in 1876 and united him with Mrs. Lizzie Annie (Davis) Swet, who was born in Boston, Mass., and accompanied her parents to California in early life, settling at Visalia, where she was educated in the public schools. By her first marriage she had two sons, John Swet, of Bakersfield, and William Swet, now living at Madera. Of her union with Mr. Petersen there are three children, namely: Howard, a farmer on the South Fork; Mrs. Addie Fugitt, also of the South Fork valley; and Walter, who has charge of the cattle interests of his father. Fraternally Mr. Petersen is connected with Bakersfield Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E., and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. For years he has served as a trustee of the South Fork school and his interest in its welfare has been constant. To fill a vacancy in the office of supervisor, formerly held by J. W. Kelley, he was appointed in 1902 by Governor Gage to represent district No. 1 on the county board. At the regular election in 1904 he was elected by a good majority on the Republican ticket in a Democratic district, serving continuously until January, 1909. During the period of his service the hall of records and high school were erected. From the beginning of his residence in the state he has been deeply interested in its development. When Kern county was set apart from Tulare, he was one of the organizers of the new county and his interest in its progress has been unceasing.

JOSEPH PERCY FREEAR.—A son of the late Henry T. Freear and a grandson of Rev. Henry T. Freear, a rector in the Church of England, Joseph P. Freear was born in Bakersfield, April 18, 1881, and has since lived in Kern county. After he had completed the studies of the local schools he was sent to Stockton Business College, from which he was graduated.

J. J. Deuel

in 1903, and immediately afterward became bookkeeper for the Union Oil Company at the refinery in the Kern river field, where he continued perhaps three years. Meanwhile he had been interested in ranch activities and with his brothers had owned a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, but finally he sold his interest to the brothers and then began to devote his attention to alfalfa-raising on a tract on Union avenue, where he remained for two years. Although since 1908 he has made his home in Bakersfield he still retains agricultural interests and during 1912 with his brothers he put in and raised five hundred acres of corn at Buena Vista lake.

Devoted to the best interests of Bakersfield, many measures for civic advancement have received the enthusiastic support of Mr. Freear and he has aided local projects to the extent of his ability. In politics he votes with the Republican party. His marriage was solemnized December 9, 1906, at Red Bluff, this state, and united him with Miss Zola Clayman, a native of that city, a woman of excellent education, an active worker with the Order of Women of Woodcraft and a devoted mother to her two children, Lorin Donald and Vivian. The father of Mrs. Freear is John H. Clayman, a pioneer of 1859 in California and since 1910 a resident of Bakersfield, where with one exception all of his five children now make their homes.

J. J. DEUEL, JR.—As treasurer and manager of the E. A. Hardison Perforator Company of Bakersfield, J. J. Deuel, Jr., has evinced a high type of the capable, foresighted and clear-minded business man. While interested in many fields he devotes his chief attention to the perforating company of which he is the principal owner and manager, and his extensive business extends to all the California oil fields, as well as those in Texas and old Mexico, and even to such remote points as Trinidad, West Indies, Australia, Austria, China and Burmah, India. The automatic machine which this company employs is one of the most important innovations in the oil producing business today. Under absolute control of the operator perforations of any size or shape may be made in casing of any weight or dimensions. The device is the result of the ingenuity of Edwin A. Hardison of Los Angeles and is now owned and improved by Mr. Deuel, who has his oil-well supply store at No. 2111 Chester avenue, Bakersfield, under his personal direction. He is also sales manager of the Axelson Machine Company.

J. J. Deuel, Jr., was born July 31, 1879, at Wellsville, Columbiana county, Ohio, son of Joseph Jasper and Flora V. (Eaton) Deuel, natives respectively of Ohio and West Virginia. The father was employed for many years as foreman for the C. & P. R. R., on the Panhandle and later for the L. & N. R. R. at Pensacola, Fla., where the son grew to manhood. In 1904 the family joined the latter in Bakersfield, and father and son became associated in business, outside of which they have acquired valuable property and real estate. Joseph J. Deuel and wife were the parents of two sons and one daughter, of whom J. J. Jr. was the first born. In Pensacola, Fla., he was educated in the common schools and also in the academy there, and before he finished his education was well advanced in a practical knowledge of the machinist's trade which he completed in due time. In April, 1898, he volunteered in the United States navy for the Spanish-American war, enlisting at the navy yard at Pensacola, Fla., and serving a year on the San Francisco and Armeria as a machinist, in the Cuban blockade. Soon after his honorable discharge from the United States service he went to work at his trade and was so employed at Galveston at the time of the historic flood which destroyed much of that city, and he spent several months running a hoisting engine on the water-front clearing up the debris. In December, 1900, he located at Bakersfield, Cal., where for four years he was agent for the Standard Oil Company, building up a local business three times the size it was when he took it in hand. The subsequent two years he was a special officer, operating on the San Joaquin division, in the employ of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. Resigning that position to take charge of the Bakersfield interests of the Axelson Machine Company, of Los Angeles, who were manufacturers of oil pumps and dealers in oil well supplies, with the Axelson pump and the Parker pump as specialties, he materially advanced the interests of the concern, and later was advanced to sales manager of the entire output and various stores. His perforator is the most successful in use today and is employed by the largest companies who aim to obtain the best results. In 1909 Mr. Deuel became the owner of the Hardison Perforator by purchasing it from the inventor, E. A. Hardison, and since that time he has patented an improvement on the machine. His operations have extended over a wide area and he employs five experienced men to operate the perforator.

Mr. Deuel and his interesting family occupy a high place among the citizens of Bakersfield. His marriage occurred here June 1, 1902, uniting him with Miss Mary E. Thurlow, a native of New York state, and they have six children, viz.: Edwin J., James W., George A., Ruth, Harry A. and Jackson Bryan. Mr. Deuel is a member of the Kern County Merchants' Association, and politically believes in the principles of the Democratic party. He is a communicant of the Christian church and affiliates with the Woodmen of the World. On Chester avenue, near Twentieth, he occupies a store and office quarters. He owns two hundred and forty acres of land four miles southeast of Bakersfield, which is devoted to farming and horticulture and on which he has installed two pumping plants.

ROBERT NEILL.—The first twenty years in the useful and interesting life of Robert Neill were passed near the bleak shores of the Atlantic, where the family, Scotch by birth and ancestry, but Canadian by adoption, had established a home near Kensington, Prince Edward Island. The stern and rigorous climate to which he was inured from earliest recollections developed not only a sturdy physique, but also a forceful mentality and a self-reliant spirit, qualifying him to successfully cope with the hardships of the work-a-day world. His parents, James and Marion (McCaull) Neill, were natives of Scotland, who seeking a home in the new world had settled in Canada, identifying themselves with farming interests on Prince Edward Island, where, in the midst of an environment given over to the fishing business and the coasting trade, they tilled the soil and raised such crops as the all too brief summers permitted.

The eldest of eight children, Robert Neill was born on the farm in Prince Edward Island February 18, 1852, and grew to manhood at the old homestead, where he worked during the vacation months in the period of his school life. Leaving school at the age of fifteen, he devoted his time entirely to farm work as an assistant to his father. Upon starting out for himself in 1872 he went first to Massachusetts and spent the summer months on a farm near Middleboro. During the winter of 1872-73 he was sent by Swift & Co. from New Bedford, Mass., to Florida, where he engaged as a broad axeman in getting out live oak timber for the government navy yards. During the summer he went from Florida to Bath, Me., to do similar work in the private yard.

From boyhood it had been the desire of Mr. Neill to see the land of the Golden West and during 1875, giving up his work in the east, he crossed the continent to California. It was his original intention to remain here only long enough to accumulate a little money and then return to his old home, but he was so favorably impressed by the state that he decided to remain, a decision he has no cause to regret. During the first three months he was employed on a farm at Baden Station owned by Miller & Lux, and from that place in August of the same year he came to Kernville. From that time to the present he has been identified with Kern county, of which he is not only one of the old settlers, but also one of the most honored citizens and progressive farmers. However, his connection with agriculture does not go back to his settlement in the county. First as a carman and later as a fireman, he spent four years with the Sumner Mining Company. Next he was an employe in the store of Andrew Brown at Kernville, where he remained for ten years, first as a clerk and then as bookkeeper and office-man. Meanwhile he saved his earnings with frugal care, for he had determined to engage in farming. Resigning his position in the store in 1889, he purchased two hundred and eighty acres and took up general ranch pursuits.

Robert. Keill,

By subsequent purchase the ranch of Mr. Neill has been enlarged to eight hundred and forty acres, all in one body, situated about two and one-half miles west of Weldon. Several hundred acres are in alfalfa, irrigation for which is provided by the South Fork. The balance of the valley land is devoted to the raising of grain. Realizing the importance of the stock industry, the owner has made a specialty of the same from the very beginning of his farming operations. The brand of R. N. (with letters separate) is to be seen on his large herd of shorthorn Durham cattle.

Throughout this portion of the county "Bob" Neill is known as a man of honor and integrity. His name is a synonym for all that is worthy in citizenship and progressive in agriculture. When a postmaster was to be chosen at Weldon during the year 1888 he was selected as one satisfactory to all concerned and his service was efficient to an unusual degree. At this writing he is a school trustee in the Weldon district and he has acted in a similar capacity for many years. Since coming to this county he was made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M. As a boy in the old Canadian home he was trained to a belief in Presbyterian doctrines. There being no church of that denomination near his ranch he, with his sister, Miss Millie A. Neill, who is a member of his household, attend the Methodist Episcopal Church at Weldon. By nature religious, his life expresses less the religion of creeds than that of a cheerful, hopeful and helpful existence, devoted to the uplifting of humanity and the welfare of the race. Careful study of the principles upon which our government is founded led him to espouse the platform of the Republican party when he became a citizen of our country in 1884. Of his services to his adopted country it may be said that they have been admirable, whether viewed from the point of agriculture or business or private life.

THOMAS HENRY McGOVERN.—Change and development have marked the history of Kern county since Mr. McGovern became a resident of Annette during the year 1881. The small hamlet near which he took up land stands in the northwestern corner of the county and being remote from the railroad has acquired no significance as a market town. The nearest market was San Luis Obispo, a distance of fifty-five miles toward the coast, and thither the farmers were accustomed to drive for the purpose of buying provisions, clothing and lumber. Immediately after his arrival in the state Mr. McGovern took up a homestead, a pre-emption and a timber-culture, amounting to four hundred and eighty acres altogether, the tract being adapted chiefly to the raising of grain. With one exception he was the first settler in that part of the county. Privations were many, the task of caring for the crops of oats, wheat and barley without sufficient help was discouraging, and the long drives to market took up much valuable time, but ultimately he saw the fruit of his labor and became financially independent. His only son, John A., took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres, so that the two owned and cultivated eight hundred acres, and this has been increased by subsequent purchase to seventeen hundred acres, the whole forming a stock ranch of great value, now managed by the son, the father having retired to a life of ease and merited rest.

County Cavan in the north of Ireland is the native home of Thomas Henry McGovern and September 11, 1835, the date of his birth. On the eighth anniversary of his birth the family landed in New Orleans from the vessel that had brought them from Ireland to America. A voyage up the Mississippi took them to Illinois and after a brief sojourn at Galena they moved to Wisconsin, where the father took up land near Platteville, Grant county. As a boy Thomas H. attended school at Ellenboro, and aided in the development of the home farm. After he ceased to attend school he gave his attention wholly to farming until 1857, when he left Wisconsin for Missouri. Holding the position of driller, he remained for four years in the Iron mountain mines. At the opening of the war he decided to return to Wisconsin and went to St. Louis with that object in view, but found that no trains were leaving the city. Meanwhile John H. McHenry, general foreman of the mine in which he had worked, became colonel in the Fifteenth Mississippi Regiment, C. S. A. At Cape Girardeau Mr. McGovern volunteered for service in that regiment, which was later consolidated with and became the Seventeenth Mississippi Regiment. For four years and seven months he remained in the Confederate army. During that time he endured all the hardships of war and fought in many bloody battles. One of the hardest fought engagements in which he participated was that of Cold Harbor. At the siege of Vicksburg he served as an army scout. During a portion of his service he was under General Pemberton, and in addition he served under Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston. After the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., he was released from service and allowed to return to Wisconsin, where he joined his parents, then living at Platteville, Grant county. For several years he worked in lead ore mines during the winters and farmed in the summer months, but later he carried on a general mercantile store at Trempealeau, Wis., and also served as a justice of the peace, remaining there until the time of his removal to California. In Kern county he was twice elected justice of the peace, but did not qualify. He also filled the office of roadmaster for a number of years, and for sixteen years acted as clerk of the Annette school district.

From early life Mr. McGovern has been a member of the Roman Catholic Church. Since attaining his majority he has given stanch support to the Democratic party. January 8, 1866, he married in Platteville, Wis., Miss Josephine Roselip, who was born in Grant county, Wis., July 8, 1841. By their union there is an only child, John A., who resides with his parents and superintends the large landed interests of the family. Removing to Wasco from the ranch in 1905, Mr. McGovern has since been retired from active agricultural cares and enjoys the comforts possible after long years of labor. When he came to this small town it had only one general store, but there were also two saloons. Shortly after settling here he built the Wasco Hotel and this he now leases.

CHARLES F. BENNETT.—As county supervisor of the first district of Kern county and a successful business man as well, Charles F. Bennett has identified himself closely with the industrial work of this county, becoming well and favorably known for the impartial execution of his official duties, his painstaking efforts to meet the approbation of his constituents and his never-failing good-will toward all. He was born May 8, 1862, in Washoe City, Nev., the son of Rev. Jesse Lee Bennett, a well-known minister, who was born in West Virginia and made his way to Missouri to fill the responsible office of minister in the Methodist Episcopal church. Later he crossed the plains to California in 1849, followed mining for a time and was pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church at Washoe City, Nev. He returned east after a time and was married, but the call of the west again brought him to Washoe City, this trip being made via Panama. Upon arrival he resumed the duties of minister and until 1873 he and his estimable wife, who before her marriage was Elizabeth de Jersey, made their home in Nevada. In the latter year he came with his family to Kernville, this county, where he was the local pastor until his death, in April, 1888. From Kernville he went to different parts of the county to minister, his trips often being made on foot, and extending from Tehachapi and Bakersfield and places on the south fork to Linn's valley and Darwin. His wife, who was a native of the Isle of Guernsey, England, and was of French parentage, passed away in Bakersfield. Of their six children, four are living: Charles F.; Annie, of Bakersfield; Edith, Mrs. Charles C. Taylor; and Nellie, of Bakersfield.

Charles F. Bennett was but eleven years of age when his parents brought him to Kern county and until he was thirteen he attended the public school of his vicinity. His first work was on neighboring ranches; afterward mining took his attention, and he learned the details of that industry, becoming foreman of Warrington mine at Havilah, and after a time foreman of the Lady Bell mine, at Kernville, and he also prospected and mined in Piute. Subsequently for some years he was engaged in running a hotel bus in Kernville, and it was in 1888 that he entered into public life by being elected on the Democratic ticket as supervisor of the first district, his term of service covering the period from January, 1889, to January, 1893. In 1903 Mr. Bennett started a livery business in Caliente, which also embraced a hay and grain business, a blacksmith shop and a wagon and carriage factory. The business was a splendid success from the start and he built it up to a most profitable condition. In 1910 he built the store in which he is now engaged in general merchandising, his capable wife lending her assistance in order to relieve Mr. Bennett of the many arduous tasks incident to the business.

On February 16, 1892, Mr. Bennett was married in Bakersfield to Miss Lulie Jones, a native of Mariposa county, Cal., and daughter of D. E. and Caroline (Wyatt) Jones, born in Ohio and Virginia, respectively. Her father was a miner, but has passed away, the mother making her home with her daughter. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Bennett, Jesse L., who is a member of the San Luis Obispo high school class of 1914; Loring F. and Alice Caroline. Mr. Bennett was for several years a member of the board of school trustees in Caliente, serving as clerk for seven years. In 1912 he was an independent candidate for county supervisor and received the election, taking the oath of office in January, 1913, for a term of four years. His former experience as well as his inherent ability in this direction, ably qualifies him for the office and his fellow-citizens have the utmost confidence in his efficiency. He is a staunch Democrat in politics and in fraternal connection is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

JOHN ROBERT JESSUP.—Allegiance to the Society of Friends characterized the Jessup family both in their English home and in the colonial environment of North Carolina, and their dominant traits were such as marked the Quakers in every part of the world. Uniformly industrious, thrifty and peace-loving, they aided in the early development and upbuilding of the south and particularly wielded a large influence in North Carolina, from which state in the first half of the nineteenth century Caleb Jessup removed to Indiana. At the time of the migration his son, Frank, was a mere lad and from that time until his death he continued to make Indiana his home, engaging both in general farming and carpentering until his death in 1853 at middle age. During young manhood he had married Elizabeth Sanders, who was born in North Carolina, of Quaker parentage, and whose death in 1851 left him a widower for the last two years of his life. Their family comprised eight children and the fifth of these, John Robert, whose birth occurred on the home farm near Worthington, Greene county, Ind., April 4, 1846, was only seven years of age at the time the death of his father left him an orphan. An uncle, James Jessup, took him into his home, but at the expiration of four years he was given into the care of his eldest sister, the wife of Fayette A. Dickinson. Until he was twenty-eight the Dickinson farm continued to be his home with the exception of four years in the army during the Civil war.

With the very first call for volunteers in the Union service the heart of the youth of fifteen years became fired with patriotic fervor and he determined to go to the front in defense of his country. During November, 1861, he was assigned to Company E, Fifty-ninth Indiana Infantry, and was mustered into service at Gosport, Owen county, Ind., whence he was dispatched to the south in February of the following year. From that time until the close of the great struggle he fought in many decisive battles, endured the hardships of forced marches and underwent privations in camp and on field. In the most strenuous exertion and the greatest danger to life and limb, no one heard a word of discouragement from this lad; on the other hand, he was always willing, courageous and helpful, and proved his patriotism on many a fiercely-contested field. Among his leading engagements were the following: New Madrid, Mo.; siege of Corinth; battle of Corinth, October 3-4, 1862; Forty Hills, Raymond and Jackson, Miss., in the last-named of which his regiment placed the first flag on the state-house at Jackson; Champion Hill; the siege of Vicksburg lasting forty-seven days, where his regiment sustained a heavy loss; Chattanooga; Missionary Ridge; the Atlanta campaign of 1864, including the battles of Resaca, Dallas, Buzzard's Roost, Snake Creek Gap, Kenesaw mountain, Atlanta and Jonesboro; Sherman's march to the sea with the siege of Savannah and the battle of Bentonville; and last, participation in the grand review at Washington, followed by honorable discharge at Louisville, Ky., in August, 1865. At the expiration of the war he returned to the home of his sister in Indiana and resumed his studies, ending with a commercial course in Terre Haute.

The marriage of John Robert Jessup was solemnized at Paris, Ill., in December, 1874, and united him with Miss Annie Marie Welch, a native of Vigo county, Ind. The young couple began housekeeping on a farm near Hume, Edgar county, Ill., and later settled near Decatur, Macon county, in the same state, eventually going from the farm into the city of Decatur for the purpose of operating a dairy. Four children were born of their marriage, namely: Maude Marie, Mrs. B. S. Hageman, of Rosedale, Kern county; John Clyde, who died at the age of seven years; Elizabeth Catherine, wife of Frank Cary, of San Francisco; and Harry Warren, of Portland, Ore. The family came to California in 1891, arriving at Bakersfield in December of that year. The first venture of Mr. Jessup proved unsuccessful, for the farm which he bought in the Rosedale district eight miles west of Bakersfield could not be made remunerative owing to the lack of water in the Calloway canal. At the expiration of nine years of strenuous exertion he abandoned farming and gave his attention to the teaming business in Bakersfield, later having a fruit wagon in the Kern river oil field. During January, 1909, he bought out the grocery business of C. C. Minter & Bro., on Chester avenue, and has continued the enterprise with the satisfaction of a growing trade and increased patronage on the part of a most desirable class of customers. In politics he always has supported Republican candidates and principles. While still living in Indiana he was made a Mason in Worthington Lodge and later identified himself with Macon Lodge No. 8, F. & A. M., at Decatur, Ill., where his name is still enrolled as a member. With his wife he belongs to the Eastern Star Chapter at Bakersfield and in addition Mrs. Jessup is a leading worker (and now president) of the Hurlburt Women's Relief Corps, while he has been intimately associated with the activities of Hurlburt Post No. 124, G. A. R., also at Bakersfield.

HENRY R. SCHAFFNIT.—The chief of the Bakersfield fire department, whose wide reputation for successful work in this important specialty led to his selection for his present responsible post, belongs to a German-American family and is a son of Leonard and Emma (Miller) Schaffnit, natives of Germany and descendants of long lines of Teutonic ancestry. An uncle, Henry Schaffnit, an immigrant to America in early life, served gallantly as a lieutenant in the Union army during the Civil war. Leonard Schaffnit was by trade a cabinet-maker and trained to an unusual degree of skill in the occupation, besides being an expert mechanic, and it was not difficult for him to secure steady employment after he came to the United States and he worked for some years for day wages. When the west was still undeveloped and he was yet a young man, he crossed the plains to California in 1854 with a party of emigrants traveling with wagons and ox-teams, but a short tour of inspection ended his residence in California at that period. After his marriage he lived in St. Louis, Mo., where his eldest child, Henry R., was born June 27, 1874. Shortly after the birth of that son he took the family to Colorado and settled at Central City, where he built and for twenty-five years conducted the Washington house. His wife died in Denver in 1902 and more recently he has established a home in Los Angeles, his present place of residence.

Out of seven children comprising the parental family all but two are still living and the eldest of these, Henry R., received a public-school education at Central City, Colo., from which place he went to Denver at the age of fifteen years. Ever since then he has been self-supporting. As early as 1894 he became connected with the Denver fire department, where an experience of six years proved most helpful to him in later labors along the same line. In company with George Hale he attended the exhibitions at Kansas City and Omaha and the Louisiana Purchase Exposition at St. Louis, where as captain of the life line and pompier work during the fair he led off the best crew in the United States, comprising a fine body of men personally selected by an inspection of the entire country. At the close of the exposition he returned to Denver, Colo., as captain of engine No. 2 under Chief Owens. Resigning from that position in 1905 he became chief of the new fire department at Goldfield, Nev., selected by the Board of Underwriters. The occasion of his employment had been the need of perfected fire system. The task proved one of great responsibility and many difficulties, but he triumphed over every obstacle, surmounted every difficulty and succeeded in securing for the town a splendid system with headquarters in a new fire house costing $20,000 and containing every equipment for the fighting of fire. January 2, 1911, he was transferred by the Board of Underwriters from Goldfield in order to enter upon similar duties at Bakersfield, where he has since labored with tireless energy and sagacious judgment.

The Bakersfield fire department at the present writing has three hose wagons, four engines, one chemical engine, one hook and ladder truck and an auto truck, also two large gas pumps and six electrical pumps, the water for which is supplied from an excellent irrigation system with ten-inch mains and six eight-inch laterals. At all times there is a pressure of thirty-five pounds in the plugs. The signal telephone fire alarm system contains forty-one boxes at the present writing, these being distributed with such care that no point is far distant from fire alarm call. Fifteen paid men are in the employ of the department, besides sixteen call men. Under the present chief improvements are being made constantly and effectively. Four thousand feet of hose have been provided, and two new fire houses are being built. In the course of a few months six automobiles, combination hose, engine and chemical will be installed, the expenditure for all these new facilities amounting in all to $75,000, and in a short time Bakersfield will have a fire department brought to the rank of first place on the coast, this gratifying condition resulting from the wise use of the tax-payers' money on the part of the chief in charge. Through membership in the Association of Fire Chiefs of the Pacific Coast and the International Association of Steam Engineers, Mr. Schaffnit keeps in touch with every development in his special work and is therefore thoroughly modern and up-to-date in his ideas. While living in Goldfield he was connected with Montezuma Lodge No. 30, F. & A. M., and since coming to Bakersfield he has joined the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks No. 266. His marriage took place in Denver and united him with Miss Hattie Schultz, who was born and educated in that city and by whom he has two sons, Robert and Peter. The family hold membership in the Bakersfield Presbyterian Church.

ROLAND G. HILL.—The task of converting the Greenfield ranch into an alfalfa and stock farm recently has been assumed by Mr. Hill, who is thoroughly prepared for his large responsibilities by reason of previous successful experience along the same line of enterprise. The property lies twelve miles south of Bakersfield and includes two thousand three hundred and sixty acres of land. To guests the chief attraction of the ranch is the comfortable and attractive modern residence, presided over graciously by Mrs. Hill, formerly Miss Edith Baker.

A lifelong resident of Kern county, Mr. Hill was born in Cummings valley and with his sisters, Ruby and Emma, and a brother, Russell (now foreman of the Hill ranch in the Cummings valley) belongs to a family long known and highly honored in this locality. His father, the late Ross Hill, came to Kern county as early as 1882 and embarked in the cattle business, starting a stock ranch on a very modest scale, but working his way forward by sure degrees to a position among the prosperous ranchers of the valley. Since his death, which occurred on the ranch about 1902, his widow (formerly Lottie Gridley) has removed to Los Angeles and there established a home. When sixteen years of age Roland G. Hill left school to take up ranching. The next year his father died and that threw into his care the home ranch of two thousand acres. Assuming the heavy responsibilities with an energetic will, he gave to the work close and undivided attention. A specialty was made of raising horses, cattle and hogs. So well did he succeed that the Hill ranch increased in area from two thousand acres to fourteen thousand acres, the latter being its size in 1912 when it went into the hands of the Tehachapi Cattle Company. The latter organization was founded by R. G. Hill and Messrs. P. G., A. H. and C. W. Gates, three brothers residing in Pasadena and owning vast interests in different places, including large lumber interests in Arkansas. In the present possession of the company are the following holdings: the Greenfield ranch of two thousand three hundred and sixty acres; deeded land in Cummings valley aggregating fourteen thousand acres; and leased land in the same valley comprising about five thousand acres, making a total of twenty-one thousand three hundred and sixty acres. The cattle industry has been a specialty with Mr. Hill for some years in the past and in developing the Greenfield ranch it is with the intention of continuing in the same business. While some of the cattle are raised on the range, many are shipped in from Arizona and kept on the home ranch for fattening.

W. W. STEPHENSON.—A citizen of worth and integrity, W. W. Stephenson, or "Big Bill" Stephenson (as he is known among his confreres), enjoys to an unusual degree the confidence of all who have known him during his residence in Kern county. To no man is greater credit due for the development of the oil industry in this district. He and a brother, R. M., now an oil operator near Tampico, Mexico, were the only children of W. P. Stephenson, who in an early day removed from Iowa to Oregon, sojourned for a brief period in Salem, thence removed to Portland, that state, and became chief engineer for the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, returning to Iowa during the latter part of 1882 and re-establishing himself on the farm in Palo Alto county which had been his home prior to the removal to the west. It was during the residence of the family in Salem, Ore., that William W. Stephenson was born in that city June 20, 1875, but his earliest recollections are associated with the city of Portland and there he was a pupil in the primary grades of the public school. At the age of seven years he accompanied his parents to Iowa and from that time until seventeen he lived on the old homestead of the family.

Roland G. Hill.

Returning to the west when seventeen years of age Mr. Stephenson established himself in Santa Barbara county, Cal., and became interested in the business which he has since followed. The fields at Summerland and Santa Paula gave to him his initial experience in the oil industry. Soon he began to take contracts for drilling. Much of his work was in the interests of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. For three years he continued in contract drilling. Much of the work was in the ocean. Drilling was done by means of wharves built out into the water for a distance of one thousand feet from shore. Experiences in the employ of others whetted his ambition to undertake the business for himself. In the summer of 1899 he purchased two drilling outfits and brought them to the Kern river fields. The venture proved a success and justified the purchase of four additional outfits in the fall of the same year, so that by 1900 he had six drilling outfits in operation.

Upon becoming a stockholder in the Alma, Wolverine and Black Jack Oil Companies, Mr. Stephenson deemed it advisable to dispose of a number of his drilling rigs. Although the Black Jack and Wolverine have since been sold, he still retains a block of stock in each, while he continues as superintendent of the Alma Oil Company, which has recently taken over the Alma, Jr., so that the two are practically under one management. The officers of the company are as follows: president, W. H. Mason, Battle Creek, Mich.; vice-president, J. E. Beard, of Napa, Cal.; secretary, M. A. Thomas of San Francisco; treasurer, the Canadian Bank of Commerce in San Francisco. The following gentlemen comprise the board of directors: W. H. Mason and C. E. Thomas, of Battle Creek, Mich.; J. E. Beard, of Napa, this state; A. Kaines of San Francisco; and W. W. Stephenson of Bakersfield. Beginning operations in September of 1900, the company now holds one hundred and twenty acres of land, employs eleven men, and has twenty-four producing wells in the Alma and Alma, Jr., with an average net output of twelve thousand barrels per month.

The oil interests owned by Mr. Stephenson, including his stock in various oil companies throughout the California fields, by no means represent the limit of his mental activities and commercial relations. As president of the Pacific Motor and Engineering Company, he maintains an intimate association with the development of a business for the buying, selling and renting of motors and for the monthly inspection of motors. In addition the company engages in the manufacture of machinery for the use of bakers and confectioners, also makes a specialty of other machine and repair work, and of the wiring and installing of motors. The headquarters of the concern are at No. 527 Mission street, San Francisco. Besides being the principal owner of this large business, Mr. Stephenson is president and leading stockholder in the Butterworth-Stephenson Company of Portland, Ore., and the Hamilton Cloak and Suit Company, the Midway Equipment Company and the Central Purchasing Company, all of Bakersfield.

The California Well Drilling Company of Taft, the B. S. & B. Company of Los Angeles and the Western Trust Company of Portland, Ore., have the benefit of the services of Mr. Stephenson as a director and principal stockholder. As a stockholder he is further interested in the First National Bank of Bakersfield, the California Life Insurance Company of San Francisco, the Inter-Urban Realty Company of Portland, Ore., the Willamette Realty Company of Portland, Ore., the Hydraulic Mining Company of Oroville, Cal., and a number of mining concerns at Randsburg, this state. A stanch believer in life insurance, for years he has carried heavy policies as a possible protection for his family and large business interests. In land and real estate his holdings are important and include a beautiful home on Perkins street in Oakland, Cal., an attractive residence in the Irvington district of Portland, Ore., property in Bakersfield and valuable holdings at Wildwood, Del Monte and other points.

In December of 1910 Mr. Stephenson lost his wife, Mrs. Edna (Nance) Stephenson, by her death in young womanhood. A daughter survives, Zada, now a student in the high school at Berkeley, this state. From a business standpoint Mr. Stephenson ranks among the most capable men in the oil fields. Taking the past as a criterion and remembering that he is yet a young man, it is safe to state that a brilliant future awaits him. For much that he has accomplished he gives credit to the inheritance of large mechanical and engineering ability from his father, who, as has been stated, served for years as chief engineer for the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company at Portland. Personally Mr. Stephenson is a man who thinks for himself and conducts his researches independently. Consideration for others is a leading characteristic. While he possesses a worthy ambition to make and enjoy his share of the world's wealth, he has never trespassed upon the domain of others in the acquisition of his possessions. A practical demonstration of the Golden Rule has been made in his interesting career.

OTTO R. KAMPRATH.—The assistant cashier of the Security Trust Company of Bakersfield is a member of an old eastern family descended from Teutonic ancestors. The genealogy shows that Ferdinand Kamprath in an early day drove overland from New York to Michigan, accompanied by his family, and took up a tract of raw land from the government, later devoting his time to the tilling of the soil in that then frontier region. Among his children was a son, Henry F., a native of Buffalo, N. Y., but from childhood a resident of Michigan, where for many years he has engaged in the manufacture of furniture at Monroe, Monroe county. During young manhood he married Miss Christine Enselberger, who was born and reared in the vicinity of Monroe, being a daughter of Leonard Enselberger, a pioneer farmer of honored name. Not only are the parents still living, but their three children also survive, the eldest of these being Otto R., who was born at Monroe, Mich., November 21, 1875, and in 1891 was graduated from the high school of his native city. Immediately afterward he secured employment as a messenger in the First National Bank of Monroe and later was promoted to be a bookkeeper in the institution.

A desire to remove to California caused Mr. Kamprath to resign his position with the Michigan bank and thereupon he came to Bakersfield, where he secured a place as bookkeeper in the Bank of Bakersfield. A few years later he was promoted to be teller. When by consolidation the Security Trust Company was organized October 7, 1910, with a capital stock of $300,000 fully paid in, he was chosen assistant cashier of the new institution. Since its inception the bank has been noted for the conservative spirit of its officers and directors. The men at its head are among the leading financiers of the city. Their judgment is recognized as excellent, their ability as above the ordinary and their energy as boundless. Much credit also is due to the assistant cashier, who fills his position with accuracy, dispatch and mental alertness, thereby winning for himself a recognized place in local financial circles. After coming west he was married at Los Angeles to Miss Dorothea

Mrs. Wm. Tracy      Wm. Tracy

Heinicke, who was born at Pleasant Ridge, Ill., and by whom he has three children, Gerald, Willard and Marie. The family residence, erected by Mr. Kamprath, stands at No. 2212 Truxtun avenue and both in exterior appearance and interior finishings indicates the cultured tastes of the family.

As one of the founders of St. John's Lutheran Church, as the chairman of its building committee, a member of the board of trustees and the present treasurer of the congregation, Mr. Kamprath has been closely identified with the upbuilding of the church and in its annals his name will hold a place all its own. He keeps posted concerning current events and national problems and supports the Republican party in general elections. The board of trade has had the benefit of his intelligent services as a member of its executive committee.

WILLIAM TRACY.—It is the proud claim of William Tracy that he is a native son of California. In San Joaquin county, but near Galt, Sacramento county, he was born August 8, 1866, being a son of the late Edgar Vernet and Mary (Dix) Tracy, natives, respectively, of Pennsylvania and Ohio. The mother died in San Joaquin county in 1877 and the father passed away May 2, 1913, when advanced in years. Reared and educated in Pennsylvania and Ohio, and married in the Buckeye state in 1852, he had brought his young wife across the plains in the summer of 1852, making the long journey with ox-teams and wagons. At the opening of the Civil war he returned east, enlisted in his old home regiment of Ohio infantry, went to the front and served until the close of the rebellion, when he received an honorable discharge and returned to California. For many years and indeed until he retired from business cares he engaged as a liveryman and owned a stable at Acampo. In his family there were nine children, as follows: Alice, Mrs. J. W. Johnston, of Sacramento; Theodore, of Bakersfield; Emma, who married Ellis Kilgore and died in Sacramento; Mrs. Ida Marsh, a resident of Massillon, Ohio; Mrs. Mary Barber, of Amador county; Mrs. Sarah Van Valkenburg, of Lodi; William, whose name introduces this article; Anna, wife of James Arp, of Bakersfield; and Mrs. Nellie Jarvis, who is living in Amador county.

The death of his mother when he was ten years of age brought to William Tracy a breaking up of tender home ties and a loss almost irreparable. During the next six years he was given a home by a farmer. After leaving here he lived with his sister, Mrs. Kilgore, of Sacramento, where he finished the grammar school. Mr. Kilgore is of the well-known firm of Kilgore & Tracy, of Sacramento. The happy days spent in Mr. Kilgore's home and about his place of business are among the happiest recollections of Mr. Tracy's childhood days. While yet in his teens he purchased an outfit and engaged in teaming on the large ranches in Colusa county, meanwhile saving his earnings with frugal forethought for the future. Since coming to Bakersfield in January of 1891 he has been actively associated with the farm and stock interests of Kern county. Here he took up a homestead and joined his brother, Theodore, who had secured a claim on the Goose lake channel of Kern river, on the range of Canfield & Tracy, whose herds of cattle the two brothers superintended. In due time William Tracy acquired the Canfield & Tracy holdings and later bought out the interests of his brother, who removed to Bakersfield. By such additions to his original homestead he acquired a ranch of three thousand and eighty acres, lying five miles northeast of Buttonwillow, or twenty-five miles west of Bakersfield as the crow flies. Much of the ranch is in pasture, on which may be seen cattle bearing the well-known brand of 91 and horses with the T brand that in the neighborhood has come to stand for quality and breeding. One section of the ranch has been put under irrigation and is devoted to alfalfa and grain, the balance being used for range. A special feature of the ranch is the breeding of draft horses, which find a ready sale in western markets and always command a high price. At the head of the drove of over two hundred horses are two Belgian stallions, viz.: Predominant, weight fifteen hundred pounds, and Silver Tip, two thousand pounds, both fine specimens of their popular breed.

A rancher whose devotion to agriculture has been so constant and whose interest in county development has continued through so many years must necessarily have identified himself with other enterprises besides those of ranching, and we find that Mr. Tracy has exhibited a steadfast devotion to every movement of permanent value to the county. Particularly has he been interested in the cause of education. For many years he served as a trustee of the Wildwood school and the district had the advantage of his painstaking devotion to its educational system and his ardent determination to promote the upbuilding of a first-class country school. Although by no means a partisan, he is a pronounced Republican and stanch in his allegiance to party principles. In his marriage to Miss Fannie C. Rowlee, a native daughter of San Joaquin county, he won a wife possessing in eminent measure housewifely skill, artistic talents and deep devotion to country life, and they are earnestly promoting by their united, harmonious efforts the mental development and physical training of their children, Cecil Foster, William Darrel, Frances Fay and Charles Wellington.

MRS. WILLIAM TRACY.—Versatility of mental equipment forms a notable attribute of Mrs. Tracy, to whom belongs the distinction of being a native daughter of the state, whose entire life has been passed within the boundaries of the commonwealth, whose education reflects the training offered by its schools and whose refinement of taste indicates a cultured environment from earliest years. A resident of Kern county from childhood, but a native of San Joaquin county, she is a daughter of that sterling and honored pioneer couple, Charles W. and Martha (Martin) Rowlee, mention of whom is made at length elsewhere in this volume. At a very early age she gave evidence of unusual ability and desire for knowledge. Not satisfied with the opportunities offered by the common schools, she prepared for normal work and then entered the Chico State Normal, where she spent two years in study, pedagogy being her specialty. Next she availed herself of the advantages offered by the San Diego State Normal and after she had graduated from that institution in 1902 she took up educational work in Kern county with the intention of specializing as a teacher, but her marriage to Mr. Tracy, April 3, 1904, changed her plans and terminated a brief but highly successful career as an instructor. There was, however, no relinquishment of her interest in schools and schooling, for she has continued up to the present time a capable and enthusiastic promoter of all educational advancement, a firm believer in the value of the public schools and an exponent of modern methods adopted in the most progressive institutions of learning.

For her four children, Cecil Foster, William Darrel, Frances Fay and Charles Wellington, Mrs. Tracy cherishes worthy ambitions. That they may receive the best of training and educational advantages is a source of constant solicitude on her part. That their ideals may be of the highest Christian type, not bound by narrow creed or selfish egotism, is her hope for their future. While striving to promote their physical welfare and mental growth, she finds the leisure to devote herself to art and her own paintings adorn the walls of the ranch home as well as the family residence in the city at No. 1919 Orange street. Fond of outdoor life and a lover of the country, she finds great pleasure in developing the natural resources of their environment. To watch things grow and thrive brings her happiness, and whether it is a plant or tree or whether some pet bird or animal, the growth of each interests her intensely. For this reason she surrounds herself with pets. The pea-fowls on the ranch, the fancy poultry and the thoroughbred sheep are objects of deep interest to her. Together with Mr. Tracy she is especially interested in watching the development of "Phoenix" and "Tempe," a pair of magnificent ostriches now eight years of age, and brought from Arizona in 1907 when only eighteen months old. They were the first birds of the kind in the entire county and Mrs. Tracy has made a special study of their needs, growth, the incubation, hatching, etc., with a view, not only to understanding them, but also to making them a source of revenue. The season of 1913 resulted in an ostrich hatch that is destined to play an important part in the commercial future of the valley, when their birds brought forth a troop of eight chicks which were successfully raised. These were the first ostrich chicks hatched in the county and thus opened a new industry in the San Joaquin valley. This led to the purchase of a troop of fifty-two birds from W. F. Robison, manager of the Southern California ostrich farm at Idora Park, Oakland. The birds were successfully transported by rail to Buttonwillow and from there they were hauled in wagons five miles to the Tracy ranch, this being accomplished without injury to any of the birds. The ease with which they are cared for is shown when it is known that they are turned into an alfalfa field surrounded by the usual four-foot woven wire stock fence. When the birds select their mates they are placed in individual pens for nesting. Among these birds there are representatives from three different sections of Africa, i.e., the South African (the most common breed in the country), the West Coast and Nubia. The Nubian is the finest ostrich known, having skin of a blush-pink color and being a larger bird and producing a longer and finer feather than any other breed.

C. H. Fairchild

The feather industry has grown to such proportions and the demand has become so large that Mrs. Tracy has found it necessary to remove to Bakersfield her factory for cleaning, dyeing, repairing and the manufacture of feathers into plumes and ostrich fancies. Her sister, Miss Hazel Rowlee, has charge of the factory, while Mrs. Tracy devotes her attention to the management and superintendence of the ostrich farm. She is recognized among the ostrich farmers as an authority on the nesting, hatching and rearing of the birds. The present successful status of the industry gives great promise for the future and not only the family, but the entire community finds much of interest in the new undertaking as a novel industry with unique possibilities.

CHARLES H. FAIRCHILD.—The records of Pennsylvania show that when William Penn brought over his original colony of emigrants he had among the number a member of the English family of Fairchild, a young man of bold spirit and fearless valor, well qualified to assist in pioneer tasks, and it is said that he became one of the first settlers in the city of Philadelphia. Later generations remained in the Keystone state and Ephraim Fairchild was born in Bradford county. With the love of the frontier that had been manifested in the original immigrant, he came to California when this great commonwealth was an unknown region without attractions except for goldseekers, its rich soil undeveloped and its sunny climate unappreciated. While developing an important business in Sacramento and acquiring large tracts of land in the adjacent valley, his wife, Sarah Kelton (Ford) Fairchild, also was becoming well known in the west, where she contributed liberally to the press of that day and was recognized as a gifted and popular writer.

The schools of his native city of Sacramento afforded to Charles H. Fairchild fair educational advantages, of which he availed himself to the utmost. A sturdy, wideawake and ambitious boy, he developed into a successful man who was never content to do less than his best. From the time that he entered the employ of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company he rose rapidly to positions of trust. Gradually he was given additional responsibilities. Any doubts that might have been entertained as to his ability were soon changed to satisfaction and therefore he was trusted in a degree not always given to the young. The interests of the company were promoted by his able service as assistant superintendent at Mojave. In recognition of his ability and sound business judgment he was promoted to be freight and passenger agent at Bakersfield, which influential position he held for many years, meanwhile establishing in this city a home made beautiful by the artistic tastes of his wife (nee Margaret H. Fay) and made happy by the presence of their four children. He was an influential member of the Episcopal Church, and kind and charitable to those in need.

The discovery of oil in Kern county and the instantaneous development of a new industry here did not fail to rouse the enthusiastic interest of Mr. Fairchild. As was natural to a man of his breadth of thought, he at once entered heartily into the new work. Grasping the business with a celerity seldom surpassed, he became very successful as a dealer in oil lands and acquired expertness as a judge of values and possibilities. Eventually his interests as an oil operator became so important that he resigned from his position with the Southern Pacific Railroad and devoted himself exclusively to oil development thereafter, with the exception that for one year he also engaged as proprietor of the Hughes hotel in Fresno. His most important and profitable connection in the oil fields was as vice-president and a large stockholder in the Calloma Oil Company operating in the Kern river field, the other partners in the organization having been H. A. Jastro and the St. Clair estate. Another successful lease which he promoted with Clarence Berry as partner was the Ethel D., in the west side field. His death occurred May 14, 1910, from hemorrhage of the brain, and brought an unexpected and sudden termination to his far-reaching activities, entailing upon Bakersfield a heavy loss to its citizenship, depriving the Bakersfield Club of one of its honored charter members and removing from the oil industry of Kern county one of its keenest operators. He was a strong partisan in politics, possessing stanch convictions, and was at one time chairman of the Republican County Central Committee. Fraternally he was a member of the Elks, a Mason of the Knight Templar degree, and a Shriner.

MARGARET H. FAIRCHILD.—The career of Mrs. Fairchild is a most interesting as well as an active one. Born in San Francisco, Cal., she was the daughter of Stephen J. and Catherine (Kelley) Fay, both pioneers of California, having come hither from Boston, Mass., and arriving in San Francisco in 1862. Here Mr. Fay became an extensive general contractor, but when at the height of his career his untimely death occurred in 1869. Her mother also being taken from her when she was very young, Mrs. Fairchild was reared in the family of Daniel Sullivan, a wealthy man of San Francisco, and here she received a thorough education. Having ability and the spirit to acquire a firm foundation in her studies, she rose rapidly and was graduated from the public school with a splendid record. Newspaper work early attracted her, and after acquiring a knowledge of the business in all its branches, on February 14, 1901, she came to Bakersfield, where her services were given first to the Bakersfield Democrat which was edited by E. A. Pueschel, then the leading paper of the county. Later she was engaged on the Kern Standard, owned by W. D. Young. Her success in this work was phenomenal and subsequently she purchased a half interest with Mr. Young, still later buying out his interest in the Standard and conducting it as sole owner and proprietor for two years. She then sold the plant to Messrs. Conklin & Maude.

It was at this time that Mrs. Fairchild became the wife of Charles H. Fairchild, the ceremony taking place in San Francisco. She is a well-to-do, prosperous and thorough business woman, whose ideas of business lead her to transact all her affairs on a strictly honorable basis. Of the highest principles, she is conscientious and trustworthy, and her influence for good is felt throughout her entire community.

R. A. Rees

Mrs. Fairchild has a very comfortable residence at the corner of Pine and Twentieth streets, Bakersfield, where she with her gifted and talented children live an ideal home life. Her refining influence has accomplished much to bring them to their present exquisite state, for their well-mannered, cultured ways are proof of the best of breeding and training. She is the mother of four children, Ruth, Dorothy C., Gerald Charles and Virginia Fay, and they have brought much comfort and cheer to their deserving mother.

R. B. REES, M.D.—Whatever of success has come to Dr. Rees is the result of his own efforts and constant study. It was not possible for his parents, John W. and Rachel (John) Rees, to give him any educational advantages, for after they crossed the ocean from their native Wales they had to labor incessantly to secure the necessities of existence. The father, who was a contracting painter in his younger years, now makes his home in Columbus, Ohio, where the mother died in 1910 at the age of seventy-five years. Their son, R. B., was born in Newark, Ohio, and in boyhood attended school at Columbus, that state, whence he went east to Boston in order to earn a livelihood in a humble position. During leisure hours he studied in the Boston evening high school, where he pursued a special scientific course until his graduation. Meanwhile all of his studies had been directed with the ultimate aim of professional work, an ambition of which he never lost sight through all the financial hardships of youth. During 1897 and 1898 he attended the University of Vermont and in the fall of 1898 he matriculated in the University of Maryland at Baltimore, from which he was graduated in 1900. The degree of M.D. was conferred upon him when he graduated from the medical college of Harvard University at Cambridge, Mass., in 1901, after which he practiced his profession for three years in Boston, later serving for two years as resident surgeon in Carney hospital, South Boston. It was there that his splendid talent for surgery first attracted attention. In critical operations he proved unusually successful and his time was almost wholly given to surgical duties. Since leaving the east he has retained an honorary membership in the Massachusetts State Medical Association.

Having successfully passed an examination before the state medical board of California in December of 1906, during March of 1907 Dr. Rees selected Bakersfield as the center of future professional work and established an office in this city. Here too he has his home, which is presided over graciously by Mrs. Rees, formerly Miss Edna Clark Wettermann, and is brightened by the presence of an only child, John Wettermann. In Bakersfield, as in the east, Dr. Rees makes a specialty of surgery and practices at Mercy hospital, in addition to having built up a large private practice. From two to four o'clock he has office hours in his suite above the Hughes drug store, while during the balance of his time he gives his attention to home and hospital professional duties. Devotion to his specialty is indicated by membership in the Surgical Club of Rochester, Minn. In addition he is identified with the Kern County and California State Medical Associations, the San Joaquin Valley Medical Society and the American Medical Association, and through these organizations as well as through the reading of current medical literature he keeps in touch with modern developments in the science of therapeutics. Such has been his devotion to the practice of medicine and surgery that he has had no leisure for participation in political affairs or civic enterprises, nor has he been active in any fraternities aside from the Elks and the Woodmen of the World.

J. R. NEFF.—The president of the Neff colonies, who has become closely connected with the material upbuilding of Kern county through the promoting of irrigation colonies in the Weed Patch, began to be interested in this region during the year 1907 and, after having carefully studied the soil, climate and possible profitable cultivation of the land in intensive farming through irrigation, purchased property and undertook the development of the plans he had projected. With a record of successful identification with the banking business he was qualified by executive ability and thorough knowledge of financial problems to manage and develop large landed interests and those associated with his projects in Kern county have found him to be not only enterprising and progressive, but also far-sighted in discrimination, honorable in action and sagacious in judgment. The original colony which he established in Kern county, known as the Foothill Citrus Farms Colony, is located on section 26, township 31, range 29, and was incorporated during 1907 with a capital stock of $24,000, which is the value of the pumping plant and irrigation system. Upon the first election of officers Mr. Neff was chosen president and he has filled the position up to the present time, H. A. Moyers of San Bernardino being secretary, while the California State Bank of San Bernardino acts as treasurer. The large tract of land incorporated by the company is held privately by about twenty colonists, who own shares in the water company. The two wells, which are each twelve-inch bores, are two hundred and fifty feet and three hundred and three feet respectively, and produce sufficient water for the irrigation of the land as well as for domestic purposes, as needed by the twenty colonists now on the tract. During 1912 the company put in electrical motors and centrifugal pumps and since then has used electricity, buying the power from the San Joaquin Light & Power Company. The products of the land include alfalfa, Egyptian corn, all the fruits known to Southern California; nut trees, such as English and French walnuts and black walnuts; all kinds of berries, Logan berries doing especially well; and vegetables of every kind.

The Bear Mountain Orange Company, of which Mr. Neff is also president, is located on section 24, township 31, range 29, Kern county, and was organized in 1908, with a capital stock of $12,800, on the same plan as the older company. In addition he manages the Orange Belt Farms Company, capitalized at $9,600, and owning the southeast quarter of section 23, township 31, range 29. All of the colonists, numbering now about seventy-five persons, are interested with Mr. Neff in his enterprise. Under his capable leadership, wise judgment and untiring energy, the prospects for future development and growing success are most attractive, and there is every reason to believe that the colonies will prove most profitable acquisitions to the landed wealth of the county. Many of the persons buying in these tracts have come from Southern California, quite a few being from Santa Ana, and they were influenced to select property here from the fact that the soil and climate ranked with their own section, the water facilities are adequate, and the price of the land was low enough to meet their approval. Nor have they had reason to regret their decision in coming to Kern county. On the other hand, their prospects for the future are the brightest.

Mr. Neff was born in Baylor county, Tex., April 29, 1876, and grew to manhood in that commonwealth, where for some years he held a position as cashier of the City National Bank of Childress, also from 1900 to 1904 he served as clerk of the district and county court of Cottle county. At Austin, that state, he was united in marriage with Miss Bessie Hutchinson, a resident of that city. There are two children in the family, Lawrence and Pattie. During the latter part of 1904 Mr. Neff removed to California and settled in San Bernardino county, but afterward removed to Pomona, Los Angeles county, and now makes that city his home, superintending through frequent personal trips the valuable interests which he has acquired in Kern county and in which he has invested heavily with a firm faith in their steady advancement in production and valuation.

John Enas

JOHN ENAS.—At St. George, Azores Islands, Portugal, John Enas was born April 29, 1852, the son of John Enas, a farmer and builder in that country. His wife, Marianna J. Bettencurt in maidenhood, died in 1911. John Enas, Jr., attended school until fourteen years old. In 1866 he came alone to the United States to earn his own way unaided. Settling first in Stanislaus county, Cal., he worked part of the time as sheep-shearer, and part as helper on a threshing machine, being employed after this for a few years at different points in the state, working for wages. In 1873 he came to Kern county and settled in Delano, where he became occupied in sheep raising for himself, and he soon became thoroughly familiar with all the details of that enterprise. He remained in Delano until 1881, when he bought what is now his home place, consisting of four hundred and eighty acres of land, located fifteen miles west of Bakersfield on the old Headquarters road. Of this one hundred acres were then planted in alfalfa, and the remainder was unimproved.

Mr. Enas has since that time been extensively engaged in stockraising, handling horses, mules, sheep and cattle. He has added to his original tract until it now covers an area of over nine thousand acres; three hundred acres are under cultivation and the remainder devoted to pasture land. He has spent most of his time on his ranch, and it can be said of him that he is one of the most extensive stockraisers in the county. He also owns a section of land in the Kern River oil field, of which one hundred and sixty acres is proven oil land. On this land are twenty wells, of which fourteen are producing at the present time. In 1906 he accepted the office of vice-president and director of the Portuguese-American Bank of San Francisco, and he was also a director in the Bank of Bakersfield until it was dissolved. He is now a director of the Security Trust Company in Bakersfield. He is a man highly successful, but he has worked hard to gain the position he now holds, and has justly earned his present prosperity. An expert in stockraising, his stock is considered the best, and his business enjoys the most flattering recognition. He is a member of the U. P. E. C. and the I. D. E. S. societies, while politically is an Independent Republican.

CHARLES SCHIEFFERLE.—An expert knowledge of machinery enables Mr. Schiefferle to creditably fill his responsible position as chief engineer of the Valley Ice Company's plant in Bakersfield, where although holding the place for a comparatively brief period he has proved himself to be thoroughly competent for the difficult task entrusted to him in connection with the operation of the large plant. Having helped to install the machinery, he is thoroughly familiar with every detail. The day after he arrived in Bakersfield, during March of 1911, he entered the employ of the company and began to assist in the erection of machinery. Upon the completion of the plant he was retained as an assistant and it was not long before his worth and ability were recognized by the management, who in May of 1912 appointed him to be night engineer. On the 1st of July, of the same year, he was promoted to his present place as chief engineer and since then has been in charge of the plant, capacity one hundred and twenty tons. The company makes a specialty of the manufacture of ice for the icing of cars and also for the refrigeration of their large cold-storage plant at this point.

Descended from German ancestors, Charles Schiefferle was born at Northeast, Erie county, Pa., April 25, 1876, and is a son of Jacob and Catherine (Meehl) Schiefferle, natives respectively of Germany and Cat-taraugus county, N. Y., the latter now a resident of Northeast, Pa. The father crossed the ocean in young manhood and settled in Pennsylvania, from which state he went to New York and enlisted in the Sixty-fifth New York Infantry. In company with the regiment he proceeded to the front and bore his share in the hardships of camp and the dangers of the battlefield. During an engagement, while in the act of aiming to fire, he was shot through the right wrist and also through the left hand in such a manner that the fingers were cut off. On account of the disability resulting from gunshot wounds he was honorably discharged. After he had recovered sufficiently to resume work he turned his attention to farming and settled on a place near Northeast, Pa., where in February of 1906 his death occurred.

The family of Jacob Schiefferle comprised nine children, all but one of whom still survive. Charles, who was seventh in order of birth, passed the years of boyhood on the home farm and in the neighboring schools. At the age of seventeen he was apprenticed to the trade of machinist in the Novelty machine shop at Northeast and there he continued until he had completed his time, meanwhile gaining an expert knowledge of every department of the trade. During 1898 he began to take contracts to drill gas wells in Erie county and for a considerable period he remained in that business, meanwhile completing an average of about twenty wells each year. Desiring to change his location in January of 1910 he sold out with the intention of removing to the west. A brief sojourn at Cripple Creek, Colo., where he operated a lease, was followed by his removal to California and his permanent settlement at Bakersfield. The progress of this city is of interest to him and he maintains the deepest faith in the future development and great prosperity of the place. In politics, although not a partisan, he has stanch convictions in favor of Republican principles, while fraternally he holds membership with the Knights and Ladies of Security.

GEORGE W. PARISH.—The business of George W. Parish has taken him to many parts of the globe and he has been fortunate in gaining the wide experience and knowledge which alone is acquired by travel. He is the son of George Parish, who served in the Confederate army in the Civil war from 1861 to 1865, and was twice wounded, carrying two bullets to his grave. He was born in Nashville, Tenn., and came to California in 1869, in 1873 taking up a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres in Kern county, where he followed general farming and stockraising, as he had done in the east. He built the old Wilson and Parish ditch before the Kern County Land Company had control, the water that supplied the ditch being taken from the Kern river. This ditch was four miles long, and attracted considerable attention on account of its completeness. George Parish passed away in 1892.

George W. Parish was born August 15, 1869, in Anaheim, Orange county, Cal., where his parents first settled upon coming west. He attended school in the old Canfield district, Kern county, also in the Fairview district, and for a time attended in Inyo county, until he reached the age of fifteen. In 1872 he was brought by his parents to Kern county, settlement being made on what is now the Bailey ranch, and the next year the homestead was taken up, as above stated. The family moved to Independence, Inyo county, in 1886, and there the father's death occurred. In 1896 Mr. Parish returned to Kern county, where he rented the Kiefer ranch and engaged in general farming for six years, in 1900 buying twenty acres of his present property, later adding eighty acres, until he now has one hundred acres at Panama, ten miles southwest of Bakersfield devoted to raising alfalfa hay. In addition to his ranch interests he has also taken an active part in the development of the oil fields in the vicinity, being a stockholder in the 25 Oil Company in Taft, and was one of the locators of the land. He is also interested in the California Midway Oil Company, the Blackmore Oil Company and the Wyoming Shamrock Oil Company in Wyoming, being a director in the last-mentioned company.

G. W. Parish

In truth Mr. Parish may be called a pioneer of Taft, for he built the first business structure and the first residence in town and also started the first store. He also organized the school district and served as the clerk of the first board of trustees, and while filling that office supervised the building of the first school house. In the Panama district he has also served as school trustee. The first store in Taft, referred to above, was established by Mr. Parish in 1908 with a stock of general merchandise, which was destroyed by fire in 1910. In addition to the property mentioned he also owns other property in Taft splendidly located, as well as property in the town of Richmond.

For about four years Mr. Parish was engaged in hunting birds of plumage and alligators for their hides. This took him into the different states of South America, Central America and Mexico. He has sold feathers as high as $42 an ounce in New York and London, to which cities he made business trips.

At Winside, Wayne county, Nebr., Mr. Parish was married to Miss Minnie Olmstead, a native of Tekamah, Burt county, that state, the daughter of A. E. and Nancy H. (Conklin) Olmstead, natives of New York and Illinois respectively. The Olmsteads came from Nebraska to California in 1895, and in Kern the death of Mr. Olmstead occurred, while Mrs. Olmstead makes her home with her daughter, Mrs. Parish. Mr. and Mrs. Parish have four children, Earl, Donald, Elsie and Jack.

A. Y. MEUDELL.—The superintendent of machinery for the San Joaquin Light and Power Corporation possesses qualifications that adapt him admirably for his responsible post and that have enabled him to fill with marked efficiency other positions of equal importance. Upon the installation of the machinery and electrical appliances of the great corporation at Bakersfield his services were retained as superintendent of machinery, his selection for the responsible task being induced through his wide reputation as an expert in the line of his specialty. When it is considered that the company operates the street car system in Bakersfield and has laid double tracks to East Bakersfield, besides having built more than one hundred and twenty-five miles of feeder lines in Kern county (the principal line being from Weed Patch to a point fifteen miles south of Edison); when it is further appreciated that hydro-electric power is furnished for illuminating cities, propelling factory plants and raising water for irrigating purposes.

Through his father, George Meudell, who came to America from Edinburgh, Mr. Meudell is descended from Scotch ancestors, while his mother, Mary (Yeoman) Meudell, was a member of an old New York family identified with the colonial history of our country. Although he is a native of Chicago, Ill., born in 1872, from the age of three years he was reared in Belleville, Ontario, and at a very early age he learned the trade of machinist. Coming to California in 1893 he engaged in ranching at Gardena for two years, after which he worked as a machinist and boiler-setter for J. B. Meyer & Co., of Los Angeles. During 1900 he entered the employ of the Los Angeles Railway Company as engineer and machinist at the power house and thus was identified with the inauguration of the Huntington electric system in that city. After six years in one position he was promoted to be chief engineer in charge of the Central avenue power plant, but soon resigned on account of ill health.

While engaged with Charles C. Moore, erecting engineer, Mr. Meudell assisted in the construction of the Redondo electric plant and remained to take charge of the first test, which covered a period of eight months. During 1908 he entered the employ of the Pacific Light & Power Company in Los Angeles and was sent to the Redlands plant as engineer, but after a few months he resigned to take charge of the power plants of the Monterey Gas and Electric Light Company at Monterey and Salinas. Returning from Monterey to Los Angeles he engaged for a brief period as erecting engineer with the Pacific Light and Power Company, leaving that important place in order to accept his present position in Bakersfield when the corporation installed its plant in this city. Mr. Meudell is very optimistic over the great possibilities of the soil production in Kern county and owns two small farms in the county. One, of twenty acres, at Lerdo, is given to the raising of hemp, while the other, of ten acres, on the Rosedale road, is devoted to alfalfa. While making his headquarters in Los Angeles he married in that city Miss Bessie Hannam, who was born in Witby, Ontario, and by whom he has two daughters, Mary and Myrtle. In fraternal relations he holds membership with South Gate Lodge No. 320, F. & A. M., in which he was made a Mason. His life has been an existence of busy activities and it has not been possible for him, in any city of his residence, to participate prominently in civic upbuilding or political affairs, yet he has kept posted on national problems and in sentiment is a staunch upholder of Republican principles.

PETER O'HARE.—The childhood recollections of Mr. O'Hare clustered around the little village of Banbridge, Ireland, where his father, Michael O'Hare, was engaged in business and where he passed the carefree days of early life. The family belonged to one of the oldest and most honored in the north of Ireland and he claimed county Down as his native place, his birth having occurred there December 7, 1843. After a course at college and while still a young man he came to the United States. After a comparatively brief sojourn in Massachusetts he proceeded west to California and settled in Mariposa county, where he found employment in the mines. While employed at Visalia in 1869 he accidentally saw a map of Kern Island and being interested from the first, determined to come here.

The original purchase made by Mr. O'Hare comprised two hundred and fifty acres of unimproved land. This he brought under cultivation and greatly enhanced in value through systematic irrigation. Later he acquired the title to a second farm and this also he put under irrigation, making other improvements of permanent value to the property. Both farms were in his possession at the time of his death, August 26, 1894, and since then they have been rented by his widow, the tenants devoting them to general farming and dairying. In addition to these two properties he was interested in the Buena Vista canal, of which he had been an original promoter and builder. From the beginning of his citizenship in the United States he voted with the Democratic party, but he was not a partisan in spirit and the only office that he ever consented to fill, which was county supervisor, he won by a nomination without his solicitation. After he had been a member of the board from 1882 to 1886 and had given his influence to all movements for the permanent growth of the county, he refused to continue in the office, preferring to devote his entire time to private business and agricultural enterprises.

The marriage of Peter O'Hare and Miss Mary E. Clancy was solemnized in San Francisco in June of 1891. Mrs. O'Hare was born in county Leitrim, Ireland, and during girlhood came to the United States, joining a brother, T. J. Clancy, who was a merchant of San Francisco. Of her marriage two sons were born, James M. and Peter C. The former, a graduate of the Bakersfield high school in 1912 is now attending Santa Clara University, and the latter is a member of the Kern county high school class of 1914. Since the death of her husband, which occurred in San Francisco, Mrs. O'Hare has made her home in Bakersfield.

Peter. O'Hare

JOHN S. OSWALD.—Although his earliest memories are associated with the United States and practically all of his life has been passed in this country, Mr. Oswald is of German nativity and was born at Rodersheim, Rheinpfalz, December 19, 1866, being a son of Vollmanus and Eva Barbara (Goger) Oswald, likewise natives of that part of Germany. During 1867 the father, who was a carpenter by trade, brought his family to America and settled in Pennsylvania, where he found employment in the building business at Allentown. For less than ten years he remained a resident of the east. The development of the central west was attracting resolute farmers to that section of the country and he formed one of the number who undertook to earn a livelihood from the soil of Minnesota. During 1876 he took his family to McLeod county and secured land near Glencoe, where he engaged in general farming for eleven years. Lack of satisfactory returns from his farm led him to seek other locations and finally he decided upon Oregon, his son, John S., having preceded him to the Pacific coast where he himself established a home near Eugene, in 1887. A study of soil conditions proved gratifying to him and he invested in unimproved farm property, which at the time was selling at low figures. He still lives on his ranch, but of recent years has largely retired from the strenuous activities of younger days. Born in 1837 and his wife six years later, both are still rugged and robust and maintain an intelligent interest in the progress of the world. Adjacent to their ranch lies one hundred and sixty acres owned by their son, John S., who bought the tract for $1200 and since has had the satisfaction of witnessing such a rapid advance in valuations that farms further from Eugene than his own have sold for $400 per acre.

The eldest of seven children, John S. Oswald was brought to the United States in infancy and as soon as old enough to attend school was a pupil in the primary grade at Allentown, Pa. During 1876 he accompanied his parents to Glencoe, Minn., where he attended a private academy. Upon leaving school he learned the trade of carpenter under his father in McLeod county. At the age of about twenty he left home to make his own way in the world. The great northwest was the objective point. For a time he engaged in carpentering at Spokane, Wash., and later he had employment at South Bend, that state, whence in 1887 he went to Oregon and there joined his parents at Eugene, settling upon a farm in the vicinity. In the spring of 1888 he came to Bakersfield and entered the employ of F. W. Hickox as a carpenter. For three years he continued in the same position. Since then he has been associated with the hardware department of the A. Weill establishment. At first as a clerk he proved the value of his services and justified his promotion to the head of the department at the expiration of three years.

The marriage of John S. Oswald was solemnized in Bakersfield October 6, 1897, and united him with Miss Maude Hathway, who was born in Owensboro, Daviess county, Ky., and was fourth in order of birth among six children. Her parents, Howard and Phoebe (Kinchloe) Hathway, have resided in Bakersfield for many years. Of her marriage to Mr. Oswald there is a son, Raymond John Oswald. Ever since making a study of political questions Mr. Oswald has favored the Republican party. Since coming to Bakersfield he has identified himself with Aerie No. 96, of the Eagles, and Bakersfield Lodge No. 266 of the Elks, also the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Knights of Pythias.

EZRA NEWTON BLACKER.—As the owner of considerable real estate in Bakersfield, whose material upbuilding he has witnessed with civic pride, E. Newton Blacker has an intimate identification with local affairs. Twenty years or more have passed since first he landed in Bakersfield and began to work for the Kern County Land Company on Poso ranch as a fence-rider. In this long period he has witnessed the development of farms, the growth of towns and the transformation of the entire county into an aspect of material prosperity. In removing to this state he came direct from his native commonwealth of Indiana, where he was born in Clinton county February 20, 1868, and where he passed the years of boyhood upon a farm operated by his father, J. N. Blacker. Of six children forming the family of his father's first marriage he was the eldest, the youngest being Robert E., superintendent of the stable department of the Kern County Land Company at Bakersfield.

By trade a carpenter, skilled with tools and an expert in various forms of cabinet work, E. Newton Blacker followed the occupation for some years in Bakersfield after he had resigned his position on the ranch. Upon the starting of Famosa he went to the new town, bought business property, erected a large store building and engaged in mercantile pursuits, also conducted an hotel, but his venture had a disastrous termination through the abandoning of the village. Thereupon he returned to Bakersfield in 1900 and purchased a lot on the corner of I and Twenty-third streets. To this lot he moved his building from Famosa and remodeled it into an apartment house of sixteen rooms, which he now manages. In addition he has built eight residences in the same block and the adjoining block on I street. All of the houses were planned and built by himself and represent his own skilled knowledge of his trade.

The marriage of Mr. Blacker took place at Crawfordsville, Ind., September 2, 1891, and united him with Miss Ida Cave, who was born and reared near that city. The young couple came to California in 1892 and settled in Kern county, where occurred the birth of their two sons, Haven and Carroll. Mrs. Blacker was the youngest among eight children comprising the family of James E. and Carlotta (Kious) Cave, natives respectively of Ohio and Indiana. The mother was a daughter of Martin Kious, an Indiana farmer, and two of her brothers were soldiers in the Civil war, one meeting his death while fighting for the preservation of the Union. James E. Cave, who engaged in farming pursuits until his death in 1910, was a member of Company M, Eleventh Indiana Cavalry, at the time of the Civil war, in which two of his brothers also participated, as well as their father, Rev. Alfred N. Cave, the latter a commissioned officer and an influential man in his regiment. The skill of the Union officer was not confined to military tactics, for as a pioneer minister of the Methodist Episcopal denomination he proved himself to be an able speaker, logical thinker and profound exponent of the Scriptures. Although a native of Ohio, the greater part of his life was passed in Montgomery county, Ind., and he was known and honored by the Methodists throughout all that section of the country. Throughout all of their mature years Mr. and Mrs. Blacker have been earnest members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In gifts to the church they have been generous, while they also have assisted educational and philanthropic enterprises to the extent of their ability. In national principles Mr. Blacker favors the Republican party, while fraternally he holds membership with the Woodmen of the World.

SAMUEL GRAHAM SMARTT.—A native of McMinnville, Warren county, Tenn., Mr. Smartt was born October 21, 1862, the son of Samuel G. and Martha (Graham) Smartt, both of whom passed away in Tennessee. The father followed agriculture as a life pursuit, and during the Civil war served in the Confederate army for a long period, after which he returned to Tennessee and remained for the rest of his life. Nine children were born to him and his wife Martha, of whom five are now living, and Samuel G. is the only one of the family to reside in the state of California.

Avis Gilli      Peter Gilli

Brought up in his native town, Samuel G. Smartt, Jr., received the schooling afforded by the local public schools and then learned the carpenter trade which he continued to follow until the year 1887. At this time he decided to come west and his first location was at Fresno where he was employed at raisin-packing for a year. The building business then attracted him and he became engaged in that line of work, in October, 1889, coming to Bakersfield to aid in the building up of that place after the big fire. There was sore need for these workers at that time, as the fire had caused the destruction of many buildings and left the city in a bad state. This has been the field of operation for Mr. Smartt ever since, with the exception of a period between 1906 and 1910 when he spent his time in San Francisco, building among other houses the Madison school and the St. Luke's church, which are fine examples of his capable, energetic powers. In 1910, however, he returned to Bakersfield, where he has built many residence and business houses, and, in fact, many of the schoolhouses throughout Kern county have been built under his direction and contract. The Smartt apartments, situated at No. 1715 Eighteenth street, Bakersfield, and owned by Mr. and Mrs. Smartt, were built by him. In Fresno Mr. Smartt married Mrs. Lulu Lisk, a native of Texas.

PETER GILLI.—The excellent opportunities afforded by Kern county to young men of energy of temperament and force of character, find illustration in the successful activities of Peter Gilli, a prosperous farmer and the owner of one hundred and seventy acres of highly improved land on the Kern Island road. Less than a quarter of a century has elapsed since he came from Switzerland to America and identified himself with the growing interests of California, where since he has lived and labored in Kern county. During the early years of his residence here he worked for wages and sent back to Switzerland a large portion of his earnings, in order to assist his father in paying off an indebtedness on the home farm. However, as early as 1894, four years after landing in the west, he proved his faith in this locality by investing in land, the original purchase comprising sixty acres. It was no slight task to assume a debt almost burdening in amount and for several years he was scarcely able to meet his payments, but his faith never wavered nor did his courage falter. After selling the place he purchased a tract from R. E. Houghton which was then known as the Lincoln farm. Although at the time of buying he could raise only one-fourth of the cash, he finally succeeded in paying for it. In addition he put about $5,000 worth of improvements on the place, including the elegant residence erected in 1910 and containing all modern conveniences, not the least of these being the installation of electric lights and of an adequate water service. Dairying has been one of his specialties and at this writing he has twelve fine milch cows on the farm, besides which he engages in raising mules and hogs as well as in the cultivation of the ground in such crops as are best adapted to the soil and climate.

Although the only member of the family now living in California Mr. Gilli was not the first of the name who crossed the ocean from the far-distant Alpine home. When a young man his father, John Gilli, was attracted to the Pacific coast by reason of the discovery of gold and prospected in all the region lying between Bakersfield and San Francisco, but meeting with no special luck in the mines and feeling deeply the isolation from kindred he returned after a time to his native land, where he settled on a farm. About 1905 he lost his wife, Rosa (Grischott) Gilli, since which time he has made his home with his youngest daughter. For years he lived a life of self-sacrificing labor and toiled early and late to support his family from the products raised on his farm. In the earning of a livelihood he was greatly aided by an appointment as a Swiss road master and when he recently retired from that position, after years of faithful service, he was given a substantial pension by the government. All of his seven children excepting the fourth, Peter, continue to live in Switzerland. They are named as follows: Eva, Mrs. Florian Cojori; Rosa, Mrs. Alexander Joos; Maria, the widow of Albert Ritzzi; Christine, Mrs. Peter Grischott; John, who is employed as a custom house official by the Swiss government; and Elizabeth, who married John Tobler and lives on a farm in her native canton.

Descended from an old Swiss family that also boasted of a pedigree going back to ancient Roman blood, Peter Gilli was born in Graubunden, Grisons, Switzerland, November 24, 1867, and during boyhood gained a comprehensive knowledge of both the German and old Italian tongues. The schools of the home neighborhood were excellent and after he had completed the grammar course he spent two years in a high school, but did not graduate on account of the necessity of earning his livelihood. Early in life he embraced the doctrines of the German Lutheran Church and since then he has been faithful in devotion to that denomination. After having worked for one year in a store at Zurich, Switzerland, and two years in Hotel Enderlin at Pontresina in the picturesque Alpine region, he came to California, arriving at Bakersfield April 9, 1890. For five years he worked steadily in the employ of Welling Canfield, a pioneer dairyman of Kern county. From 1895 to 1897 he worked for Chris Mattly, a prominent dairyman of this county, who had come from the same village as himself. Later he rented one hundred and sixty acres lying near Lakeside and belonging to Mrs. R. Chubb. On that place he prospered as a dairyman and general farmer and finally he accumulated an amount sufficient to justify the improvement of the raw land which he had purchased during 1894. Since then he has given his attention to his own land, which forms one of the valuable farms of the vicinity. In politics he is a Republican and belongs to the Woodmen of the World.

The first trip across the ocean was made by Mr. Gilli during 1890, when on the 20th of March he boarded a trans-Atlantic steamer at Havre, France, and journeyed over the usual ocean route to New York. The next trip was made in 1900, during which year he left California for New York and from there sailed for Europe. En route to Switzerland he visited the World's Fair at Paris and found both pleasure and instruction in that great international exposition. After a happy renewal of friendships with the people of his native canton he came back to work in California and eagerly took up the battle necessary to the securing of financial independence. Again in 1908 he returned to his old home in the Alps. In the meantime his mother had passed away, but there yet remained his father, then about seventy-three years of age.

Mr. Gilli was married at Bakersfield July 2, 1913, to Miss Avis Haworth, daughter of C. N. and Mary A. (Mattley) Haworth, of El Reno, Okla. She was born in Iowa, and went to Oklahoma with her parents when she was four years old.

WILLIAM BRADLEY PECK.—In his native city of Detroit, Mich., where he was born May 23, 1840, he became familiar with the environment of the frontier and tales of the dangers of the west did not daunt his resolution to come hither. At the age of nineteen he crossed the plains with a large expedition of emigrants. The journey, although not without its dangers, came to an uneventful end and the men dispersed to the various mines, Mr. Peck seeking the placer mines of Hangtown. The camp with its throngs of gold-seekers from every part of the world presented a weird spectacle to a stranger, but he soon became familiar with the work of the mines and the customs of the miners. The life, although one of hardship and deprivation, was not without its zest of adventure and thrilling exploits, but in time he wearied of the unsatisfactory returns and the lack of permanency, so he turned his attention to the buying of horses and the running of a dairy near Placerville, Eldorado county.

C. N. Johnston

Like many of the original pioneers Mr. Peck has followed various occupations, having been at different times a miner, dairyman, rancher and liveryman, and while none of these callings brought him a fortune he has become the possessor of a well-earned competency. During 1864 at San Jose he married Miss Hattie Stiner and his second marriage, which occurred in Reedley, united him with Mrs. Amanda (Weeks) Burney, born in Fond du Lac, Wis. Of his first marriage there are two daughters, namely: Euphemia, wife of Joseph Stephens, a farmer at Turlock; and Lillian, wife of Alfred Giles, who is employed in a dairy business at Fresno. Of Mrs. Peck's first marriage there were three children, Elgin of Bakersfield; May, Mrs. Carter, of Bakersfield; and Frank, of New Westminster, B. C. For some time Mr. Peck has made his home on a ranch of twenty acres two and one-half miles south of Bakersfield. This property, which he purchased in 1910, has been improved under his careful oversight.

CHARLES NEWTON JOHNSTON.—The Johnston family long has been identified with New England, where C. N. and his father, John Eldridge, were born at Bristol, Me. He was the eighth generation and lineal descendant of Governor Bradford of Massachusetts, the originator of Thanksgiving day. The life of the father was all too brief, but was marked by patriotism and courage. When yet a mere lad he had gone to sea and by slow degrees he rose to be first mate of a vessel. When the Civil war began he offered his services as a member of a Maine regiment of infantry, but soon after he had been accepted he was transferred to the United States navy as an officer on the transport, Potomac, from which he rose to the rank of captain. Upon the expiration of his time of service he received an honorable discharge from the navy, whereupon he resumed his former position as first mate on an ocean steamer. While yet a young man he passed from earth, leaving an only son, Charles Newton, whose birth had occurred November 14, 1865. The widow, who bore the maiden name of Elizabeth Francis and was a native of Maine, was married again some time after losing her first husband. Her second union was with Joseph Spinney, of Maine, a man of ability and worth, who after bringing the family to California in 1877 settled at Fresno. In that city he engaged in the manufacture of brick and also in the building business as a contractor. Some of the first permanent buildings in Fresno were erected under his personal oversight. Rising to prominence in the city of his adoption he was honored with election to the mayoralty and filled the office for two terms. For some years he owned the I. O. O. F. building in Fresno, which he had erected during the period of his activities as a contractor. After his death, which occurred at Fresno, his widow removed to Point Richmond, Contra Costa county, and continues to live there at the present time.

When about twelve years of age Charles Newton Johnston accompanied his mother and stepfather in their removal from Maine to California, where he completed his education in the Fresno schools. During 1879 he left school to take up blacksmithing as an apprentice to J. W. Williams, whose shop occupied the present site of the Grand Central hotel in Fresno. Until the completion of his time he continued in the same shop, but upon starting out for himself in 1882 he came to Bakersfield, where he began to work in a shop on the corner of L and Nineteenth streets. For a time he was employed by J. E. Smith and later he was under H. H. Fish, being with the two men about twenty years altogether. Buying the shop in 1907, he conducted the business there, which was the oldest of the kind in the city. It was in March, 1913, that he moved into his new building. The site covers an area of 132 x 115 feet on Eighteenth and O streets and the building, which is two stories, is 70 x 90 feet. This has been fully equipped with the most modern and complete machinery for general blacksmithing; woodwork, forgings and repairing for automobiles is an important feature, and the heaviest kind of work is handled in the shops. The largest automobile stage in the valley was built here and is used for service on the Oil Center stage line. In the conduct of his business Mr. Johnston is ably assisted by his wife, who has charge of his office.

The comfortable home which Mr. Johnston built at the corner of C and Twenty-second streets is presided over with dignity and grace by his capable wife, who bore the maiden name of Emma Blanche Redstone, and who is a native of Dutch Flat, Placer county, this state. During the era of mining activity her father, Col. A. E. Redstone, with Judge Rhoades and others, crossed the plains in the '50s with ox-teams from Indianapolis to California, and engaged in mining. Having no luck as a seeker of gold, he turned his attention to journalistic affairs and became prominent in newspaper work. For a time he also was employed in the secret service. At this writing he and his wife make their home at Woody, Cal. His wife, who was before her marriage Mary Josephine Koontz, was a native of Indianapolis, daughter of George Koontz. She was a niece of Rev. Abraham Koontz, the founder of the first Methodist Episcopal Church in Indianapolis. George Koontz was an extensive farmer and left to his daughter the farm that is now the City Park of Indianapolis. Colonel Redstone returned to Indianapolis and served as Colonel of an Indiana regiment in the Civil war. He was a prominent attorney, and was very talented. In California he published many works bearing on the labor problem as well as other philanthropic reforms. When a young lady Mrs. Johnston, then Miss Emma Blanche Redstone, was graduated from the Oakland high school, after which she was married to F. R. Kalloch, who died leaving her with two children, namely: Rita, now the wife of Herman S. Dumble, of Bakersfield; and F. R. Kalloch, contractor and builder of the same city. In Bakersfield March 17, 1902, she became the wife of Mr. Johnston.

Upon the organization of the first volunteer fire department in Bakersfield many years ago, Mr. Johnston became a member and at different times he served as foreman of the Eureka Engine Company, also for one term he served as chief of the fire department. Before the incorporation of the city he was chosen a fire commissioner and served as such for two terms, being honored with the chairmanship of the board for one term. Recognizing the imperative need of fire protection, he cheerfully gave his services as long as funds were lacking for the payment of a regular corps of workers. From the time of attaining his majority he has voted the Republican ticket at all national elections, but he is independent in local affairs. After coming to Bakersfield he was made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., and was raised to the Royal Arch degree in Kern Valley Chapter No. 75, R. A. M. Later he joined the local lodge of the Knights of Pythias, and with his wife is a member of Sunset Temple No. 16, Pythian Sisters. Mr. Johnston is an influential local worker in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is a member of the encampment.

THADDEUS M. McNAMARA, M.D.—The McNamara family is of Anglo-Saxon origin and was founded in America by William M. McNamara, for years a farmer in Illinois. The next generation was represented by T. M., born on the home farm near Elgin, Ill., but from young manhood a resident of California. The eldest of his three children, Thaddeus M., was born at Visalia, Cal., August 1, 1880, received his early education at St. Ignatius College in San Francisco and then matriculated in St. Mary's

J. H. McMillen

College in Kansas, from which institution he received the degree of A. B. upon his graduation in 1901. On returning to California he entered the Cooper Medical College in San Francisco, where he took the regular course of lectures, graduating in 1905 with the degree of M. D. and with an excellent record for scholarship. Indeed, it was largely due to his capability in clinical work that he received an appointment as interne in the city and county hospital, where he remained for sixteen months. Valuable experience also was gained through a service of eight months as resident physician in the emergency and general hospital at Los Angeles. Important professional knowledge was further acquired while acting as interne in the Lane hospital of San Francisco. After he had filled that position for ten months he was promoted to be resident physician in the same institution, where he continued during the following year and then resigned in 1909 in order to engage in practice in Bakersfield. In this city for a time he had the advantage of an association with Dr. A. F. Schafer, but since the latter has concentrated his attention upon an important professional specialty, Dr. McNamara has succeeded to their private practice. Besides the private practice and hospital activities he has been prominent in the work of the Kern County Medical Society, and is now filling the office of vice-president; he is also a member of the State Medical Society and American Medical Association. Since coming to Bakersfield he has associated himself with the Knights of Columbus and the Fraternal Brotherhood. While making his home in San Francisco he met and married Miss Lillian Price, who was born in Stockton and is a graduate of the Lane hospital training school for nurses. Two sons bless their union, Thaddeus M. and Joseph, the elder representing the third generation to bear the same name.

JOHN HENRY McMILLEN.—Not alone as a son of that honored pioneer, Joel McMillen, but because of his own worthy achievements is John Henry McMillen, of Wasco, entitled to prominence in this work. Joel McMillen, a native of Cape Elizabeth, Me., born February 22, 1833, was educated in public schools near his boyhood home and early acquired a practical knowledge of the ship-joiners' trade. In 1849, when he was sixteen years old, he came to California with the Simpson brothers, around Cape Horn on a sailer to San Francisco, Simpson brothers becoming successful lumber manufacturers and dealers in that city. Mr. McMillen was for some years employed at teaming, but eventually engaged in contract work. From San Francisco he moved to Nevada, where he employed himself profitably in teaming and hauling, chiefly in the mining districts. He followed the mining booms here and there in Nevada until 1879, when he came to Kern county and bought a section of land near Poso ranch and engaged in general farming and stock-raising on a large scale. He died December 3, 1896, on his homestead and his wife passed away October 5, 1902. He married Henrietta Matlock, a native of New York City, who accompanied her parents across the plains to California when she was six years old, settling at Placerville.

It was in Lodi, Sacramento county, Cal., that John Henry McMillen was born August 11, 1877. His parents brought him to Kern county in 1879, when he was about two years old, and he remained at home until after the death of his mother in 1902. He attended school until he was sixteen years old, then took a commercial course in Heald's Business College, San Francisco, from which he was graduated in 1897. Then returning to Kern county, he associated himself with his mother on the old farm, carrying on general farming and stock-raising on a large scale. Mr. McMillen also engaged in breeding and handling for the market horses, mules, cattle and hogs, continuing this until 1900, when he took up contracting, teaming and hauling, together with general grading, the construction of roads and the laying of pipe lines, operating extensively in different parts of the state. For six months he was engaged in teaming and hauling at Coalinga and for three years in the building of levees in the Tulare Lake district and he was busy for a time in the construction of roads at McKittrick. In 1910 he took up his residence at Wasco, since which time he has continued in the general contracting business and has done the hauling for all the pipe lines constructed out of Lost Hills. He began contracting in a small way and his business has steadily increased until he owns two hundred and fifty mules, which are kept busy the year round in his contract work in different parts of the state. Mr. McMillen has lately sold his farming as well as his cattle interests, to devote all of his time to his business of general contracting. His corrals and headquarters are at Wasco, where he has two large warehouses for the storage of hay and grain for his stock.

Mr. McMillen was married in El Monte, Los Angeles county, July 15, 1911, to Miss Mabel James Lambert, who was born in Illinois and came to California with her parents when she was a child. She was educated in the public schools of Pasadena and graduated at the Los Angeles State Normal School, after which she was engaged in educational work for ten years.

REV. LOUIS KUEFFNER.—St. John's German Lutheran Church of Bakersfield, under the efficient ministrations of Rev. Louis Kueffner as pastor, is now making the most gratifying progress in its brief but meritorious history and in its spiritual helpfulness is evincing the source and secret of its numerical growth. In the early part of the twentieth century a few people of that faith decided to promote the establishment of a congregation. The beginning was as a grain of mustard seed, insignificant and unpromising. The few faithful members held occasional services in the old Justice of the Peace hall on I street, opposite from the old court house. It was impossible to support a regular pastor and dependence was placed upon the helpfulness of visiting brethren. Rev. Mr. Norden, who established and first ministered to the congregation, was followed by Elders Baur and Denninger. Later the congregation enjoyed the occasional ministrations of Rev. Mr. Grunow, of Visalia, and still later Rev. Mr. Berner, of Terra Bella, preached for them twice a month. During the spring of 1911 the congregation completed their house of worship and an adjoining parsonage, on the corner of Twentieth and C streets, and September 17, 1911, Rev. Louis Kueffner became their first resident pastor.

From his earliest recollections Rev. Louis Kueffner had been familiar with the doctrines of the German Lutheran denomination, for he was instructed wisely and thoroughly by his devoted father, an ordained minister of the church. With such an environment in boyhood and with such talents as he possessed, it was natural that he should follow in the footsteps of his father and consecrate his all to the service of the Lord. Born in Fairbank, Iowa, August 22, 1886, he was reared in Illinois and still has hosts of warm friends in that state. His father, Rev. Christian Kueffner, a native of Joliet, Ill., received exceptional advantages in preparation for a ministerial career. After he had graduated from Concordia College in Fort Wayne, Ind., he took the complete course of study in Concordia College at Springfield, Ill., and was graduated with honors, following which he was ordained to the ministry of the German Lutheran denomination. With the exception of three years in Iowa his entire period of ministerial service was confined to Illinois and he died at Plainfield, that state, while his widow, who bore the maiden name of Anna Wilding and who was born in Illinois, is now a resident of Aurora, same state. Seven children formed their family and all but two are still living. The eldest, Louis, was educated primarily in parochial schools. At the age of fifteen years he matriculated in Concordia College at Milwaukee, Wis., where he completed the study of the classics. Next he attended Concordia Theological Seminary in St. Louis, Mo., and after his graduation in June of 1911 he was ordained to the ministry, since which time he has been resident pastor at Bakersfield and supply pastor of Zion Church at Terra Bella. Returning to St. Louis, Mo., in 1912, he there married Miss Clara Binger, who was born, reared and educated in that city and who assists him most graciously and effectively in his ministerial work. Throughout his denomination he has become well known, with the promise of growing influence with ripening years and added experience. As a member of the California district of the Missouri synod and also of the Northern California conference, he has been identified with organizations for the upbuilding of his denomination and has added the weight of his labors and influence to the development of denominational work.

WILLIAM G. WHITE.—The sturdy Scotch-Irish element, which has been so important a factor in the permanent upbuilding of American civilization, appeared in the ancestry of William G. White of Bakersfield, whose paternal forbears established themselves in Pennsylvania during the colonial period. Both his father, Thomas, and grandfather, James White, were natives of Mercer county, Pa., and engaged in general farming in that part of the state. The former married Mary Miller, whose ancestors, forced to flee from Scotland on account of religious persecution, found a harbor of refuge in Ireland and thence crossed the ocean to the new world. The most illustrious member of the family was Hugh Miller, the Scottish geologist and writer of the nineteenth century.

One of eight children comprising the parental family, William G. White was born in Mercer county, Pa., June 7, 1876, and passed the years of boyhood on a farm eighty miles from Pittsburg. In addition to attendance at public schools he was sent to the Grove City College. Although reared to a knowledge of farming and from the age of fifteen until seventeen practically in charge of a farm, with the supervision of stock and field work, he had no inherent fondness for agriculture and at seventeen he left home to serve an apprenticeship to the trade of bricklayer in Pittsburg. For three years he remained with a Mr. Donovan, an expert in the trade. On the completion of his trade he began to work as a journeyman. From taking small jobs and doing day work he soon rose to contract work and made a specialty of furnaces and boilers. Meanwhile he had married in his native county Miss Harriet Fisher, who was born and reared in that county and was a member of one of its old families. They are the parents of four children, Gladys Emmalynn, Milan Tadema, Mary Gould and Helen Rowena.

The ill health of his wife and the desirability of seeking a change of climate in her interests led Mr. White to remove to the west in 1902, during which year after having traveled over the coast he settled in San Francisco and took up contracting and building. About that time he had charge of the building of the First National Bank of San Jose. Meanwhile his own health had become impaired and he was obliged to remove from San Francisco. Starting with his family for Arizona in 1910, he chanced to stop at Bakersfield, and believing that the climate would agree with him he decided to engage in business here. Since that time he has enjoyed fair health and has been energetically engaged in the filling of contracts. While he is regarded as especially successful in brick and cobble-stone work, he has not limited his attention to these specialties, but does building of all kinds. Among his contracts were those for the Brown building in Kern, the Gardner building, the brick work in Mercy Hospital and Scofield building in Bakersfield, and four brick buildings in Wasco, also the Brix apartments in Fresno. He has taken a complete course in architecture and drafting under Miller & Campbell and is able to design a private or public building as well as erect the same. One of his chief ambitions has been to secure ordinances for the safety of builders and workmen; another ambition has been to improve the standard of the finishing of buildings. With keen alertness he watches every advance made in his chosen occupation and is himself foremost in promoting the welfare of the building business. Upon the organization of the Builders' Exchange (in which work he assisted) he was placed upon the directorate of the same and also acts as a member of the arbitration board. He is identified with the Woodmen of the World and interested in the Presbyterian Church, of which his wife is a member.

SAMUEL A. WILLIAMS.—The Williams family to which belongs Samuel A. Williams is an old established and well-known New England one, the American ancestor coming from England at an early day, and it is highly represented in California in the personages of Samuel A. Williams and his sons William A. and Elmer E. Williams, the well-known proprietors of the Greenfield grocery, with headquarters about eight miles south of Bakersfield.

A selfmade man in the true sense of the word, Mr. Williams has the satisfaction of knowing that every cent he has in the world represents so much honest toil and practical good judgment. His birth occurred December 15, 1854, in Ross county, Ohio, son of Jonathan B. and Philanda D. (Freeman) Williams, the former a native of New Hampshire, while the mother was born near Moores Junction in northern New York. The parents were married at Orwell, Vt., just across from old Fort Ticonderoga, and moved to Detroit, Mich., a short time later. From there they subsequently made their way to southern Ohio, where Jonathan Williams conducted a hotel at Palestine, about twenty miles south of Columbus, and his death occurred during the war, when Samuel A. was but eight years of age. He was one of five children born to his parents, the others being: Eugene, who died at the age of nine years; Affie Eliza, who died when eighteen months old; Lucy Jane, who became the wife of the late Jacob Niederauer, of Bakersfield, and died in Bakersfield; and Ellsworth, who now makes his home in Bakersfield.

Soon after the death of the father, Mrs. Williams and her three children returned to Vermont, where Samuel A. was reared to manhood, assuming the responsibility of caring for his mother and the two younger children at an early age. At an early age he worked for George Hibbard, in Orwell, Vt., where he made his home, the agreement being that he should work for him for a year, and then if mutually agreeable he should remain until he reached his majority. But after two years Mr. Williams decided to give up that work and until he was sixteen worked at various places in the vicinity for $6 a month and his board. He then went to Connecticut, where he worked on a farm for two years, the following two years being employed in a saw mill, and it was at this time, in 1875, that he married, Miss Margaret O'Brien, of Canterbury, Conn., becoming his bride. While working at the saw mill he was injured and his illness was of so long duration that his means became sorely depleted, so that when he recovered his strength he and his excellent wife took employment on a Connecticut farm in order to somewhat replenish their loss. In the fall of 1876 they moved back to Vermont, and he there worked at general work for a number of years. In the fall of 1883 they came to California, bringing with them their three children, and located at Bakersfield. Mr. Williams started his life here under most discouraging circumstances, as he arrived here on crutches, having sustained injuries in a railroad accident on the New York Central road near Syracuse, N. Y., on his way west, and was in a hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, for six weeks. He procured employment with Haggin, Carr & Co., taking charge of work on their canals and water ditches, and such satisfaction did he give his employers that he was retained at that position for eight years and seven months, and only relinquished his connection with them to start out for himself. He then engaged in farming in Panama, but in 1900 traded his farm there for his present sixty-acre ranch at Greenfield.

Mr. and Mrs. Williams became the parents of five children. May married

C. T. McKinnis.

Frank Parish of Panama and is now deceased (she left no children); William A. and Elmer are proprietors of the Greenfield grocery, and are mentioned more fully elsewhere in this volume; Frederick S. married Mrs. Alice Morrison, and was killed when twenty-five years of age in a railroad accident at Fresno, on the Southern Pacific railroad, on which he was a fireman; and Ray is at home. Mr. Williams is a member of the Woodmen of the World and the Moose.

CARLE TURNER MCKINNIE.—Thomas W. McKinnie was born in Ohio, as was also his wife, Alice (Turner) McKinnie. Thomas W. was among those loyal patriots who gave their services to aid in the country's cause in the Civil war. From a private in Company H, One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry he rose to be colonel of his regiment. He saw active service for a long period, and his record on the field of battle was a most honorable one. His death occurred at St. Louis, Mo., in 1909, and there, too, his wife passed away in 1895.

Carle Turner McKinnie was born in Cadiz, Ohio, August 9, 1869, and when a year old was brought by his parents to Fort Scott, Kans., where for six years they made their home, thence removing to St. Joe, Mo. At the latter place he was sent to school and grew to manhood, at which period he went to St. Louis, Mo., and there was employed by the Simmons Hardware Co., as buyer for three years, after which he accepted a position with the Stanley Works of New Britain, Conn., and New York City. After twelve years with this company he and his brother, Burt P. McKinnie, bought a ranch near Loup City, Nebr., whither Carle T. removed and engaged in farming and stock raising for five years. During this time he was interested with land development in the Grand valley district in Colorado, his experience there leading him and his associates to take up the same line of work on a broader scale in Tehachapi, Kern county. He made his way hither in 1910 and located in Tehachapi, where with his associates he bought sixteen hundred acres of land adjoining the town, organizing the Tehachapi Fruit & Land Company, Incorporated, of which Mr. McKinnie is now the president and manager, and under his direction the company have placed their holdings under irrigation by means of pumping plants and have sold one thousand acres, five hundred of which have been set to Bartlett pears and winter varieties of apples. As fast as possible the remainder is being planted not only to pears and apples, but also to currants, sour cherries and crab-apples, for which the soil and climate of the Tehachapi country is especially adapted.

In 1909 Mr. McKinnie was married to Miss Winifred Lois Leach, a native of Oakdale, Neb., and they have one child, Thomas Carle. Fraternally he is a member of Webster Groves Lodge No. 84, F. & A. M., of St. Louis, and he is also a member of Colorado Commandery, Military Order of the Loyal Legion. Politically he is a Republican.

ALBERT W. MARION.—In generations past the southern representatives of the Marion family displayed the hospitality, chivalry and courtesy characteristic of their section of the country. Later identification with the north gave to them the energy and progressive spirit typical of the people of that region. The founder of the family north of Mason's and Dixon's line was Moses Marion, a native of North Carolina and a soldier in the war of 1812. Some years after his marriage and after the birth of his son, John, he took the family to Indiana and settled near Lafayette, Tippecanoe county, in the vicinity of the historic battle ground embodied in the famous presidential slogan "Tippecanoe and Tyler too," so familiar to the frontiersmen during the campaign of William Henry Harrison. In the state of Indiana were passed the last days of Moses Marion and his son John, also there occurred the death of the latter's wife, Margaret (Fisher) Marion, a native of Pennsylvania, descended from German ancestry, and from childhood a resident of Indiana, her parents having been early settlers of that state. In her family there were two sons, one of whom, Francis, is a resident of Missouri. The other, Albert W., has made California his home since 1876. Born near Lafayette, Ind., January 7, 1858, he passed the years of childhood at the old home farm and in the neighboring schools. Upon the completion of the common branches of study he entered Asbury University at Greencastle, Ind., and took the regular course, graduating in the spring of 1876. Immediately afterward he came to California and settled first in Tulare county, but after clerking there for a short time he came to Bakersfield in the autumn of 1876 and ever since has been identified with the interests of Kern county.

After six months of employment in the Long Tom mine, Mr. Marion became a brakeman on the Southern Pacific Railroad between Sumner (later known as Kern) and Tulare, also from Tulare to Lathrop. Three years later he was promoted to be conductor on the same line and continued as such until 1888, when he resigned to engage in the hotel business in Kern, becoming manager of the old Central house on the present site of the Metropole. As manager he proved obliging, efficient and popular. During the fall of 1894 on the Republican ticket he was elected justice of the peace of the third township of Kern county and in January, 1895, he took the oath of office and assumed the duties of the position. Since then he has been successively re-elected in 1898, 1902, 1906 and 1910, the last time having no opposition whatever, a fact that bears testimony as to the tactful, wise and impartial nature of his decisions. Throughout the entire period of his service he has maintained his office in East Bakersfield and when this community relinquished its former name of Kern and became a part of Bakersfield he maintained a deep interest in the plan. In his official capacity he has proved himself capable of discharging the complicated duties as a justice. While he never studied for the law he has picked up a varied and important assortment of legal knowledge and, had he entered the profession, easily would have risen to prominence. It can be stated of him without contradiction that rarely if ever have his decisions been reversed in the higher courts. After coming to California he married in Stockton Mrs. Augusta (Garner) Welsh, who was born in Illinois, but at the age of three weeks was taken by her parents from the old home, the family then starting upon the journey across the continent to the western coast. Fraternally Mr. Marion holds membership with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. Active in Odd Fellows' work, he served for several terms as noble grand of Bakersfield Lodge No. 202 and also has been honored with office in the Bakersfield Encampment.

WILLIAM A. WILLIAMS.—It is not alone the cities that attract men of enterprise and business ingenuity, but in addition the country itself is not lacking in opportunities commercial as well as agricultural, and a realization of this truth has led the firm of Williams Bros. into mercantile enterprises in a region somewhat remote from the main civic centers of the San Joaquin valley. After having given careful consideration to the subject the brothers, William A. and Elmer E., opened the Greenfield grocery on the 1st of July, 1909, selecting as their headquarters a rural building on Union avenue about eight miles south of Bakersfield. The structure of 20x38 was erected in 1909, since which time it has been well filled with a stock representing an investment of about $2,000 and including both groceries and general merchandise. Besides the four horses which the proprietors find necessary to the management of their growing business, they use an auto truck and make four trips to Bakersfield each week in the interests of their increasing trade.

The senior member of the firm, William A. Williams, was born at Orwell, Vt., December 19, 1879, while the younger brother is a native son of this state and was born at Bakersfield September 1, 1888, their father, Samuel A.

Mr. & Mrs. B. C. Vaughn

Williams, having been a pioneer of the San Joaquin valley. Elsewhere in this volume appears mention of that early settler and honored citizen. Both sons were educated in Kern county and represent the enterprise, thrift and progressive spirit typical of the west. Both have given their allegiance to the Democratic party and uniformly support measures for the benefit of their county. Fraternally William A. is one of the leading local members of the Woodmen of the World. During December of 1904 he was united in marriage with Miss Mary Tonini, a native of San Luis Obispo, Cal., and a daughter of M. and Eliza Tonini. Their union has been blessed with two daughters, Margaret and Hazel.

BENJAMIN CLAIBOURN VAUGHN.—The fact that his father, David Vaughn, a Kentuckian by birth, was wounded while serving in the Thirty-third Indiana Volunteer Infantry during the Civil war and later died in Libby prison, obliged Benjamin C. Vaughn to aid in the cultivation of the home farm at an early age. Hence his education was meager and his opportunities limited. In his native county of Shelby, Ind., where he was born in 1860, he remained until thirty-one years of age, meanwhile gaining a thorough knowledge of general farming as conducted in that locality. In youth his services were of great value to his mother, who was a native of Ohio and had borne the maiden name of Lucy A. Peake. After he married he left the home farm and rented a tract in the same county, where for about fifteen ensuing years he endured the adversities and enjoyed the successes that characterize the life of a grain farmer. From there he removed to California in 1891 and two years later settled near Bakersfield, Kern county, where at first he bought only twenty acres in the Weed Patch and used the first water out of the Eastside canal after it was built. On this land he began raising alfalfa, and later traded the land for eighty acres at Jeweta. In addition to raising alfalfa he also followed general contracting, leveling land and building canals and reservoirs for about ten years. In 1906 he purchased his present place of four hundred and eighty acres, which was then raw land. In the meantime he has sunk wells and installed pumping plants which furnish six hundred and fifty miner's inches of water. He now has four hundred acres in alfalfa, yielding five crops a year, which is baled and shipped to the Los Angeles market. Mr. Vaughn was a pioneer in the installation of large pumping plants for irrigation, and for the first five years used electric power (ultimately using eighty-four horse power), but when increased rates made this prohibitive he installed two gas engines of forty-five and sixty horse power respectively. This arrangement gives him a pumping plant on each half of the ranch. The ranch is located five miles west of Bakersfield, while the shipping station is at Jastro, half a mile away. While a specialty is made of alfalfa, sufficient stock is also raised for the needs of the farm.

Very early in life Mr. Vaughn established domestic ties. His marriage in Indiana October 26, 1879, united him with Miss Martha Viola Nelson, a native of the Hoosier state and a daughter of Leander E. and Ann (Allen) Nelson, natives of Indiana, the former deceased, and the latter still living in that state. To the union of Mr. and Mrs. Vaughn seven children were born, as follows: Hattie, who married Charles Ballinger and is living in East Bakersfield; Earlene, Mrs. John H. Morgan, of Pasadena, who died in August, 1912; Ida and Ira, twins; Rachel, the wife of Oscar McKinney, of Covina, who is aiding in the management of the farm; Mary, also on the home farm; and Cecil, the youngest of the family and a prize-winner in the seventh-grade examinations. The greatest happiness of their lives Mr. and Mrs. Vaughn have found in their children and it has been a matter of grave concern to so educate and train them that they may be qualified for the duties of life. The family are identified with the Christian Church at Bakersfield and for years have been generous contributors to the upbuilding of that congregation.

Aside from the management of his farm and the enjoyment of his home, Mr. Vaughn has found leisure to aid in movements for the permanent prosperity of the county and has been an interested participant in public-spirited projects. At this writing he serves as game commissioner, an office that he has filled for some years in the past. Politically he has voted with the Republican party ever since he cast his first ballot upon attaining his majority. Fraternal relations with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, entered into many years ago, have been continued up to the present time. Meanwhile twice he has been chosen master of the local lodge, besides which he now belongs to the grand lodge of the state.

WALTER J. BURKE.—On a farm in the foothills of the Greenhorn mountain, where his parents, Daniel and Mary (Vickers) Burke, were improving a claim and pre-empting a homestead, W. J. Burke was born, March 7, 1865. His father, Daniel, was born in county Mayo in 1826 and passed his youth upon an Irish farm. With the hope of benefiting his condition by coming to the new world, in 1849 he crossed the ocean and settled in Sheffield, Mass., where he learned the trade of brickmaker. During 1853 he came to California via the Nicaragua route and at once went to the mines of Sierra county. With the exception of eighteen months in the mines of British Columbia, he spent his remaining years in California. On his return from the northern mines he took up land in Tulare county near Woodville and began to raise stock.

Immediately after his arrival in Kern county in 1864 Daniel Burke took up land on Greenhorn mountain, where he acquired three hundred and twenty acres and engaged in raising grain, vegetables and stock, selling all the products of the farm at the neighboring mines. By degrees he became fairly prosperous and at his death, which occurred August 8, 1900, he was counted among the large land-owners of his locality. In June of 1862 he had married Miss Mary Vickers, who was born in Adams county, Ill., and in 1860 crossed the plains with her parents in a wagon drawn by oxen, the family settling in Tulare county. Her death occurred in Kern county December 20, 1903. Six children had been born of her marriage, the eldest being Mrs. Margaret Fritz, of Ripon, San Joaquin county. The second, Walter J., forms the subject of this review. The others are as follows: Daniel, a farmer living near Bakersfield; Mrs. Celia Wilkerson, of Bakersfield; William, who is practicing law in Portland, Ore.; and Vincent, a resident of San Jose.

In order that he might enjoy educational advantages not possible in the vicinity of the mountain farm, Walter J. Burke was sent to Los Angeles and for two years was a student in St. Vincent's College, then located on Sixth and Hill streets. Upon his return to the farm he began to take a very active part in its supervision, besides pre-empting one hundred and sixty acres near the old homestead and later buying adjacent property from time to time as his means permitted. Meanwhile he had married at Porterville, February 15, 1892, Miss Sarah Gill, a native of county Mayo, Ireland, and a capable assistant in his enterprises. Mrs. Burke came to New York City in 1880 with a sister, Mrs. Conway, and in 1890 came with her to California. Her father, James Gill, a farmer in Mayo, died there. Her mother, Nora Varley, is still living on the old farm at an advanced age. Eventually Walter Burke held the title to one thousand acres on Greenhorn and this was utilized for stock range or grain-raising. For years he made a specialty of raising cattle and horses and in this line of work his judgment was so keen that he prospered to an unusual degree. During 1908 he built a residence at No. 402 A street, Bakersfield, and in 1910 he sold out the stock, disposed of some of the range and closed out his farming interests, although he still owns three hundred and twenty acres at the old place. In addition he owns one hundred acres eight miles south of Bakersfield under the Kern Island canal and this he leases to a tenant, the land being under cultivation to alfalfa and grain. Included in his city holdings are a frontage of one hundred and fifty feet on Nineteenth and A streets, improved with three cottages, and a frontage of equal size on Chester avenue and Twenty-third street, occupied by three business houses. Property at Princeton, San Mateo county, also is held by him, and his interests are further enlarged through his position as president of the Apartment House Building Company in Los Angeles, of which he is a large stockholder. He also built and owns the Panama apartment building on Second and Flower streets in that city. All of his seven children are at home, namely: Mary, Nora, Teresa, James, Catherine, Margaret and Walter. The family are leading members of St. Francis' Catholic Church and he has been prominently identified with the Knights of Columbus. In national elections he supports the Democratic party.

Walter J. Burke

JOSEPH LLEWELYN EVANS.—A narrative of the life of Mr. Evans takes us in its early records across the ocean to the rugged lands of Wales, where his ancestors had lived and labored for uncounted generations and where the family held a position of great influence in their community. For years his father, Benjamin Evans, engaged in mercantile undertakings and general farming in the shire of Carmarthen, and here the son Joseph L. was born January 4, 1865. He began to attend the public schools at an early age and afterward studied in Emlyn Academy, from which institution he was graduated in 1883 with a high standing in all of his studies. Immediately after leaving the academy he began to study civil engineering with Davies & Davies, a prominent engineering firm with headquarters at Aberystwyth, Cardigan, Wales, and for several years had charge of their branch office at Lampeter, a flourishing town situated on the border line of Cardigan and Carmarthen.

Meanwhile having read much concerning America and believing that it would be possible for him to secure greater success as a civil engineer in the new world than in the old, Mr. Evans resigned his position in Wales and during 1888 crossed the ocean to the United States. During the following nine years he made Racine, Wis., his headquarters. His first employment was with the government as civil engineering inspector of improvements on Lake Michigan. During 1890-91 he took a postgraduate course in the University of Wisconsin at Madison and upon his return to Racine entered upon the duties of city engineer, which office he held by appointment or election for six years. During 1897 he came to California upon a leave of absence and, traveling through the state, he became so greatly impressed with the possibilities of the west that he sent back his resignation as city engineer of Racine.

The discovery of gold in Alaska caused Mr. Evans to make a tour of that country. During the early part of 1898 he went to Kotzebue Sound, north of the Arctic Circle in the Arctic Ocean, having sailed through Bering Straits, this point being so remote that few explorers penetrated beyond it. Two winters were spent in the north prospecting and exploring the country. Upon his return to California in 1900 Mr. Evans came to Bakersfield and secured a position in the office of the city engineer and county surveyor. Four months later he was appointed city engineer, which office he filled by successive appointment from 1900 to 1906. He prepared plans for a sewer system which were accepted by the board of trustees, and bonds were voted for the purpose, but afterwards for some reason many changes were made in the original plans by another surveyor at the instigation of the board. Manfully Mr. Evans opposed these changes, claiming that they were not practical as far as efficiency and permanency were concerned, and so positive was he of his position in the matter that he considered it expedient for him to resign from the office when his advice was not considered. The necessity for the late sewer contract of 1913 has demonstrated that his opinion was correct. Since his retirement from office he has engaged in the private practice of surveying and civil engineering, being located in the Maud building on Chester avenue. Not only in Kern county but in other counties of the state he has at different times been retained as expert engineer in the courts. He laid out the town of Lost Hills, Pentland and Lerdo, laid out and superintended the construction of the new race track upon which the world's automobile record was broken, besides doing other work of a most responsible nature connected with the line of his special endeavors. In February, 1913, he was appointed a member of the Kern County Highway Commission to prepare plans and estimates for the improvement of a system of highways for Kern county. Upon their recommendation the tax payers of Kern county voted $2,500,000 in bonds for the purpose.

Throughout the period of his citizenship in the United States the Republican party has had the allegiance of Mr. Evans and the Congregational Church has received his staunch support in religious movements. Fraternally he is identified with Bakersfield Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E. and is also a very prominent Mason. Indeed any mention of his fraternal and social activities would be incomplete without considerable reference to his association with Masonry. While in Wisconsin he was made a Mason in Racine Lodge No. 18, F. & A. M., to which he belongs at the present time. Upon locating in Bakersfield he transferred his membership from Racine Chapter, R. A. M., to Kern Valley Chapter, R. A. M., also from Racine Commandery No. 7, K. T., to Bakersfield Commandery No. 39, K. T., of which he is a charter member and in which he has held every office. Chosen in 1908 as eminent commander, he was again elected to that office in 1912 and is the present incumbent, besides being actively associated with Al Malaikah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. in Los Angeles.

ROBERT M. HOLTBY.—The movement of migration to Canada was largely promoted by a sturdy class of Englishmen who aided in its agricultural development by their own patient perseverance and untiring labors. It was in this manner that the Holtby family came to be associated with Canadian farm advancement. Several generations of the name assisted in the upbuilding of their own community. Upon a large farm near Manchester, Canada, Robert M. Holtby was born March 7, 1847, and in the same locality he received a common-school education, also acquired a thorough knowledge of farming and stock-raising. From his earliest recollections he had heard much concerning the western states. The discovery of gold in California was still a popular theme of conversation during his boyhood. It was said too that this state offered greater inducements to farmers than to miners and thus he early determined to seek the Pacific coast. At the age of nineteen years he sailed from New York around the Horn to Oregon, where he engaged in teaching school for six months. On August 26, 1867, he left Oregon for California, where afterward he made his home until death. With money given him by his father he invested in sheep and started a ranch on the White river in Tulare county. In time he enlarged his range and increased his flock. His operations became very large in extent and represented an immense outlay of money. While in large degree he prospered, he met with many reverses, for the sheep industry always has been characterized by many "ups and downs." During one severe winter he lost six thousand head in the deep snow.

The management of so large a business necessitated the employment of many men and in his dealings with these employes Mr. Holtby always displayed the deepest consideration and most kindly forbearance, as far as possible overlooking their mistakes, but also showing an appreciation of any special work which they did in his behalf. With ranges widely scattered and flocks in different parts of the state, he left their management to trusted employes, but maintained a close personal supervision of all. For several years he made his home on a ranch on Poso creek twelve miles from Bakers-field. From 1886 until his removal to Bakersfield he lived on the Troy ranch, one of the most highly cultivated farms in the entire county. This he sold in 1891 and during the same year removed to Bakersfield, where he erected a large, comfortable residence. It was his intention to plant shade trees and improve the property, but ere his dreams had been realized he was called from earth, March 7, 1892, on the day that he was forty-five years of age. The era of struggle had been passed, the days of hardship and toil were to be replaced by a life of greater ease, he was about to enter upon a realization of the fruits of his privation, sacrifices and strenuous labor, when death cut short all hopes of an earthly future. Of Christian principles and manly virtues, he belonged to the type of citizenship of inestimable value to any community and his passing called forth many testimonials of regard from friends of long standing. After he became a citizen of the United States he adopted Republican principles, but never mingled actively in politics and at no time allowed the use of his name as a candidate for office.

The marriage of Mr. Holtby was solemnized in San Francisco May 6, 1880, and united him with Miss Celia Woodman, who was born at Paw Paw, Mich., and belongs to an old family of New England that became established on the Atlantic coast as early as 1635. The original home of the family was in England. It was the privilege of Mrs. Holtby as a young girl to receive excellent educational advantages and she is a woman of the highest refinement. Religion has mingled with the other elements that give gentleness and beauty to her character. An attendant upon the services of the Episcopal Church and a contributor to its maintenance, she has found happiness in her religious faith and usefulness in its charitable functions. Her only child, Mrs. Roberta Morgan, resides in Bakersfield. Since the death of her husband she has continued to occupy the home which he built for her.

OSCAR GLANVILLE, Ph.C.—The eldest of four children, Oscar Glanville was born at Dover, Kan., June 18, 1885, being a son of William J. and Mary (Sage) Glanville, natives respectively of Missouri and New York. The mother died in Kansas and the father, who still makes his home at Bond, that state, has for years engaged extensively in business as a merchant and miller. After having completed the studies of the Dover public schools Oscar Glanville was sent to the Topeka high school and there finished the prescribed curriculum. Next he matriculated in the Kansas State University at Lawrence, where he remained until he received the degree of Ph. C., upon graduating in 1904. Immediately after finishing his studies he secured employment in the pharmacy of a Topeka druggist and later was engaged similarly at Parsons. During May of 1905 he went to Arizona and found work in a pharmacy at Prescott. Coming to California in January of 1906, he first engaged as a pharmacist at Riverside, but during July of the same year he removed to San Diego. Twelve months later he became a pharmacist with the Owl Drug Company at Los Angeles and after six months went to San Francisco in the interests of the same concern. After two years with that organization in San Francisco he engaged to go to Honolulu for Benson, Smith & Co., and spent six months on the famous islands in the ocean, with his headquarters in the capital city, where he was both salesman and pharmacist. Upon returning to California he spent four months with William England of Marysville and then was an employe for seven months with the Neve Drug Company of Sacramento, after which he spent a year as a pharmacist with a large drug firm in Los Angeles. From that city he came to Mojave in February of 1912 and purchased the Peterson drug store, which since he has conducted under the title of O. Glanville. In addition to the usual stock of drugs, sundries, proprietary medicines and Rexall remedies, he carries a line of Eastman kodaks, also acts as agent for the Columbia and Edison phonographs and keeps in stock samples of the various styles and sizes, together with records for each. Upon the organization of the Knights of the Desert he became one of the charter members. In politics he is a Democrat.

REV. FATHER JOHN P. HOLDEN.—The first pastor of St. Francis Catholic Church in Bakersfield was Rev. Father P. Carasco, who was followed by Father P. Bannon, whose pastorate extended to June, 1894. Father Joseph O'Reilly ministered to the congregation until 1897, when the work was taken up by Father P. Lennon, whose earthly labors came to an end December 11, 1904. At his death he left a bequest of about $2,000 toward the erection of St. Francis Church. Father Lennon bought the lot at K and Eighteenth streets and built the first house of worship about twenty years ago. He afterward bought the site of the present church at I street and Truxton avenue. During his pastorate he had charge also of missions at Delano and Wasco, now separate churches, and of the congregation gathered at Kern, now East Bakersfield. He ministered also to the Indian mission at Fort Tejon, and services are still conducted there. For a few weeks after his death Father Quinlan had charge of the pastorate, he being followed by Father Frund, who was appointed pastor, and he it was who built the brick church and bought the St. Francis rectory. The Sisters of Mercy secured the St. Clair property near the Santa Fe depot for hospital purposes in 1910 and in 1911 abandoned it for the present site on Truxton avenue, to which they removed the St. Clair house, which was enlarged and remodeled. However, even this was inadequate, and in 1913 they erected an entirely new building facing Truxton avenue. This is a reinforced concrete and brick building, 108x48, three stories with basement. The present capacity is thirty-six rooms for patients, in addition to wards and two operating rooms. Modern heating and cooling systems with other up-to-date features make this one of the best equipped hospitals in the country.

During Father Frund's time he had several well remembered assistant priests—Father Lawrence Donleavy (now deceased), Father John Kelly, Father Schiaparelli and Father Leo Von Garsse. The assistants of Father Holden have been: Father Joseph Daumas, now of Fresno, then Father De Munick, now of Los Angeles, Father Marton, now of Oxnard, and the present assistant, Father Morris.

Rev. Father John P. Holden is the present pastor of St. Francis Catholic Church, having been appointed to the charge in November, 1910. He was born at Belleville, Ontario, Canada, May 31, 1865, a son of David Holden, manager of a lumber manufacturing firm, who lived his active years at Belleville, and passed away there, as did also his wife. Her maiden name was Mary Byrne, and she became the mother of six children, Father Holden being the third in order of birth. The latter was educated at a parochial school at Belleville and at St. Jerome's college, Berlin, Ontario, where he made a specialty of classics and theology and where he was graduated in 1895. He was ordained to the priesthood at Hamilton by Bishop Dowling, October 20, 1895, and became secretary to the Bishop and afterwards chancellor of the Hamilton diocese and superintendent of Catholic schools under Bishop Dowling. Later he was for five years pastor of St. Joseph's Church at Hamilton; but, because of throat difficulties, he resigned to come to California, and in 1910 came to Los Angeles. Before coming to Bakersfield he was acting rector of St. John's church in Fresno, during the temporary absence of Monsignor McCarthy in Europe. The parochial school of St. Francis's church was established in 1910 and now employs four teachers. Among the organizations of the church are the St. Francis Congregation Altar Society, the St. Vincent de Paul Society, the Ladies' Aid Society and the League of the Sacred Heart, the Sodality of the Children of Mary, the Young Ladies' Sodality, the Sanctuary Boys' Society, the St. Cecelia Choir and the Society of the Knights of Columbus, which is included in the Bakersfield branch of that order.

J. P. Halden

St. Francis church is a large structure of Gothic architecture, with Gothic spires, cathedral glass windows and beautifully decorated. During 1913 three new altars of Gothic type were installed, the center one being of marble. Plans are now under way to build a new rectory on the church grounds, when the present rectory will be remodeled and used for a sisters' convent and academy; and a new parochial school will be built adjoining.

WILLIAM HUNTER LAIRD, M. D.—One of the early settlers of the San Joaquin valley, who through many years of identification with the professional life of this community served faithfully and well, winning the confidence of all who knew him, was Dr. William Hunter Laird. Born in Browns county, Ohio, in 1816, he was there carefully reared and thoroughly educated. He entered upon the study of medicine and as a graduate physician came to California in 1859 and practiced for a time at Monterey and vicinity. In 1861 he came to Visalia, where he practiced medicine, riding horseback with his saddle-bags. Subsequently he was located at San Bernardino for a time, but later went to Bakersfield where he practiced medicine and became the owner of one hundred and sixty acres of land, which afterwards proved to be in the Kern river oil fields. Along with his many experiences in the early settlement of this part of the country he experienced the trials of war in the Mexican war, seeing active service. Dr. Laird passed away in August, 1909, aged ninety-three years, and his death marked the end of a substantial and exemplary career, in which he had met every obstruction bravely and had ministered to the sick in body and mind alike, proving a friend in need and a sociable, congenial and trustworthy fellow citizen.

Dr. Laird was married in Bakersfield to Mrs. Margaret (Cox) Pierce, who was born in Georgia and came to Kern county in the early days to join her brother, J. K. Cox, a farmer near Bakersfield, where she married. Of this union there were two children, Margaret and William, both residents of East Bakersfield living with their mother, who sold her ranch in the oil fields and is living retired. Mrs. Laird is a member of the Christian Church and she and her children are well known and highly respected throughout the community.

W. J. HOLLAND.—The secretary and treasurer of the Rotary Disc Bit Company, Incorporated, was born at Wigan, England, August 12, 1859, and upon the completion of a common-school education he served an apprenticeship with a firm of mechanical engineers in his native town. At the expiration of a term of five years he severed his connection with J. S. Walker & Bro., in 1881, and immediately shipped for the United States, settling in San Antonio, Tex., where he engaged in the tea and coffee business and built up considerable patronage both in wholesale and retail lines. Holland's tea store is now an institution of the southern city and is being conducted efficiently by his father, but after six years in the work he left San Antonio for Missouri and at Sweet Springs, that state, married Miss Eleanor Hawkins, daughter of a well-known physician of San Antonio. One year was spent in Missouri and one winter in New Mexico, after which he removed to Alabama, settled at Birmingham and remained in that city for eleven years, meanwhile engaging with the Hawkins Lumber Company as manager.

Coming to California in 1899 Mr. Holland settled at Fair Oaks, where he still owns a ranch. In order that his three children, Walter H., Eleanor and Ruth, might have educational advantages, he removed to Berkeley and they completed the high-school course in that city, since which time they have been students in the University. During April of 1910, Mr. Holland came down to Fellows to take charge of the townsite work as an employe of Jamieson, Wrampelmeier and Strassburger, and in that capacity he helped to plat and lease the lots. Since then he has remained in the town, where he represents the Connecticut Fire Insurance Company of Hartford, and is also acting as an official in the Rotary Disc Bit Company. In July of 1911 he was appointed justice of the peace at Fellows, and has since held that office in the seventeenth township of Kern county. In religious belief he has been a Presbyterian and his family are active in that church.

SAMUEL CALVIN LONG, M.D.—The call for volunteers in the Union army during the Civil war received a quick response from Hugh Long, a native of Mercer county, Pa., who went to the front with a regiment from his commonwealth and gave faithful service until the expiration of his term of enlistment. With the close of the war he exchanged the uniform of a soldier for the homely garb of a tiller of the soil and thenceforward for some years gave his attention to the management of his farm in Mercer county, where he also operated a coal mine on his land. Accompanied by wife and children in 1879 he removed from Pennsylvania to Iowa and settled in the southwestern part of the state. After ten years in Ringgold county he crossed the line into Taylor county and bought land near Lenox, where he engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death in 1891. His wife, who survived him for some years and died in Iowa during December of 1899, bore the maiden name of Florinda Campbell and was born in Mercer county, Pa., of Scotch-Irish lineage; her mother lived to be ninety-six years of age. The family of Hugh and Florinda Long comprised ten children, namely: Alonzo, who died in infancy; James Campbell, of Lompoc; Mark, a farmer near Hanford, Cal.; Dr. George L., a physician in Fresno; R. A., who died in Fresno; Anna, residing near the old home at Lenox, Iowa; Mrs. Margaret Wyant, of Clearfield, Iowa; Wilbert M., of Clearfield, Iowa; Mrs. Susie Gordon, of Lenox, that state; and Samuel Calvin, the youngest of the family circle and the only one to settle in Kern county. Born near Pardoe, Mercer county, Pa., August 16, 1871, he grew to manhood upon an Iowa farm and received his education principally in country schools. He can scarcely recall when he first determined upon a professional career. At first his studies were directed toward the occupation of pharmacist and during July of 1897 he was graduated with the degree of Ph.G. from the department of pharmacy, Highland Park College, at Des Moines.

Almost coincident with his arrival in California in August, a month after his graduation, the young pharmacist secured a position in a hospital at Fresno, and for two years had the most valuable experience as interne and pharmacist. During this time he determined to continue his studies with a view to becoming a physician. For some years he was a student in the Hahnemann Medical College of the Pacific, at San Francisco, from which he was graduated May 13, 1901. Returning to Fresno, he entered the office of his brother, Dr. George L. Long, but in a short time he determined to seek a new location. October 5, 1901, he arrived in Bakersfield, a stranger in a strange city. For some years past he has maintained his office in a suite of rooms in the Woodmen of the World building. As a member of the American Institute of Homeopathy and the California Homeopathic Medical Institute, he has maintained an intimate identification with organizations for the upbuilding of his chosen branch of therapeutics, and is medical examiner for several old line insurance companies. His fraternal relations have been and still are very important and it has been a source of pride to him that he has been chosen medical examiner by the various orders with which he has local association, including the Woodmen of the World, Fraternal Brotherhood, Knights and Ladies of Security, Degree of Honor, Women of Woodcraft, American Yeomen, American Nobles and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He was made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., is a member of Los Angeles Consistory No. 3, Scottish Rite, and Al Malaikah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., Los Angeles.

The home of Dr. Long at No. 1715 Seventeenth street is presided over hospitably by his wife, who is a woman of culture and was educated in Simpson College at Indianola, Iowa. Their marriage was solemnized in Lenox, Iowa, in October of 1902, Mrs. Long having been Miss Nona E. Adams, a native of Belle Plain, Marshall county, Ill., and a daughter of Thomas and Mary (Barton) Adams, the former born in Pittsburg, Pa., and the latter in Cincinnati, Ohio, of English lineage. After he had removed from Pennsylvania to Illinois Mr. Adams served as a private in the One Hundred and Seventh Illinois Infantry during the Civil war. Later he continued to cultivate farm land in Illinois until 1882, when he removed to Iowa and settled upon a farm. His last days were spent in Lenox and there he passed away in 1908. A man of local prominence and civic pride he served for one term as supervisor and gave his support to movements for the material upbuilding of his county. His widow now makes her home with Dr. and Mrs. Long at Bakersfield. She had four other children: W. B., who is a farmer at Dixon, Ill.; E. M. and N. D., both of Des Moines; and Chester, now living in Kansas City. Mrs. Long was next to the eldest in the family and was the only one to settle in California. Prior to her marriage she taught several terms of school. Mr. and Mrs. Long are members of the Congregational church, to the work of which both have been generous contributors. They are the parents of two children, Mary Oneita and Hugh Thomas. In politics the Doctor is staunchly Republican.

Samuel C. Long M.D.

W. P. MONROE.—The Monroe family has the distinction of belonging to the fine old pioneer element of California. In every instance its members have exhibited the utmost loyalty toward the great west and wherever known their name is a synonym for patriotic devotion and progressive spirit. The founder of the family on the coast was Wesley Monroe, a native of Illinois and a member of that great throng of immigrants whom the discovery of gold brought to the then unknown country beside the sunset sea. As early as 1850 he settled in what is now Tulare county. Later he lived in Sonoma county and followed the occupation of ranching, his large herds being permitted to range over miles of uninhabited territory in every direction from his ranch-house. He married Elizabeth Condry, who was born in Tennessee and died in 1906 in Tulare county. Their family numbered seven children, one of whom, J. D., is a wealthy stock-raiser in Tulare county. Another member of the family, W. P., was born in Sonoma county, this state, March 26, 1864, and during boyhood aided in the care of the stock in Tulare and Kings counties. From Tulare he came to Kern county in 1899 and in 1901 began to work for the Petroleum Development Company, being promoted to the position of manager in 1906 after five years of energetic efforts in less responsible capacities. He has charge of the wells of the Petroleum Development Company located on section 2, township 29, range 28.

While promoting the interests of the company Mr. Monroe has acquired lands of his own and is now the owner of eighty acres of land, situated on section 34, township 28, range 28. A part of the tract has been placed under irrigation and the balance is available for similar work, the proximity of the Kern river proving of the greatest importance to water development. With the completion of irrigating facilities, oranges could be raised on the land, while any kind of garden truck would do well on such soil. The marriage of Mr. Monroe took place in Kings county and united him with Miss Susie Becker, who was born and reared there, and by whom he is the father of three children, Harry, Ruby and Evelyn. The fact that he did not enjoy good educational advantages has made Mr. Monroe solicitous that his own children and the children of other people in the community should receive every modern school privilege, hence he urged the organization of a school district and when such organization was effected in 1910 in the Petroleum school district he was chosen a member of the school board. In this capacity he has labored earnestly to secure good teachers and to surround the children with every advantage that will go toward the making of substantial citizens for future years. The board of directors of the Petroleum school district, consisting of H. J. Heath, Charles N. Newberry and W. P. Monroe have under construction a new $10,000 school house, which will be completed for the September 1913 term and will be the finest school house in the Kern River field. While living in Tulare county he became a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Tulare and maintained a warm interest in lodge enterprises. In addition to his eighty acres of good land he has acquired city property at Richmond on the coast.

FRANK S. MATTSON.—From the age of thirteen years up to the present time, when as an experienced and skilled oil operator of fifty years he holds a position of responsibility in the Midway field, Mr. Mattson has known no business save that of oil production. Familiar with its every department and experienced with the work in many of the most important fields of the entire country, he has had a long and honorable career in his chosen occupation and now, even more interested in the work than when a young man and even more skilled in its details, he is giving acceptable service as superintendent of the Safe Oil Company and the B. H. C. Oil Company. The leases of these small but productive concerns stand on the celebrated 25 Hill, occupying a portion of section 25, township 32, range 23, overlooking Taft and the Midway field, and here he is always to be found, overseeing every phase of production and aiming by intelligent oversight to secure the largest possible returns for the stockholders of the companies.

Born in Venango county, Pa., April 14, 1863, Frank S. Mattson is the son of Tobias Mattson, a pioneer in the oil industry in Pennsylvania, where he first became familiar with the business. Practically every position from roustabout to superintendent he has filled in different parts of the country. Following in the wake of oil strikes, he worked in the fields of Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio and Indiana, prior to coming to California during 1900. A list of the fields in which he has worked would include many of the best known in the east. After coming to the Pacific coast he made his headquarters in Los Angeles for a time and then went to Carpinteria, from which place he came to Kern county and the Midway field. In his various removals from one field to another he has been accompanied by his wife whom he married in Ohio and who bore the maiden name of Anna E. Behrens.

C. H. SELLERS.—The Union Oil Company, operating on section 8, township 29, range 28, was incorporated under the laws of the state of California by a number of stockholders, principally residents of Los Angeles, where also reside its officers, namely: president, Lyman Stewart; vice-president, W. L. Stewart; secretary, Giles Kellogg; and treasurer, E. W. Alston. The superintendent of their refinery, which is said to be not only the first but also the largest in the Kern river fields, has been connected with the plant throughout the greater part of its operative history, for the factory was completed in July of 1902, and he took charge on the 15th of September of the same year. Since then the capacity of the plant has been doubled and employment is furnished to thirty-five men. A total capital of $200,000 has been invested in the refinery and the returns secured under the efficient management of the superintendent have justified the expenditure of this sum.

Very early in the development of the Mississippi valley the Sellers family removed from the east to Iowa, where for years George Sellers followed the trade of a carpenter and where he married Rachel Wells, now deceased. Of recent years, since his retirement from active work as a carpenter, he has made his home in San Jose, Cal. In his family there were five sons and three daughters, one of the sons being C. H., whose birth occurred in Clinton county, Iowa, March 24, 1876, and whose somewhat limited education was secured in Iowa schools. As a boy he helped his father and learned much concerning the trade of carpenter, but when fifteen he started out to make his own way in the world, coming to California, where he learned to be a practical butter-maker in a creamery at San Jose. His introduction to the oil business took place when he became interested in a refinery operated by S. W. Palmer, of Oakland. Having no practical knowledge of the industry he began as an unskilled laborer and as a roustabout, but gradually he worked his way up to a more profitable position. During 1902 the company showed their confidence in him by sending him to the Kern river fields as their superintendent and since the fall of that year he has had charge of the refinery, its progress and development being largely due to his energy and intelligent oversight. A specialty is made of the production of asphaltum for street paving and roofing purposes and in the latter specialty the company has been a pioneer. Through the pipe lines of the Producers' Transportation Company connection is made with the lines of various oil companies. About five thousand barrels of crude oil are used daily and the monthly production of asphalt reaches two thousand tons.

T. Arthur Cannell

With his wife, whom he married at Martinez, Cal., and who was Miss Ella Kindig of Chicago, and with their two children, Spencer and Inez, Mr. Sellers has established a comfortable home on the company holdings and there his leisure hours are happily spent. He aided in the organization of the Standard school district and acted as trustee.

THOMAS ARTHUR CANNELL.—On the Isle of Man, Thomas A. Cannell was born June 9, 1854, the son of Robert and Catherine (Kelley) Cannell. There they spent their entire lives, the former conducting business as a hatter in Douglas. There were eight children in the family and two of these, John J. and Thomas Arthur, became residents of California, the former now having a home at Bishop, Inyo county. For several years the two brothers in California engaged in the sheep industry and had large flocks upon the ranges of Tulare, Kern and Inyo counties. The venture proved profitable, but a desire to avoid the migratory experiences of a sheepman led the younger brother to take up land, buy cattle and embark in farming and stock-raising in Kern county.

During a visit at his old home across the seas Mr. Cannell married, October 19, 1891, Miss Margaret Ann Joughin, daughter of John and Margaret (Kaighin) Joughin, lifelong residents of the Isle of Man and owners of Ballacrebbin, one of the most productive farms of that little country. Mrs. Cannell was born in the parish of Jurby on that island and grew to womanhood in the parish of Andreas near the town of Ramsey, where she remained until her marriage and where one of her brothers, the present owner of Ballacrebbin farm, still makes his home. Her other brother, William D. Joughin, came to California and now operates the Cannell ranch near Isabella, Kern county, on the south fork of the Kern river.

Immediately after their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Cannell came across the ocean to California and settled in Kern county, where by their united efforts and constant industry they became increasingly prosperous. The brand of the triangle inverted, which Mr. Cannell used, was to be found on many of the ranges in this part of the state, for his holdings in stock were exceedingly large. One of his ranches comprised several sections of land at Granite Station, Kern county, while his home ranch was the tract of eight hundred acres near Isabella, a well-improved estate developed from the primeval condition of nature through his own painstaking industry and wise supervision. Selling his stock in 1906 and renting the land, he built a residence at No. 445 South Union avenue, Los Angeles, where his widow still makes her home. After coming to the city he did not retire from business activities, but became an organizer and promoter of the Apartment House Building Company, of which he acted as secretary, treasurer and a director until his death, and which in 1911 erected a splendid modern apartment building on Second and Flower streets and it should be added that it proved to be such a success that in 1913 the company built an annex of large dimensions. While on a visit to his ranch at Isabella Mr. Cannell died, October 17, 1912, and his sudden demise brought a personal grief to a large host of friends throughout his community. All through his life in California he had been a loyal citizen, with progressive views as to local development and upbuilding. Although not a member of any religious movement he attended church and contributed to such work and his wife for years has been a generous member of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Los Angeles.

ALBERT LEROY HARRINGTON.—Connected with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company as night yard-master at Bakersfield, Mr. Harrington is regarded by the officials under whom he works as a most conscientious and careful man, devoted to the business and alive to the responsibilities of his position. From an early age he has been connected with some form of railroad work. Indeed he was only sixteen when he left high school to enter upon railroading, and ever since, with scarcely a vacation, he has continued with different companies in different capacities. In addition one of his brothers and his father also have been identified with railroad work for many years and are now in the employ of the Western Pacific, with headquarters at Stockton, the brother, Arthur, having risen to be a conductor with that road. Two other brothers, Arnold and Lorin L., are employed by the Pacific States Telephone and Telegraph Company at Stockton, the former holding the important position of outside manager. The youngest brother of the five, William, is still with the parents in the Stockton home.

The parents of Albert LeRoy Harrington are Lorin and Nettie E. (Hargis) Harrington, natives respectively of Illinois and Iowa. Their eldest son among the five who form the family is Albert LeRoy, whose birth occurred at Fontanelle, Adair county, Iowa, November 2, 1882, and whose earliest days were passed upon the home farm there. During 1883 the family became pioneers of Nebraska, where the father took up land in Fillmore county. Results were not favorable and learning of land in Lincoln county available for homesteading he removed there in 1886 and settled near the Platte river. Very soon, however, he went a little further west to Keith county in the same state, where he made a determined effort to develop his homestead into a productive farm. Climatic conditions were such that his unceasing exertions brought little but failure, and finally in 1896 he sought employment on the railroad. For three years he was employed on the maintenance of way in Nebraska by the Union Pacific Railroad and in 1899 he took his family to Wyoming, where he worked for the same company. In 1901 he worked on the Union Pacific in Utah and during 1903 he went to Nevada for the Central Pacific. Coming to California in 1904 and settling at Stockton, he since has been in the employ of the Western Pacific road.

As early as 1898 Albert LeRoy Harrington worked on the maintenance of way for the Union Pacific in Nebraska and in 1899 he secured similar work in Wyoming. During 1901 he entered the train service of the Union Pacific road as a brakeman with headquarters at Rawlins. Resigning two years later he came to California and entered the employ of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company as a brakeman out from Los Angeles. Soon he was transferred to the yards as a switchman. In June of 1904 he was sent to Oakland as a foreman on the maintenance of way. From there in July of 1905 he came to Bakersfield as a switchman in the Southern Pacific yards. Appreciation of his fidelity and intelligence appeared in his promotion to be assistant yard-master in 1908, and two years later he was promoted again, this time to the responsible post of night yardmaster. Meanwhile in 1908 he had married at Santa Ana Miss Mabelle Buell, who was born in Kansas and reared in California, and who is a graduate nurse from the Sisters' hospital in Los Angeles. They own a comfortable home at No. 607 Quincy street, East Bakersfield, which he erected some years ago and in which they dispense a broad and kindly hospitality. Both are well known in the local organization of Pythian Sisters, and in addition Mr. Harrington is connected with the Knights of Pythias, the Eagles and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. Politically he votes with the Democratic party.

Geo H. Lounsbury

JUDGE GEORGE FLOURNOY.—The Flournoy genealogy is traced back to the middle ages in France, where representatives of the name bore a part in the activities of the Huguenots. Religious persecutions led to the massacre of many of that faith and to the exile of others from their native country. They became transplanted upon American soil shortly after the first attempts at colonization had been made near the shores of the Atlantic. The first home of the immigrants was in Virginia and later some of the family settled in Georgia. Col. George Flournoy, son of Marcus A. Flournoy, was born and reared upon a plantation in Georgia and received excellent advantages in the state university at Athens, from which institution in 1854 he was graduated with a high standing. He was well qualified for the practice of law and went to Texas to open an office at Austin. Soon he rose to such prominence in the profession that in 1860 he was elected attorney-general of the state. At the opening of the Civil war he resigned from office in order to serve the Confederate cause as colonel of the Sixteenth Texas Infantry and that regiment he commanded until the close of the war. Meanwhile he was often wounded in battle and several times the wounds were serious, but in the midst of physical sufferings and untold deprivations he continued to lead his men until finally they crossed the Red river, the last Confederate regiment to retreat from the victorious Federal troops.

The south having been financially ruined by the war, Colonel Flournoy found no professional opening and accordingly crossed into Mexico, where as captain of the guards of the palace he served in the French army under Marshal Besaine. Upon the downfall of Maximilian he retired with the French army. Returning to Texas, he engaged in practice at Galveston and became widely known as an attorney of remarkable ability and professional knowledge. During 1879 he came to California and opened a law office in San Francisco, remaining there until his death, September 20, 1889, at the age of fifty-seven years. While his life was not long as men count years, it was eventful, useful and crowned by the friendship of a large circle of associates, both professional and social. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Virginia Holman, was born in Tennessee and died in Oakland, Cal. Her father, James Holman, a Kentuckian by birth, became a resident of Tennessee as early as 1804 and upon attaining man's estate became interested in the occupation of a planter. During 1852 he took the family to Texas and settled upon a farm near Austin, where in 1867 his long and busy existence came to an end. Three children comprised the family of Colonel and Mrs. Flournoy. Eugenia, the wife of Paul Corti, died in Bakersfield January 27, 1912. Marguerite, the wife of Thomas F. Garrity, died in Oakland in 1905, leaving two daughters, Eugenia and Virginia, both making their home with Judge Flournoy. The next to the youngest child, and his father's namesake, is Judge Flournoy, of Bakersfield, who was born in Austin, Tex., April 20, 1863, and received a classical education in the Jesuit College in the District of Columbia and in the University of Georgia at Athens. After his graduation in 1879 from the latter institution he came to California and began to study law with his father in San Francisco, later for two years enjoying the advantages of study in Hastings Law School.

Having been admitted to the bar of California in 1884 at the age of twenty-one years George Flournoy came to Bakersfield, but soon returned to San Francisco, where in 1886 he was elected city and county attorney on the Democratic ticket. So satisfactory was his service in the very difficult position that in 1888 he was re-elected, serving until 1890. After his release from official duties he devoted considerable time to travel. During March of 1892 he came to Bakersfield and opened a law office. Soon he won recognition through his wide knowledge of jurisprudence. For eight years he served as city attorney of Bakersfield and for another three terms he served as deputy district attorney of Kern county. In both of these positions he displayed a broad understanding of the law, especially as pertaining to the statutes of California. March 6, 1911, the board of supervisors appointed him justice of the peace to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Judge J. C. Black, a position he has since filled. Throughout all of his active life he has supported Democratic principles and has given to that party locally the benefit of his sagacious mind, unvarying tact and comprehensive grasp of political problems. During the period of his residence in San Francisco he was united in marriage with Miss Elizabeth Huie, a native of Sonoma county, this state, by which union there was one child, Huie, who died in Los Angeles November 6, 1912, leaving a wife and a daughter, Roberta, four years of age.

R. W. BESS.—Diversified experiences in many of the well-known oil fields in the United States have enabled Mr. Bess to appreciate the advantage offered by the industry in California and particularly by that portion of the state embraced within the Kern county fields. Through a recent contract he became superintendent and manager of the United Crude Oil Company at Maricopa and since he took possession in March of 1913, under an eight-year lease on a fifty per cent basis, he has raised the production from practically nothing to three thousand barrels per month, doing this by dint of his own persistence, energy and capability, aided by the three efficient workmen whom he employs. Thoroughly and critically competent, he is well qualified to develop the lease into a gratifying and growing success. From the time he began in the oil business at the age of fourteen up to the present era of managerial connection with a lease, he has been interested in no occupation aside from the oil industry nor has he cared to enter other lines of enterprise.

The lifelong interest in the industry maintained by Mr. Bess results from early environment. When only one year old he was taken by his parents from New York state to Bradford, Pa., in the midst of oil fields of considerable importance, and there he passed the years of youth. Born May 19, 1882, at Bolivar, Allegheny county, N. Y., across the state line from the Bradford fields in Pennsylvania, he was the eldest of six children, whose father, W. W. Bess, for years engaged with the Roberts Torpedo Company and held other positions in the Bradford fields, but is now an employe of the United Crude Oil Company at Maricopa. The wife and mother, who bore the maiden name of Esther Aldumas McClellan, is an own niece of General McClellan, of Civil war fame.

When the family removed from Bradford they lived successively in other oil regions of Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia and Indiana, and the son accompanied them in these various moves, eventually coming to California in 1896 and securing employment in the Fullerton oil fields. His first work there was in the capacity of pumper for the old Santa Fe. After one year at Fullerton he proceeded to Coalinga during the period of its first boom. For two years he engaged with a company in that district. At the opening of the Kern river field he came to this county and secured a position as tool-dresser, continuing in the field for two years. From this point he returned to Fullerton to work, later went back to Coalinga, and finally left the state in order to study conditions of the oil industry in Colorado. The fields near Boulder, Golden, Greeley and other places became familiar to him through actual experiences as a driller. From Colorado he went into Kansas and engaged in drilling in the oil fields at Independence and Chanute, thence coming back to California, where for four years he engaged in drilling in the Sunset, Midway and Santa Maria fields. Early in 1913 he assumed the duties of his present position. During May of 1906 he was united in marriage with Miss Rose La Vern Freear, daughter of Henry T. Freear, an old settler of Kern county, a Civil war veteran and a man widely known and universally honored. Mrs. Bess is also connected with the McCutchen family, one of the most prominent in Kern county. Three children blessed her marriage to Mr. Bess, but a heavy bereavement came in the death of two, Leona being the sole survivor.

DELBERT A. SHIVELY.—The history of the Shively family in America dates back to a very early period in the colonization of Pennsylvania and one of the name, who removed from the Keystone state to Illinois during the first years of the nineteenth century, opened and conducted the first tailor shop ever started in Chicago, later relinquishing business in order to develop property at Freeport, Ill., and still later removing to Iowa to pass his declining days. The next generation was represented by Samuel A. Shively, who was born near Freeport, Ill., and removed with his father to Chickasaw county, Iowa, when all that section of country was an undeveloped wilderness and prairie. Scarcely had he arrived at man's estate when a call came for volunteers in the Union service and he volunteered in the Thirty-second Iowa Infantry, going with his regiment to the front and fighting in its battles until the expiration of his term of service. The war ended, he engaged in farming near Lawler, Chickasaw county, Iowa, and on his farm there his oldest child, Delbert A., was born June 26, 1866. The family contained two younger children, whose mother, Cornelia (Tisdale) Shively, now deceased, was a member of a very old family of New England.

Taking the family to Minnesota about 1872, Samuel A. Shively homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres in Rock county and devoted ten years to the improvement of the tract. Upon disposing of the property he returned to Iowa and settled in Lyon county, but later removed to Missouri and established a home at Springfield. Thence he went to Chicago and took up the study of medicine. After having graduated with the degree of M.D., he engaged in practice in Chicago until the time of his death. His eldest son was six when the family went to Minnesota and thirteen when they became residents of Lyon county, Iowa. After he had completed the studies of the common schools he learned the trade of barber in Rock Rapids, Lyon county, and there engaged in the business for himself. The summer of 1895 was spent in Pasadena, Cal., and the visit gave him a favorable impression concerning the west. Selling his business at Rock Rapids in 1901 he came to Bakersfield and purchased the Southern hotel barber shop, which since he has conducted with efficiency, securing a large trade by reason of recognized skill in the trade. Meanwhile he has become interested in alfalfa ranching in the Rio Bravo country, where he has installed a pumping plant for irrigation of the one hundred and ten acre tract. He has erected two bungalows, one of which he sold, and the other (at No. 2021 Cedar street) he now occupies. Fraternally he holds membership with the Knights of Pythias.

The marriage of Mr. Shively took place at Rock Rapids, Iowa, August 28, 1887, and united him with Miss Fannie Geiser, who was born at Normal, McLean county, Ill. Their only child, Vera, is the wife of R. C. Hackett of Bakersfield. A graduate of the Rock Rapids high school, she was a teacher prior to her marriage. She was the youngest among the three children forming the family of Frederick and Fannie (Eicher) Geiser, the former a native of Canton Bern, Switzerland, and the latter of France. Shortly after his arrival in the new world Mr. Geiser enlisted in an Ohio regiment and served in the Union army throughout the Civil war. After the death of his wife, which occurred in Normal, Ill., he removed to Iowa and embarked in business, and later he resided at Colby, Kans., where occurred his death, April 14, 1899, at the age of sixty-eight years.

J. ROBINSON.—The Revenue Oil Company (J. Robinson, superintendent) was incorporated March 17, 1900, with a capital stock of $200,000, and now has its head office at Nos. 404-406 Chamber of Commerce building, Pasadena, Cal., its president, R. H. Pinney, and secretary, A. K. Nash, both being citizens of that place. The board of directors consists of the two officials named, in addition to C. B. Scoville, Isaac Bailey and J. C. Dalton. Five men working under the direction of the superintendent care for the company holdings of forty acres on section 4, township 29, range 28, where since the first work was started seventeen wells have been put down, six of these, however, now out of commission, although by re-drilling the present superintendent has been able to secure twelve producing wells, six of which are operated by a power jack. The net yield is six thousand barrels per month, an amount largely in excess of former returns and therefore gratifying to those financially interested in the concern.

All through his life Mr. Robinson has been identified with the oil industry. Born in Fayette county, Pa., April 21, 1867, he was fifteen years of age when he began to work in the Bradford field in Ohio and for twelve years he was employed there by the Hazelwood Oil Company. Studying the industry with assiduous attention, he became familiar with every department and is now able to manage any responsibility, important or trivial. From the Bradford field he went to the Clinton Rock fields near Toledo, Lima and Findley, and acquired the sole ownership of eight wells, besides a one-fourth interest in twenty-four others. When eventually he disposed of all these interests it gave him financial independence, but the spell of the oil fields was upon him and after "wild-catting" in Ohio and finding twelve dry holes, there was little left of his former fortune. Later he prospected in West Virginia, drilled wells in Guernsey county, Ohio, and Barboursville, Cabell county, W. Va., and then took charge of a property owned by J. W. Stone in Wood county, Ohio, whence he changed his headquarters to Illinois, working first at Robinson, Crawford county, and then spending one summer at Casey, Clark county. Next he investigated conditions in Oklahoma and from there went to Utah to meet Colonel Dunn with a view to drilling for him, but the two failed to complete their negotiations.

Upon coming west to California and landing in the Whittier field near Los Angeles, Mr. Robinson engaged with the Central Oil Company and later with the Murphy Oil Company as production man. After perhaps three years in that field he came to the Kern river oil fields in 1910 and since has been retained as superintendent with the well-known concern whose interests he guards with extreme care. His sons, John and James, bright youths of nineteen and sixteen, are a source of pride to him and he is sparing no pains to prepare them for whatever responsibilities the future may hold for them. With his wife, formerly Miss Alice Elthringham of Ohio, he has established a comfortable home on the company's holdings and such limited leisure as his very responsible position permits is spent in the society of his family and friends, there being no inclination on his part to participate in politics or identify himself with fraternal organizations.

E. H. WHITAKER.—The supply house of Fairbanks, Morse & Co., at Shale, over which Mr. Whitaker has been manager since its establishment, is one of the recent additions to the important list of business houses in Kern county having for their object the filling of the needs of the oil operators in this section of the country. Since the opening of the house there has been kept in stock a full complement of oil well supplies of the guaranteed quality for which the name of the firm stands sponsor. Throughout the oil fields near Shale the manager of the house has an established reputation for energy, reliability and sagacious judgment, and he is not only capable but also popular.

A native of this state, Mr. Whitaker was born in the city of Los Angeles September 24, 1877, and at the age of thirteen first came to the Kern river oil fields, since which time he has been more or less closely identified with the business now engaging his attention. For a time he was employed in the shipping department of Fairbanks, Morse & Co., in Los Angeles, but in

Ap Grand

Mrs. A. P. Eyraud

July of 1909 the company transferred him to Bakersfield and during the following month sent him from that city to Taft, eventually transferring him in August, 1911, to his present post at Shale, where he was the first and has been the only manager of the supply house. The erection of the store building was carried forward under his personal supervision, the stocking of the room with such equipment as must be carried by such a house also was given over to his charge and the success of the business may be attributed wholly to his oversight. With his wife, whom he married in Bakersfield and who was formerly Miss Josephine Dempsey, he makes his home at Shale. Fraternally he is connected with the blue lodge of Masons at Bakersfield and the Improved Order of Red Men at Taft.

AUGUST PIERRE EYRAUD.—As far back as the genealogical records of the Eyraud family can be traced they were residents of that portion of France embraced within the limits of Hautes-Alpes lying in the shadow of the snow-capped Alps and a short distance to the east of the vine-clad valley of the Rhone. In the midst of this fertile section lies the thriving city of Gap, where Joseph Eyraud was born in 1803 and where, after years of active identification with mercantile affairs, he died in 1884, having long survived his wife, Victoria (Sauva) Eyraud, who passed away in 1853. While the family name is still represented in Hautes-Alpes the immediate members of this family circle no longer have identification with the region, for the sole survivor and the youngest of the four children, August Pierre, who was born there May 15, 1852, has made his home in the United States since 1872. For a short time after his arrival in San Francisco he was employed as clerk in a hotel and later he worked in a tannery on twenty-sixth and Mission streets, after which, in 1877, he opened the Hotel des Alps on Pacific street, San Francisco. Since 1880 he has made his home in Bakersfield and while during this period he has endured vicissitudes and faced business reverses resulting from fires, by persisting in a course of straightforward dealing with all he has gained a gratifying degree of financial prosperity.

Shortly after his arrival in Bakersfield Mr. Eyraud became the proprietor of the Alps hotel on the northwest corner of Nineteenth and M streets, where also he conducted a hotel and liquor business. During 1885 he took the agency for Wieland's brewery and was able to reduce the cost of bottled beer from $16 to $9 per barrel by having the work done at this point. A disastrous fire in 1889 entailed upon him a heavy loss. Prior to the fire he had bought unimproved real estate on the southeast corner of Nineteenth and M streets and at once he began to erect the building which he called the French hotel. Upon the completion of the structure he hung at its front the flag of his adopted country. For a number of years he made his headquarters at that place, but during the autumn of 1900 he again met with a heavy loss through the total destruction of the building by fire. Upon rebuilding he changed the name to the Commercial hotel. This he leased to others, while on the corner he established a wholesale liquor business. During 1909 he erected on adjacent property a three-story building known as the St. Regis hotel. This gives him a frontage of one hundred and thirty-two feet and a depth of ninety feet, with six store rooms facing on Nineteenth street. In March, 1912, he retired from the wholesale business to devote his time to looking after his city property and his ranches. Besides his other holdings he owns oil lands in the McKittrick field and is also the owner of a fine cattle ranch of nine hundred and sixty acres lying in the Greenhorn mountains fifty miles northeast of Bakersfield. On the ranch, which is superintended by his brother-in-law, Jules Caillaud, he has a large herd of cattle bearing the brand BO. He also owns two alfalfa ranches under the Kern Island canal, which he is improving and superintending. In 1911 he built a beautiful modern residence on the corner of N and Truxtun avenue, where the family make their home. On the organization of the National Bank of Bakersfield he became an original stockholder and he is also a member of the board of directors. Politically he has supported the Democratic party ever since he attained his majority. Fraternally he holds membership with the Eagles and the Knights of Pythias. His marriage was solemnized in Bakersfield February 4, 1884, and united him with Miss Rosalie Caillaud, who was born in Paris, France, but was brought to this country at an early age by her father, Charles Caillaud, who settled in Kern county in 1869 and engaged in stock-raising on his ranch which was afterward known as the French ranch. He passed away in 1878, and his widow, Frances (Guillion) Caillaud, reared their family of five children and spent her last days in the home of her daughter, Mrs. August P. Eyraud, in Bakersfield, where her death occurred in 1911, at the age of seventy-nine. The original settler of the Caillaud family was Eugene, a brother of Charles, who came on a sailer around Cape Horn in 1849 and arrived in San Francisco that year. He engaged in mining and drifted into Kern county in the early days; as early as 1859 he located in the Greenhorn mountains, where he was a storekeeper and miner, engaging in placer mining on Bear Trap creek, where he was accidentally killed by the caving of the gravel bank in 1886.

The only son of Mr. and Mrs. Eyraud was August, a promising youth, who died at the age of sixteen years. The only daughter, Mrs. Alice Ingram, is a resident of San Francisco.

WILLIAM PARKS RUSSELL.—Success has marked the experiences of Mr. Russell as a driller. To him belongs the credit of having drilled all the wells on the Acme and all but two on the Sacramento, which two properties laid the foundation to the present prosperity and influence of their superintendent, W. W. Colm, one of the leading men in the Kern river field. Purchasing a block of the promotion stock of the Alberta Oil Company on section 15, 31-22, in the North Midway field, where work was begun in May of 1911, Mr. Russell has since drilled all but two of the wells on the lease of forty acres. Under his able supervision the five wells are now producing an average of five thousand barrels per month and there is every reason to hope for an increased output as the work of development progresses. The president of the company is W. W. Colm of the Kern river field, while Harry Thomas of Bakersfield acts as secretary, and the Security Trust Company officiates as treasurer. Capitalized by Kern county men, who repose the utmost confidence in the superintendent, the latter has been able to work unhampered by limitations, and therefore may reasonably hope to reach the success in this proposition that rewarded his efforts in the Acme, the Sacramento and all the other properties with which he has been connected.

In the vicinity of the great oil fields of Clarion county, Pa., on a farm owned by his parents, John A. and Hannah (Tippry) Russell, William P. Russell was born May 10, 1864. His father died at the old homestead and the mother, now eighty years of age, is still living on that place. There are six children in the family, namely: Josephine, wife of Ambrose Spencer, who is connected with the iron business at Scranton, Pa.; Marcus E., an Alaskan gold miner now making his headquarters at Juneau; Lizzie, Mrs. John Parkin, of Parkers Landing, Pa.; William P., of California; A. Barton, a farmer living near Foxburg, Clarion county, Pa.; and Orrin M., a contract driller working in West Virginia. At the age of eighteen years William P. Russell became a roustabout in the Clarion fields. Going from Pennsylvania to West Virginia, he spent fifteen years in the oil fields of that state and meanwhile acquired a thorough practical knowledge of drilling. In Ohio he engaged in drilling at St. Mary's.

An experience of six years in mining in New Mexico was sufficient to prove to Mr. Russell that he was far less interested in mining than in the oil industry, hence he eventually returned to the West Virginia oil fields and worked at Cairo, Ritchie county. Upon coming to California in 1900 he struck the Kern river field in the height of its fame. At first he worked for the Chicago Crude, now a property of the Associated. Later he drilled all the wells on the Acme and all but two on the Sacramento, also drilled on the Sterling and Sovereign leases in the Kern river field, from which he came to the North Midway to take up development work with the Alberta. In 1909 he married Miss Elizabeth Dunkle, of Parkers Landing, Armstrong county, Pa., a woman of culture and education, and an earnest member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

A. A. SLOAN.—In Crawford county, Pa., A. A. Sloan was born April 24, 1858, the only other child, Alice, dying about 1897. The father, Erastus Sloan, died in 1862, and was long survived by the mother, Rosanna (McGuire) Sloan, whose death occurred November 9, 1911, at the age of eighty-three years. Having completed the studies of the common schools, A. A. Sloan had some experience as a drug clerk at Little Cooley, Crawford county, and at the age of eighteen started west to see the country. The hardships of life on the plains of Kansas, Colorado and the Indian Territory did not appeal to him and he went back to Pennsylvania, there to gain his first knowledge of the oil industry while working at Sawyer City, McKean county. As a roustabout with the Hazelwood Oil Company he experienced the difficulties incident to the beginning of work in the great industry. Step by step he rose to be a driller. Successively in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and California he followed the occupation of drilling, and while in Indiana he engaged in contract drilling as a partner of Joseph Wilson under the firm name of Sloan and Wilson.

For two and one-half years after his first removal to California in 1887 Mr. Sloan engaged as a driller for the Pacific Coast Oil Company at Newhall. On returning to eastern oil fields he continued as a driller for seven years, when again he was induced to come to California. On this second sojourn in California he drilled for the Santa Fe Company at Fullerton. At the expiration of ten months he went back to Pennsylvania. January of 1900 found him again in the Fullerton field. During June of the same year he came to Kern county to drill at the old Sunset, having purchased an interest in the Navajo Oil Company. Going to Lompoc in 1901, he worked for the Union Oil Company. On returning to Kern county he engaged with the Bear Creek Oil Company and later was with the Fox Oil Company, but in the meantime he had spent one year on his ranch at Altadena. His connection with the Engineers Oil Company began July 3, 1913, and already has proved helpful to the interests of the concern on section 14, where he makes his headquarters. Fraternally he became connected with Esperanza Lodge No. 339, F. & A. M., at Fullerton. By his marriage to Miss Hattie Bailey, of Jamestown, N. Y., he has an only daughter, Miss Marie Sloan, who has developed marked vocal talent and is now studying voice culture under competent instructors, it being the desire of her parents to prepare her for a successful career in the art. For some years Mrs. Sloan has been a prominent worker in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and in religion she is an earnest adherent to the doctrines of the Congregational Church.

JOHN COLE RAMSEY.—On a farm one hundred miles below Pittsburg, near Morgantown, W. Va., John Cole Ramsey was born June 11, 1875, the son of Josephus A. and Annie E. (Waters) Ramsey. The father, who owned a quarter section of fine farming land in West Virginia, was killed in a runaway accident when he was sixty-seven years of age. The mother, who still lives at Morgantown, has charge of the husband's estate, besides owning thirty-seven acres adjacent, the whole forming a valuable tract. Of her twelve children seven are now living, namely: John Cole, the eldest of the family; D. B., who has drilled on the Globe division of the General Petroleum and in other places; Lillie, Mrs. Charles W. Morris, of Cassville, W. Va.; Mrs. Maude Pride, also of Cassville; Pearl, Grace and Blanche, who reside on the old homestead in the east.

At the age of nineteen years John C. Ramsey found employment in the oil fields at Cassville, W. Va., where he worked for two years in the pipe line department of the Standard Oil Company. Next he entered the producing department of the Standard at Mannington, continuing there and at Bristol, Pa., and Weston, W. Va. In each of these places he had charge of Standard property. Coming as far west as Oklahoma in 1904, he worked at Bartlesville and Tulsa, mainly as a driller. The year 1906 found him in Coalinga, where he began to drill in the employ of the California Limited. From Coalinga he went to Sherman and engaged with the American Oilfields Company, Limited. Later periods of work kept him in the employ successively of the Alma, Alma, Jr., and the Blackjack in the Kern river field, after which he came to the North Midway in the interests of Barlow & Hill. One year was spent at Taft, from which place he went to the 25 Hill for T. M. Young. Two years were devoted to various departments of the work on the lease, and he then came to his present position in 1911, since which he has made all the improvements on the property and has converted it into a remunerative proposition. Politically he votes with the Democratic party, and fraternally he is connected with the Moose at Taft and the Elks at Bakersfield. While still living in the east he married at Oakland, Md., Miss Grace Chesney, a native of Morgantown, W. Va., and they are now making their home on section 14, 31-22, lease of the Midway Gas and Petroleum Company.

REV. JOSEPH WANNER.—Of the many Roman Catholic priests laboring in California few have charge of a larger territory than that which has been assigned to Father Wanner for his spiritual oversight and none has in larger degree than he the qualities necessary for the successful discharge of great responsibilities. The fact that he is able to speak five languages, German, French, Spanish, English and Italian, indicates his classical education and fine powers of mind and also makes him somewhat of a cosmopolitan in his outlook upon the world.

Father Wanner was born at Belford, Haute Saone, France, October 12, 1865, and is a son of the late Casimer and Marie (Grelle) Wanner, the latter a farmer's daughter, and the former a son of Fortuné Wanner, an educator and owner of a farm in Haute Saone. The family was of high standing in the community where so many generations had lived and labored. It was possible, therefore, to give the ambitious youth excellent educational advantages and he was sent to the La Chapelle College in France, where he completed the study of the classics. Later he studied philosophy in the St. Sulpician Seminary at Vesoul, Haute Saone. On the completion of the course in that institution he went to Switzerland and studied theology at Luzerne near the shores of the beautiful lake of that name. The historic university in which he was a student had been the alma mater of many men of influence in former generations of religious progress.

Upon coming to the new world the young priest devoted two years to theological study under the Benedictine Fathers in St. Vincent's Seminary at Pittsburgh, Pa. Ordained to the holy priesthood by Archbishop Feehan of Chicago in 1891, he was assigned to the Chicago diocese as an assistant. Later he was appointed rector of the Holy Ghost Church in Chicago and during his pastorate he established the Sisters of St. Agnes convent and academy in his parish. The demands of the work upon his time and strength were great. After a time his health began to suffer under the strain and it became necessary for him to resign his charge in order to benefit by a change of climate. In this way he was led to come to California during 1903. For three years he served as chaplain at the old mission in San Diego and then for a similar period he was rector at Cayucos, San Luis Obispo county, where he built the new church and the parsonage. At the same time he conducted the missions St. Cambria and St. Simeon. During 1906 he was assigned to Tehachapi as rector of St. Malachy's Roman Catholic Church, which had been started in 1884 by Father Bannon. In 1910 he built the St. Mary of the Desert church at Mojave. During the construction of the aqueduct he had charge of all the Roman Catholic missions up to Cinco. In addition he has rebuilt the edifice used by the Sacred Heart congregation at Lancaster, Los Angeles county, and has visited regularly the missions at Amelia and Paris. His most distant missions are at Tejon ranch and the Indian mission near Weldon, on the south fork of the Kern river, eighty-five miles from his home, the entire extent of his territory covering one hundred and thirty miles. It is necessary for him to ride horseback over the mountains, for much of the route takes him over roads impracticable for conveyances. To one of his consecrated spirit and tireless energy the hardships of the trips to mission points count for naught in his zealous efforts to advance the kingdom of Christ in the world. While he has traveled extensively in Europe, has visited Africa and many islands of the Pacific, no country is so dear to him as California and no spot in the commonwealth more interesting to him than his present parish with its widely scattered parishioners, its constant difficulties and its calls upon his sympathies, patience, tact and leadership.

Rev. Joseph Warner

JOHN JOHNSON.—Although having recently established a residence in East Bakersfield, Mr. Johnson still makes his headquarters at Weldon on the South Fork of the Kern river, where he was born May 10, 1867, and where now he has stock interests. Much of his life, however, has been passed in other places, for the interests of the stock industry, to which his father devoted the greater part of his active life and in which he has been constantly interested, have obliged him to seek different locations and as a boy he spent much of his time in the Sierra country of Kern and Inyo counties. Later on he had a disastrous experience in San Bernardino county in the vicinity of Daggett, where a severe and protracted drought caused him losses so heavy that he was forced to begin anew. The spread of the Texas fever among his herds completed the catastrophe that left him without either stock or capital. However, since returning to Kern county he has been more fortunate. The losses have been retrieved and he now ranks among the prosperous stockmen of his district.

Through helping in the care of the stock owned by his father, John Johnson, Sr., who was a pioneer of California and a rancher in Kern, Inyo and San Bernardino counties, and eventually a merchant at Daggett, where he died, John Johnson, Jr., learned the stock industry in all of its details. For thirteen years he was employed on the stock ranch of W. W. Landers on the South Fork and his proficiency led to his promotion to the responsibilities of foremanship, in which position he continued until he embarked in the stock business for himself. After he had maintained headquarters in the Kelsey valley for some time and had made a most gratifying start in the industry, he unfortunately took his cattle to Daggett in 1908 and there the herd was practically wiped out through the Texas fever and the drought. What was left he sold in 1909 and returned to Kern county, bought a small bunch of cattle and started on the South Fork, where since he has maintained headquarters at Weldon and has ranged his stock on the Manache meadows. The brand of 22 which he uses is common in the district, this proving the size of his herd and the extent to which he has made up for former losses.

Buying a residence at No. 916 Eureka street, East Bakersfield, in 1912, Mr. Johnson moved his family to their new home and since then a part of his time has been spent in the city. He is interested in the development of East Bakersfield, maintains considerable pride in its growing prosperity and supports all measures for the local upbuilding. Politically he votes with the Republican party. His marriage was solemnized near Weldon, Kern county, and united him with Miss Victoria Seybert, a native of San Bernardino county, but a resident of Kern county since childhood. They are the parents of two daughters and one son, namely: Mrs. Viola Polkinghorn, who lives at Weldon and has one child, Dorothy; Inice and James. The father of Mrs. Johnson is Robert Seybert, who at the age of eighty-two years, still survives, rugged and hearty, and still makes his home at his ranch on the South Fork, where he is an honored pioneer and prominent rancher. In an early day he came across the plains from Missouri and settled in California, whose development he has witnessed during the long period of his identification therewith.

CALVIN B. ALEXANDER.—The results of industry and perseverance find a fitting illustration in the successful activities of this well-known farmer of Kern county, who orphaned by the death of his father when he was only twelve years of age took up the battle of self-support immediately afterward and from that time onward made his own way in the world. Not only did he accomplish the strenuous task of self-support when other boys were in school or enjoying the recreations of youth, but in addition he turned over all of his wages to his mother until he was twenty and thus assisted in the general maintenance of the family, including at the time six children, of whom he was next to the eldest.

Upon first settling in America it is known that the Alexander family, established their home in Maine, whence later generations drifted as far west as Ohio. There Isaac Alexander met and married Mary Harshberger, who was born in Ohio of German ancestry and who is still living, physically robust for one of eighty-six years. During the period of their residence in Miami county, Ohio, the second child in the family, Calvin B., was born on New Year's day of 1853. When only two years of age he was taken by his parents to Miami county, Ind., but seven years later the family returned to their old Ohio home, where the father died about the year 1865. The next year the son was put to work at $8 per month and from that time he worked without intermission for rest or schooling. At the age of twenty he moved to Warren county, Ind., where he secured work as a farm hand. Later he took up farming for himself, working land for himself in the summer and then hiring out to others in the winter. For twenty years he continued in Indiana.

Coming to this state in 1893 and purchasing his first acreage in 1898. Mr. Alexander since has devoted himself industriously to the care of land and of stock. Besides being a large grower of alfalfa hay, he is successful with other crops. In addition he makes a specialty of stock, is considered an excellent judge of horse-flesh and has on his place two very fine Percheron stallions, one of which is his private property, while the other is owned by a company. The home place comprises eighty acres located on section 7, township 31, range 29, and under his supervision the tract has been improved and greatly enhanced in value. In addition he owns an improved eighty on section 12, township 31, range 28, now operated and occupied by his older son, John C., a progressive young farmer of Kern county. At this writing he also has one hundred and sixty acres under contract.

During 1877 Mr. Alexander was united in marriage with Miss Mary A. Anderson, of Warren county, Ind., by whom he has four children, namely: John C., who married Miss Estella McDonald, of Kern county; Nora A., whose husband, William Patterson, formerly a druggist, is now engaged in farming at Lathrop near Stockton, San Joaquin county; Christine I., the wife of Archie T. Rudrum, a farmer near Stockton; and Arthur Arlington, now in Bakersfield. The family has a high social standing in their community and all of its members receive the genuine respect which is their due. In all of his efforts Mr. Alexander has enjoyed the hearty and wise co-operation of his wife, who is a woman of education and culture and possesses the gentleness of disposition together with intelligence of mind, that gives her a first place not only in the home, but also in the neighborhood. At no time an office holder, Mr. Alexander has always espoused Republican principles.

Mary A Alexander    C B Alexander

MARION J. SCOTT.—From early life dependent upon his own efforts for a livelihood, Mr. Scott has met every hardship with a cheerful optimism and has risen to a position of considerable importance in the oil industry, being now in charge of the Brookshire Oil Company's holdings in the North Midway field. A native of the commonwealth where all of his life has been passed, he is a typical Californian in energy, progressive spirit and patriotic loyalty. The first three years of his life were passed in Modoc county, where he was born November 22, 1885, but in 1888 he was taken by his parents to Santa Barbara and with that portion of the state his early memories are most closely associated. When only fourteen he was orphaned by the death of his parents. He was the youngest of nine children, the most of whom had reached mature years at the time and were in a position to earn their own livelihoods. With characteristic energy and courage he discontinued his studies and took up the task of self-support. From that time to the present he has owed his progress to his unaided exertions. At the age of nineteen years he found employment in the Santa Maria field and ever since that time he has been identified with the oil industry, with the exception of one year devoted to other work.

A long identification with the Santa Maria field was broken by removal to the Coalinga district, where Mr. Scott engaged with the Claremont Oil Company during 1908-09. During 1910 he came to Kern county and found employment with the Brookshire Oil Company, which corporation has since had the benefit of his arduous services and competent assistance. When A. P. Kennedy, superintendent of the Brookshire, died July 22, 1913, Mr. Scott was placed in charge of the lease, receiving his appointment as superintendent of the Brookshire August 10, 1913, since which time he has devoted himself with conscientious intelligence and excellent results to the many details connected with such tasks. The lease comprises one hundred and sixty acres located in the North Midway field, where three excellent wells give an average monthly production of thirty-six hundred barrels. He has little leisure for outside affairs. The discharge of his duties on the lease keep him closely confined to the property. While living at Coalinga he became a member of the Order of Eagles, but since coming to this county he has not identified himself with any organization of that nature. His marriage took place at Santa Barbara in 1906 and united him with Miss Lottie Foster, of Santa Maria, and they are the parents of two children, Marion J., Jr., and Mary E., aged respectively four and two years. The family reside on the Brookshire lease in the North Midway field.

CHARLES G. WHITTIER.—Allied with an honored pioneer family of New England and a distant relative of the famous poet, John Greenleaf Whittier, it has been the ambition of Charles G. Whittier to add prestige to the name and such has been the result achieved in the midst of the strenuous activities of the oil field and in a region remote from the scenes of youth. As a boy he was familiar with the remote and isolated county of Aroostook in the northern part of Maine, where he was born at Caribou, August 4, 1871, and where he was reared in the midst of an agricultural environment and a wilderness that was bleak and stern and unfruitful. Self-reliance was developed by force of circumstances. Ease and comfort was not possible to the family in their northern home. The most diligent effort was necessary to secure a livelihood from the sterile soil. Strength of body and fortitude of soul were the heritage of those reared in and inured to stern climatic conditions, and the mother, who bore the maiden name of Ruth Keach, is still hale and hearty at the age of seventy-one. The father, Charles Greenleaf Whittier, Sr., died at the old Maine homestead in 1912, when seventy-one years of age. The eldest of their seven children is Milo W., who remains at the old homestead. The second son, Mericos H. Whittier, a millionaire oil operator residing in Los Angeles, was a member of the firm of Green & Whittier, developers of what is now the Green and Whittier division of the Associated Oil Company in the Kern river field. The third son, Colon F., is also an oil operator and a resident of Los Angeles. The fourth son, Charles G., who has lived in California since 1903, is one of the leading oil superintendents in the North Midway field. There are three daughters in the family, namely: Olive, wife of Lester Fair, a merchant in Maine; Viora, wife of Henry Sousa, of Maine; and Florence, Mrs. Henry Vinol, who makes her home at Caribou.

Upon coming to the North Midway field immediately after his arrival in the west Mr. Whittier joined his brother, M. H., in drilling a discovery well on section 20, 31-22. This was practically the first development work attempted in the district. Although oil was struck, the well was closed down and the lease abandoned, after which he went to Coalinga, January 4, 1905. For eighteen months he worked on a lease in which his brother held an interest. Going from there to the Los Angeles field he entered the employ of the Salt Lake Oil Company and for five years continued on their lease, meantime purchasing a substantial residence in Los Angeles and forming many warm and permanent friendships with well-known operators of that city. For the period of his residence there he held membership with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Hollywood. During February of 1911 he returned to the North Midway field, where now he engages as superintendent of the Hondo Oil Company, operating on section 15, 31-22. The name of the company is taken from a Spanish word meaning "a deep hole." Wells on the lease average one thousand feet in depth and two hundred and fifty barrels per day in production. Forty-two and one-half acres are leased by the two brothers, M. H. and C. G., who are partners in the Hondo Oil Company.

The marriage of Mr. Whittier took place at Portsmouth, N. H., and united him with Miss Mary Coughlan, who was born in County Cork, Ireland, and at the age of seventeen came to the United States, settling first in Boston. From childhood she has been an earnest member of the Roman Catholic Church. While still retaining their Los Angeles residence, they are now making their home on the lease.

MRS. AMANDA RUBY.—The real estate business, which has made such strides in development in this part of the country in the last decade, has proved a most attractive field of labor for the progressive business woman, who recently has come to the fore and procured such good returns that her fellow workers are kept busy looking after their interests and keeping in close touch with her. Mrs. Amanda Ruby is a fine example of the self-made woman, whose untiring effort along this line has made her a most prosperous woman. She is the granddaughter of Frederick Wise, who was born in Pennsylvania, and who was one of the pioneer farmers of Illinois. Frederick and Rebecca Wise were the parents of Jacob Mason Wise, born in Springfield, Sangamon county, Ill., who became the father of Mrs. Ruby.

Jacob Mason Wise, was a blacksmith in Sangamon county, Ill., for a while and later went to Riverton and then to Mount Auburn, Christian county, same state, but he soon returned to Sangamon county and settled in Niantic. Illiopolis was his next place of residence and later he returned to Mt. Auburn. He followed his trade for some years, then was a hardware merchant while at Mount Auburn, but finally returned to blacksmithing, which he followed the remainder of his life. His wife, who before her marriage was Nancy J. Millstead, was born in Wheeling, W. Va., and her death occurred in Mt. Auburn, Ill. Mr. Wise passed away in Mt. Auburn in August, 1891, aged sixty four years. He was a Mason, and was a popular man in those circles which knew him. Three of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Wise are now living, viz.: Amanda, Mrs. Ruby; Alvin A., a resident of San Jose, Cal.; and George O., of Springfield, Ill. Mr. Wise served in both the Mexican and the Civil wars.

R. T. Polkrite

Mrs. R. T. Polkrite

Reared in Illinois, Amanda Wise attended the public schools of the various localities where her parents were settled, and there grew to womanhood. She married in Springfield, Horace S. Ruby, who was born in Macon county, Ill., and reared on a farm there. At the outbreak of the Civil war he enlisted in Company I, 7th Regiment, Illinois Cavalry, and was honorably discharged at the end of the great conflict. His death occurred in Bement, Ill., in May, 1884.

After the death of her husband Mrs. Ruby continued to reside in Illinois until 1891, when she came to Mojave, Cal., where she purchased a hotel and rooming house. This place was burned out twice, but undaunted she rebuilt again and remained there for a number of years, in 1907 locating in East Bakersfield, where she has since resided, looking after her interests.

RICHARD T. WILHITE.—That type of manhood which, in spite of vicissitudes and losses, in the face of disappointment, will nevertheless keep steadily at work, with untiring effort, is represented in the life of Richard T. Wilhite, who was born near Marshall, Saline county, Mo., September 7, 1851. His father, William Wilhite, a native of Tennessee, became a farmer in Saline county, Mo., where he married Martha Woolard, a native of South Carolina. The father was accidentally killed by a runaway horse, and the mother died at the age of sixty years. Of their seven children Richard is the oldest. He received his educational training in the schools of his native place and graduated from the Marshall high school in 1870.

Mr. Wilhite worked at farming for a short time, but in 1879 deciding to come west he set out for California. He first located at Modesto, Stanislaus county, and there obtained employment in the grocery of L. Strauss & Co. at Turlock, remaining there five years. In 1886 he came to Kern county, and for several years worked for Haggin & Carr, later known as the Kern County Land Company. During this time he took up a homestead claim of a hundred and sixty acres and proved up on it in five years, but he suffered losses and reverses and became in debt to the amount of $1000. Not losing courage, but rather with renewed effort, in 1890 he rented one hundred and sixty acres of land which was under cultivation, and later bought the eighty acres comprising his home ranch, upon which he is engaged extensively in general farming, making a specialty of raising alfalfa and grain. In connection with this he has for ten years also carried on a dairy business. Recently Mr. Wilhite disposed of nineteen acres of his place to a Mr. Attwood.

On May 24, 1885, Mr. Wilhite was united in marriage with Mattie J. Allen, born in Sawmill Flat, Tuolumne county, Cal., on November 24, 1864, the daughter of James M. and Eliza (Bradford) Allen, natives of Missouri and Tennessee, respectively, who came to California in the early days. Mr. Allen died in Bakersfield and his widow now resides in Modesto. Mr. and Mrs. Wilhite have three children, Rodney, of Taft; Shirley, Mrs. Watson, of Maricopa; and Veda, at home. By a former marriage to Josephine Benedict, who died in Missouri, Mr. Wilhite had one child, Minnie, Mrs. E. K. Blood, of Bakersfield.

ALEXANDER H. CROMWELL, D. V. S.—Romance threw its warm glow of adventure, travel and thrilling experiences over the boyhood years of Dr. Cromwell, whose present quiet but efficient discharge of the duties of veterinary surgeon at Taft has for its background a career full of excitement and more or less danger. The trend of an entire existence was for him decided by the fact that in boyhood he lived on the largest cattle ranch in the United States and learned to ride horses almost as soon as he learned to talk. He was born at Anaqua, Victoria county, Tex., September 5, 1878, and was the eldest son of Col. Frank Hawkins Cromwell, a man of varied abilities, particularly skilled in the care of stock. Attracting the attention of Dull Bros., of Pittsburg, Pa., in 1881 he was engaged by them to manage their famous ranch in Texas. Under his able supervision the vast property was enlarged until finally the firm owned one hundred square miles, all under fence, comprising the largest stock ranch in the entire country.

In such an environment Dr. Cromwell passed his earliest years and developed fearlessness and self-reliance to an unusual degree. Three times he followed the trail up to the Yellowstone park. The first of these trips occurred when he was only twelve years of age. Leaving the Texas ranch during the latter part of February he made the long trip as a horse herder and reached the Yellowstone the following Christmas. Without accident or loss he brought out three herds of cattle numbering about twenty-five hundred head each, besides one hundred head of saddle horses. Scarcely had he reached the age of thirteen when he joined the celebrated Buffalo Bill show in 1891. Unusual skill in trick riding enabled him to secure a place in this show, which contained in its ring some of the finest riders in the world. During the World's Fair in 1893 he was with the show near the exposition grounds and did fancy riding which won for him continued applause from the vast throngs crowding the great tent. Besides showing with Buffalo Bill in the principal cities of the United States he accompanied the circus to other countries and one of the first places visited was Mexico City, where there was an exhibition September 16, 1891. Nor did his travels end with his resignation from the circus work. In addition he has taken work and draft horses in great numbers to foreign countries, doing that work in the interests of large English and American oil companies, and for some time he was employed by S. Pierson & Son, of London.

A desire to acquire a knowledge of veterinary surgery and dentistry caused Mr. Cromwell to matriculate in the Veterinary Dental College at Detroit, Mich., during 1900. Two years later he became a student in the Veterinary Science Association's College at Ontario, Canada, from which he was graduated in March, 1903, in the veterinary surgical course, and in the same year he received his diploma in veterinary dentistry from the Detroit institution. Returning to Texas in the same year, he engaged in the oil fields at Beaumont and continued in different oil fields of Texas for a number of years. As an employe of S. Pierson & Son, of London, in 1906 he went to the isthmus of Tehuantepec, state of Vera Cruz, Mexico, where he engaged as transportation manager in the oil fields. When the position had become remunerative and the work had developed to large proportions, he almost lost his life in an attack of yellow fever during the latter part of 1908. Forced to abandon all work, he boarded a steamer that sailed around the Horn to New Orleans. The long ocean voyage gave him a little strength, but he was still emaciated and weak when he was advised to seek the oil fields of Coalinga in California. The change brought him benefit at once and he is now robust, rugged and fitted to discharge efficiently every business duty. With Dr. W. A. Seabury he built the Coalinga veterinary hospital in 1909, but this building was destroyed by fire in 1911, and since 1910 he has devoted his time to veterinary surgery in Taft, where Dr. Seabury has likewise been his partner. Since coming to this place he has bought stock in one of the oil companies and also has taken up several excellent government locations. Fraternally he is associated with the Improved Order of Red Men, holds the office of secretary in the Taft lodge of Knights of Pythias and is also an honorary member of the Pythian Sisters in this city.

H. H. Janszig

Edith M. Janszig

NATHAN W. TAUSSIG.—Varied experiences and an association with diversified occupations have given to Mr. Taussig a broad knowledge of the great Southwest and have deepened in his mind a conviction that Kern county offers to settlers of energy and sagacity opportunities unsurpassed by any other section of the great empire by the sunset sea. Practically all of his memories of childhood cluster around San Bernardino, for he was only a little more than three years of age when the family left the East (where he had been born at Cleveland, Ohio, August 30, 1862), and cast in their fortunes with the then insignificant hamlet situated at the edge of the desert. Vividly he recalls the little schools of San Bernardino, the slow growth of the town and the struggle sustained by the people in their unceasing efforts to secure an adequate supply of water for irrigation. When only fourteen years of age he was hired to drive the stage coach from San Bernardino to Resting Springs in Death Valley. This was a task calling for physical strength, powers of endurance and fearless courage, and the fact that he continued with the company for two years furnishes proof as to his fine physical and mental qualities. When he resigned the position he crossed over into Arizona and secured a position in the quartermaster's department with the government service.

Returning to San Bernardino at the expiration of three years Mr. Taussig made a brief sojourn in that town and then proceeded to Barstow to work in a mill connected with the Waterman mines. For five years he remained in the mill, of which for a time he acted as foreman. Next he spent three years with the Barber Mining and Milling Company at Calico. An ardent desire to become a rancher led him to buy property near Santa Ana in 1887, but he found conditions unfavorable and sold in about one year, later returning to the mines. For a short time he worked in the Ibex mill in Death Valley, operated in conjunction with large gold and silver mines. From that place he went to Mexico and engaged as foreman in a mine in Sonora for one year.

Upon his arrival in Kern county during 1891 Mr. Taussig bought one hundred and twenty acres of unimproved land at Semi-Tropic, where he spent nine years in a vain endeavor to make a success of agricultural operations. Discouraged by repeated failures, he finally sought another location and in 1900 bought one hundred and sixty acres of unimproved land on the Goose Lake channel of Kern river. The new property responded to his efforts for profitable cultivation. Crops of grain were remunerative. Stock-raising brought to him considerable success. Dairying, in which he embarked during 1905, also proved a success. Alfalfa, several crops of which were cut each year, furnished an abundance of hay for the stock. With the profits of a few seasons he felt justified in buying one hundred and sixty acres three and one-half miles north of Wasco and this tract has been put in an excellent state of cultivation. A well seventy-five feet deep is operated by a pumping plant with a ten-horse electric motor, providing a flow of water from fifty to sixty inches, sufficient to furnish an abundance of water for the irrigation for a quarter-section. During 1911 Mr. Taussig moved to his Wasco ranch, but he still continues to manage the other place.

The marriage of Mr. Taussig took place at Santa Ana, Cal., December 20, 1886, and united him with Miss Edith Siegfried, who was born in Waterloo, N. Y., April 27, 1862. She was the daughter of Henry and Mary (Poorman) Siegfried, natives of New York. Mr. Siegfried came to California via Cape Horn in 1849, landing at San Francisco, and for some years he followed mining. After a stay of eight years in the West he returned to New York, where he was married and there he followed farming until his death in 1870. Mrs. Taussig's mother, now Mrs. M. A. Hotaling, resides in Orange county, Cal. Mrs. Taussig was educated in Syracuse, N. Y., and came to Santa Ana in 1882. She is the mother of six children, as follows: Perla E., wife of T. T. Miller of Wasco; James W., who has been educated in public schools and the Heald's Business College at Riverside; Leona, Nathan, Theodore and Billie G.

ROBERT LEE SCOTT.—The Lakeview No. 2 Oil Company, of which Mr. Scott acts as superintendent, operates a lease of eighty acres situated on section 4, township 11, range 23, and is financed by the following officers and directors: Clarence H. White, president; Floyd G. White, secretary; and W. W. Wickersham, treasurer, the three gentlemen named being capitalists residing in Los Angeles. The identification of Mr. Scott with the company dates from February, 1911, and since December of the same year he has filled the position of superintendent, in which capacity he has proved efficient, energetic and resourceful, a thoroughly dependable man for a position of great responsibility. When first he entered the employ of the company he took charge of the drilling of their well No. 2 situated on section 26, township 32, range 24. This well has a depth of forty-five hundred and fifty-five feet and is excelled in depth by only one other rotary well in the entire country, namely: well No. 4, of the Lakeview Annex Oil Company, located on section 26, township 32, range 24, which has a depth of forty-nine hundred feet. Well No. 2, drilled by Mr. Scott, came in January 23, 1913, with a record of twenty-six hundred barrels as a gusher and is still a most valuable proposition, pumping six hundred barrels per day of twenty-four hours, and furnishing oil of twenty-six to twenty-seven degrees gravity. Eighteen men are employed on the lease, which presents an appearance of prosperous activity and profitable operation.

Ever since the excitement caused by oil discovery in the Spindletop region in Texas Mr. Scott has been closely connected with the oil industry. All of his life has been spent in the south and west, where prior to his identification with his present business he had been employed as a structural iron worker. A member of an old southern family, he was born at Lost Prairie, Miller county, Ark., March 19, 1879, and was the fourth and youngest child of William B. and Emily Eliza (Evans) Scott, natives respectively of Virginia and Louisiana. The father, who migrated to Louisiana in early life, there met and married Miss Evans and later removed to Arkansas, where he became well-known locally as an expert judge of stock. About the time that his youngest child was born he was killed by being thrown from a horse. His widow afterward continued to reside in Arkansas, where in a few years she again married; her death occurred at Texarkana in December of 1904. Three sons survive her and a daughter died in childhood. The eldest son, John Harrison Scott, is engaged in farming at Texarkana, Tex., and the second son, William B., Jr., is employed as a structural iron worker in St. Louis. The youngest child, Robert Lee, who has always been known as Lee Scott, passed the years of boyhood at Texarkana, Ark., where the family moved shortly after the accidental death of the father. A difference of opinion with his stepfather caused him to leave home at the age of thirteen, in 1892, and since then he has been self-supporting. For two years he worked on a farm about thirty-five miles from Texarkana, but agriculture was not congenial to him and he was glad to turn from it to general work in a mechanical line, being engaged in saw-mills, shingle-mills and planing-mills as a mechanic. From that he drifted into structural iron work.

The owners of the Missouri Valley Bridge and Iron Works in Leavenworth, Kan., were at that time extensively engaged in bridge construction through the middle west and Mr. Scott found employment with one of their construction gangs. For two years he was employed in building a bridge on the Kansas City, Pittsburg & Gulf (now the Kansas City-Southern) Railroad across the Red river and later he worked on the South Canadian bridge at Sapulpa, in the Indian Territory. With his employers he worked in various parts of Missouri, Kansas and Oklahoma as a bridge-builder. At the outbreak of the Spanish-American war he resigned his position and enlisted at Little Rock, Ark., in Company L, First Regiment of Arkansas Infantry, but at the expiration of five months he was honorably discharged, there being no need of his regiment at the front. Returning to the structural iron line of work, he continued in the south and was employed on the North Washataw bridge at Ravia in the Indian Territory at the time of the excitement in the Spindletop region. Leaving the work in which he had been so notably successful, he embarked in the oil business. March 10, 1900, he began to work at Beaumont and Spindletop. During December of the same year he turned his attention to drilling in the Spindletop field. There he helped to bring in three gushers. Leaving that field in 1902, he went to Evangeline, La., as a driller and superintendent of production. Upon returning to Texas he continued as a driller. About that time he made the acquaintance of the lady whom he married, February 22, 1904, at Houston, Tex., and who was Mrs. Mary Hill, daughter of John Manning, of Alabama. By her first marriage Mrs. Scott had one child, Mayna, who is now a student in St. Augustine's Academy at Fresno.

As owner of a one-half interest in two drilling rigs, with J. W. Boynton, of Beaumont, Tex., as a partner, Mr. Scott took contracts for drilling in a number of fields and made considerable money at such work. Unfortunately he and Mr. Boynton invested their means in a venture that lost each of them $8,000 or more, the two wells which they drilled proving to be unproductive. Later Mr. Scott engaged in drilling for the larger companies on the Gulf coast of Texas, but in 1906 returned to his previous location at Saratoga and secured employment as a fireman and pumper. During October, 1910, he came from Texas to California and established himself in the Sunset field, where in addition to serving as superintendent of one of the prominent companies he has acquired an enviable reputation as one of the best rotary drillers in the west. A portion of his time has been given to contract drilling and he has drilled four important wells on the leases of the Pacific Midway, Obispo and Brookshire Oil Companies.

ELONZO P. DAVIS.—The call of the frontier brought the Davis family by gradual migration and with several sojourns in the intervening territory, from the plantations of old Virginia, where they became established during the colonial era, to the coast of the Pacific ocean. The head of the house at the time of the removal to California was Isham Turner Davis, born near Lebanon, Wilson county, Tenn., but a pioneer farmer of Arkansas from a period antedating the struggle with Mexico. In that war he bore an honorable part and during the battle of Vera Cruz, serving under the illustrious general, Zachary Taylor, he received a severe wound in the leg. Upon the declaration of peace and the discharge of the army he returned to his Arkansas farm, where for many years he continued the arduous struggle for a livelihood. Meanwhile he had married Miss Mary A. Farley, a native of East Tennessee and a member of an old Virginia family. It became increasingly more and more difficult to earn a livelihood for their large family on their farm, so their thoughts turned longingly toward the west. Finally, during 1869, they started across the plains via Texas, New Mexico and Arizona, loading their necessary equipment in wagons and using oxen for motive power. The son, Elonzo P., was at that time a youth of about sixteen years, strong, willing and industrious. With a kind heart and willing spirit he often stood guard at night in place of older members of the party whose turn it was for such a task and he recalls vividly the loneliness of those occasions and the anxiety caused by the least noise of unusual portent. One cold, rainy night a strange noise put every nerve on tension. Twice he called, but received no answer. Then he fired. The next morning when an investigation was made the body of a large wolf was found. Fortunately the Indians did not attack them at any time during the long journey. From 1869 until 1871 the family lived at El Monte and from that time until 1876 they made their home in Kern county, but in the year last-named the father, accompanied by all of the family excepting a daughter and Elonzo P., went back to Arkansas, only to return to the west in 1883 and settle again in Kern county, where he died in 1900 at the age of eighty-seven. Here also occurred the demise of his wife.

In the family of Isham Turner Davis there were eight children who reached maturity, Elonzo P. having been the second among these. The eldest, William H., is a mining man at Rosamond, Kern county. Two daughters, Mrs. Addie Egan and Mrs. Mollie Purcell, are widows living in Bakersfield. Mrs. Sarah Houston resides in Los Angeles and Lucetta, Mrs. Martin Pettis, is a resident of Bakersfield. The youngest sons are John Edward and Robert Lee, the latter a resident of Rosamond, while the former, who lives in Bakersfield, is operating oil land on the west side in the McKittrick field. During early boyhood Elonzo P. Davis attended subscription schools in Arkansas. When the family crossed the plains he was able to do a man's work and proved of the greatest assistance in bringing the hazardous trip to a safe consummation. While living at El Monte he earned a livelihood by teaming and working on a farm. November of 1871 found him in Kern county, where he since has made his home. He had lived here but a short time when the county-seat question came up before the people and at election time he rode mule-back through Bear valley and Tehachapi, carrying tickets for voting as well as the other necessities of the election. Both before and after the return of his father to Arkansas he engaged in teaming to the mountains and into Inyo county, using twelve or fourteen mules to two wagons.

Ever since the autumn of 1881 Mr. Davis has engaged in the livery business in Bakersfield. For the first two years he carried on the Overland stable located on Eighteenth near K street. Next he bought the old Dexter barn on Nineteenth between L and M streets. After having managed that stable for almost seven years he sold out and soon afterward the barn was destroyed by fire. Meanwhile he had purchased the old French stable, but when the Dexter was rebuilt on Nineteenth between M and N streets, he leased the place and for more than twenty years conducted a livery business at that location. During February of 1910 he leased the Union stable on K and Twenty-first streets and since then he has conducted here a large business in his line.

Politically a Democrat, Mr. Davis has maintained a warm interest in local and national issues. During a service of nine years as a member of the board of education he assisted in raising the standard of the graded schools and putting them into excellent condition for permanent helpfulness. For four years he served as city marshal of Bakersfield. His comfortable home in Bakersfield is presided over by Mrs. Davis, formerly Miss Margaret Hope Taylor, who is a native of Virginia and a member of an old and cultured family of that commonwealth. About 1879 she was brought to California by her father, J. C. Taylor, who settled in Kern county and engaged in general farming. In this county she received her education and here she became the wife of Mr. Davis. They are the parents of five children, Myrtle, Elonzo P., Jr., Pearl, Marvin and Erna. In young girlhood Mrs. Davis became identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

ANTON THORAND.—Born in Germany, May 14, 1863. Mr. Thorand is a son of Joseph and Mary (Hanke) Thorand, the latter of whom was born in Germany and died in Illinois. The father brought his family to America when

W. J. Schultz.

Anton was but four years of age, and they located in Trenton, Clinton county, Ill., where he has ever since made his home. He was the father of ten children, of whom six are now living, Anton being the youngest son.

Anton Thorand was reared in Trenton, and received but meager educational advantages, being obliged early in life, when but a lad, to go to work in the coal mines in that vicinity. This work he followed until 1889, when he came west and on October 7 or 8, 1897, arrived at Bakersfield, where he entered the employ of the Sumner Water Company, under Simon W. Wible. He began work at the bottom as a general hand, by his diligent and attentive labor receiving rapid promotion, and in July, 1898, he was made foreman for the company. He superintended the laying of the pipes and mains (and there were miles of mains and pipe laid) and gave close attention to the plant until it was sold to the Bakersfield Water Company. As he was one of the organizers of the present company, Mr. Thorand was elected vice-president of the board of directors as well as superintendent, and in this capacity he has taken an active part in building the new plant, which they immediately proceeded to do. Five new wells were sunk, these yielding them more than ample supply for all present needs; three new electric pumping stations have been installed, giving a service that has become appreciated by the consumers, and that, too, of a splendid quality of water; and it has all been constructed on the plan that it can be easily enlarged as the population grows and there is greater demand. A storage system is arranged by means of a reservoir with a capacity of over two million gallons, constructed on the heights above East Bakersfield. Since the installation of the new plant there has been more activity in building operations in East Bakersfield from the fact that the citizens became convinced that they could be assured of adequate water supply and a good system for same. Politically Mr. Thorand is a Republican.

WILLIAM J. SCHULTZ.—On the paternal side he is of Teutonic origin, while the Genaud family were of French lineage, and in his own mentality may be seen the attributes of both nationalities, supplemented by traits distinctively American. His father, Frederick F., a native of Germany, but from young manhood a resident of Ohio and for many years a contractor and builder, is now living retired in Cincinnati, where the wife and mother died in May of 1901. Of the five children comprising the family, William J. was born at Mount Carmel, Clermont county, Ohio, March 23, 1879, received his education in Cincinnati, where he lived from the age of six years until after he had attained man's estate. Upon leaving school he became a clerk in a grocery and for three years continued in that business.

Coming to California and to Bakersfield during 1901, Mr. Schultz proceeded direct to the Kern river field and secured employment as a roustabout. The exercise of ability brought him merited promotion. As a tool-dresser he proved efficient, as a driller he made good, and in a short time he rose to be superintendent of a company, where as in the less important posts of duty he displayed energy, discrimination and sagacity. At the time of his arrival in the Sunset field Jewell & Blodgett owned the principal interests, but the north end of the field was entirely undeveloped and the importance of the district as an oil center was not realized by the most optimistic residents. The Maricopa Oil Company owned forty acres lying in the southwest quarter of section 1, 12-23, and out of this tract they leased seventeen acres to the Gate City Oil Company, which later bought the land and platted the town site of Maricopa. As early as 1903 an extension of the Sunset Railroad had been built to Monarch (practically the nucleus of Maricopa), but it was not until some time afterward that the seventeen acres on section 1 were platted and sold. Upon the incorporation of Maricopa in 1910 other lands were included in the town site, so that now the town lies on sections 1, 2, 11 and 12, township 12, range 23. Even as early as 1902 Mr. Schultz was familiar with the tract where the present city stands. The possibility of oil discoveries had led him to this locality. For some time he had engaged with a firm of contract drillers. The first well that he drilled for the Maricopa Oil Company came in as a gusher and this led to his appointment as superintendent and general manager of the lease. Later he became interested in the property.

In 1906 a corporation known as the Maricopa Road Oil and Development Company was organized with the late Capt. F. F. Weed as secretary and Mr. Schultz as general manager. Four wells were drilled, all proving to be good producers. In the fall of 1908 the Maricopa Road Oil and Development Company sold out to the Gate City Oil Company. The two gentlemen worked together in the utmost harmony and with the most satisfactory results and acquired six hundred and forty acres of land in the gusher belt of the Midway field. The title to this land is held in the name of the Maricopa Investment Company, with Mr. Schultz as manager, while in addition he is manager of the Maple Leaf, Luxor and Maricopa Oil Companies, operating on the same section, namely: 22, 32-24.

WALLACE MELVIN MORGAN.—Mr. Morgan was born in De Soto, Johnson County, Kan., April 21, 1868. His father was Nelson Wallace Morgan, a native of New York, whose forebears had been residents of New York and the New England states since 1620. His mother was Jeanet Storms, also born in New York, of English-Dutch ancestry. They were married in Michigan, of which state both their families were pioneers, and moved to Kansas during the time when that territory was the principal battleground in the contest over the extension or restriction of slavery. When the Civil War began, Nelson W. Morgan enlisted in the First Kansas Infantry and served through the war. Except for a visit of a few months to her parents in Michigan, his wife, with three young children, remained in De Soto, a little town a few miles east of Lawrence, directly in the path of the guerilla bands that terrorized Eastern Kansas in the days when nearly all the able-bodied men of that section were fighting the larger battles in the East and South. In 1870 Nelson W. Morgan moved his family to Marshall County, Kan., where he took up a homestead close to the town of Irving, and a few years later moved to the latter place, where he conducted a wagon-making shop during the remainder of his active life.

The subject of this sketch grew up in Irving and was educated in the public school of that place with a few months' additional instruction in a little college at Holton, Kan. Up to the time he was twenty-one, outside of the months he spent in school, he worked on farms in the summer, chopped wood in winter, quarried rock, worked in a railroad grading camp, lived a generally vigorous out-door life, and acquired a greater or less degree of proficiency in several of the building trades to which his early intimacy with the wagon-making shop had afforded him a natural introduction.

In December, 1889, crops and the general business and industrial outlook in Kansas being uniformly bad, Morgan, then just past twenty-one years of age, followed the family instinct to go West, and bought a ticket to Bakersfield, Cal. After six months spent on a Rosedale raisin vineyard, he went to Miramonte in the artesian belt in the northern part of the county, where he homesteaded a quarter-section of land, farmed and raised a little livestock until June, 1902, when he bought the Delano Record and moved to that place.

Meantime, on February 18, 1896, he was married to Frances Howard Raymond, a native of San Francisco, daughter of George A. Raymond and Mary Hatch Raymond. Mr. Raymond is a son of one of the early California pioneers and a descendant, through his mother's family, of Abraham Howard, who came to New England in 1722. One of Mrs. Raymond's ancestors was Capt. Thomas White, one of the original settlers of Weymouth and a resident of Plymouth in 1635. After a nine-months' apprenticeship in country journalism in which both Mr. and Mrs. Morgan learned enough about the art preservative to get out a little weekly paper without assistance at any stage of its manufacture, they came to Bakersfield, where Mr. Morgan took a place on the newsgathering staff of the Morning Echo.

Alexis Flagg Lowell

Luella, Lowell,

Since April, 1903, Mr. Morgan has been continuously with the Morning Echo. In the summer of 1904 S. C. Smith, editor and principal owner of the Echo, began a successful campaign for election to Congress, and delegated to the subject of this sketch the duty of editorial writing. Since that time, with one or two intermissions of two or three weeks each, nearly all of the editorials in the Echo have been his work. In addition he filled the position of city editor for a part of the time, and at all times has been one of the paper's general newsgatherers. Since Mr. Smith's death in January, 1913, the editorial direction of the paper has been in his hands.

Mr. and Mrs. Morgan have one daughter, Frances, born in Bakersfield on September 6, 1903.

ALEXIS FLAGG LOWELL.—The family of which Alexis F. Lowell is a member comes of English extraction and exhibits the qualities inherent in that race. The initial period of American development found the name transplanted to the soil of New England, where a number of generations has lived and labored and where it is still worthily represented by men of intelligence and patriotism. Genealogical records show that John Lowell devoted his entire life to agriculture in New England. His son, William, a native of Olney, Me., learned the trade of ship carpenter in youth and for years engaged in the occupation, together with that of farming. Late in life he joined his sons in California and died in Bakersfield. By his marriage to Mary Tyler, a native of Maine, he became the father of six sons, of whom Wilmot, Danville and William Harrison died in Bakersfield, which city is still the home of John and Alexis Flagg. The only son who remained in the east was Henry H., who died in Boston, November 20, 1912.

The youngest of the sons, Alexis, was born at Concord, Me., November 19, 1846, and attended schools in his native township, where also at an early age he acquired a thorough knowledge of farm duties. An older brother, Wilmot, had come to California about 1862, and in 1873 he joined him here. For two years he engaged in the sheep industry near Hollister with that brother. During 1875 they removed the flock to Kern county and established their headquarters at Bakersfield. Here for a year or two they were exceptionally successful. Their flocks grazed on the Greenhorn mountains and along the plains, where an abundance of pasturage was to be found. However, the severe drought of 1877 completely changed conditions and wiped out all of their profits, so that their flock of four thousand was reduced to a scant four hundred. With undaunted courage the brothers began anew. Fortunately they were not again called upon to sustain such a loss or endure such a drought. When they disposed of their flocks about 1887 they did so at a fair profit. About that time they bought three hundred and twenty acres adjoining Bakersfield. This tract they devoted to general farm products and to fruit, particularly to peaches. Eventually the property was sold and a portion subdivided as the Lowell addition to Bakersfield, but Alexis F., having a fondness for the place, bought back twenty acres and planted it to fruit. He continued to superintend the acreage and care for the trees until 1910, when he disposed of the entire tract with the exception of the corner occupied by his residence. In addition he owns six houses in the Lowell addition, as well as other property in the city, and these various places he oversees personally. With that exception he has retired from all business activities, nor does he take any part in fraternal organizations, nor in politics aside from the casting of a Republican ballot at all national elections.

It was the good fortune of Mr. Lowell to have the cheerful co-operation and capable assistance of an appreciated helpmate. Mrs. Luella (Rogers) Lowell was born in Vanderburg county, Ind., and was next to the youngest among five children, all of whom attained maturity. Her parents, Samuel Curtis and Marilla J. (Sirkle) Rogers, were natives respectively of New Hampshire and Indiana. Early in life Mr. Rogers became a resident of Indiana and took up a raw tract of land, which he developed into a productive farm. During the summer of 1852 he crossed the plains to California and engaged in mining, but without any gratifying returns. Determining to resume his profession of teacher, he went to Santa Clara county, where he opened and founded the first public school in the county. About three years later he went back to Indiana and resumed farm pursuits. However, the lure of the west had sent its call to his soul and in 1867 conditions were such that he decided to remove his family to Arizona. The trip was made with wagon and ox-teams and he settled in Prescott, where he found employment as a teacher, in addition to which he engaged in general farming, and while living there he also served as internal revenue collector at Prescott. After the death of his wife, which occurred in Arizona, he came to California and spent his last days in the home of his daughter, Mrs. Lowell. Here he passed away in 1909. Another bereavement came to Mrs. Lowell in 1910, when the second son of the family, Raymond Lowell, was called from the home by death. There still survive two sons, William Curtis and Alexis, who are the pride of their parents and in whose welfare they maintain the deepest concern.

THOMAS H. SMITH.—For fifty years Mr. Smith has been an active factor in the agricultural upbuilding of the remote but rich valley where he owns valuable holdings in land and stock and where, in the calm fruition of a life worthily spent, he is passing the twilight of a useful existence beneath his own vine and fig tree and surrounded by evidences of his thrifty management. It is said that his was the second family to locate in this valley and certain it is that none surpasses him in point of long and intimate association with the locality. A typical pioneer in temperament, he was well qualified for the hardships of the frontier and the loneliness of an isolated cattle ranch. As he pursued the even tenor of his way, adding to his acreage and increasing his herds, he did not neglect his duties as a citizen, but gave liberally to community movements and especially interested himself in the starting of schools, for he was solicitous that the young people of the community should receive excellent educations. Known and honored for miles in every direction from his homestead, he is recognized as a pioneer who aided in the local upbuilding and who achieved success in local enterprises. His own individual success proves the possibilities of the valley and laid the foundation of the extensive stock business continued satisfactorily by his son, Thomas S., represented elsewhere in this volume.

Descended from an ancient Anglo-Saxon family, Thomas H. Smith was born in Bristol, England, in 1824, and from early life followed the sea. In the course of several voyages he saw much of the world and visited many important ports, but he finally decided to locate permanently in the United States. For his wife he chose Miss Sophia M. Whittock, who was born at Salem, Washington county, Ohio, in 1829, being the granddaughter (on the maternal side) of Major Stanley, an illustrious officer in the war of 1812. The young couple were married at Salem and remained there for some time, but in 1853 Mr. Smith, leaving his wife in Ohio, came to California via Panama. Three years later Mrs. Smith came via the same route and joined him at Oakland, where he had engaged in clerking. During 1859 the family removed from Oakland to Tulare county and Mr. Smith took up land near Visalia, where he embarked in ranching. In 1862 he crossed the line into Kern county and located a claim on the South Fork of the Kern river, where the following year he was joined by his family. As time passed his fields grew larger, his tracts more widely extended and his herd of cattle more important, so that the brand 13 then, as now, became known far and near. It became apparent to him at an early period of his identification with the valley that he must take steps to secure irrigation facilities. Accordingly he took out what is now the oldest ditch at the head of the river, thus bringing under irrigation some four hundred acres of excellent land.

Thomas & Jane
Mrs J. H. Smith

Because his large ranching interests have kept Mr. Smith remote from the great centers of population, it must not be supposed that he has neglected any duty devolving upon a public-spirited citizen or that he has failed to keep posted concerning national problems. In politics he staunchly upholds Republican principles. An abiding faith in the uplifting influence of religion has deepened his character and harmonized the elements entering into his mentality. For years he and his wife have been earnest Methodists, loyal to the church of their choice and generous in contributions to missionary and benevolent causes. Of their six children three attained mature years and two survive. One daughter, Sophia, became the wife of J. B. Batz and is living in Bakersfield. The other, Henrietta, Mrs. J. H. Powers, died in the South Fork district. The only son, Thomas S., is represented elsewhere.

EDWARD D. GILLETTE.—As an active, benign personality combining successful business achievement with the highest social, moral and political ideals, Mr. Gillette stands out prominently among the production men in the Midway oil field and particularly on 25 Hill. Since April of 1909 he has been the efficient superintendent of the T. W. Oil Company, whose holding on section 25, township 32, range 23, now shows five producing wells with a monthly production of twenty thousand barrels. In addition he has been appointed superintendent of the W. T. M. Oil Company, also on 25, 32, 23, with six producing wells that average a monthly production of twenty thousand barrels; and the Carbo-Petroleum Oil Company, on 26-32-23, with eleven producing wells and a monthly production of twelve thousand barrels. The two other organizations of which he is superintendent (the Los Posos Oil Company and the San Francisco Midway Oil Company) have no producing wells at present and are now idle, while the Los Angeles Midway Oil Company, on 6-31-23, which he owns, also has proved to be unproductive. In the management of the producing companies there is, however, sufficient responsibility to engross the time of even so energetic and forceful a superintendent as Mr. Gillette. Withal he has found leisure to identify himself with influences uplifting to the community.

Not only is Mr. Gillette a native son, but his parents, James O. and Augusta E. (Murley) Gillette, likewise are natives of the state, the latter born and reared in Alameda county. The paternal grandfather, James Gillette, the first civil engineer in Humboldt county, this state, started on a surveying expedition in 1849, and in order to take advantage of a short cut to his destination he left the other members of the party. When he failed to put in an appearance a search was made and his body was found where he had been shot by Indians. For many years James O. Gillette has engaged in ranching in Monterey county and there Edward D. was born July 29, 1877. There were three sons in the family. The eldest, Robert L., a skilled machinist, learned the trade with the Union iron works in San Francisco and helped to build the great battleship, Oregon. While still a young man he died of appendicitis. The second son, Nathaniel, who studied assaying and became a practical miner, now owns the Gold Hill, a placer claim near the home ranch in Monterey county. The third son, Edward D., was five years of age when the family removed to Santa Cruz, the father carrying on a lumber business in that city. After two years a return was made to Monterey county and to the old homestead in the Chelam valley.

where the lad was sent to the grammar school until he had completed the course. He had no higher educational advantages. Through wide general reading he has become well informed. When only sixteen years of age he began to operate a threshing machine and he continued at the work for three years, meanwhile threshing thousands of bushels of wheat. When nineteen he went to the Santa Margarita oil fields in San Luis Obispo county and there secured employment in hewing out timber for oil derricks and rigs. Next he worked as a roustabout, then as tool-dresser and rig-builder. After some experience as tool-dresser with the San Luis Obispo Oil Company he was transferred back to Parkfield, Monterey county. Eleven holes were drilled there, but no oil was found, nor was he much more fortunate at San Pablo, where he drilled three holes and found two dry and one with only ten barrels.

Left penniless by these disastrous experiences, the young man drilled a water well for the Santa Fe Railroad Company at Point Richmond and in that way earned money enough to pay his expenses to the Kern river field. Arriving here, he went to work for the Associated Oil Company and became superintendent on the Green and Whittier division of that concern. When he resigned his position, July 1, 1908, at the expiration of five years of continuous service, he had thoroughly learned the production part of the oil industry. In the Sunset field he spent one year with the Sunset Road Oil Company and when that concern became the property of the Union Oil Company he remained about ninety days with the new crew, in order that the Union employes might become acquainted with the location and outputs of the wells. During that period, in addition to his responsibilities on the field, he owned the hospital at Maricopa. On leaving the Sunset he was offered the superintendency of the T. W. Oil Company, which he accepted and has since filled. At the time of his first association with the lease well No. 1 had been condemned as hazardous and unprofitable. After drilling twenty-nine days he secured an average of four hundred barrels and there is now a daily average of two hundred and fifty barrels. The well was the first profitable venture of the kind on the south side of 25 Hill, where John Conley had first discovered oil and where the Sunset Coast Oil Company had brought in the first well. The pioneers of the hill were Messrs. Barlow and Hill, of Bakersfield.

Fraternally Mr. Gillette belongs to Bakersfield Camp No. 266, B. P. O. E. For some years he has been a director in the First National Bank of Taft. His first marriage took place in 1906 and united him with Miss Helen D. Campbell, of San Francisco, who died in 1907 when her child, Isabelle Helen, was only thirty days old. In 1910 Mr. Gillette was united with Mrs. Constance H. Wilson, widow of Dr. W. C. Wilson, of South Africa, and a daughter of William Harshaw, of Toronto, Canada. The attractive residence of Mr. Gillette on the W. T. & M. lease affords a decided improvement on the primitive conditions in the oil fields, when canvas tents served as houses. Often Mr. Gillette mentions the fact that the first night on his present lease he spent in a rude shack built on posts over a rough board floor, under which, the first sight to greet his eyes as he awakened in the morning, he saw three rattlesnakes ready for action. No local movement is of deeper interest to him than the growth of the Petroleum Club, which owes its organization in part to his energy and enthusiasm. In addition to his prominent work in the Petroleum Club and in other local enterprises, Mr. Gillette has been a booster for good roads and maintains a warm interest in the "Three Hours to the Coast" movement, for no one realizes more than he the value to the oil fields (and to all of Kern county as well) of a first-class highway leading to the ocean.

HARRY F. MURDOCK.—The city clerk of Bakersfield traces his lineage to the Old Dominion and bears the name of his paternal grandfather, a Virginian of fine family and irreproachable character, who removed to Illinois when migration was at its flood tide and settled at Vandalia, Fayette county. Having acquired skill in the carpenter's trade during youth, he gave attention to that occupation and for years made a specialty of building contracts. Such work occupied his attention in Vandalia until the infirmities of advancing years prevented manual labor. His death occurred in Illinois in 1910. Under his wise supervision a son, E. E., born in Bond county, Ill., had been trained to a thorough knowledge of carpentering and had entered upon contracting and building, these activities filling the entire period of his business career. At this writing he makes his home in Omaha, Neb., and though no longer active, he retains full possession of mental and physical faculties and keeps abreast with current affairs of city and nation. His wife, who like himself claims Bond county, Ill., as her native home, bore the maiden name of Emma Gill and was a daughter of James Gill, a Virginian by birth and ancestry. Subsequent to his removal from the Old Dominion Mr. Gill followed the occupation of a stage-driver on the plank road between St. Louis and Vandalia.

The family of E. E. and Emma Murdock comprised three sons and one daughter, all still living, the eldest being Harry F., who was born in Bond county, Ill., September 22, 1871, and received excellent advantages in the grammar and high schools of Greenville, that county. After he had completed the high-school course he spent three years in Greenville College and then gave up educational interests in order to earn his own way in the world. Going to St. Louis he entered the office of the "Big Four" Railroad and held clerkships in different departments, but at the outbreak of the Spanish-American war resigned the position in order to enlist in the service. His name was placed upon the muster rolls of Battery L, First United States Artillery, in Indianapolis, Ind., and soon he was appointed to special duty in the paymaster's department, serving at Pensacola, Fla., until he received an honorable discharge by reason of the adjutant-general's orders.

Immediately after his return from the south Mr. Murdock came to California during the autumn of 1898 and entered the Southern Pacific Railroad offices at San Francisco. The following year he came to Kern as a clerk in the superintendent's office of the operating department with the Southern Pacific Railroad and in a short time was promoted to be paymaster, which position he filled for some years. During July of 1910 he retired from the railroad service. Meanwhile in 1908 he had been elected town clerk of Kern. Upon the consolidation of Kern and Bakersfield July 19, 1910, he was elected city clerk of the new consolidated city. At the regular election in April, 1911, he was chosen to serve as city clerk for a term of four years and he has devoted his time and attention to official duties, having his office in the Producers Bank building. Realizing the need of securing a new and adequate supply of water for Kern, or East Bakersfield, the old Sumner Water Company having failed to keep pace with the growth and to supply the needs of the place, he began individually in 1911 to lay plans to interest people of that section in a new company to take over the old franchise and put in a new water plant and system. He secured an option on the plant for S. W. Wible and organized the Bakersfield Water Company, of which he became secretary and treasurer and one of the largest stockholders. This company sunk five wells and put in three pumping plants and a modern system at present sufficient for a period of twenty years. Since the plant's completion he has resigned his official position and management of the company in order to devote his time to other improvements which he is fostering, which are of general interest in the welfare of the community. It should be stated that the completion of the new water system for East Bakersfield has established renewed confidence in that section as shown in the activities of improvement and building that is now going on. In national principles Mr. Murdock favors Republican tenets, but he is not a partisan in any respect and his election to office represents the choice of the people irrespective of political ties. The Spanish-American War Veterans number him among their most interested and loyal members and he is further connected with the Eagles and Woodmen of the World. Since coming to Bakersfield he has purchased property and maintains an active interest in realty developments here and in adjacent communities. His family consists of wife and three children, Elizabeth, Kelton and Virginia, Mrs. Murdock formerly having been Miss Margaret Clay, a resident of St. Louis, Mo., but a member of an old Tennessee family and herself a native of Nashville.

HORACE GREELEY PARSONS.—Thirty years after the Mayflower had made its memorable voyage across the ocean to the new world the first representatives of the Parsons family in America came from England and settled among the colonists of Massachusetts, whence a later generation became transplanted upon New Hampshire soil. When the tide of migration began to turn toward the new west Jonathan Parsons removed from his native New Hampshire and settled upon the prairies of Wisconsin, where he developed a farm out of raw land in the primeval condition of nature. In his family was a son, Samos, born and reared in New Hampshire and during early manhood a business man of Dunkirk, N. Y., where he engaged in the manufacture of fanning mills. Later he made a somewhat brief sojourn in Ontario, Canada, whence he removed to Wisconsin and settled in Waukesha county. In addition to the difficulty connected with the developing of a large tract of raw land into a productive farm he gave considerable time to public affairs and served efficiently as a justice of the peace and postmaster. Eventually he became a citizen of Whitewater, Walworth county, Wis., and a stockholder in the Esterly reaper factory. Selling out his interests there in 1874 he came to California and purchased a home in Santa Clara county, where occurred the demise of his wife, Sophronia (Burt) Parsons, a native of New York. His own life was spared to the age of ninety years, when he died at his home. In his family there were four sons and two daughters. Two of the sons were gallant soldiers during the Civil war and one of these, Silas, was killed at Chickamauga while bravely fighting with the Twenty-fourth Wisconsin Infantry. The other soldier son, William, served in the Thirteenth Wisconsin Infantry and remained at the front throughout the entire four years of the war; his death occurred in 1911 in Santa Clara county.

The youngest member of the family circle, Horace Greeley Parsons, was born in Waukesha county, Wis., August 19, 1847, and received a grammar-school education at Whitewater, that state, later spending a year in the University of Wisconsin. When yet a mere lad he learned the trade of a printer and in it became exceptionally expert. A brother-in-law, L. H. Rann, publisher of the Whitewater Register, began to fail in health and at his solicitation Mr. Parsons agreed to take charge of the paper, which he did with considerable success, having the management of the sheet after the death of the brother-in-law and until the sale of the plant. Later for three years he published the Blue Valley Record at Milford, Seward county, Nebr. At the expiration of that time he moved the plant to Lincoln, that state, and merged the sheet into the Lincoln Leader, a well-known daily. A year later he sold the paper and plant and shortly afterward in 1874 he came to California, where he secured work at his trade in San Francisco. By carefully saving his wages he was able to open a printing office of his own and in it he published twelve or more periodicals, including The Pacific (Congregational), The Pacific Methodist, California Christian Advocate, The Rescue, and other publications. The business proved fairly profitable, but it was too confining for his health and he was obliged to seek other lines of activity. Selling out he began to travel for the Dewey Publishing Company and for eight years he remained steadily in their employ, meanwhile traveling from San Diego as far north as Seattle. After three or four years as publisher of the Grass Valley Tidings and owner of a one-half interest, he returned to the employ of the Dewey Publishing Company, this time traveling in their interests for six years.

H. G. Parsons

When the oil excitement was bringing many newcomers to Kern county Mr. Parsons became a resident of Bakersfield in 1900 and the following year embarked in the real-estate business. For a time he was a member of the firm of Williams & Parsons, but since 1906 he has been alone. The distinction of being, in point of years of continuous business, the oldest real-estate agent in Bakersfield belongs to him. City realty and country property have been handled by him with equal success. Besides improving a ranch of one hundred and sixty acres he has been interested in orange properties in the Edison section and in other lands. At his office on Chester avenue is located the agency for the Provident Building & Loan Association of Los Angeles and the Continental Building & Loan Association of San Francisco, also the agency for six of the leading insurance companies of the world, viz.: Hartford, New Zealand, Scottish Union and National, Law Union and Rock, Manchester of London and Teutonia of New Orleans. Deeply interested in the progress of Bakersfield, he has officiated for two terms as a director of its board of trade and has ranked among its most resourceful members. All movements for the local upbuilding receive his stanch support. He was one of the organizers of Bakersfield Realty Board and was elected its first president and is now serving his third term.

Mr. Parsons' marriage was solemnized in Nevada City, Cal., and united him with Miss Anne Naffziger, who was born near Keokuk, Iowa, and is a graduate of the Laurel Hall school in San Mateo county. Gifted with exceptional artistic ability, she has devoted herself to music from young girlhood and completed the course in the New England Conservatory of Music at Boston. After her graduation from that noted school she became a teacher of the art and built up a wide reputation for skill as an instructor as well as for proficiency as a pianist. Two children were born of her marriage to Mr. Parsons, the elder being Carrie, wife of George D. Keller, of Los Angeles, and the younger being Horace G., Jr., who is interested in a drug business in Fresno.

MILTON DALLAS BERINGER.—Born in Cambria county, Pa., December 5, 1858, Mr. Beringer is a son of John Beringer, a farmer by occupation. The latter moved across the line from Cambria county into Clearfield county and spent his last days at Burnside, where still lives the aged mother, Mary Jane (Patrick) Beringer. There were seven children in the family, namely: Milton Dallas; George Elmore; Porter Jesse, a machinist now employed at Tyrone, Pa.; A. L., an assistant to his eldest brother in the Kern river oil field; John Oscar, a farmer, who remains at the old Pennsylvania homestead; Charles; and Olie, the widow of Clarence McAleese and a resident of Parsborough, Nova Scotia. The youngest son, Charles, was accidentally killed in 1906 at a railroad crossing in Pittsburg, Pa.; he left a wife but no children.

While yet a mere boy M. D. Beringer aided his father on the home farm and earned extra money as a helper in lumber camps. At the age of fourteen years he secured employment as trimmer and edger with the Empire Lumber and Mining Company of Philadelphia. After he had spent four years with the same concern he went south to North Carolina and secured work as a lumberman in Mitchell county, where he met and married Miss Callie Franklin, daughter of the late Andrew Franklin, of Eltopark, Mitchell county. Two years were spent in that locality and he then removed to Little River, Blount county, Tenn., where he remained for four years in the employ of a lumber company. From Tennessee in 1907 he came to California and settled in the Kern river oil field. Without delay he was able to secure a position as engineer with a natural gas engine used in the Central Point division of the Associated Oil Company and he continued in that place until 1910, when he was chosen as foreman of the waterworks system of the Kern River Oil Fields of California, Limited. With his family, consisting of wife and four children, Charles D., George E., Margaret and Mabel, he is comfortably domiciled in the residence of the superintendent.

DANIEL BOONE NEWELL.—From Kentucky many men have come out to the West who have made their marks as citizens and public officials and been factors in the general development of the community. One such is Daniel Boone Newell, of Bakersfield, who bears the name of a distinguished pioneer and has himself won a notable success in the home of his adoption. He was born May 20, 1865, at Antioch Mills, Pendleton county, Ky. His father, William Stich Newell, a native of Pennsylvania, was brought to Pendleton county by his parents. There he became a prosperous farmer and stockman and remained until 1889, when he took up land near Perkins, Lincoln county, Okla., where he improved a farm on which he died aged eighty-five years. He was descended remotely from Scotch ancestors. His wife, before their marriage Miss Mary Williams, was born in Pendleton county, Ky., and died while on a visit to Bakersfield when she was seventy-two years old.

Of the eleven children comprising the parental family ten grew to manhood and womanhood. Daniel B., the seventh oldest, was early put to work on a farm in Kentucky and had brief educational opportunities in public schools, at the age of thirteen taking up the battle of life for himself. Locating in Hickman county, Ky., he worked there for an uncle until 1881, when he went to Fort Worth, Tex., which town was then primitive and without a railroad. There he engaged in farming and stock-raising and he and his brother John bought land. They were quite successful and accumulated considerable money, which they lost, however, by failure of a bank in Fort Worth to which they had intrusted it. From Fort Worth Mr. Newell went to Winfield, Kan., where he farmed until 1888, when he came to California, without capital. He and a partner, Charles Hess, came together to Kern county, having only twenty-five cents between them. They found employment with John Hendrickson as choppers of cord wood at $2 a cord. After they had completed a contract for five hundred cords Mr. Newell found work in the bridge department of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, in which he was employed about four years. Then becoming a citizen of Tehachapi, he followed carpentering during the first winter and then he purchased the Cuddeback stable and ran it about one year, after which he traded it for a farming outfit. For two years he engaged in grain-raising on two sections of land, but both years proved dry and the venture did not turn out successfully. In the meantime, in 1892, he had been elected constable, in which capacity he served two years to the entire satisfaction of all interested. For six years afterward he was the proprietor of a feed yard at Garlock, and at the same time he tried mining on the desert without success. In 1901 he located in Bakersfield. For a short time he was employed in the work of the street department, and after that he was for about four years a street car motorman. July 5, 1905, he was appointed an officer on the city police force. In 1906 he was elected on the Republican ticket as constable for the sixth judicial township of Kern, and in January, 1907, he assumed the duties of the office. So able and so satisfactory was his service that in 1910 he was re-elected to serve until January, 1915. Since 1903 he has filled the office of deputy sheriff of Kern county. He was made a Mason in Tehachapi Lodge No. 313, F. & A. M., and affiliates with the Woodmen of the World and the Modern Woodmen of America. Mrs. Newell is a member of the Order of the Eastern Star and of L. O. T. M.

D. B. Newell

At Tehachapi Mr. Newell married Miss Kate Davis, a daughter of James L. and Martha (Moffett) Davis, and a native of Los Angeles, Cal. Her father, who was born in Missouri, moved to Arkansas and there married Miss Moffett, of Tennessee birth. They crossed the plains to California with an ox-team caravan in 1853, and he was for many years successful as a builder in Los Angeles. He pursued the same business after his removal in 1882 to Bakersfield, where he and his wife both passed away. Of their ten children Mrs. Newell was the third youngest. She was brought up at Bakersfield and educated in local public schools. She has borne her husband two children, Roy and Elsa. Mr. Newell owns his comfortable residence at No. 1015 I street. He is locally active in the work of the Republican party and is a citizen of much public spirit.

CHESSMAN J. CHADWICK.—The remarkable development of the oil industry in the Kern river fields may be attributed in large degree to the energy and ability of the men connected therewith and not the least important of these is Chessman J. Chadwick, whose first identification with the business in Kern county dates back to the year 1901 and who now fills a very responsible position as general foreman of the Columbian, M. and S., and the Lorenzo Oil Companies, all located on section 29, township 28, range 28. In addition he has the foremanship of the Minnehaha Water Company, legally organized as the Minnehaha Oil Company, whose lease is located on section 19, township 28, range 28.

Shortly after the discovery of gold in the west Benjamin D. Chadwick left his eastern home and sailed around the Horn for California, where he landed safely, but without means or friends. In order to secure funds necessary for mining he became a sea-faring man and sailed on vessels between San Francisco and Panama. Later he was a pioneer placer miner in Yuba and Nevada counties. For seventeen years he made his home in Nevada county. Rising to prominence in his chosen occupation, he was elected president of the Sailor Flat Hydraulic Mining Company and continued to superintend the business policy of the organization until its operations were discontinued by reason of the filling in of the Sacramento river at that point. His death occurred in 1903. His widow, who bore the maiden name of Mary A. Landing, resides in Hanford, Kings county, and at the age of sixty-two is physically and mentally well preserved.

Out of a family of four sons and four daughters all are still living except two sons. The eldest of the eight, Chessman J., was born in Yuba county, Cal., June 11, 1869, and grew to manhood in Nevada City, where he supplemented a country school education by a course of study in Potter's Academy. When a mere boy he was accustomed to assist his father in mining operations and at the age of sixteen he devoted his entire time to placer and quartz mining. For two years he was employed in the Sierra Butte mine at Sierra City and for some years he continued to work in the mines of Nevada county. Later he leased a hydraulic proposition at Bloomfield and this he operated with considerable profit. When oil was discovered at Coalinga, Fresno county, about seventeen years ago, he went to that point and secured employment as a tool-dresser. Little more than a year was spent in that place, after which he spent about the same time in the Los Angeles oil fields, coming thence to Bakersfield in 1901 and engaging with a contractor to drill on the Sacramento lease. Next he drilled on the Sterling and later continued as its foreman under Messrs. Henderson and Martin. Six busy years were spent with the Sterling and when he resigned there he traveled through Nevada, visiting mines of importance, among them those at Tonopah and Goldfield. Upon his return to the Kern river fields in 1908 he immediately was appointed general foreman of the Expansion and soon was promoted to be superintendent, but when that organization was overtaken by the Traders he returned to the foremanship and for the past few years has been retained in that capacity by the Columbian, M. & S., and Lorenzo Oil Companies, also by the Minnehaha Oil Company. Politically he votes the Republican ticket.

HON. PAUL W. BENNETT.—Rarely is there to be found in a community a man so deeply honored, so thoroughly respected or so generally beloved as was the Hon. Paul W. Bennett, whose association with Bakersfield covered the period from 1897 until June, 1913, when he passed from his earthly labors. As Judge of the Superior Court of Kern county for the past ten years, he had proved himself one of the state's ablest jurists, commanding the attention of many outside of the county who frequently called upon him to hear important cases away from Bakersfield and the surrounding county.

Judge Bennett's birth occurred in Gloucester, Mass., in 1836, and had he lived until June 12, 1913, he would have celebrated his seventy-seventh birthday. His early days were passed in Canada, but as he grew up he evinced a desire to see the west and accordingly sailed from Boston, round the Horn, to San Francisco, whence he made his way to Sonoma county and lived there a short time. Mining then attracted him and he went to the mines and subsequently became a resident of the Owens River valley, in order to investigate the country. When Inyo county was organized he became an undersheriff, at which time the study of law was taking all of his spare time. In 1868 he received the appointment of district attorney of Inyo county and election by the people to a second term followed. Independence had been his place of residence for some time, but he found it expedient for him to go to Mono county, as he there formed a partnership with the late Senator Pat Reddy, the firm of Reddy & Bennett becoming well known throughout the entire mining sections of Nevada and California. Through handling numerous mining suits Judge Bennett became an acknowledged authority on mining law. In 1884 he went to Stockton to practice his profession and there was associated at different times with J. C. Campbell, David Terry and F. D. Nicol. His unusual ability was soon recognized, he was elected district attorney, but retired after one term.

The year 1897 brought Judge Bennett to Bakersfield, where he formed a partnership with the late J. W. Ahern. His reputation had preceded him and his associations with the court work there brought him immediate attention; his clientele was large and his wise, unerring judgment was sought by scores. With the creation of a second Superior Court department Judge Bennett was named as judge by former Governor George C. Pardee, and he remained on the bench continuously until his death. He was re-elected after a partial term and at a subsequent election he was nominated by both political parties and chosen without opposition, which was evidence of his popularity and the deep regard in which he was held by his fellow citizens. Many important cases came under his hearing and he presided over many notable ones, not the least of which was the great irrigation suit in San Bernardino that had to do with the use of subterranean water, and his decision in that case governs the use of such waters throughout the state today.

Like many other strong public characters, Judge Bennett was not a partisan, though a Republican of the old school. Nevertheless Democrats and Republicans alike followed in his support and he was the friend and associate of many of the foremost Democrats in the state.

John Hickey

Sarah E. Hickey

Judge Bennett left a widow, who before her marriage was Sarah B. Potter, a native of Maine. An only child, a daughter, passed away a few years ago. Judge Bennett was in fraternal circles a Knight Templar and a member of the Elks, and his associates in both bodies mourned the loss of a loyal, high-minded and conscientious member. The loss to Bakersfield was irreparable, to the county it proved to be deep and sorrowful, for the judge was loved not alone for his ability and broad-mindedness, but for his unselfishness and sweet, wholesome character.

JOHN HICKEY.—Only those familiar with the hardships and sacrifices incident to the labors of a pioneer preacher can grasp with understanding the record of the life of John Hickey, who while earning a livelihood in another occupation labored with unwearied zeal as a local minister in the Methodist Episcopal denomination. As early as 1868, while yet living in Illinois, he was licensed as an exhorter and there began the work which has since become so dear to him. Upon coming to California he found great need of such Christian work as he could offer and his was not the spirit to stand aloof when the harvest was ripe and the laborers few.

Born in Ireland in 1848, John Hickey was brought to America by an aunt in his childhood and settled in Illinois. There was nothing unusual in the disposition of the boy except his love of study and determination to secure a thorough education. With that object in view he worked at any honest occupation offered and saved his earnings with the utmost frugality. After he had finished the studies of the common schools at Godfrey, Ill., he began teaching and with the earnings he took a course in McKendree College at Lebanon, same state, and later attended the university at Mount Pleasant, Iowa. At the close of the sophomore year he left college and spent a year in Kearney, Buffalo county, Neb., as principal of the city schools. From there he came to California in 1875, and settled in Kern county. After teaching school in Bear valley he spent three years teaching the Woody School, Linns Valley district, then returned and taught for one year in Bear valley and for two years in Cummings valley. Meanwhile he had studied the soil and had become convinced of its possibilities for agriculture, hence he took up a pre-emption, settled on the land, later bought railroad land adjoining and finally acquired four hundred and eighty acres in one body. Until the farm became productive he taught school in Bear valley, and when he resigned there he was succeeded by S. C. Smith, who later became United States senator.

Discontinuance of work as an educator did not lessen the interest maintained by Mr. Hickey in the local schools and for twelve years he served as school trustee with the greatest efficiency. Meanwhile he was devoting much time also to his labors as an itinerant preacher, filling some pulpit almost every Sunday and aiding in the starting of congregations of his denomination. During the week he was busy with his ranch, where he raised grain and other crops, also developed quite a large herd of cattle, so that his brand, the letter P, became known all through that section of country. Finally feeling the imperative need of lightening his labors, he left the ranch in 1908 and removed to Tehachapi. For four years he managed the ranch from his town place and then in 1912 disposed of the property, since which time he has been retired.

Upon the incorporation of Tehachapi in 1910 Mr. Hickey was elected a member of the first board of trustees. At the general election he received a higher number of votes than any candidate. When the board was organized he was chosen chairman and now is deeply interested in the improvement of streets and the building of a water system. The village has in him a progressive citizen and loyal promoter. Its best interests have been carefully protected by him. In its citizenship he occupies a place of distinction. Fraternally he was made a Mason in Tehachapi Lodge No. 313, F. & A. M., and later became identified with the Los Angeles Consistory. His marriage, in Godfrey, Madison county, Ill., August 21, 1873, united him with Miss Laura E. Waggoner, a native of that place and a daughter of Samuel and Louise (Powell) Waggoner, natives respectively of Tennessee and Delaware. The five children of Mr. and Mrs. Hickey are natives of Kern county, but are now living elsewhere in the state. Edwin C. is employed with the Pacific Electric in Los Angeles; Mrs. Laura Edith Howland also lives in that city; John H. is connected with the Southern Pacific Company in San Luis Obispo; Mrs. Bertha L. Perkins lives in Los Angeles; and Morris L. has a position in San Luis Obispo.

GEORGE C. SPROULE.—At Oil Springs, Ontario, Canada, where he was born February 10, 1880, and where his parents, Jacob and Elizabeth (Hardman) Sproule, reside, George C. Sproule became familiar with the oil industry in childhood through the fact that his father was engaged as a driller and in other capacities around oil fields. The family had no means outside of the daily wages of the father. There were nine children and it was absolutely necessary that each one should become self-supporting at the earliest possible age. Therefore George C., who was sixth among the nine, had meager educational advantages, but at the age of sixteen was a contributor to the family maintenance. From being a roustabout in the Oil Springs field he was promoted to be a tool-dresser and for four years he followed that line of work, after which he became a driller. When nineteen years of age he came to the Kern river fields for the first time and secured employment as a tool-dresser. Next he drilled for Chancellor & Canfield in the Midway fields. After he had worked steadily in the Kern county fields for four years he returned to Canada, bought a one-third interest in a well-drilling outfit and embarked in independent contracting. Although he returned to California in 1906 he still owns an interest in the oil outfit, his partners being two brothers, John and Jacob Sproule.

Upon his return to the Kern river fields from his Canadian home Mr. Sproule engaged as a well puller on the Monte Cristo. Six months later he entered the employ of the Associated Oil Company and began to drill on the San Joaquin and Canfield divisions. For a time he worked as sub-foreman on the San Joaquin. During June of 1909 he was made foreman on the Green and Whittier division of the Associated and continued to fill the position with ability and devotion for three years. June 1, 1912, he resigned to become superintendent of the Enos Oil Company at an advance of salary. The Enos employs nine men and controls two hundred and twenty acres on section 6, township 29, range 28, where six producing wells (out of a total of twenty) give an average gross return of thirty-two hundred barrels of oil per month. It has not been possible for Mr. Sproule to identify himself with public affairs in his adopted country, for the duties of his position confine him closely to the oil fields. However, he is intelligently posted concerning public affairs and evinces a deep devotion toward the land of his adoption. Fraternally he holds membership with the Woodmen of the World. When he came to the west he had not yet established domestic ties, but in Kern county he formed the acquaintance of Miss Nora M. Barnes, a sister of Tom Barnes, the popular superintendent of the Associated Oil Company. Miss Barnes had come to the west from Conway, Laclede county, Mo., and August 21, 1909, she became the wife of Mr. Sproule in Kern county, where they have established a comfortable home in the oil fields. Their daughter, Imogene Elaine, was born here in 1911.

Mrs. W. E. Underwood

W. E. Underwood

WILLIAM E. UNDERWOOD.—Through long identification with the landed development of Kern county Mr. Underwood has been brought into intimate association with people similarly engaged and has acquired thorough knowledge of soils, climate, crops and methods of cultivation. An expensive series of experiments with different products, particularly with several varieties of grapes, finally convinced him that grain and alfalfa are the crops best adapted to successful growth in his district and hence he now specializes with these, adding thereto an important interest in the stock business and particularly in the dairy industry. When he arrived in Kern county February 3, 1890, he bought land in Rosedale colony and began its development. Now he owns two hundred and sixty-five acres under cultivation to alfalfa and grain and in addition he has on the farm about forty head of stock. When he first came to the colony he bought eighty acres and later added to the farm until he gave it adequate size for grain-raising. Besides the management of his farm he is interested financially in the Tejon Oil Company, operating in the Kern river field.

A member of a pioneer California family, William E. Underwood was born near Stockton, San Joaquin county, November 13, 1864, and is a son of Ezra Edwin and Mary (Hughes) Underwood, natives of Ohio and Pennsylvania. Ezra E. Underwood, who came of Colonial and Revolutionary stock, crossed the plains with ox teams in 1859 and engaged in grain farming in San Joaquin county. There he married his wife, who was a daughter of William H. Hughes, a native of Pennsylvania, afterwards a settler in Missouri, where his wife died. In 1849 he brought his children across the plains and settled at Sonora, later locating near what is now Ripon, where he followed stock-raising. Old Uncle Billie Hughes was well known in those parts, where he resided until his death. Ezra E. Underwood settled near Waterford, Stanislaus county, and was closely identified with the upbuilding of that county, being a member of the county board of supervisors. Upon retiring he removed to Santa Cruz, where he died October 7, 1911; his wife continues to reside in the same place. Of this union there were three children, William E. being the oldest; Alfred F. resides near Hollister; Herbert L. is a farmer and dairyman in the Panama district. After he had completed the studies of the public schools William E. was sent to University Mound College in San Francisco and afterwards to the Stockton Business College, so that from an educational standpoint he was well qualified for life's responsibilities. Leaving business college at the age of twenty years, he assumed the management of a ranch of sixteen hundred acres owned by his father and situated in Fresno county. The portion of the large tract under cultivation was devoted to wheat-growing and for five years he continued the oversight of the property, meanwhile, plowing, sowing, harvesting and threshing upon a very extensive scale. When he left Fresno county it was for the purpose of identifying himself with the new Rosedale colony, and he purchased the small tract six miles west of Bakersfield on the Rosedale road where he continues to reside, having, however, enlarged the farm by subsequent purchase. From 1890 to 1900 he devoted himself chiefly to the cultivation of grapes. This was not a success and in 1900 he embarked in dairying, which proved more profitable. Later he specialized with alfalfa, which is well suited to the soil and climate and is perhaps the most dependable and remunerative crop that could be grown in the district. On his ranch he has sunk three twelve-inch wells; on one ranch of one hundred and sixty acres he installed a fifty horse-power Western engine, which yields a capacity of two hundred inches of water. This latter property he is rapidly putting into alfalfa. He is a stockholder of the Security Trust Company of Bakersfield. He was married in Santa Cruz, January 1, 1890, to Miss Roxana J. Adams, born in Essex county, Vt., the daughter of Jonathan C. and Elizabeth (Babcock) Adams, born in Vermont. Her parents, who were farmers, still reside in Vermont.

Mrs. Underwood came to California in 1888. Her uncle, Moses Adams, was a pioneer of Modesto.

For some years Mr. Underwood has served as a clerk of the board of trustees of Fruitvale School District, and in this capacity his intelligence and sagacious judgment have been very helpful to the free educational system of the community. Politically he is a Republican in national issues. He has always stood for public improvement and organized and was president of the Rosedale Improvement Club, and through that organization set out shade trees on each side of the Rosedale road for eight miles between Rosedale and Bakersfield. For years he has been identified with Masonry and has enjoyed fraternal relations with Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M.

WILLIAM BREUCH.—The first representative of the Breuch family to seek a home in the new world was Peter Breuch, a native of Witzenburg, Germany, and a wheelwright by trade, who at the expiration of his apprenticeship when eighteen years of age crossed the seas to the United States and secured employment in Georgia. His marriage united him with Miss Johanna Wagner, a native of Georgia and now a resident of Denver, Colo. From the south he removed to Wisconsin prior to the opening of the Civil war and settled at Madison, where he was employed at the trade of wagon-maker. Twice during the progress of the Rebellion he offered his services to the Union, but each time he was rejected on account of injury to his leg. During 1871 he removed to Colorado and settled in Denver, where he resided until death, meanwhile engaging in business as a carriage-maker. Of his twelve children all but three are still living and the third in order of birth is William, born at Madison, Wis., July 18, 1864, and reared in Denver, Colo. At the age of eleven years he was taken from school and apprenticed to the trade of machinist in the Denver & Rio Grande shops in Denver, where he completed the trade prior to the age of eighteen. For eleven years altogether he continued in the same shops and meanwhile he had attended night schools, so that his education had not been entirely neglected.

After two years in the machine shops of the Union Pacific Railroad in Denver and three years in the shops of the same road at Como, Colo., Mr. Breuch spent several months at Pocatello, Ida., in the shops of the Oregon Short Line. Coming to California in June of 1890, he entered the Southern Pacific shops at East Bakersfield on the 1st of July, 1890, and there held a position as machinist. During 1901 he was promoted to be foreman of the machine shop, in which capacity he has continued up to the present time, being now the oldest employe in the plant in point of years of continuous service. He has given his attention very closely to his chosen work and has taken little interest in public affairs. Politically he is independent. After coming to Bakersfield he was made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., and he also holds membership with the Uniform Rank, Knights of Pythias, and the Woodmen of the World.

The residence of Mr. Breuch, erected under his personal supervision, stands at No. 508 Monterey street and is presided over by Mrs. Breuch, a lady of culture and gracious courtesy. Prior to their marriage, which was solemnized in Denver, July 23, 1885, she bore the name of Ella Sutherland. Born and reared in Denver, she had the advantages offered by the excellent schools of that city. At the time of her removal to California she was in such ill health that Colorado physicians had abandoned all hope of her recovery. Her present excellent health she attributes to the fine air and unexcelled climate of Bakersfield. The family of which she was a member and in which she was next to the eldest comprised fourteen children, seven of whom are now living. Her parents were Prof. Alexander and Anna (Mills) Sutherland, the former a native of England, the latter a southern lady. The paternal grandfather was a Scotchman by birth and ancestry and for years served as an officer in the English army, in which Alexander Sutherland also served as bandmaster and trumpeteer. During the memorable battle of Balaklava the trumpeteer served in the first platoon and sounded the first charge of the Light Brigade under Lord Carrigan. He was one of the few survivors of the charge and received a wound from which he never fully recovered. Upon leaving the army service he crossed the ocean to New York and for a time taught music in St. Joseph, Mo., but in 1859 crossed the plains to Denver, where he organized the first band in Colorado. For years he engaged in teaching band instruments and his reputation as a musician and instructor was the highest. His death occurred in Denver about 1908 and his wife died in that city thirteen years prior to his demise.

F. M. Barlock

FRANCIS M. CARLOCK.—The memorable era of the '50s found the Carlock family established among the pioneers of California. The father, George M. Carlock, who had taken his wife and children from Adams county, Ill., to Clark county, Mo., made only a brief sojourn in the latter location, but in the summer of 1853 brought his family to the coast via the Platte route, settling at Georgetown, Eldorado county, and trying his luck in nearby mines. Neither the occupation nor the locality proved satisfactory and accordingly he turned his attention to ranching in Washington and there spent his last days. By his marriage to Margaret E. Rohr, who was born in Germany and died in Kern county, Cal., he had a family of eight children. Of these we note the following: A. B., born February 8, 1833, is a resident of Portland, Ore.; Elizabeth, Mrs. Carter, born September 15, 1834, now lives at Lodi, Cal.; Jacob, born April 28, 1836, also makes his home at Lodi; Ervin W., born December 3, 1842, died at Ashland, Ore., October 14, 1912; Francis M. and Mary (twins), were born in Adams county, Ill., August 12, 1844, the latter, Mrs. Pease, dying near Lodi, Cal., at thirty-eight years of age; George H., born August 27, 1847, died in Oakland in November, 1911; and Hiram M., born May 28, 1855, makes Portland his home.

When a little less than nine years of age Francis M. Carlock crossed the plains with his parents and he recalls vividly his anxiety on account of the close proximity of the Indians. Their depredations among other emigrants were recounted frequently and caused him great concern as to their own safety, but the end came in due time and without any attacks from the savages. While he had limited opportunities to attend school he yet acquired an excellent education. After clerking a time at Ft. Jones, Siskiyou county, he entered Heald's Business College in San Francisco, from which he graduated in 1868. Returning to Siskiyou county he became head bookkeeper for his brother, A. B., in a mercantile business at Ft. Jones some distance from the railroad and near the mountains. During 1871 he went to Portland, Ore., and for a year was connected with a mercantile business, but in 1872 returned to California and became a pioneer of Bakersfield. The first residence in what is now East Bakersfield was built by him in 1874 and he also started in the lumber business there, but in a short time he moved his yards to what is now the corner of Chester avenue and Eighteenth street, Bakersfield. This was the first lumber yard in the town and for some time he carried on the business, but in 1889 the fire completely destroyed his yards and material, after which he did not resume the business. Altogether he was burned out three times and on two occasions, notwithstanding the fact that he had sustained a total loss, he rebuilt. From the time of his arrival in the city until 1904 he also engaged in the transfer business, eventually selling out and retiring from business activities. For thirty-two years his dray-teams were to be seen upon the streets.

Since his retirement from the transfer business Mr. Carlock has given his attention to looking after his varied interests. In East Bakersfield he has held valuable property, including a residence on the corner of Kern and Humboldt streets and four stores. It is his intention to improve some of the vacant property he now owns. Some years ago he built the Overland stables on Eighteenth street and in 1888 erected a residence at No. 1623 H street, both of which he still owns. From its organization he has been interested in the Superior Oil Company operating at Maricopa and in addition he owns stock in the Sunset Security Oil Company in the Sunset field. In politics he always has supported the Republican party. As early as 1865 he became associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Fort Jones, Siskiyou county, and in 1876 he identified himself with the lodge at Bakersfield, of which he since has been an honored member and which now he serves as financial secretary. May 1, 1870, at Fort Jones, Siskiyou county, he married Miss Emma E. Tucker, who was born at Milton, Pike county, Ill., and during 1865 came across the plains by ox teams with her father, Walter W. Tucker, a Kentuckian by birth. After a six-months trip they first settled in Marion county, Ore., but later came to California. The Tucker family were devoted adherents of the Christian Church and Mrs. Carlock is a firm believer in that faith, aiding in the charities and missionary movements of the church to the extent of her means. Of her marriage seven children were born, but a heavy bereavement came in the loss by death of four of the number. Warren and Edmund R. were still in their infancy when taken from the home, the former being only two months old. The eldest of the family circle, Charles C., died in Bakersfield in 1904, and the youngest, Inez, wife of Duncan McLennan, passed away May 12, 1911, at the family residence in this city. Harriet E. and Howard W. reside in Bakersfield, the latter being engaged in a livery business here, while Iva, Mrs. Hayes, makes her home at Healdsburg, this state. The latter's daughter, Azalea, took the prize as a child orator when nine years of age. The Carlock family are of German descent and migrated in 1816 to Virginia, where members of the family still reside and where in 1916 there will be a home-coming and gathering of their descendants from the different parts of the Union.

JOHN LEWIS WASSON.—John Lewis Wasson was born near Pleasant Grove, Des Moines county, Iowa, April 7, 1844, and was the son of John and Ruth (Sherwood) Wasson. The parents were natives of Sandusky, Ohio, and were early settlers of Des Moines county, Iowa, where they died of cholera in 1849. Of their six children John L. is the third in order of birth and the only one now living.

After his parents' death Mr. Wasson went to live on his Grandfather Wasson's farm in the same county, receiving his education in the public schools. In 1864 he crossed the plains with an ox-team to Oregon, where he was employed until 1868. He then came to Stanislaus county, remaining until 1871, when he returned to his old home in Iowa. While there he was married, February 7, 1872, being united with Miss Sarah E. Wilhite, who was born in Washington, Iowa. Her father, E. K. Wilhite, a native of Ohio, was married in that state to Sarah Carr and removed to Washington, Iowa.

In 1873 John Wasson with his young wife came to Hanford, Cal., located a homestead of eighty acres in Mussel Slough and proved up on it. In 1883 he sold this place. From 1885 to 1887 he farmed on White river, Tulare county. Being entitled to another eighty acres of homestead land, in 1887 he located eighty acres one-half mile west of Delano, which he has improved and where he now makes his home. For many years he was engaged in raising grain on the plains, but now he devotes his land to raising alfalfa, having improved it with a well, pumping plant and reservoir.

Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Wasson there are six children: Ida Bell, Mrs. Merrill, Lucy May, Mrs. Johnson, Nettie Martha, Mrs. George Small, all of Delano; Martin resides in Monmouth, Ore.; Grover is assisting his father on the home ranch and Minnie is unmarried. Always interested in the cause of education Mr. Wasson has been active in building up schools in the different localities where he has lived and is at present a member of of the board of school trustees of Delano district. In his political views he is strongly Democratic.

Pierre Lartiat

Louise Cartier

PIERRE SARTIAT.—His parents, Jean and Mary (Lassalle) Sartiat, were natives of Basses-Pyrenees in the south of France and spent their entire lives in that district, where the father carried on a small farm and to some extent engaged in raising stock. The old homestead was in the village of Escot and there occurred the birth of Pierre Sartiat November 5, 1852. He was the youngest of three children. A brother, Bernard, about four years older than himself, came to America in 1871, settled in California and after his own arrival in 1872, the two pre-empted land in the mountainous district of Kern county, bought a flock of sheep in partnership and thus started the large agricultural operations that since have made them financially independent.

Upon coming to this country in 1872 and joining his older brother in Kern county, Pierre Sartiat found employment with a sheep-raiser in the Cummings valley. For two years he continued in the same employment and then left to start a flock of his own, beginning in the sheep business and in farm pursuits with his brother and taking up a homestead in the San Emidio district. From time to time they bought property near to their original pre-emption. At this writing they own five thousand acres in one body, lying in the shadow of the San Emidio range, and watered by Salt creek, Cacuya creek and numerous springs. The ranch is one of the best improved in that section of the county. The sheep industry by no means represents the limit of the activities of the brothers, who also are now engaged in raising horses and Durham cattle and use for their brand the letters SB. Grain is raised in large quantities upon the ranch. Horticulture gives diversified products and greatly adds to the income from the property, a specialty being made of apples, pears and peaches. Another occupation of importance is viticulture. To care for the grapes in the most profitable manner a winery has been built on the ranch. Some years ago a mine was opened on the land which is known as the Black Bob and in connection therewith a substantial two-stamp quartz mill has been erected. A part of the land is now being developed for oil and at present drilling is being actively prosecuted.

The marriage of Pierre Sartiat took place in East Bakersfield June 19, 1890, and united him with Miss Mary Louisa Octavie Richaud, who was born at Pont-du-Fossé near Gap, Hautes Alpes, France, and came to Kern county in the fall of 1887. She was a graduate of the Female Seminary in Gap and after teaching four years obtained a leave of absence to visit California and she liked it so well she remained. An only son, Pierre Bernard, was born in Bakersfield April 13, 1892. He was educated in the public schools and at Heald's Business College, San Francisco, and is now manager of the National Hotel. In Los Angeles, in 1911, he was married to Alice Jouglaud. The family own and occupy a residence at No. 510 K street, East Bakersfield. In addition the two brothers built and still own the National hotel, on the corner of Baker and Humboldt streets, East Bakersfield. Mr. Sartiat is a Republican and a member of the Eagles. Concerning the early years of his identification with the county he recounts many interesting experiences, not the least memorable of which has to do with a stranger who stopped one evening at his sheep camp in the mountains and asked for food and lodging. With the kindness and hospitality ever characteristic of him, Mr. Sartiat willingly kept him over night, only to ascertain after the stranger had departed the following day that all unaware he had entertained the notorious Vasquez.

LEVI ERWIN FOUST.—In its varied departments of activity the Associated Oil Company has brought into its service many young men of capability and intelligence, who, finding in the development of its holdings an adequate outlet for their energies, are acquiring meanwhile so thorough a knowledge of the oil industry as to give weight to their influence and value to their opinions concerning any lease. The energies of Mr. Foust have been concentrated upon the rig-building and house-carpentering of the great corporation in the Midway division.

A member of a pioneer Iowa family and himself a native of the vicinity of Des Moines, born July 20, 1885, Mr. Foust is the youngest among the four children of A. J. and Electra L. (Bishop) Foust, natives of Iowa and farmers of that state. During 1888 the family removed to California and settled in Kern county, where the father took up agricultural pursuits and where he still owns a farm adjacent to East Bakersfield. The maternal grandfather, Levi Bishop, was a soldier in an Iowa regiment during the Civil war and fought on the side of the Union with courage and devotion. At the time of the removal of the family to the west Mr. Foust was a child only three years. Hence his education was obtained in the schools of Kern county. By study and observation he has become a man of broad information. At the age of seventeen, during the spring of 1903, he became an employe of the Associated Oil Company on its San Joaquin division in the Kern river field.

After he had been in charge of the rig-building gang in that division for a time, in 1908 Mr. Foust was transferred to McKittrick as foreman of rig-building and house-carpentering. The year 1910 found him engaged in a similar capacity in the Midway division, where he has filled the same responsible position ever since, discharging his duties with alertness and energy. Politically he is a Republican. In Bakersfield he was married to Miss Christine Church, a native of San Luis Obispo, this state. Two daughters comprise their family, Dorothy Evelyn and Ellen Loraine.

BELLAMY KOSSUTH SAID.—The president of the Kern County Pioneer Society dates his first association with the county from February of 1873 and his residence in California from 1852, when he was brought across the plains by his parents, Elkanah and Jane (Hayden) Said, natives respectively of Kentucky and Missouri. The eldest in a family comprising five children, three of whom are now living, he was born at Shullsburg, Lafayette county, Wis., July 22, 1848. For some years the father engaged in lead mining in Southern Wisconsin. In 1848 he went to Panama, where he was at the time of the gold discovery in California. He immediately came to San Francisco, landing in 1849, and after spending some time in the mines he returned to Wisconsin. In 1852 he brought his wife and children to California, crossing the plains with ox and horse teams, and settled in Sierra county, where he mined for gold with more or less success. When rumors came concerning the discovery of gold at Virginia City he traveled on foot over the mountains in company with John W. Mackey, another adventurous Argonaut. Later he visited other camps at the times of great mining excitement and he continued to follow the occupation until his death, which occurred in Eldorado county. The death of his wife occurred at Bodie, Mono county, Cal. Their eldest child, Bellamy Kossuth, was four years of age at the time of the removal to California, hence his education was obtained wholly in the west. After he had completed the studies of the common schools he attended Santa Clara College and later was a student at Gates Institute, San Jose. The first occupation to which he devoted himself was that of clerking.

Upon his arrival in Kern county Mr. Said secured a tract of government land sixteen miles west of Bakersfield under what is now the Pioneer ditch, which improvement he helped to survey and build. Later he bought a tract of one hundred and sixty acres adjacent to his original claim. In addition he managed claims owned by his mother and uncle, so that altogether he had charge of a whole section of land under the Pioneer ditch. The possibility of irrigation in abundance led him into the alfalfa business and for some time he made this his principal crop, although he also engaged in general farming and horticulture. On leaving the ranch he spent two years in Mono county, whence he came to Bakersfield and has since devoted his time to the supervision of his property interests, although for six years he was in business in the Kern River oil fields and for some years he also acted as the head bookkeeper for the Union Oil Company at their refining plant. Near Cordelia, Solano county, he was united in marriage with Miss Bertha C. Morrison, who was born at Downieville, Sierra county, Cal. She graduated from the San Jose State Normal and prior to her marriage followed teaching. She died at Berkeley, September 27, 1910. Very early in the colonization of the west her father, J. Z. Morrison, came across the plains and settled in California, where he still lives, owning and operating a farm in Solano county. The family of Mr. and Mrs. Said comprise four children, namely: Kinney M., a resident of Arizona; Mark E. and Ethel M., students in the University of California at Berkeley, and Harry B., a pupil in the Kern county high school. The Congregational denomination has had the active co-operation and generous assistance of Mr. Said for many years and in the church of that faith at Bakersfield he not only officiates as a deacon, but in addition has been active and helpful in the Sunday school work.

Bellamy Kossuth Said

J. H. CROFT.—The fact that he has reached a position of influence and importance in the oil business may be attributed to the energy which Mr. Croft has thrown into every task since first at the age of twelve years, orphaned by the death of his father, he took up the battle of self-support. The hardships that followed the dark period of facing the world alone were met with a courage and cheerfulness that never deserted him and that laid the foundation for a later gratifying degree of success. After an extended experience in the oil fields of various states, he came to California in 1908 and during September, 1912, arrived in the Sunset field to engage as drilling foreman on the North Midway leases of the Kern Trading & Oil Company, with which great corporation he still is connected as head driller, filling with characteristic fidelity and intelligence a position of importance and showing in his work an intimate acquaintance with both the production and operating departments of the oil business.

A son of Christian Croft, a native of Ohio and a farmer by occupation, J. H. Croft was born at St. Marys, Auglaize county, Ohio, in 1882 and passed the years of childhood on the home farm. After the death of his father in 1894 he began to work as a farm hand, in this way earning his board and clothes, but having little opportunity for attending school. At the age of sixteen he had his first experience in the oil industry. The fields at Lima, Ohio, afforded him an opportunity to gain a livelihood as a roustabout. Little by little he rose to positions of importance. As a tool-dresser he received good wages and from that he advanced to be a driller in the gas fields of Marion, Grant county, Ind., where he remained for five years. Going to Kansas, he engaged in drilling at Independence, from which place he went to the new oil fields at Dewey, Okla., to engage in drilling wells. When he came to California in 1908 he secured employment as a driller at Coalinga with the Associated Oil Company, but five months later changed to the employ of the Kern Trading & Oil Company in its Coalinga division. During the fall of 1912 the company sent him to the Sunset field, where since he has engaged as head driller of the North Midway leases. While engaged in the oil business in Oklahoma he married at Bartlesville, that state, Miss Lena Warren, a native of Waynesfield, Auglaize county, Ohio, and an earnest member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. By the marriage there is one son, Robert. In Oklahoma Mr. Croft joined Bartlesville Lodge No. 1060, B. P. O. E.

MRS. PAULINE DARNUL PETRAY.—The hardships of pioneer existence in California form a remote but distinct background in the memories of Mrs. Petray, whose busy life has been crowded with useful activities and crowned with the honors always accorded to women of intelligence, industry and inherent kindliness of spirit. When her parents, Cook B. and Elizabeth (Shinn) Darnul, removed from her native county of Pope in Arkansas and sought the larger opportunities of the west, she was brought with the other children to the then little known land of California. At the expiration of an overland trip that consumed five tedious months, the family arrived in Calaveras county and entered upon the difficult task of securing a home and profitable work in a frontier environment. Schools were few and widely scattered in those days and it was not possible for her to secure a broad, thorough education, but she found an abundance of work in the home. At an early age she became adept in the culinary art and this accomplishment she has in no wise forgotten; on the other hand, she is still numbered among the most efficient housekeepers and skilled cooks in her neighborhood. While yet a young girl she became the wife of Robert Bowen, whom in 1870 she accompanied to Linn's valley in Kern county.

A claim of one hundred and sixty acres was homesteaded in the upper end of the valley and there Mr. and Mrs. Bowen labored with indefatigable earnestness to earn a livelihood and improve a farm. There were two children born of this union; the oldest, a daughter, Alice, passed away in 1891, at the age of twenty-three years; the son, Robert A. Bowen, a native-born son of California, is now engaged in general farming south of Bakersfield. Upon the sale of the claim the old Hughes farm on Poso creek was bought and occupied and until his death, which occurred on that ranch, Mr. Bowen devoted himself to the care and cultivation of the two hundred and forty acres comprising the tract. After the death of Mr. Bowen his widow spent some time in Healdsburg and there she was united in marriage with R. A. Petray, whose death occurred some years later in the same city. Since her return to Linn's valley she has made her home principally with her brother, J. J. Darnul, over whose ranch house she presides with unbounded hospitality and unfailing energy. Besides owning a residence at White River she still owns a valuable farm, which is leased.

EDWARD T. McMAHON.—As division superintendent Mr. McMahon's field extends to the Sigma pumping station in the Sunset field, and to the Midway pumping station in the Midway field, including also the pumping of all the water used on the various leaseholds. The water is pumped from wells at the Rio Bravo pumping station near Lake Buena Vista in Kern county. From the two oil pumping stations the oil is sent on its way from the Midway and Sunset fields to the storage tanks at Point Richmond. That an immense amount of oil can be cared for and disposed of promptly is evident from the fact that the pumps on section 1, township 32, range 23, have a capacity of three thousand barrels per hour. The equipment is the most modern and in every branch of the pipe line department, skill, great expense and large results are apparent.

The division superintendent is a New Yorker by birth and was born at Ellicottville, Cattaraugus county, July 3, 1876. From early life he has been familiar with the oil industry. At the age of twenty he secured employment as a tool-dresser with the Northwestern Gas Company in the Findlay field in Hancock county, Ohio, where he remained for two years. Chance turned him from the oil business into structural iron work. As an employe of the Pittsburgh Construction Company he helped to build bridges on the Nickel Plate and New York Central railroads. In addition he was employed in the construction of the American radiator works in Buffalo and the Kingsford boiler works at Oswego. For five years he followed the structural iron trade, and during that period he married Miss Mary Murray, of Ellicottville, N. Y., of which union there is now one son, Edward J.

Pauline Darnul, Petray.

Re-entering the oil industry about 1903, Mr. McMahon engaged with the East Ohio Gas Company as an employe of its distribution department. Much of his work was in connection with the laying of mains in Cleveland, Ohio, where he was promoted to be pipe line foreman. After six years with the gas and oil business in Ohio, in 1909, he came to California, arriving in the Midway field during March and immediately beginning work as field foreman with the Standard. When oil was discovered it was his duty to connect the lease with the main line of the Standard and from that work developed the pipe line department, of which since October, 1912, he has been division superintendent. Since coming to this post of duty he has established a home for his family on section 1, township 32, range 23, at the Midway station of the Standard. With his wife he belongs to the Roman Catholic Church at Taft.

THOMAS L. CUMMINS.—Discouragements neither few nor small have been met by Mr. Cummins since the time when, a boy of nine years, he began to earn his livelihood by driving a team and doing other farm work on his father's place in Illinois. More than once he has made a gratifying start in business or occupative tasks, only to have the fruits of his labors destroyed, but each time he has started with undiminished optimism and since coming to Bakersfield in 1904 he has been gratified by continued prosperity represented by a large and important building business. Previous experience had given him a thorough knowledge of carpentering.

In a family of eight children, all but one of whom are still living, the third in order of birth, Thomas L. Cummins, was born at Shelbyville, Ind., June 13, 1864, and at the age of less than one year was taken to Iowa by his parents, William L. and Edna (Short) Cummins, natives respectively of Ohio and New York. The paternal grandfather, Jesse Cummins, a native of Ohio, developed farms successively in Indiana, Illinois and Iowa and represented the hardy class of frontiersmen whose efforts laid the foundation of the remarkable agricultural development of the middle west. During the early part of the Civil war William L. Cummins served as a private in an Indiana regiment, but upon receiving an honorable discharge at the expiration of his time he returned to farm pursuits, removing in 1864 with his family to Wayne county, Iowa. In 1873 he made another move, this time settling on an Illinois farm, and about 1879 he took up a homestead in Sumner county, Kan., near the town of Wellington. The last move of his life took him to Los Angeles in 1883, and his death occurred there in the same year. His widow, now eighty years and still active, makes her home in Bakersfield.

When the family came to California in 1883 Thomas L. Cummins immediately secured employment on a ranch. For such work he was well qualified, being experienced, industrious and persevering, but at the expiration of two years he gave up farming in order to serve an apprenticeship to the trade of a carpenter in Los Angeles. His time ended, he worked at the trade and soon became foreman for a contractor. From 1889 until 1896 he followed the trade in San Diego, where he became known as a careful builder and skilled carpenter. Meanwhile he had become interestd in mining and during 1897 he turned his attention entirely to the building and operating of mills in mines of San Bernardino county, where with a partner he owned a valuable mine and mill. The interests*became highly profitable in their developed state, but the partner proved dishonest and Mr. Cummins lost heavily in the enterprise. Nor was his next venture any more successful. Going to Madera county, he leased a sawmill in the pines, began to operate the plant and had every promise of a large business, but his sanguine expectations came to an end with the burning of the mill, entailing a heavy loss. During 1904 he came to Bakersfield and took up carpentering, since which time he has bought a residence. Interested also in farming he owns three hundred and twenty acres, eight miles southeast of the city in the Weed Patch country, which he has checked and ditched and will seed to alfalfa. In this city he married Miss Susan Fleckner, a native of New York City, a woman of education and an active worker in the Women of Woodcraft. She is very literary and a playwright of ability, having written and staged "The Matrimonial Club," "The Last Rehearsal," "Women's Rights in Pumpkin Center," "Life of David," "Life of Joseph," also being the author of Scotch, Irish and American songs as well as lectures. All her productions proved popular and were favorably commented upon. Mr. Cummins is a well-known member of the Woodmen of the World.

WILLIAM HARRISON LOWELL.—Although not one of the earliest settlers of Bakersfield, the date of the arrival of Mr. Lowell, May 27, 1876, indicates that he identified himself with Kern county long before its present wealth of resources was appreciated and before its present era of expansion had been inaugurated. From the time of his arrival until his useful existence came to an end, May 11, 1910, he labored for the advancement of his adopted home and while endeavoring to attain independence for himself never slighted any movement that would promote the growth of the community.

Descended from an old English family long resident in New England, William Harrison Lowell was born at Concord, Me., April 14, 1841, and was a son of William and Mary (Tyler) Lowell, also natives of Maine. When but little more than twenty years of age he enlisted in the Civil war as a member of the Fourth Maine Cavalry and accompanied his regiment to the front, where he served with valor and fidelity for a period of three years. In January, 1865, he received an honorable discharge and returned to his home in Maine, where he took up farm pursuits. July 2, 1875, at Pleasant Ridge, Me., he was united in marriage with Miss Hannah C. Ball, a native of the same village as himself, and a daughter of Daniel and Eliza (Carl) Ball, farmers by occupation. Both of her parents died in early life and she was but eighteen months old when left an orphan, after which she was taken into the home of Mrs. Mary Bridgen, an English lady. The foster mother sent her to school and trained her carefully in a knowledge of housekeeping duties, so that she was well qualified to take charge of a home of her own. Shortly after her marriage she started with her husband for California and here established a home in Bakersfield.

The Lowell brothers, Wilmot, Danville, Alexis and William Harrison, engaged in sheep-raising, the last-named being first merely a salaried employe, but later admitted as a partner. While they met with the reverses always to be counted upon in the sheep industry, in the main they were successful and their large investments of means and time in the business brought them satisfactory returns. With a portion of their profits they bought a ranch of three hundred and twenty acres adjoining Bakersfield, and there they engaged in raising alfalfa and fruit. A part of the tract was eventually made a subdivision and as such was sold off in lots, many of which were improved by the brothers themselves with neat cottages or commodious residences. Eleven of the houses were erected by Wilmot and William H., and they also built a number of houses on Chester avenue, besides which William H. bought a large residence at K and Twenty-first streets, that he owned but rented for a rooming house up to the time of his death. His only son, Arthur, is living in Bakersfield, and since her husband's death Mrs. Lowell has continued to reside at the old home place, No. 1120 Seventeenth street, carefully superintending the family interests, which include the ownership of unimproved property, houses and lots, stock in the Bank of Bakersfield and other valuable interests. In national politics he always voted with the Republican party, while fraternally after the organization of Hurlburt Post, G. A. R., at Bakersfield, he was one of its leading and most highly honored members and the incumbent of a number of its leading offices. Mrs. Lowell is a member of the Woman's Relief Corps of Bakersfield, and takes an active interest and is ever helpful in all movements that tend to improve and better the conditions of the city and citizens of her adopted home.

Hannah C Lowell

HERBERT GEORGE BALL.—The history of the Ball family is traced back to the early period of the American occupancy of California. The first of the name to identify himself with the then unknown west was John Ball, a Kentuckian by birth and education and a member of an honored and influential southern family. Such was the wealth and prestige of the family in the Blue Grass state that in his own name he owned two thousand slaves and vast tracts of land. After removing to Missouri he became heavily interested in cattle. During 1848 he was made high sheriff of Missouri, which at the time was undergoing great excitement and trouble owing to the presence of the Mormons, exiled from Hancock county, Ill., subsequent to the killing of Joseph Smith earlier in the same decade. In his capacity as high sheriff it became necessary for Mr. Ball to confine Brigham Young in his own home for three weeks. The great Mormon leader when released determined to revenge himself upon his jailer and when the latter determined to cross the plains to California, he sent word to him that he would not be permitted to cross the plains alive. However, John Ball was not a man to be frightened by a threat. Instead, he became all the more resolute in his purpose and in the spring of 1848, shortly after Young had been released and had gone to Utah, a large company of Missouri people set out for California. Twelve hundred persons formed the party, which carried a suitable equipment of wagons, cattle, provisions, supplies and, most important of all, a large amount of ammunition. In the outfit were two brass cannon made at New Orleans, with one and one-half inch bore and shooting balls attached together by means of chains from three to seven inches long.

The winter of 1848-49 was passed in camp, the men of the party building Fort Hall and fortifying it against the Indians. Every mile of their journey across the plains was contested by savages. Through the country where the Mormons could attack them their progress was one continual warfare. Particularly memorable was the battle of Bloody Hollow, where Ball's forces, consisting of one hundred and six cavalrymen, thirteen scouts (of whom Kit Carson was the leader) and twelve hundred men in the train, met and conquered a great army of Indians and Mormons, inflicting a heavy loss of life. The expedition was the first to get through after the ill-fated Donner party. On account of the hostilities of savages they were forced to take the northern route, and it was not until the spring of 1850 that they landed in California via Portland, Ore. Immediately John Ball put up a canvas hotel in Sacramento. For a few years he met with phenomenal success, but his large generosity involved him in financial difficulties and his large fortune was spent before his death. He built the first brick house in Sacramento and also built and equipped the first railroad ever in California, this being a road eight miles in length, built primarily for the purpose of hauling wood to Sacramento. From the latter city he moved to Sonoma county and founded Frankville, afterwards known as Santa Rosa, where he died in 1865 from the result of injuries caused by a kick from a horse. Of his family of two daughters and six sons only two are now living.

At the time of starting from Missouri William P., son of John Ball, was a child seven years of age. In youth he learned the trade of a blacksmith. For many years he struggled to secure a footing in the business world. Meanwhile he lived as far north as Washington and as far in the other direction as Southern California. During 1856, when taking a herd of eight hundred Arizona cattle from the lower part of California to Sacramento via the San Joaquin valley, he and his comrades noticed smoke issuing from the hills north of McKittrick. Believing the smoke to come from a volcano they started an investigation. They ascertained that the Indians had set fire to the hills where the oil oozed out of the earth and the soil was burned to the color and appearance of lava. However, Mr. Ball had no means for developing oil and being anxious to get his herd through to their destination, he gave no further attention to the discovery of oil. Later he worked in the Kern county oil fields, but at this writing he is engaged in the real estate business at Santa Rosa.

Born at Healdsburg, Sonoma county, Cal., July 28, 1875, Herbert George Ball was educated mainly in public schools in Washington, where he finished the grammar grade. As a boy he lived in various places, but principally at Walla Walla, Wash., and San Francisco. From the age of fourteen until twenty-one he was apprenticed to the old California Electric Light Company (now consolidated with the Edison Power & Light Company). From twenty-one until twenty-six he was employed as an artistic metal worker with Thomas, Day & Co., of San Francisco. Were he not an exceptionally proficient oil superintendent, he could earn his livelihood either as an electrician or as a metal worker. While he was working with the metal company an older brother, residing in San Francisco, had made the acquaintance of E. C. Landis, then as now connected with the Kern River Oil Company. Mr. Landis was in need of a blacksmith to work upon his lease and the older brother secured the place for his father, who was an expert at that trade. After the father had been working for some time on the lease, a demand developed for an electrician and he recommended his son, Herbert George, who was thereupon requested to begin work at the lease. As an electrician, the young man made good. However, the price of oil began to drop until it was only ten cents per barrel. This meant practical ruin to the oil industry. The plant was shut down, but he was retained as caretaker and when an increasing price caused the resuming of operations he was ready to start in at the bottom and work his way forward by dint of efficiency.

Since first coming to the oil fields, April 8, 1901, Mr. Ball has never been out of the employ of the Kern River Oil Company nor has he ever been absent from the McKittrick field with the exception of the seven months from January 1st to August 1st, 1903, when his employers sent him over to the Kern river field to observe the water in the wells and learn the best methods of shutting it off. This he did so successfully that he was called to many of the leading leases to aid in similar tasks, among them being the following: West Shore Oil Company, Monte Cristo Oil Company, Green-Whittier Oil Company, Astec Oil Company, Rasmussen Oil Company, Red Bank Oil Company, Del Rey Oil Company, Nevada County Oil Company, Peerless Oil Company, Kern Oil Company, Omar Oil Company and the Reed Crude Oil Company. At this writing he has the Kern River Oil Company's lease of ten acres under contract from year to year and through his enterprise he has made a success of the property. Out of the four oil wells two are producing and give an average monthly output of four thousand barrels. Altogether he has spent tens of thousands of dollars in wild-cattng and putting down discovery wells in the McKittrick field. Associated with Mr. Bandittini of McKittrick and H. S. Williams he put down the discovery well on the I. X. L. lease, now a part of the Associated, and sold out to advantage after striking a good flow of oil. Together with Mr. Williams he put down a well to a depth of three thousand one hundred and eighty-seven feet on eighty acres of government land, known as the Leader Oil Company lease. As they began operations before the government withdrew the land they are entitled to a patent. Indications for a gusher of high gravity oil are excellent and in that event the lease will become one of the most valuable properties at McKittrick. Upon forty acres known as the S. and W. lease, Messrs. Williams and Ball have one well producing one hundred barrels per day. On his lease of ten acres Mr. Ball uses gas for fuel and for generating steam, while he has installed electrical power for pumping purposes. In addition he has an electrical pumping plant on his fine ranch of eighty acres in the Laurel colony, Tulare county, where he is developing a model country home. In politics he is a Progressive Republican, and fraternally he is a member of Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M. During 1902 he married Miss Jessie N. Mull, member of a prominent family of Tulare county, and their union has been blessed with two children, Cornelia Elizabeth and Herbert William.

J. A. Tracy

FERDINAND A. TRACY.—The life which this narrative depicts began in Wilkesbarre, Pa., in 1829, and closed at Bakersfield, Cal., January 9, 1908. The intervening years represented a period of intense activity crowned by the regard of friends. From 1850, when he was attracted to the west by the discovery of gold and crossed the plains with a large expedition of emigrants, he was identified with the material upbuilding of California and gave to its development an intensity of devotion indicative of his fondness for the commonwealth of his adoption. In the early '50s he was commissioned lieutenant of a company of United States troops to quell an Indian uprising in northern California. The company was successful in establishing peace, and it was the last time these Indians were on the warpath. When his services were no longer needed Mr. Tracy was honorably discharged. During the period of mining activity he followed the occupation in the Mokelumne region and indeed he never lost his interest in the industry, but after he had left the Sierras he became interested in the mines of Kern county, notably those in the Tehachapi range. From mining he turned to stock-raising. During 1860, in search of feed for his herds, he came into the Carissa valley and from there he proceeded to the Kern delta, whose possibilities attracted him. Becoming a resident of Bakersfield in 1862, he operated his stock interests from this point and with Wellington Canfield, under the firm title of Canfield & Tracy, he became a leader in the cattle industry throughout the San Joaquin valley. Their herds increased in size until their brand was more frequently seen than that of any of the stockmen in the state. It is said that during the fifty-six years of their co-partnership, never a word of disagreement arose between the two partners, but they remained in the end as in the beginning close personal friends, congenial associates and devotedly attached each to the welfare of the other.

The marriage of Mr. Tracy in 1875 united him with Mrs. Ellen Baker, the widow of the founder of Bakersfield. Politically he always advocated Republican principles. Frequently he was called upon to occupy positions of trust in county affairs, but these came to him without his seeking. Indeed he was so unassuming, so reticent in his own claims, so strong in his dislike for notoriety that he shunned public life and often was superseded by others who had not the moral and intellectual equipment for an honorable career that he possessed. Had it not been for his exceeding modesty he would have ranked with men known in the annals of the state. His manly nature appealed to men in a manly way. Generous to a fault, hospitable in act, attractive in personality and genial in companionship, he made friends of all whether rich or poor. In every sense of the word he was a true gentleman and this was particularly noticeable in his desire to protect all helpless and dependent creatures. The poor had in him a helpful friend, the suffering never sought his assistance in vain. His integrity and honesty were of the kind that sought no personal emoluments, but upheld the highest principles of honor through innate purity of soul. Self-poise guided all of his acts and was apparent in every business detail, but it was not the self-control of the selfish man, instead the natural temperament of one ever ready to make sacrifices for others and one who displayed patience and kindness under every circumstance. Possessed of splendid mind, he developed this through a wise and long-continued course of reading. The master-minds of all the ages became familiar to him in his readings and thus he acquired a cosmopolitan culture. A fondness for poetry did not deter him from delving into the intricacies of science and political economy, while in history he was exceptionally well informed. Of religion too he was a thoughtful student and while with innate reticence he never revealed his thoughts concerning the spiritual life, his own deeply religious nature pervaded his entire existence and made beautiful his adherence to the stronghold of Christianity.

CLAUS PETER CHRISTENSEN.—Many of the enterprising men who are taking an active part in the development of Kern county came here from the fertile country of Denmark and it was there that Claus Peter Christensen was born near Naskov, Laaland, September 27, 1865. He was reared on a farm and received a thorough training in the local schools. In 1882 he came to Illinois and for a time was employed at farming in Sangamon county. In 1884 he came to Shasta county, California, where for eighteen months he worked on a farm and then began placer and quartz mining and learned millwrighting, building and running quartz mills in Shasta and Trinity counties. During this time he completed a course in mining engineering in the International Correspondence School.

Mr. Christensen built a dredger on the Klamath river and a smelter at Keswick, then was superintendent of the Dunderberg mine in Mono county for two years. Wishing to still further perfect himself for his life work he entered Vandernailen's School of Mines at San Francisco, where he was graduated in 1898. In December of that year he came to Johannesburg, where he built two different cyanide plants and the Phoenix mill. Thence he went to Barstow where he rebuilt a cyanide plant. His next venture was prospecting and mining in Old Mexico where later he was in the employ of the Green-Cananea Company. On his return to California he erected a 100-stamp mill in Calaveras county and then went to Goldfield, Nev., where he spent nearly a year. For the next three years he was engaged in contracting and building in Petaluma when he again returned to the Randsburg district. Here he was mill man in the Atolia mills and afterwards in charge of the mill and cyanide plant of the Skidoo Mines Company, resigning in 1909 to accept the position of superintendent for the Stanford Mining and Reduction Company, which position he is filling with conscientious ability.

In Mokelumne Hill, Calaveras county, May 27, 1900, Mr. Christensen was united in marriage with Miss Edna Vaillancourt, a native of Reno, Nev., and they have two children, Cecil P. and Hilda. Fraternally he is a member of the Dania society in Petaluma and Sergeant lodge No. 368, I. O. O. F., San Francisco. Politically he gives his allegiance to Democratic principles. Mr. Christensen is much interested in the cause of education and is clerk of the board of trustees of the Johannesburg School District.

GEORGE WALLER.—Two generations of the Waller family have been and are now in the employ of the same corporation, holding positions of trust and discharging their duties with efficiency. The second generation is represented by George Waller, now the foreman of the pipe line department on section 1, township 32, range 23, in the Midway field; and the older generation is represented by his father, J. H., a life-long employe of the Standard Oil Company, and still capable, efficient and energetic, refusing to give up the work in which he takes great satisfaction, although officials of the company repeatedly have importuned him to retire on a pension. An example of fealty and devotion is afforded by the long and pleasant connection of father and son with the same corporation.

Jas McKamy

Although a native of West Virginia (born February 15, 1879) George Waller spent his boyhood years in the Lima oil fields in Ohio, for he was only one year old when his father, J. H. Waller, moved over to Ohio to take up work in the pipe line department of the Standard. The boy was educated in Ohio and finished the high-school course at Fort Recovery, Mercer county, in 1897. Meanwhile he had become self-supporting by working in the Standard office during vacations. As a messenger boy he proved that he had in him the making of an expert oil worker. Always the industry has interested him. To master its details has been his principal ambition in life. The Standard, the only company for which he has ever worked, has given him every opportunity to gain a practical knowledge of the business. At the age of twenty-one he was promoted to be connecting foreman. In that capacity he later worked in Kansas and Oklahoma. Sent back to Illinois, he worked successively at Robinson, Bridgeport, Casey and Stoy, and in 1910 left Stoy for California, being assigned to work in the Coalinga field. For two years and eight months he was connected with the pipe line department of the Standard at Coalinga, from which point he was transferred to the Midway field and has since been foreman of the pipe line department on section 1. While making his headquarters at Robinson, Ill., he married Miss Myrtle Jacobs, and they now occupy one of the Standard houses on 1-32-23, where they have a comfortable home. While in Illinois Mr. Waller was made a Mason in the Eaton blue lodge and after coming to this state he became connected with the Scottish Rite Consistory at Fresno.

JAMES McKAMY.—Long association with the history of the south preceded any identification of the McKamy family with the early settlement of California. The founder of the name on the Pacific coast was J. M., son of James, and a native of Tennessee, born in the vicinity of Memphis in 1822. While serving in the Mexican war from 1846 to 1848 he traveled much through the south and southwest and became interested in the opportunities afforded by the undeveloped country beyond the then confines of civilization. After he had sojourned for a time in Texas he joined an expedition of Argonauts bound for California. The trip across the plains via Fort Yuma occupied nine months of difficulty and danger. Upon one occasion the savages attacked the party and decamped with their stock, but the emigrants followed on horseback and were able to regain the animals. Among the people crossing the plains in this expedition there was a young lady, Miss Eleanor Petty, a native of Alabama, born in 1823.

The young couple became acquainted and their friendship ripened into affection. Some time after they landed in California they were married at Stockton, from which point Mr. McKamy engaged in freighting to the mines. Later he took up land on the Mariposa road ten miles east of Stockton and moved his family to the claim, where he engaged in ranching. While the family lived at that location a son, James, was born March 7, 1856. During 1873 the father visited Kern county and was favorably impressed with the country. Accordingly the following year he brought his family hither and settled on Poso creek at the old stage crossing, where he embarked in the sheep business upon a large scale. At first fortune favored him. The flock prospered and thrived. Returns were gratifying. However, with the drought of 1877 conditions changed, feed became scarce and water difficult to secure in sufficient quantities, so that he lost all of his flock, thus leaving him practically bankrupted. Forced to begin anew, he took the family to Glennville, Kern county, and engaged in stock-raising there until his death in 1895. His widow, now eighty-eight years of age, still remains at Glennville. For several terms he served as supervisor and during part of the time he was honored with the chairmanship of the board.

There were four daughters and four sons in the parental family, namely: Isabella, who married P. J. Garwood and lives at Glennville, Kern county; Minerva, Mrs. Collins, who died in this county; James, city marshal of Bakersfield; John, a farmer living in Tulare county; Julian, a stockman who follows his occupation in the vicinity of Glennville; Daniel, who died in Mendocino county in 1885; Virginia, Mrs. Alfred Harrald, of Bakersfield; and Mrs. Fannie Hughes, of Glennville. The eldest son, James, passed his childhood years on a ranch in San Joaquin county and attended the school of which his father was trustee. The district, indeed, had been organized largely through the influence of the father and still bears the name of the McKamy school district, although years have passed since the family removed from the vicinity. Even before leaving that county the lad had earned his livelihood by teaming and hauling, harvesting and threshing, and after he had permanently located in Kern county in 1874 he aided his father in the care of the sheep. When the flock was lost in the drought of 1877 he entered the employ of Carr & Haggin and operated a threshing machine on their ranch during the summer months. In the spring he engaged in sheep-shearing, a work in which he gained such remarkable speed that he was able to shear from one hundred and forty to one hundred and fifty sheep per day.

Leaving the busy activities of the ranch and the farm in 1882 Mr. McKamy went to Colorado and engaged in mining in the San Juan and Ouray districts. Upon his return to Bakersfield in 1887 he secured a deputyship under the county assessor, Thomas Harding. Later for four years he acted as deputy constable and for two terms of four years each he was constable. In April of 1907 he was elected city marshal and took the oath of office for a term of four years. However, the consolidation of Kern and Bakersfield called for a special election, which occurred July 19, 1910. After a hot campaign he was elected. During April of 1911, at the regular election, he won by a majority of twenty-seven votes. The election was contested and he won in the contest. The city marshal's office is now in the second story of the fire department house on the corner of K and Twentieth streets and here Mr. McKamy makes his headquarters. In national politics he votes with the Democratic party. In his work as an officer he does not consider party, but endeavors to maintain law and order and to promote the reputation of Bakersfield as a law-abiding city of patriotic citizens and high moral standing. Since coming to this city he has erected a residence at No. 2124 E Street. His marriage took place in Bakersfield and united him with Mrs. Emma Gagne, who was born in Ontario, Canada, and died in Los Angeles January 31, 1909, leaving one son, James L. McKamy. In fraternal relations he is a local leader in the work of the Eagles, besides being actively interested in the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

GEORGE KAMMERER.—It would be difficult to name any phase of the oil industry with which Mr. Kammerer is not familiar, for he has been connected with the business from childhood and has ever been a close observer and careful student of the occupation. A native of Pennsylvania, born at Pleasantville, Venango county, March 11, 1873, he was only six years of age when the family removed to Bradford in the same state and thus he was made familiar with the oil fields of McKean county. The chief topic of conversation in the neighborhood was some development in oil, so that he grew up to a thorough knowledge of the business, and he also learned much from his father, who was a pioneer driller in Pennsylvania. Ever since thirteen years of age he has earned a livelihood as a worker in oil fields. Industry and perseverance came naturally to him, and an intelligent mind enabled him to grasp every problem presented by the work. The path to success was not easy. For hours each day he worked as a pumper, but promotion came as a result of his diligent attention to duty. He was only fifteen when he was trained in the task of tool-dressing. All through his early life he worked for large firms in the oil and gas fields of the east, mainly in New York and Pennsylvania, and in that way he gained an experience of the greatest value to him in subsequent positions.

The Fullerton field was first sought by Mr. Kammerer when he arrived in California in 1899 and for six years he was an employe of the Santa Fe on its leases at that point. He then went to work for the Union Oil Company and spent one year at Casmalia, four years in the Fullerton and three years in the Midway field. He has been an employe of the Union Oil Company continuously since 1905, and has been in the Midway since 1910. He and his wife, formerly Miss Kathleen Enoch, and their daughter, Virginia, now make their home in a company cottage on the Bed Rock lease, one mile north of Taft, on section 14, township 31, range 23. In his present position as superintendent of development in the Midway and Maricopa districts, he gives not only faithful, but also intelligent and remarkably efficient service to the Union Oil Company, whose interests have been protected and promoted by his alert supervision. Besides his identification with the oil industry he has other interests at Taft, where he now owns one-third interest in the Taft garage and where also he is popular in the Petroleum Club, of which he is a charter member. While making his headquarters in the Fullerton field he was initiated into Masonry at Fullerton, became a member also of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at that place, identified himself with the Elks at Santa Ana and with the Eagles at Anaheim.

F. B. GORMLEY.—Born at Marion, Ind., September 7, 1891, F. B. Gormley is the second son of Thomas and Sarah (Finnigan) Gormley, long residents of Marion. The family consisted of nine children and six of these are now living. The father, a native of West Virginia, born about 1854, has been employed by the Pennsylvania (known as the Panhandle) Railroad Company since 1880, holding the position of telegraph inspector in charge of poles, instruments and lines extending from Logansport, Ind., to Bradford, same state. From the age of seventeen years F. B. Gormley has been self-supporting. Upon the completion of the studies of the grammar grade in the Marion schools he turned his attention to the earning of a livelihood and for a time worked at bookkeeping. While he was employed by the Gulf Pipe Line Company at Tulsa, Okla., he received a telegram stating that his older brother, who had come to California suffering from tuberculosis and was temporarily at Maricopa, was very ill and in all probability would soon pass away. Hurriedly severing his business connections at Tulsa he started for California and May 10, 1909, arrived at Maricopa, where he cared for his brother until the end came seven weeks afterward. Accompanying the remains he went back to the old Indiana home and afterward visited with friends and relatives for two months. Upon his second arrival at Maricopa he became an employe in the men's furnishing department of the store owned by Coons & Price. Eight months later he entered the employ of the Honolulu Oil Company, with which he continued for nine months, meanwhile filling the position of warehouseman. Resigning from the Honolulu he spent three weeks in San Francisco. On coming back to Maricopa he became a clerk in the hardware store of J. F. Blessing, with whom he continued for eighteen months. From April until June of 1912 he visited in Indiana and since his return to Maricopa he has been engaged as warehouseman with the Lakeview Oil Company, whose interests he has promoted by his uniform business tact, strict integrity and recognized capability.

LAYTON JUDD KING.—An efficient oil operator, Mr. King is the son of a pioneer in that business, for his father, John King, a native of Geauga county, Ohio, worked at oil camps in Ohio and Indiana, then returned to Ohio to resume the business in the fields of that state and eventually came to Los Angeles, where he makes his home. While living in Ohio he married Miss Etta Judd, who was born in Massachusetts, a descendant of a colonial family of New England. Their son, Layton Judd, was born in Geauga county, Ohio, in 1880, and received his education in public schools and Geauga Seminary. During 1895 he removed to Indiana with his father and found employment in the oil fields near Montpelier, but in a short time returned to Geauga county, and resumed drilling in Ohio. Besides working in oil fields he drilled water wells and took many contracts for such work in Geauga, Cuyahoga and Ashtabula counties. Upon his arrival in California in 1902 he secured a position with the R. D. Robinson Drilling Company as a tool-dresser. Nine months later in 1903 he entered the employ of the Associated Oil Company as a driller in the Kern river field.

An experience of nine months as a driller in the oil fields of Coffeyville, Kan., was followed by the return of Mr. King to California, where in October, 1904, he again became an employe of the Associated in the Kern river field. In July of 1905 the company appointed him foreman of the Central Point division in the same field. A merited promotion to be superintendent of the same division came to him in April, 1906, and in February, 1907, he was transferred to be superintendent of the San Joaquin division, at that time the largest division of the entire concern. The year 1908 found him superintendent of the McKittrick division and in that capacity he developed the valuable holdings of the company in that field. Transferred in February, 1910, to act as superintendent of the Midway division, he since has had charge of development work in the Midway field and Elk Hills territory. When at leisure from the heavy responsibilities incident to his important position he finds his chief pleasure in the society of his wife and four children, Rupert, Ronald, Reginald and Ethelyn. Prior to their marriage at Chagrin Falls, Cuyahoga county, Ohio, Mrs. King was Miss Ethelyn Parker; born in the Buckeye state, educated in its schools, a graduate of the high school at Burton, Geauga county, she is a woman of education and culture and has many friends back in her girlhood home, as well as in the newer home of the west. In politics Mr. King always has voted with the Republican party. Since 1905 he has been connected with Masonry, having been made a Mason during that year in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M.

H. E. BECKER.—From the beginning of the development work undertaken by the Pacific Crude Oil Company in the Midway field Mr. Becker has had charge of its important enterprises in the capacity of superintendent and has made good in a position demanding boundless energy, great tact, quickness of decision and a thorough knowledge of the oil industry. Since November, 1911, when he entered the employ of the company, work on the lease near Fellows has been started and brought up to a point of great importance and considerable promise. Well No. 1 on the lease came in as a gusher, but in the midst of its first enormous output the rig caught fire. After having burned for five days the fire was smothered with steam and brought under control. In the seven following months the well produced one million barrels and is now flowing at the rate of two hundred and fifty barrels per day. Well No. 2 came in as a gusher of eighty-five hundred barrels and is still producing seven hundred barrels of 26 gravity oil as the daily output. The latest development has been in well No. 3, the drilling of which was completed in 1913 and which is proving a valuable acquisition to the holdings of the company.

In boyhood Mr. Becker lived in his native city of Pittsburg, Pa., where he attended the schools and at the age of seventeen was graduated from the high school, later completing the trade of machinist as an apprentice in the Pittsburg locomotive works. His father, Elias, a machinist by trade and a lifelong resident of Pennsylvania, served throughout the entire period of the Civil war as a soldier in the Ninth Pennsylvania Infantry. Upon coming to California in 1901 the son, H. E., learned the oil business in the Newhall field as an employe of the Standard Oil Company. While in that field he worked first as a tool-dresser and then as a driller. In the Santa Maria field he engaged as a driller with the Union Oil Company. Coming to Maricopa, Kern county, in 1908, he continued to work for the Union Oil Company as a driller. Later he entered the employ of the American Midway Oil Company, of which he became superintendent, and he was further associated with the Cleveland Oil Company and the Canadian Pacific Oil Company in the Midway field, where since November of 1911 he has worked in the interests of the Pacific Crude Oil Company. Always busily engaged in occupative duties, he has had no leisure for participation in public affairs and has taken no part in fraternal matters aside from being a member of Bakersfield Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E.

J. J. Brinkman

JOHN J. BRINKMAN.—With characteristic modesty and affection he attributes his success largely to the noble example set by his mother and to the encouraging companionship of his wife. The former, who was Sophronia Beacock and a native of Michigan, is now seventy-four years old and resides at the old Ohio homestead associated with her younger days. The father, Henry Brinkman, was a farmer by occupation and died in 1910 at the age of seventy-three, his death being caused by an accidental injury. The fifth among seven children, John J. was born in Williams county, Ohio, December 28, 1871, and had but meager advantages for an education in his early life. For a time he attended the public schools of Angola, Ind., from which place he went to Kansas, where he earned his livelihood by teaching in the winter and working on ranches during the summer months. His own efforts were made to defray his expenses in the Salina Normal University, from which he was graduated in 1895.

Arrival in California during the fall of 1900 and an immediate identification with the oil fields of Kern county brought to Mr. Brinkman an early and adequate comprehension of the oil industry. Thus apparently by chance he was led into the occupation with which, although indirectly, his greatest lifework has been accomplished. After he had worked in the fields until he thoroughly understood the business he entered the employ of the Hardison Perforating Company. When he left the employ of that concern many of his friends urged him to secure a perforator of his own and, acting upon their suggestions, he leased two old contrivances, but found them to be unserviceable, so he turned his mind toward the invention of a new machine. In this difficult task he was remarkably successful. However, he was wholly without means and unable to build a machine for lack of money. At this crisis the Associated Oil Company came to his aid and built the first machine, also made the first test, which proved the value of the perforator without a question. Even then all was not "smooth sailing," for the Hardison Perforating Company in 1903-4 brought suits against him in the United States district court for infringement of their patent. The outcome of the case was that Mr. Brinkman was upheld in court on every point of the case.

The business having proved very profitable, Mr. Brinkman has been enabled to invest in farm lands and real estate and now owns four hundred acres in the Weed Patch, which by means of artesian water and an adequate pumping system he is bringing under a high state of cultivation. His faith in Kern county is great and he is proving it by his investments, and possessing a commendable spirit, he rightly ranks high among the business men of the county. Sharing with him in this popularity is his accomplished wife, who prior to their marriage in March, 1908, was Miss Margaret Jenkins of Oakland, this state. They are the parents of two children, Rolla and Helen.

CLARENCE S. GREEN.—The business men of Maricopa have been leading factors in its rapid growth and not the least of these is Clarence S. Green, who during May of 1907 came to the west side and since then has witnessed the entire material growth of the town. At first its destiny seemed uncertain. The mushroom character of the original growth caused many to believe its importance would be temporary, but with each year it has planted its roots deeper in the soil of prosperous existence and since 1907 it has developed into a city, rich, progressive and permanent. July 20, 1911, it was incorporated as a city and Mr. Green, who had been chosen a member of the board of school trustees in 1909, was again chosen to serve the newly-incorporated city in the same office. In fact, it was his work, together with that of other leading men, that rendered possible the successful incorporation, and since then these same citizens have fostered all public enterprises.

Born at Watsonville, Monterey county, Cal., September 16, 1868, Mr. Green has little recollection of his birthplace, for at the age of three years he was taken by the family to Santa Barbara, where later he was sent to the public school. He began to earn a livelihood as a farm hand and soon became an expert in the care of stock as well as in the tilling of the soil. As early as 1889, when scarcely twenty-one years of age he came to Kern county and here he has since made his home, having in 1892 married Miss Mollie Emerson, of Kern county, but who was born in San Luis Obispo county, Cal. She was reared there until she was eighteen years of age, when she came with her parents to Kern county. Three sons were born of the union, Clarence, Robert and Edward. The first home of the couple was in the southwest part of the county, where Mr. Green made a specialty of stock-raising and general ranching. During 1904 he moved to the vicinity of Bakersfield and rented land, which he devoted to the raising of general crops and of stock. As previously stated, he came to the west side in 1907 and has been a resident of Maricopa ever since the town started. For one year he devoted his time to contract teaming, next he started a livery stable and six months later he opened a blacksmith shop and started in the harness business also. During 1911 he erected a building for a harness shop and this he now occupies, doing an excellent business in the making, repair and sale of harness of all kinds. Although he left his farm some years ago he still retains the tract near Old River twelve miles southwest of Bakersfield, where he owns a well-improved estate of three hundred acres in grain and alfalfa. He is identified with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks at Bakersfield, also with the Ancient Order of United Workmen in the same city.

Mr. Green continues to run the livery, harness, blacksmith and team contracting business at Maricopa, while Mrs. Green, with the help of her three sons, operates the large three hundred acre alfalfa, grain and stock ranch in the Old River district of Kern county.

Mrs. Green is the daughter of E. S. Emerson, who was born in Missouri and came to California in the early days. He was with the Government troops in Mexico driving team during the Mexican war and then came up to California and engaged in the stock business. He was married in Sonoma county to Miss Julia Duncan, of Missouri, who crossed the plains in 1849 in company with her parents. Settlement was made in Sonoma county, where she grew up to young womanhood and where she was married. A part of her children were born in that county. Later the parents moved to San Luis Obispo county and in 1886 the parents and their family came to Kern county and settled on the Paleto country land. Here they homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres. The seven sons also took homesteads there, and this gave rise to bitter litigation which ran through several years, but the case was finally won by the Emersons.

Henry Thomas Freear

Mrs Mary Treear

HENRY THOMAS FREEAR.—Many years ago, when the nineteenth century had scarcely rounded out one-half of its era of progress, a parish in Norfolk, England, had as its rector Rev. Henry T. Freear, a popular and talented young clergyman in the Church of England, beloved among his parishioners and deeply mourned when in 1852 death brought an untimely end to his ministerial labors. Surviving him were an only child, Henry Thomas, and the widow, Ann (Stribling) Freear, who was a native of the city of London. After being left a widow she and her small son accompanied her brother, John Stribling, to the United States and settled with him in Dekalb county, Ill., where she met and married Robert Mott, a prosperous pioneer farmer of the community. Thus it happened that Henry Thomas Freear, whose birth had occurred in London, England, December 18, 1845, passed the years of his youth upon an Illinois farm owned by his stepfather, Mr. Mott, and he gave cheerful aid to such farm work as his strength and years permitted. In 1863 at the age of almost eighteen he enlisted in Company C, Seventeenth Illinois Cavalry, and continued in the service until the close of the war, meanwhile receiving a wound in battle which proved slight in importance and did not prevent him from accompanying the regiment through all of its marches and campaigns. At the expiration of the war he engaged in farming. At Sycamore, Ill., October 24, 1866, he married Miss Mary Garlick, who was born on a farm near Kingston, Canada, and in 1853 removed to Illinois, settling on a farm in Dekalb county, where she was sent to the neighboring schools and trained to a knowledge of housekeeping. Her father, Joseph Garlick, was born in Yorkshire, England, and died in Illinois; the mother, who bore the maiden name of Elizabeth Holderness, was born in Kingston, Canada, of English parentage, and upon leaving Illinois came to California, where her declining years were passed happily in the home of her daughter, Mrs. Freear, until her death about 1884.

For three years after marriage Mr. and Mrs. Freear lived upon an Illinois farm. During 1869 they became pioneers of Nebraska and preempted a homestead in Lancaster county near Lincoln, where a small sod house was their home for a number of years. Meanwhile two sons, Horace R. and Charles H., were born on that frontier Nebraska farm. In 1874 the family came to California and located on a claim ten miles south of Bakersfield in the Old River district, where Mr. Freear developed a fine farm out of an uninviting and unpromising quarter section. After disposing of the property he bought another farm of one hundred and sixty acres one and one-half miles from the old place, and this in turn he developed from raw land into a remunerative proposition. The work of improvement was still being prosecuted when death interrupted his activities, March 4, 1902, and terminated the career of one of the most honored and successful farmers of Kern county. In religion he had always clung to the Episcopal faith, in politics he had been a staunch Republican and fraternally he held membership with Hurlburt Post, G. A. R., in Bakersfield. For years he served efficiently as school trustee of the Old River district. As superintendent of roads, which position he held for some years, he maintained a close supervision of the roads of the district.

For five years after the death of Mr. Freear the widow continued to make the ranch her home, but in 1907 she rented the property and removed to Bakersfield, where she erected and now occupies an elegant residence at No. 1709 Maple avenue. In addition she has built and now owns two other houses in this city. During 1910 she sold the old homestead to R. L. McCutchen, the husband of her third child, Lena. Her eldest sons, Horace R. and Charles H., are living in the Old River district and Bakersfield respectively, while the fourth child, Joseph P., makes Bakersfield his home. The twins, Burt and Alfred, are now in Maricopa. The youngest members of the family circle are Mrs. Laverna Bess, of Maricopa, and Mrs. Viola Perry, of Bakersfield. In religion Mrs. Freear is of the Baptist faith and has been interested continuously in all movements for the religious and moral uplifting of humanity. Since coming to Bakersfield she has become a prominent member of the Women's Relief Corps and has participated in many of its philanthropies and social functions.

MILO G. McKEE.—This well known citizen of Kern county was born in the town of Adams, Jefferson county, N. Y., October 17, 1862, and attended the public school near his parents' home until he was fifteen years old. Then he learned the tinner's and plumber's trades, at which he worked until his removal to California. He remained in his native state until 1888, when he came to California and located in Kern county. Here he worked as a tinner and plumber until 1891, when he bought twenty acres, which he farmed until 1898. It was in the last-mentioned year that his brother George S. McKee came to the county and the two formed a business partnership. They bought land from time to time until they now have a fine homestead of one hundred and sixty acres all under cultivation, seven miles south of Bakersfield on the Kern Island road, and of this sixty-five acres are in orchard, sixteen in peaches, twenty-six in prunes and ten in apricots, and ninety-five in alfalfa and grain.

Jefferson county, N. Y., was also the birthplace of George S. McKee, who was born December 29, 1860. He was educated in the public schools in his neighborhood and when he was seventeen years old began to support himself by farm labor. In 1885 he located in Perkins county, Nebr., where he homesteaded, after which he moved to Ft. Lupton, Colo., and there for eight years was successful as a butter-maker. From Colorado he came to California in 1898, since which he and his brother have contributed to the success which they both enjoy. Milo G. McKee is a Mason, and both are Republicans.

CHARLES HEMAN SHERMAN.—From practically the very beginning of his identification with the Midway field Mr. Sherman has been financially interested in the May's Oil Company and its successor, the May's Consolidated Oil Company, of which he is now treasurer and superintendent. When he entered the employ of the company in 1909, the work of development had only begun and he has been identified with all of the subsequent operations. Shortly after the concern commenced to develop their lease he was elected treasurer of the company and a member of the board of directors, having charge of the office in the Midway field, and in February, 1913, he was appointed superintendent. Articles of incorporation were again taken out in 1911 and the title changed to its present form. The properties of the organization on section 30, 31-23, and on section 28, 31-23, contain seven producing wells, the output of which entitles the company to rank among the most successful in the entire field.

Of Canadian birth, born in Ontario in 1883, Mr. Sherman is a member of an old family of New York state and was second among the four children of Heman and Margaret (Parks) Sherman, natives of New York, the former born at Elizabethtown, Essex county. For many years the father lived in Ontario and acted as administrator of a large estate. After having completed the studies of the public schools at Roche Point, Charles H. Sherman worked in the lumber woods in Western Ontario and saved his earnings in order to secure a college education. He attended the British-American College in Toronto until the close of the sophomore year, when he returned to the lumber region for another year.

Entering the banking business as bookkeeper in the Sovereign Bank of Canada at Aylmer, in five months Mr. Sherman was promoted to be cashier and a year later he was transferred to the head offices of the bank in Toronto, where he ranked as sixth on a staff of sixty-five men. On account of failing health he resigned from the bank, where he had established an enviable record for ability as an accountant, and entered the employ of F. B. Chapin, a silverminer at Cobalt, Canada, and in a short time he was promoted to be cashier, filling the same position with the successor of Mr. Chapin. However, at the expiration of two years he again found his health impaired by the confining work, and he resolved to come to California, where his former employer, Mr. Chapin, had acquired interests in the Midway field.

Wils G. McKee.

JOEL WRIGHT COULTER.—Numbered conspicuously among the young men of Southern California who have forsaken city life for the broad acres, seeking rather to live his life in the open under the blue skies than to experience the exciting tumult of city life, is Joel Wright Coulter, whose grandfather, B. F. Coulter, is well known in Los Angeles as the founder of the large establishment known as the Coulter Dry Goods Co., of which F. M. Coulter is now the head.

Joel Wright Coulter was born in Los Angeles, October 20, 1886, son of F. M. and Lelia (Lockhart) Coulter. After attendance in the public schools of his native city he was sent to Harvard Military College, from which he graduated in 1905, and then spent two years at the University of California, taking the agricultural course. Subsequently, under his grandfather's instruction, he entered the Coulter Dry Goods Co. as a clerk, and after working in the different departments in order to familiarize himself with the details of the business he finally became head of the toy department. It was in 1912 that Mr. Coulter turned his attention to agricultural pursuits, and buying six hundred and forty acres in Kern county, in Buena Vista district, he resigned his position with the Coulter Dry Goods Co. and located on his new place in order to give his personal supervision and aid in the improvement of his land. The tract is splendidly located twelve miles southwest of Bakersfield, and the whole section is irrigated by the Buena Vista Canal. It is gradually being leveled, checked and improved for raising alfalfa. Mr. Coulter expects to have four hundred acres in that crop, and the land not set apart for this purpose is devoted to general farming. In the improvement of his ranch he finds the knowledge which he acquired in agricultural college to be of great benefit, enabling him to run his own levels and surveys, as well as to make field tests and soil analysis, and make the selection of crops. He is making a specialty of stock raising and has already made splendid progress in his undertaking. He built a large eight-room residence, necessary barns and outbuildings, and has introduced every modern device to complete the place and it ranks among the foremost of its kind in the county.

On June 22, 1909, in Los Angeles, Mr. Coulter was married to Miss Edna Barlow, who was born in Ft. Covington, N. Y., daughter of Allison Barlow, who has been engaged in the real estate business in Los Angeles for many years. Mrs. Coulter was educated in Stanford and is a member of the Kappa Alpha Theta Society. Mr. Coulter is a member of the Delta Kappa Epsilon at Berkeley. They are the parents of one child, Alison Lelia. With his wife Mr. Coulter is a member of the Broadway Christian Church in Los Angeles.

CHARLES C. SMETZER.—The president of the Master Plumbers' Association of Bakersfield ranks as an artisan of exceptional skill and as a business man of high reputation for probity, careful workmanship and accuracy of judgment. Although the period of his identification with the interests of Bakersfield has not been long in duration, it has been of sufficient length to prove the high quality of his citizenship and the substantial nature of his occupational knowledge. It was in this city that he completed his apprenticeship to the trade of plumber and worked as a journeyman, later embarking in business for himself at No. 959 Baker street, East Bakersfield, where his wife has charge of the office, thus enabling him to devote his entire attention to the carrying out of contracts for the plumbing of residences of every size and style.

Since coming to California in 1900 Mr. Smetzer has seen many portions of the state and it is his conviction, founded on experience and observation, that Kern county offers advantages not to be surpassed by other sections of the commonwealth. Of German ancestry and Ohioan birth, he is a son of the late David and Rebecca (Shaffer) Smetzer, who lived upon a farm in Ohio for many years prior to their demise. There were five children in the family and two of these came to California, Charles C. and William, both now living in East Bakersfield. The former, who was next to the youngest among the children, was born in Williams county, Ohio, June 20, 1881, and passed the years of early life upon the home farm, meanwhile having such advantages as the country grammar schools and local high school offered. At the age of nineteen he started out to earn his own way in the world and immediately came to California, where he found employment on a ranch in Tulare county. Next he learned how to manufacture fruit-boxes and thereafter worked as box-maker in packing-houses from Fresno on the north to Redlands on the south, remaining in that business until he turned his attention to the trade of plumber. Since 1905 he has lived in Bakersfield and East Bakersfield and in the latter city he opened a plumber's shop in the spring of 1911, since which time he has devoted time and attention to the doing of first-class work in his special line.

The marriage of Mr. Smetzer took place in Bakersfield December 12, 1908, and united him with Miss Ethel Oren, who was born in Topeka, Kan., but was reared and educated in Kentucky. Possessing excellent business ability, she has been of assistance to her husband by taking charge of the office and keeping the books. For some years she has been a leading local worker in the organization of Pythian Sisters, while Mr. Smetzer is an interested participant in the activities of the Knights of Pythias. Local movements of merit receive his quiet but stanch support and in politics he gives allegiance to the Republican party.

THE WOMEN'S IMPROVEMENT CLUB.—Under the laws of California and federated with the state federation of Women's Clubs, the Women's Improvement Club of Taft was incorporated in 1912, its object being for civic, literary and choral improvement. The following officers direct the executive policy of the organization: president, Mrs. W. M. Mikesell; first vice-president, Mrs. J. Walter Key; second vice-president, Mrs. George Seybolt; recording secretary, Mrs. J. P. Plaugher; corresponding secretary, Mrs. L. P. Guiberson; and treasurer, Mrs. H. E. Smith. The literary and choral departments are yet in the incipency of their usefulness, but will be developed at no distant day. Up to the present time the civic branch, as expressed in the Taft branch of the Kern county free library, has been developed to such an extent that there are now four hundred volumes of choice, up-to-date literature, including all branches of history, art, travel, fiction, humor and exploration, as well as juvenile books and magazines, and in addition the leading dailies and weeklies and a number of the best magazines.

Co-operation with the county and state library organizations makes it possible for a patron of the Taft library to secure any book he or she may wish on any desired subject. Since its inception the library has had the kindly co-operation and financial support of the city trustees of Taft. The first home of the library was in the City Hall. The rapid growth of the project demonstrated that more commodious quarters were needed. Four of the leading women of Taft took the matter into consideration. These women, Mrs. Charles Heath, the then president of the Club, and the building committee consisting of Mrs. L. P. Guiberson, Mrs. J. W. Key and Mrs. W. M.

Mikesell, gave a note to the bank in order to secure funds for erecting a building in 1912. Donations were not urged, but the money has been raised through entertainments and in other ways. By the 1st of January, 1914, the ladies hope to have the building entirely free from debt, and this in itself will speak volumes for their determination and executive management. The uplifting influence of the library is evident to all. About three hundred and fifty books were added to the shelves on the 1st of July, 1913, and immediately afterward the rooms began to be filled with people, old and young, eager to avail themselves of the privilege of reading the choicest output of the large publishing houses of the world. In addition to the books and magazines, the library has been a center for good lectures by local and Kern county professional men and advanced thinkers. The custodian, Mrs. B. J. Krekeler, a courteous and intelligent woman, ably and faithfully attends to the duties of librarian and assists the members of the Women's Improvement Club in a wise endeavor to promote the moral and educational welfare of Taft.

LUCIUS JOHNSTON.—The lineage of the Johnston family is traced back to Virginia, where the original immigrant to America made settlement and became a planter of considerable local prominence. Of later generations the pioneer instinct showed strongest in Basil Johnston, a Virginian by birth and education, but throughout young manhood a planter in Tennessee and ultimately one of the first settlers of Jefferson county, Ill., where he took up raw land and developed a farm. Among his children was a son, William Ambrose Johnston, a native of Tennessee and now a resident of Jefferson county, Ill., where he has improved and still owns a valuable farm near Mount Vernon. Shortly after the opening of the Civil war he left wife and family and went to the front as a volunteer in the Sixtieth Illinois Infantry, with which he continued until the expiration of his period of enlistment. Upon receiving an honorable discharge from the army he resumed the management of his farm and since has devoted his attention to agricultural pursuits. By his marriage to Mary Lynch, who was born in Jefferson county and died there in 1871, he had a family of five children and all but one of these still survive. The eldest, Lucius, was born at the home farm near Mount Vernon, Ill., February 25, 1861, and received his education in country schools, supplemented by attendance at Ewing College.

During a period of ten years devoted to teaching school Mr. Johnston employed all his spare time to the development of the farm which he had purchased when he was twenty-two years of age. The earnings of the school-room were given over to the improvement of the land and to the erection of needed buildings. Later on, besides tilling the soil of the farm and raising stock thereon, he filled the positions of township tax collector and assessor and served with efficiency as a justice of the peace. During 1893 he came to California and engaged in ranching in Kern county. After seven years he left the farm and settled in Bakersfield, where he built his home at No. 2510 H street, besides erecting three other bungalows which he rents. Immediately after coming to this city he secured a position as chief operator in charge of the main distributing station of the Power Development Company, later known as the Power Transit and Light Company. Recognition of his faithful service came in a merited promotion to the position of superintendent of the meter department. When the San Joaquin Power and Light Corporation absorbed the old concern in 1911 he was retained in the same position, which he since has filled with customary attention to details and unswerving fidelity.

While engaged in farming in Jefferson county, Ill., Mr. Johnston was first married, in 1883, to Miss Florida Crosno, a native of that county, who died there in 1893. His second marriage occurred in Bakersfield in 1897, uniting him with Miss Lucy Range, a native of Germany who came to San Diego, Cal., when a child. She was educated in the schools of that city and Los Angeles.

One son, Donald, was born of this union, he now being a student in the Kern county high school. The family are interested in all movements for the upbuilding of Bakersfield and Mrs. Johnston is an earnest member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of this city. In politics Mr. Johnston votes with the Democratic party. Fraternally he not only belongs to the Woodmen of the World, but in addition he has been very prominent in the local ranks of the Knights of Pythias, which he has represented in the grand lodge, besides holding the office of past chancellor commander.

H. H. McCLINTOCK.—To witness the remarkable development of the Midway field and to contribute thereto through the force of his own mechanical and constructive ability has been the privilege of Mr. McClintock, who occupies a most responsible position as superintendent in Kern county for the Northern Exploration Company and for the Southern California Gas Company as well as the predecessor of the latter concern, the Midway Gas Company. The corporation named, which like the others represents enormous financial institutions, had for its principal task the building of gas-pipe lines from the Midway field to Los Angeles, where the gas is distributed and sold to the various existing gas companies through the agents of the Southern California Gas Company. In turn the latter is associated with the Northern Exploration Company, which engages in the drilling of gas wells and the production of natural gas, a product superior to the manufactured gas for heating purposes.

In the local work of these large institutions the commanding personality of H. H. McClintock has wielded a permanent influence. Through all his life a resident of California, of which he is a native son, he yet has traveled extensively, has enjoyed the advantages of training abroad and in the course of his career as a marine engineer visited the principal ports of the world. Born at San Jose, Santa Clara county, November 18, 1873, educated in the public schools and business college in his native city, married June 20, 1900, and identified with the Midway field in the early days when its total output was less than one thousand barrels, these facts give a summary of his eventful existence, but fail to indicate the thoroughness of his training and the scope of his influence in occupative enterprises. In early years he served an apprenticeship in the Fulton iron works at San Francisco and at the expiration of four years in that plant he went abroad in order to study marine engineering with a famous firm of shipbuilders in Belfast, Ireland. From the great yards of the firm have been sent forth some of the largest and finest ships that sail the high seas. The ill-fated Titanic was one of their most majestic creations.

After a practical experience in marine engine-building that kept him in Belfast from 1899 until March, 1902, Mr. McClintock then returned to San Francisco. For several years he engaged as a licensed marine engineer and master mechanic. Meanwhile he sailed around the world three times and had charge of the engines on a number of the greatest steamships. Meeting Mr. Rockefeller at San Francisco, he was induced to take up pipeline construction work. For a time he was employed in the mechanical department and for one year engaged as superintendent of the Central Division with headquarters at Hanford. During 1907 he directed the construction of the line into the Midway field, an eight-inch pipe to Richmond and the pipes for the water system to Rio Bravo. Since 1908 he has been a very active constructive agent in the development of the Midway, where as previously stated he acts as superintendent of the Northern Exploration Company, the Southern California Gas Company and the Midway Gas Company, the latter recently overtaken by the concern previously named. In July of 1911 he took charge of the construction work for the Western Water Company and from that time until the completion of the task in June, 1912, he superintended the laying of pipes and the building of the line for the concern. Besides being connected with the Elks at Bakersfield he is actively interested in the Petroleum Club at Taft.

H. H. McClintock

MRS. HARRIET JASPER.—The Boucher family, of which Mrs. Jasper is a member, descends from old French lineage, but has been represented in America for a number of generations and her father, Stephen Boucher, was a native of New York. During a residence of some years in Indiana he met and married Zoe Rahome, a descendant of German and French ancestry and a connection of the Pollock family, for years influential citizens of Louisville, Ky. Accompanied by his young wife Mr. Boucher removed to Canada and established a home at Chatham, Ontario, on the Thames river, where he engaged in the lumber business and also bought and sold grain. The daughter, Harriet, was born at Chatham during the period of the sojourn of the family at that point. During 1866 the family came via Panama to California and spent two years in San Francisco, where the court for purposes of convenience changed the spelling of the family name from Boucher to Boushey. From San Francisco Mr. Boushey went to Catalina Island and engaged in lead and silver mining with Temple and Workman. In the interests of the same gentlemen he came to Kern county in 1881 and located antimony mines in the San Emidio mountains. In addition he and a partner developed some claims of their own, then he bought out the partner and engaged alone in the management of the mill and smelting plant. In 1889 occurred the death of his wife and a son, Alexander, who had assisted him in the development of the antimony mines. His own demise occurred July 24, 1891, when he was seventy-eight years of age. Of the other members of the family his son, Dr. Julius Boushey, died in San Francisco, and a daughter, Anzoe, Mrs. Thomas E. O'Hare, died in Los Angeles.

Of the four children in the Boushey family who attained mature years Mrs. Jasper is the sole survivor. She was educated in San Francisco and Los Angeles and in the latter city became the wife of William Jasper, a native of Bremen, Germany, and by occupation a machinist and locomotive engineer. At the age of twenty-one years Mr. Jasper came to California and secured employment as an engineer in San Francisco. After his marriage he removed from San Francisco to Los Angeles, where he engaged in the mercantile business. About 1885 he came to Kern county, where afterward he assisted Mr. Boushey in the mines until the death of the latter and the subsequent sale of the antimony mine and smelter by the administrator to the Kern County Land Company. Thereupon he came to East Bakersfield and erected a residence for his family. Much of his time was spent in the oil fields until his death, which occurred January 20, 1903, at the age of sixty-two years. He had taken up a homestead in San Emidio, which he left to his wife. Later Mrs. Jasper entered a claim adjoining that which he had developed. Upon it she remained for five years as required by law. Meanwhile she made needed improvements on both places. The stipulated time having expired, she will soon hold a title to her claim. In entering upon such an undertaking after having been left a widow with a large family, she showed commendable energy and a desire not only to secure independence for herself, but also to aid her children in subsequent years, for undoubtedly the land will increase in value with development of the surrounding country and of its own resources. With her family she has been a lifelong adherent of the Roman Catholic faith and for some years past she has belonged to St. Joseph's parish. In politics both she and her husband were quiet but firm believers in the principles of the Democratic party. Of her seven children we note the following: James William is a locomotive engineer now living at San Bernardino; George Alexander is employed as cattle buyer for Miller & Lux at Hanford; Edith Adelaide is the wife of A. C. Silver and lives in East Bakersfield; Frederick Stephen is an oil-well contractor operating on the west side; Albert L.

is a locomotive engineer of East Bakersfield; Emma married Mark Wilson and lives at Waite, Kern county; and Myrtle A. married H. B. Jones and resides in Los Angeles.

HENRY FORD CONDUCT.—A study of genealogical records indicates that when William the Conqueror crossed the channel to England he had among his soldiers a member of the Conduct family, a gallant Norman of noble blood, who bore his part in the triumphal entry of the troops into the British Isles. Whatever of heroism characterized his subsequent activities and whatever of honor came to his Anglo-Saxon descendants, these possibilities are hidden in the mists of historical obscurity. The next fact that can be ascertained in the family history proves that one John Conduct came from Wales to America as early as 1640 and settled in the then wilderness of New Jersey. From him descended Nathaniel Conduct, a brave soldier and lieutenant-colonel in the Revolutionary war, in which he perished ere yet victory had crowned the self-sacrificing efforts of the feeble band of patriots. Among his children there was a son, Silas, a native of New Jersey and a farmer in the vicinity of Paterson, that state, where also he had banking interests. The next generation was represented by Sidney Conduct, who was born at Paterson, N. J., became a merchant in New York City, but during 1842 removed to the frontier of Illinois and took up government land in McHenry county. From that time until his death in 1856 he labored with unceasing energy to transform the raw tract into a productive farm, but the end came ere he had realized his anticipations of agricultural success.

The marriage of Silas Conduct united him with Charlotte Reynolds, who was born in New Jersey and died in Illinois in 1874. She was a daughter of Capt. Abram Reynolds, an officer under General Scott in the war of 1812 and a pioneer of 1842 in McHenry county, Ill., where he died about 1856. By his own energetic efforts he acquired large holdings in land. Not only was he successful in private affairs, but in addition he wielded a wide influence in public enterprises and at one time filled the office of sheriff of his county in New Jersey. The family of Silas and Charlotte Conduct numbered six children. Four of these attained maturity, but only one still survives, Henry Ford Conduct, who was born at Newark, N. J., July 5, 1837, and was brought to the frontier of Illinois in 1842. As a boy he attended the country schools of McHenry county. Through the kindly assistance of Hon. E. B. Washburne, member of congress from Illinois and a distinguished citizen of Galena, in 1854 the youth was appointed to a cadetship in the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis. Among his classmates was one who, as Admiral Dewey, later acquired a worldwide fame. After he had spent two years in the academy he was forced to resign on account of failing eyes. Returning to Illinois he later married Miss Nancy J. Young, a native of Maine. During 1859 he came via Panama to California and became interested in mining at Deadwood, Siskiyou county. When the news reached him concerning the breaking out of war he at once returned to the east and at Manchester, N. H., enlisted in the First New Hampshire Battery September 26, 1861. Upon the organization of the troops he was elected lieutenant of his company. Ordered to the front, he fought in numerous desperate engagements, including the second battle of Bull Run, Antietam, Chancellorsville and Fredericksburg. In the last-named battle the battery was reduced to four guns. This almost total annihilation obliged the young lieutenant to resign his commission and retire. Not content, however, to leave the service of the Union he went immediately to Illinois and June 3, 1863, became a member of Company H, Eighth Illinois Cavalry, which he accompanied to the front. In the historic engagement at Gettysburg his regiment fired the first shot. Throughout the balance of the war he bore a gallant part. After the surrender of the Confederate troops he was sent to Washington, where he joined in the desperate chase after Wilkes Booth, the slayer of President Lincoln, then a clerk at headquarters, administering the oath of allegiance to the Confederates, and afterwards he participated in the grand review and June 2, 1865, was mustered out of the service at Washington.

A. F. Lockie

Returning to Illinois Mr. Condict had charge of the old homestead until 1872,* when he sold out there and came to California. Bakersfield was then a small hamlet, but in the fall of the same year it secured the county-seat and its real development began at that time. For about two years he was proprietor of the old Stage hotel on the present site of the Odd Fellows hall and next he ran the old ferry for one season. During 1877 he embarked in the soda business on Nineteenth street, where the Southern block is, and later he moved it to G and Seventeenth streets. Two years later he bought one-half block across the street reaching from G to H on Seventeenth street and moved to the new location, where he has continued to the present time, meanwhile building up an important trade in all kinds of soft drinks, making his own syrups and manufacturing his popular products at his headquarters, known as the C. O. D. soda works. At the same time for twenty-five years he followed the truck and dray business, having four large trucks, and was agent for the Standard Oil Company. In 1905 he sold out the truck business and also gave up the oil agency. Since then he has devoted his time to soda works and looking after his private interests. He is secretary and director of the Paraffin Oil Company, one of the oldest producers on the west side, and is a stockholder in the Coalinga Peerless and the U. S. Oil Company. On account of the bad well water, Mr. Condict, with others, was induced to organize the Bakersfield waterworks, becoming a director and the first superintendent, and putting in all the original pipes. After serving as superintendent for several years he resigned. Near his large manufacturing establishment stands his comfortable residence on H and Seventeenth streets and here he and his wife hospitably entertain the many friends won during the long period of their residence in Bakersfield. With them is one daughter, Miss Charlotte, while the other daughter, Bertha, Mrs. C. L. Hollis, makes her home in San Francisco. At the adoption of the city charter Mr. Condict was chosen the first city assessor of Bakersfield. Throughout all of his life he has believed in the Republican party and supported its principles. Besides being connected with the Sons of the Revolution, he is a charter member of Hurlburt Post No. 127, G. A. R., and in 1886 was chosen its first commander. When he identified himself with the Ancient Order of United Workmen in 1879 his worth was recognized and he was chosen for official responsibilities. For twenty-three years he served as financier of the local lodge, of which he also is past master workman. After coming to Bakersfield in 1873 he was made a Mason in Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M. During that year also he identified himself with Kern Lodge No. 202, I. O. O. F., and afterward he was selected to serve as noble grand of the organization, besides which he became prominent in encampment work and was the first selected to fill the office of chief patriarch.

FREDERICK S. MAZE.—The emigrant trail across the plains, although less sought by ambitious Argonauts than in the memorable years of 1849 and 1850, was still a popular highway when in the summer of 1853 J. W. Maze, a Kentuckian by birth and ancestry, traveled the course of its monotonous miles in "prairie schooner" drawn by ox-teams. Accompanying him was Mrs. Maze, formerly Miss Elizabeth Mann, who was born in Missouri about 1834 and who, now an invalid as the result of an accidental fall that broke the hip-bone, is considerably cared for by her son, Frederick S. The father engaged in grain-raising in Stanislaus county and removed from there to Fresno county, settling near Selma about fourteen miles from Fresno. His death occurred about 1907 at the age of seventy-eight. Of his seven living children we note the following: Julia is the wife of S. B. Shaw, a carpenter at Visalia; William E. is engaged in farming in Kern county; Alice married Marshall A. Cotton, a fruit-packer at Visalia; Laura is the wife of C. H. Brown, a team contractor at Fowler; Zetta married F. S. Jasper, a drilling contractor at Felloes; Frederick S., a twin of Zetta, was born near Modesto, Stanislaus county, August 22, 1872; and Christopher E., is engaged in the poultry business at Fowler.

Reared on a farm in Fresno county, Frederick S. Maze began to work in the oil business at the age of fourteen years and since 1899, when he came to the McKittrick oil field, he has given his attention wholly to the industry. At first he was employed in driving teams and handled as many as eight head of horses at one time, hauling heavy machinery to the McKittrick field. When he ceased to work as a teamster he began to tend boilers with the Kern River Oil Company at McKittrick. In 1900 he came to the Midway field as a tool-dresser. However, drilling has been his main business and he has made an enviable record in this department of the oil industry. Eight wells on the Pierpont stand to his credit as a driller. In 1907 he drilled one well at McKittrick, later drilled a well on the Brockton, then returned to the Pierpont and from that went successively to several other leases. Since 1911 he has been connected with the General Petroleum Oil Company, with which he has made a record for successful drilling on the Nevada Midway, Holloway and other leases. The demands of the work are so engrossing that it leaves him no leisure for outside affairs. Early and late he has been at his post of duty. At one time he had five strings of tools running on the Holloway, Scrongo, Nevada Midway and Bankline, also five strings of tools on the Midway 32, having charge of a production that averaged about seventy-five thousand barrels per month until February 1, 1913, since which time his entire attention has been concentrated upon the Midway 32. One of his noteworthy achievements was with well No. 14, which came to him as a fishing job November 1, 1912. Practically abandoned, with boiler lost and equipment useless, he undertook a task of the greatest difficulty, and when he was successful in the attempt, removing the old casing, providing new equipment and making practically a new well that in June, 1913, came in as a three thousand barrel per day gusher, he was accorded the heartiest praise for the accomplishment of a feat than which nothing more difficult had ever been accomplished in the field.

MRS. W. M. MIKESELL.—The president of the Women's Improvement Club at Taft has, through co-operation with other progressive women of the city, accomplished much of inestimable value to the community and made possible the Taft library together with allied enterprises inseparable from civic advancement. In the very fineness of its far-reaching influence the spirit of the Club eludes definition. Its officers and members endeavor to exercise the art of kindness, of light and of progress, and the city of Taft is not unmindful of the obligations of its large debt to these women of large-hearted service and philanthropic natures. In the task of promoting civic advancement the president has received the most able assistance from other officers and from members. Their tasks have been labors of beneficence and philanthropy, and their achievements have marked the pathway of local growth.

Born and reared in Pennsylvania, educated in the State Normal School of Pennsylvania and granted a state teacher's certificate in that state, Mrs. Mikesell followed the profession of an instructor in schools until her marriage to W. M. Mikesell, of Indiana. During 1909 she came to California and settled among the pioneers of the new town of Taft, where Mr. Mikesell became the proprietor of a hardware and furniture store and where she has thoroughly identified herself with every movement for community development. Of her union with Mr. Mikesell there are two sons, Emerson and William Milton, Jr. To enjoy the friendship of Mrs. Mikesell is a privilege. Gentle in thought, yet positive in convictions and resolute in action, she possesses the qualities necessary to a successful presiding officer, yet invaluable also in the home, in the church and in society. The value of her uplifting influence has been seen in many a life outside of her home circle and has been particularly apparent in the philanthropic enterprises of the Women's Improvement Club. The Ladies' Aid Society of the Presbyterian Church of Taft was organized in Mrs. Mikesell's home at Taft. As an active worker in that organization she has been instrumental in building the fine Presbyterian Church at the corner of Fifth and Kern streets, as well as the manse, which was built in 1912 and continues to be an uplifting influence in Taft.

L. C. Payne

J. C. PAYNE.—The colonial era of American history witnessed the arrival from Scotland of a sturdy representative of the Payne family, the founder of the name in the new world and a pioneer planter in Virginia. It is interesting to note that Collins' Early History of Kentucky records a dispute and disagreement that arose between General Washington and the progenitor of the Payne family, who were contemporaries, but differed in opinions concerning national policies. A Virginian by birth, Duval Payne became an early settler of Missouri and took up a tract of farm land five miles east of Kansas City on the road to Independence. When that property was sold he moved to Cass county, Mo., about fifty miles from Sedalia, and there his death occurred during November of 1862. Years before he had married Mary Jane Wilson, a native of Kentucky, and seven children had been born to the union. The next to the youngest of these, J. C., was born in Jackson county, Mo., March 10, 1853, and was only eight years of age at the time of his father's untimely demise. The widow was left in poverty-stricken circumstances with a large family, only the eldest of whom were able to go out in the world to earn their own livelihoods. Upon the boy of eight devolved much of the burden of the family maintenance and his condition was rendered the more pitiable by reason of the Civil war being then at its climax. The portion of Missouri in which the family lived was a hotbed of guerrilla warfare. The lives of all, old and young, Union and Confederate, were constantly in danger. The rising sun of each day gave no prediction of what horror might befall the community before its setting. The barefoot boy, clad in coarse homespun clothing, had no opportunity to attend school during the war, but as he bravely tried to earn his livelihood he saw much that left an indelible impression upon his mind. More than once his life was threatened by outlaw soldiers who sought to get secret information. Quantrell's gang operated in the neighborhood. At one time he saw six innocent men shot after they had been compelled to dig their own graves. Before the fatal shot was fired each man was required to stand in such a position that his body would drop into the grave he had dug.

Finally the long civil struggle came to an end and in 1866 the fatherless lad, who had been given a temporary home with an aunt, Mrs. B. F. Smith, was taken to Kentucky by his mother, who joined relatives in the vicinity of Paris. There he attended the common schools and became trained to farm pursuits. At the age of twenty-four years he returned to Missouri. From 1878 to 1880 he lived in Johnson county and there, in the year last-named, he married Miss Martha Cook, who had been born in Indiana, but had spent the greater part of her life in Missouri. During 1883 the family came to California and settled near Selma, Fresno county, where Mr. Payne planted a tract of land to vines and deciduous fruit trees. After the fruit was in bearing condition he disposed of the property to advantage. Next he engaged in raising wheat and had from two thousand to three thousand acres in grain, conducting extensive operations and meeting with considerable success. During 1902 he removed to Bakersfield, where with his only child, James Bruce Payne, he now conducts an undertaking business. The son is a skilled embalmer and a scientist as well. June 10, 1905, he was graduated from the Barnes School of Embalming and Anatomy at New York and March 4, 1908, from the Cincinnati College of Embalming.

The Christian Church of Bakersfield has had the benefit of the capable assistance of the Payne family, who are devoted to the doctrines of that organization. In politics Mr. Payne votes with the Democratic party. Fraternally he holds membership with the blue lodge of Masonry, the Knights of Pythias and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. For many years he has been a forceful worker with the Kern County Board of Trade and more recently he has served on the executive committee of the Bakersfield Board of Trade, in which he is a leading spirit and enthusiastic worker. Never has he lost an opportunity to "boost" his city, county and state. His faith in the city and his belief in its future prosperity found evidence in his erection during 1912 of a three-story brick building at No. 1928 Nineteenth street. On the top floor the family have a modern apartment fitted up for residential purposes. The basement floor is devoted to a display, sales and stock room and a workshop, while on the first floor are the office, the operating room, the morgue and a funeral chapel with a capacity of one hundred visitors.

FRED C. BROCKMAN.—Teutonic descent in an unbroken line is indicated by the genealogy of the Brockman family, whose American representative, Fred C. Brockman, the proprietor of the Plant apartments in Bakersfield, is himself a native of Hesse-Darmstadt and identified throughout youth with that important kingdom in Germany. In the neighborhood where he was born December 21, 1866, he attended the national schools and served an apprenticeship to the trade of butcher, thus entering into manhood's activities fortified by a fair education and a thorough knowledge of a useful occupation. Meanwhile he had heard much concerning the new world and the opportunities which it offers to men of energy and determination. Determining to try his fortune in the land across the seas, he bade farewell to the friends of boyhood and took passage on a steamship bound for the port of New York. It was during 1884 that he became a resident of the United States and at first he settled in New Mexico, where he engaged in mining at Rio Mimbres. All the ups and downs incident to the existence of a miner and prospector fell to his lot in those early years of effort. There were times when all went well and the returns were fair, but also some seasons of depression and discouragement, when the profits of other times were forced to be turned to the payment of losses in unfortunate mining ventures. The Apache Indians were very troublesome in New Mexico and more than once they imperiled his life with their dastardly attacks, but in each instance he escaped in safety.

Mining interests in Colorado attracted Mr. Brockman to Ouray in 1890 and there or near by he continued for some time, combining with his work in mines the management of a meat market which he had started shortly after his arrival in Colorado. The next enterprise that engaged his attention was the purchase of a tract of one hundred and sixty acres at Hotchkiss, where he engaged in general farm pursuits and secured water under a canal from the mountains. The presence of irrigation facilities and the fertile nature of the soil rendered possible the undertaking of horticultural enterprises. With this idea in view he platted the tract in tracts of ten acres and sold to fruit-growers, himself retaining ten acres for his home place and planting the land in apples and peaches. The raising of fruit proved profitable, but the high altitude affected the health of his wife injuriously and he therefore came to California in the fall of 1912, settling in Bakersfield, where he purchased the Plant apartments at No. 806 Nineteenth street. The building contains twenty-four furnished apartments and Mr. Brockman conducts a grocery on the first floor.

Chas. E. Cooper

When a lad in his early German home Mr. Brockman was confirmed in the Lutheran Church and ever since then he has upheld the doctrines of the denomination. Fraternally he holds membership with the Woodmen of the World. During 1896 he was united in marriage at Delta, Colo., with Mrs. Mattie (Rosenkranz) Esch, a native of Keil, Germany, and a lady of amiable qualities, who since coming to Bakersfield has made many friends and also been greatly benefited in health. Besides being active in church work and a model housekeeper in the home, she takes a warm interest and leading part in the work of the Royal Neighbors and the Women of Woodcraft. By her former marriage she was the mother of three children, namely: Walter Esch, a fruit-grower residing at Hotchkiss, Colo.; Mrs. Gertrude Vincent, of Spokane, Wash.; and Elsa, who makes her home in Denver.

CHARLES E. COOPER.—It is conceded by competent judges that few citizens of Kern county are more familiar with soil conditions and property valuations than Charles E. Cooper, who conducts a real-estate, insurance and loan business in Bakersfield, with office at No. 1514 Twentieth street. One of his specialties has been the agency for the Chester Park tract on Fourth street and Chester avenue, on the east line, comprising one hundred and forty-four lots well located on the main thoroughfare of Bakersfield from north to south four blocks from the street car line. In addition he acts as agent for the Mountain View tract in the Edison district east of Bakersfield and three miles from Edison station.

By virtue of long residence in the west Mr. Cooper has acquired the enthusiasm and mental breadth characteristic of those who breathe the air of mountain or sea. Besides the qualities that come through long association with the west, he inherited the substantial characteristics that belong to the sons of Iowa. That commonwealth was his early home and Janesville, Bremer county, his native community, while a nearby farm gave him an initiation into agricultural knowledge as well as valuable information concerning soil necessities and possibilities. His father, a man of sterling worth and of considerable prominence in Bremer county, traced his lineage to Peter Cooper, who coming from England to America during the colonial era founded a numerous family whose influence has been felt in the majority of the states of the Union and whose present-day representatives are contributing effectively to the material upbuilding of their varied localities. That eminent writer on horticulture and recognized authority on olives and olive culture, Elwood Cooper, the millionaire olive grower of Santa Barbara, is a distant relative of our subject.

With the self-reliance that has characterized every generation of the family in the new world Charles E. Cooper started out to earn his own way in the world at an early age and became a resident of Denver, Colo., where for fifteen years he engaged in the real-estate business. Meanwhile he enjoyed a substantial prosperity in material matters and became popular in the most refined social circles. A later period of real-estate activity was passed in San Francisco, whence he came to Bakersfield and in this city he has won recognition through marked business ability and agreeable personality. Giving his attention very closely to realty enterprises, he takes no part in politics aside from voting the Republican ticket at all elections. In religion he holds to the doctrines of the Presbyterian Church. Aside from his large real-estate business Mr. Cooper is resident agent for the Philadelphia Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia and the West Coast Life of San Francisco, as well as agent for the Continental of New York (with assets of $26,000,000), the Firemen's Insurance Company of Newark, the Fidelity Phoenix of New York (with assets of $17,000,000), the New Jersey Fidelity and Plate Glass Insurance Company, the American Union Fire Insurance Company of Philadelphia, and the Fire Association of Philadelphia.

In September, 1913, Mr. Cooper was elected president of the Bakersfield Realty Board and also selected one of the committee of five to secure the appointment of fifteen freeholders to draft a new charter for the city. December 3, 1913, at the Van Nuys Hotel in Los Angeles occurred the marriage of C. E. Cooper and Miss Cora May St. Clair, a member of one of the pioneer families of Bakersfield, whose father, L. P. St. Clair, was the first mayor of Bakersfield, owner of the first electric light plant and a pioneer in the oil business. Mrs. Cooper had been identified with the oil business prior to her marriage and was a lady of prominence in her home city. Her brother, L. P. St. Clair, is president of the Independent Oil Producers agency.

ST. LAWRENCE OIL COMPANY.—Numbered conspicuously among the prosperous oil producers of the Kern county district is that of the St. Lawrence Oil Company, which represents the industry in its best form and furnishes to the investigator a splendid example of the methods employed in that industry. The company operates a one hundred and sixty-acre tract, it being the southeast quarter of section 5, township 32, range 23, and is composed of San Francisco investors, who started operations there in 1908, I. B. Strassburger of that city being president.

Under great difficulty well No. 1 was drilled, but at length was finished in November, 1910, when it was perforated and came in as a gusher about the same time as the No. 2-6 on the C. C. M. Oil Company's holdings. The well flowed from fifteen hundred to two thousand barrels and was soon placed under control. It is still producing, which marks the unusually fine conditions of the vicinity. The company has since put down five more wells and all are producers of better than twenty-one gravity oil. Ably superintending it is William G. Follansbee, who has met with signal success in his operations.

JOHN C. MARLEY.—The superintendent of the Stratton Water Company has been identified with the Midway field since January of 1910, when he came to Fellows to enter upon the duties connected with his present position. The organization of which he has charge and which ranks as the pioneer water concern of the entire field obtains water from a system of four wells, having a capacity of about thirty thousand barrels per day.

A resident of California since 1895, John C. Marley was born at Winterset, Madison county, Iowa, in 1859, and is a son of J. A. Marley, a florist during his lifetime. After he had completed the studies of the grammar and high schools he became an apprentice to the trades of millwright and carpenter, which he learned thoroughly and in which he became unusually skilled. However, instead of following these trades, he turned his attention to a department of the railroad business and for some years acted as station agent for various roads in Iowa, his first work being done with the Burlington Railroad. After his arrival in California in 1895 he worked as a millwright with the Demming-Palmer Milling Company. An important position as superintendent of the Holmes Lime Company at Felton, Santa Cruz county, he filled for six years, and upon resigning from that place he came to Fellows at the beginning of the year 1910, since which he has developed the business of the Stratton Water Company and also has engaged as local representative of the Midway Oil Company of Oregon, having charge of the holdings of that concern in the Midway field. His family, consisting of wife and son Donald, still maintain a residence at No. 640 Post street, San Francisco. Mrs. Marley was formerly Miss Ida Hollingshead, of Albia, Iowa, where she was born and reared. In politics Mr. Marley votes with the Republican party, while fraternally he holds membership with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Modern Woodmen of America and the Fraternal Brotherhood.

Frank S. Judah

FRANK S. JUDD.—Very early in the colonization of America the Judd family came from England to the shores of the Atlantic and the rock-bound coast of New England, where they aided in the agricultural development of that undeveloped region and gave of their energies through successive generations to the material upbuilding of the new world. Of all their representatives none was more forceful in intellect and none more adventurous in his investigations of new countries than Truman Judd, a native of Weybridge, Vt., and a graduate of Potsdam Academy in St. Lawrence county, N. Y. Within the span of his earthly existence, which began March 10, 1813, and came to an end August 10, 1885, he witnessed the development of much of the United States and contributed thereto with the energy and resourcefulness typical of the progressive pioneer. While attending school in New York he formed the acquaintance of the young lady who later became his wife and who shared in his hardships and frontier experiences until her death left him bereaved and alone. A native of Potsdam, N. Y., she bore the name of Lournda U. Taylor and was a daughter of Reuben Taylor.

Removing from New York state to Illinois, Truman Judd settled at Pecatonica, Winnebago county, where his son, Frank S., was born March 28, 1857, and where he himself for some years engaged in pedagogical work. The quiet routine of the schoolroom, however, was irksome to his adventurous temperament and at times he abandoned the profession temporarily for travels, then later gave up the work entirely in order to enter other avocations. During the spring of 1849 he joined an expedition of Argonauts bound for the gold fields of the west. Crossing the plains with ox-teams and wagons, he found so much of interest in the journey that he recorded his impressions of the country in a journal written as he traveled from point to point along the lonely route. Such a record would be of priceless value to his descendants and its loss in the Sacramento fire of the '50s was deplored. After his arrival in California he engaged in mining and later he took a contract for building a portion of the levee at Sacramento, whence in 1856 he returned to Illinois. Not long after the discovery of gold in Pike's Peak he traveled across the plains to that portion of the country and camped on the present site of Denver at a time when only a few rude shacks marked the spot destined for a commercial center. For years he made his headquarters at Monument, where he built three sawmills. Later he built a sawmill on the Little Fountain and engaged in the manufacture of lumber which was used in the early material upbuilding of both Denver and Pueblo.

Disposing of his holdings in Colorado and removing to Texas a few years after the death of his wife, which had occurred in the former state in October of 1867, Truman Judd soon became a power in the journalistic circles of the Lone Star state, where he edited and published the Fort Worth Tribune. Forceful as a writer and able as an editor, he made a name for himself throughout his part of the state and was recognized as a power on the side of progress and achievement. During 1880 he came to California as a permanent resident. After a sojourn of five years in Nevada county he came to Kern county in July, 1885, and here his death occurred in August of that year. To this same county his brother, Stoel Judd, a California pioneer of 1851, had come during the '60s and here he continued to make his home until he passed from earth in 1909 at the age of eighty-four years.

Seven children formed the family of Truman Judd. Five of these attained maturity, namely: Mrs. Julia Squires, who died in Colorado; Mrs. Almira Reader, who died in Nevada county, Cal., in 1889; Mrs. Hattie Webb, of Texarkana, Tex.; Mrs. Lucina Weir, wife of Jerome Weir, a pioneer and prominent upbuilder of Colorado Springs, Colo.; and Frank S., the youngest member of the family circle. The second daughter, Almira, migrated to California via Panama in 1863 and later became the wife of James Reader; upon her death she left five children, of whom only one, Hattie, came to Bakersfield to make her home, although there is also a granddaughter, Mrs. Amanda Krelle, residing in this city. When Frank S. Judd was a child four years of age he accompanied his parents from Illinois to Colorado and later became a pupil in the public school in Colorado City. During 1870 he removed to Texas with his father. Having finished the study of the common branches in the Fort Worth schools he learned the trade of printer in the composing room of the Fort Worth Tribune. During May of 1881 he came to California and settled in Nevada county, where he engaged in mining at French Corral. A first visit to Kern county in 1885 gave him a favorable impression concerning this portion of the state. Returning in the early part of 1887, he became a permanent resident of the county on the 12th of April and has since lived on ranches or in Bakersfield. For seven years he engaged in farming as an employe of his uncle, Stoel Judd. Later he bought land in the San Emidio country, where he engaged in ranching and stock-raising.

Upon the retirement of his uncle from active ranch pursuits Mr. Judd purchased the Judd property near Lakeside ranch and there he remained until the sale of the place in 1910. For years he made a specialty of raising alfalfa seed. After selling the farm in 1910 he bought forty acres seven miles from Bakersfield and there he since has engaged in raising alfalfa. A short time since he sold the mountain ranch and built a comfortable residence at No. 1720 Maple avenue, from which place he superintends the alfalfa farm, besides taking an active part in the buying and selling of real estate. He is a Democrat and a member of the Elks.

JAMES H. THORNBUR.—The Thornber family descends from Anglo-Saxon ancestry and for generations has been represented in Westmoreland in the north of England, where Francis Joseph and Elizabeth (Peters) Thornber passed their entire lives, the former being engaged as an accountant. The parental family comprised six sons and six daughters and the eighth in order of birth, James H., was born in the village of Kendal, July 5, 1875. Two sons and two daughters are still living and all of them have come to America, the older son, John P., being a resident of Bartlesville, Okla., while the two daughters, Mrs. Agnes Grisdale and Mrs. Elizabeth Marriott, make their home in Kern county, Cal., the headquarters also of the fourth member of the family, James H. The last-named attended the Kendal grammar school in Westmoreland, and later was a student in the Friends' school at the same place. After he was graduated at the age of fifteen years he was employed in the village until 1892, when he crossed the ocean to the United States and proceeded west to Montana. Securing employment on a ranch near Chinook he soon learned the business of operating a stock farm on the plains. Later he became interested in operating the Black Coulee coal mine, besides which he also engaged in general contracting.

Upon selling some of his interests in Montana in October of 1908 Mr. Thornber came to Bakersfield. Shortly afterward he purchased one hundred and twenty acres of land in the Weed Patch. The task of transforming the raw acreage into a productive farm was one of great difficulty, but the land was rich and fertile and ultimately produced fruit and alfalfa in paying quantities. Since 1909 he has made his home in East Bakersfield, where he owns a residence at No. 1601 Pacific street. Besides having a real-estate and insurance office at No. 919 Baker street, he is engaged in the building of cottages and bungalows and these interests, together with the supervision of his Montana ranch, which he still owns, keep him busily occupied.

Ever since he came to this city Mr. Thornber has been connected with the Chesbro Methodist Episcopal Church of East Bakersfield, where at this writing he officiates as president of the board of trustees and president of the adult Bible class. With the co-operation of the pastor of this church he organized a Sunday-school at Toltec No. 2 and since then he not only has acted as superintendent, but in addition he has given exceptionally faithful and efficient service in the capacity of local preacher. Being deeply interested in the religious life of the oil fields, he gives freely of his time, ability and means to promote the cause of Christianity in that particular portion to which he has been called. While living in Montana he was married at Chinook, September 25, 1900, to Miss Alice Greenough, a native of Mechanicsburg, Ohio, and a daughter of the late John K. and Minnie (Currier) Greenough, the former born in Concord, N. H., of Mayflower stock, and the latter a descendant of Scotch forbears. In 1886 the family removed to Chanute, Kans., where Mrs. Thornber was reared and educated, remaining there until 1899. In that year the family located in Chinook, Mont., where the marriage of the young people occurred. Interested in social functions and active in church work, Mrs. Thornber's deepest affections, however, are centered upon her four children, Chester Harve, Grace Elizabeth, Agnes Myrtle and Alice Celia. Fraternally Mr. Thornber belongs to the Modern Woodmen of America and Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., also with his wife is identified with Bakersfield Chapter No. 25, Order of the Eastern Star.

Wm Upton

Ellen B Upton

WILLIAM UPTON.—When Mr. and Mrs. Upton bought a tract of twenty acres one mile southeast of Kern in 1893 they realized the difficulties facing them. Not an attempt at cultivation had been made. Not an improvement had been placed on the land. No effort had been put forward to secure irrigation. In all of its raw unattractiveness the land awaited the patient hand of labor, and such was the capability of the owner that eventually it became known as a farm without a superior in Kern county. When finally he sold in order to retire to private life it was with the satisfaction of knowing that he had developed one of the finest farms in this portion of the state.

The Upton family is of old Virginian ancestry. Major James Upton, a native of West Virginia, migrated to Indiana and engaged in farming in that state until death. The title by which he was known came to him through service in the state militia. At the time of removing to Indiana he was a youth and later he married Sallie Bracken, a native of Rush county, that state. Following his demise she removed to Illinois and settled in Sangamon county, where her remaining years were passed. In her family there were five sons and one daughter. Two of the older sons served in the Civil war. The only survivor of the six children is William, who was next to the youngest among them. Born near Lebanon, Boone county, Ind., September 8, 1849, he was educated in country schools and Lebanon Academy. During 1866 he accompanied other members of the family to Illinois and settled near Springfield, where he aided on his mother's farm for a few years. Later he rented a farm and then bought land in Mechanicsburg township, Sangamon county. Selling that place in 1889 he removed to Dawson in the same county, whence in February of 1891 he came to California. Limited in means, he made a very small beginning as a farmer of Kern county. For two years he owned and improved a farm of forty acres in the Rosedale colony and on this place he planted fruit and also sowed alfalfa. When he sold the property in 1893 he bought the small farm near Kern where he labored diligently and successfully until he relinquished farming activities. The first purchase included twenty acres and later he bought ten acres adjoining, so that he had thirty acres altogether. During the last year on the small ranch Mrs. Upton kept a careful account of all receipts and disbursements. For the year a total of $1,823.25 was received from the sale of hay and produce, and in addition they raised many of the necessities for their own table. The total expense, without counting their time, was limited to $300, this small expense being made possible through their industry and wise management.

The marriage of Mr. Upton and Miss Ella R. Sutherland was solemnized at Illiopolis, Ill., February 17, 1875, and has been one of mutual helpfulness and happiness, their only sorrow having been the loss of their children in early life. Mrs. Upton was born in Mechanicsburg township, Sangamon county, Ill., and was fourth among the nine children comprising the family of Hugh and Abbie (Bird) Sutherland. Only four of the nine are now living. Born in 1809, Mr. Sutherland came from his native city of Edinburgh, Scotland, to the United States in 1825 and shortly thereafter settled in Illinois, where he engaged in farming. Some years after locating in that state he married Miss Bird, who was born in Frankfort, Ky., September 27, 1824, and accompanied her mother to Illinois in 1833. Of late years she has lived in Springfield and has been physically active notwithstanding her advanced age. Mrs. Upton is an earnest member of the Congregational church and a leading worker in the Ladies' Aid Society. In addition she is a popular member of the Woman's Relief Corps. Mr. Upton is connected with the Fraternal Brotherhood and in politics always has voted with the Republican party. Upon selling their farm in June of 1909 they came to East Bakersfield, where they not only erected their present residence at No. 600 Pacific street, but in addition built a number of cottages for rent.

REV. JAMES S. WEST, A. B.—The history of the First Baptist Church of Bakersfield, of which Rev. James Samuel West is now pastor, dates back to the year 1889, the inauguration of the movement occurring on the 21st of April with the union as a congregation of a very few persons, adherents of that faith and formerly communicants of the denomination in previous places of residence. The following years were filled with anxious solicitude regarding the future of the congregation, but nevertheless were years of spiritual and numerical growth. The following is a list of the pastors together with their periods of service: Rev. J. C. Jordan, April, 1889-February, 1893; Rev. C. O. Johnson, February, 1893-April, 1894; Rev. J. M. French, October, 1894-January, 1896; Rev. J. T. Collins, January, 1897-August, 1899; Rev. William Mullen, August, 1899-May, 1900; Rev. W. C. Whitaker, May, 1901-May, 1902; Rev. W. M. Collins, January, 1903-May, 1906; Rev. J. Fred Jenkins, October, 1906-January, 1908; Rev. Lloyd C. Smith, August, 1908-August, 1911, and Rev. James Samuel West, the present pastor, whose ministry commenced in September of 1911.

Immediately after the organization of the few members into a congregation steps were taken looking toward the building of a house of worship. The corner of I and Twenty-second streets was secured as a suitable site. February 17, 1890, the corner-stone was laid of a structure of brick, small but substantial. The first services were held there on the first Sunday of April, 1890. With that building as headquarters, an excellent work was conducted for years, but eventually the lot was sold March 2, 1904, the last services being conducted in the old church on the 13th of March, of the same year. The corner-stone of the new structure of white brick was laid September 14, 1904, at the new lot on the corner of Twentieth and G streets. The first services were held in the Sunday-school room December 6, 1904, and in the main auditorium March 5, 1905, while the formal dedication, April 9, 1905, consecrated the noble and dignified edifice to the worship of God. The building contains the auditorium, Sunday-school room and pastor's study, and in mode of construction adheres to modern ideas of church architecture. In addition to the church edifice there is a commodious and attractive parsonage, also of white brick. Besides the home Sunday-school a similar work has been established at East Bakersfield, and two hundred children have the advantage of the excellent religious training given by teachers thoroughly competent to discharge their appointed tasks. The present membership of the church is about two hundred and fifty, one hundred and fifteen having been added since the beginning of the pastorate of the present minister. While devoting himself with self-sacrificing intensity to the upbuilding of this congregation, the pastor has found time to minister at regular intervals to the congregation of Baptists at Edison, which was organized by his predecessor. To aid in the missionary work with the Mexican population of Bakersfield an assistant pastor has been engaged, whose time is almost wholly given to that department of Christian effort.

James E. West.

The present pastor, to whose earnest, sincere and self-denying efforts much of the present gratifying growth of the church may be attributed, is a member of a family long and honorably identified with the Baptist denomination. His father, Rev. W. W. West, a Virginian by birth and a member of a colonial family of the Old Dominion established there by Scotch forbears long before the Revolutionary war, has met with remarkable success in the Baptist ministry in West Virginia, where he has the record of having baptized more people into the Baptist Church than any other clergyman in the entire state. By his marriage to Miss Margaret Underwood, a native of Franklin County, Va., he became the father of four sons and three daughters, all still living except two of the sons. The eldest child in the family, James Samuel, was born at Highpeak, Franklin county, Va., March 17, 1875, and passed the years of boyhood in West Virginia, where at the age of sixteen he began to teach in the country district of his home county. It was his ambition to acquire a thorough education and with that end in view he carefully hoarded his earnings, so that he was able to work his way through higher institutions of learning. In 1897 he matriculated in Doane Academy, the preparatory department of Denison University at Granville, Ohio. After years of study he was graduated from the university in 1904 with the degree of A. B., and at the same time was licensed to preach, but feeling the need of more experience and further study before entering the ministry he accepted a position with the Young Men's Christian Association of Ohio as state secretary. In that office he inaugurated two departments of the state work, viz.: the county department and the bituminous coal miners' department, both of which he pioneered and promoted by personal supervision.

After having spent eighteen months of pleasant and profitable labor in the work of the Young Men's Christian Association, resigning from such service Mr. West matriculated in the Rochester (N. Y.) Theological Seminary. Upon his graduation in 1908 he returned to West Virginia and at West Union was ordained to the ministry of the Baptist denomination. For one year he served as pastor at West Union, after which he spent two years with the First Baptist Church of Bucyrus, Ohio. Meanwhile he had married at East Rochester, N. Y., Miss Helen Elizabeth Tufts, who was born in Canandaigua, Ontario county, N. Y., and received excellent advantages in the academy in that city. With his wife he has established a comfortable home in the Bakersfield Baptist parsonage, which is brightened by the presence of their small daughter, Virginia Aileen. Since coming to the west he has identified himself with the Los Angeles Baptist Association and the Southern California Baptist State convention. In fraternal relations he holds membership with the Tribe of Ben Hur and the Woodmen of the World, while during his university course he was identified with the Kappa Sigma.

VERNON L. UNDERWOOD.—The growing influence of Mr. Underwood as a citizen of Tehachapi and as a participant in the railroad service results from the possession of qualifications eminently adapting him for influential identification with any measure or movement that may enlist his aid. As agent at Tehachapi for the Southern Pacific and Santa Fe Railroads he discharges duties of importance and in addition he serves acceptably as local agent for the Wells-Fargo Express Company.

The only child of Philip and Anne (Mathewson) Lawler, Vernon L. Underwood was born in Pasadena, Cal., September 3, 1888, and at the age of nine months was left fatherless. Some years later his mother became the wife of Dr. Maro F. Underwood and the boy was given the name of the step-father. Philip Lawler, who was a native of Maine, enlisted in the Union army at the opening of the Civil war and remained at the front until the expiration of his term of service. Later he came to California and engaged in the lumber business in Mendocino county. Although he lived until 1889 and never relinquished his business enterprises, always he suffered as the result of his war service and the hardships of that period were the direct cause of his death. His wife, who was born in Wilmington, Del., and who now makes her home with her only child, was a daughter of a pioneer of 1849 who had come across the plains to California with a brave band of astronauts.

Upon completing the studies of the Los Angeles grammar and high schools, Vernon L. Underwood entered the railroad service, his first work being that of an assistant in the ticket office at Lindsay, Tulare county, where he remained for eighteen months and meantime learned much of value to him in subsequent positions. From Lindsay he was sent to Oil City as cashier and chief clerk, and later became agent; and afterwards acted as agent at Owenyo for eighteen months. During May of 1912 he was transferred to Tehachapi as agent for the Southern Pacific Company, besides which he has acted as Santa Fe agent and as the local representative of the Wells-Fargo Express Company.

FRED ALBERT HILL.—Simeon Smith Hill came to Kern county in 1880, having worked formerly with the Great Western Quick Silver Mine in Lake county. He had reached California from the East in 1874. He and his five sons followed farming in Rosedale district, Kern county, two years, but the venture not proving a success Mr. Hill bought eighty acres in another section of Rosedale district, and remained there until the death of the mother in 1885, when he sold the place and went into the livery business in Bakersfield. In 1888 he sold out and moved to Linns Valley, where he became engaged in farming, three years later moving to Golanagi Springs, a summer resort situated three miles above Democrat Springs, where he stayed for a short time, then deciding to purchase eighty acres of land in Linns Valley. Some time later he sold his place here and again launched into the livery business, but he finally purchased the Democrat Hot Springs, which he afterward sold to his son, D. D.

Fred A. Hill was born in Monmouth, Warren county, Ill., November 1, 1863, and attended school there. He came with his parents to California in 1874 and attended public schools in Lake county, this state. With the rest of the family he came to Kern county October 13, 1880, and as early as 1882 began working for Haggin & Carr, which firm is now known as the Kern County Land Company. Mr. Hill has been in the employ of the original company and its successor ever since 1880 with the exception of two years, when he was in the livery business with his father. In 1890 he was made foreman of the Kern County Land Company and in 1895 he was promoted to assistant to C. L. Conner, superintendent of the Lakeside ranch, upon whose death, in December, 1910, Mr. Hill was given full charge.

Mr. Hill was married in Bakersfield August 9, 1903, to Miss Edna M. Baker, a native of Hanford, Cal. Her father, John M. Baker, crossed the plains with ox teams in pioneer days and settled on a farm near Hanford. He now resides in East Bakersfield. To Mr. and Mrs. Hill were born three children, Milton S. S., Evelyn Edna and Fred Richard. A Democrat in politics, Mr. Hill is conversant with all the subjects of the day, and adheres closely to the principles of his party. Fraternally he is a member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles and the Knights of Pythias.

C. E. GETCHELL.—A true and loyal son of the great west is Mr. Getchell, who was born at Helena, Mont., December 18, 1866, and in all of his long life has never been east of the Rocky mountains, but with characteristic energy and progressive devotion has labored for the material upbuilding of his section of the country.

Mrs. Fred A. Hill.

Fred A. Hill

The distinction of being the second white child and the first white boy born in what is now the state of Montana belongs to Mr. Getchell, the first white child having been Anna Flowerre. His father, F. S. Getchell, came to California via the Isthmus of Panama and landed in San Francisco in June of 1850, after which he engaged in placer mining on the American river, at Sawmill Flat, Marysville, Grass Valley and other places. In Tuolumne county he married Mrs. Sarah (Sparks) De Noielle, a widow with three children. Of their union only one child, Charles E., was born, and he passed his early years in Montana, where the elder Getchell was an historic character and prominent pioneer miner, known throughout the length and breadth of the mountain state for his kindly hospitality, positive convictions and broad knowledge of gold mines.

When fourteen years of age C. E. Getchell became a cowboy, engaging with the D. H. S. Cattle Company. During 1880 he helped to drive the first band of cattle into the now celebrated Judith basin country in Montana. For five years he rode the range as an employe of the same organization, after which he filled a similar position with Daniel Flowerre for two years. In that way he became familiar with the entire country, besides acquiring a thorough understanding of stock and a really remarkable skill as a rider. At the age of twenty-one he began to run horses for himself, beginning on a very small scale and by degrees rising to business of a larger nature. Together with his half-brother, R. W. De Noielle, and J. P. Ketchum, he bought out the Holter planing mill in 1888. The plant was enlarged immediately after its purchase. Everything indicated an era of prosperity. However, there soon broke out a local financial depression which ultimately involved the whole country in a money stringency, and in 1892 the business went into the hands of receivers.

Forced to make a new start and determined to seek a new location, Mr. Getchell came to California and arrived in Los Angeles in June of 1893 with only $7 between him and destitution. Without delay he was able to secure work. For two years he was employed in the real-estate business. Later he secured employment with a large company dealing in electrical, mining and irrigation machinery. After some years with that concern he resigned and in 1902 became connected with the firm of Fairbanks, Morse & Co., in whose interests he traveled through the northern part of Arizona, selling and installing electrical, mining and irrigation machinery. During 1903 he was dispatched to Bakersfield to take charge of the local interests of the company's business and until 1906 he served efficiently as their manager at this point. Since 1906 he has engaged in the automobile livery business, catering to the local passenger trade. At Helena, Mont., he met and married Miss Ella V., daughter of Joseph Walton, of that city. They are the parents of three children, Frances, Willard and Virginia, whose presence brightens the elegant residence erected at No. 2118 Eighteenth street.

The fact that Mr. Getchell possesses a complete knowledge of the roads of Kern county led to his selection in January of 1913 to serve on a committee of three to investigate and report to the board of supervisors concerning the roads of the county. The task demands great familiarity with all parts of the county and when it is remembered that Kern county is larger than Connecticut, Rhode Island and Delaware put together, it will be seen that his study of conditions has been broad and long-continued. A practical system of county roads will cost between three and six million dollars, so that the committee of three, viz.: A. J. Woody, J. L. Evans and C. E. Getchell, have a tremendous responsibility placed upon them.

DANIEL BURKE.—One of the men who have achieved success in Kern county is Daniel Burke, a native son of the county, born twelve miles southeast of Glennville, January 18, 1867, a son of Daniel Burke, Sr. The father was born in County Mayo, Ireland, in October, 1828, and came to the United States in 1849 and to California in 1852. Until 1864 he followed mining in different parts of the state, during this time going to the Frazier river mines in British Columbia and remaining two years. In the meantime, in 1862, he bought a land claim on Little Poso creek, and in 1883, after a survey had been made, he acquired a homestead and four sections of railroad land. In 1889 he also bought land in the Panama district, to which he moved in 1898, but he died on his ranch in the Greenhorn mountains in August, 1900. He was a man of prominence in his time and locality, who had much to do with public affairs.

Daniel Burke, Jr., attended public schools until he was sixteen years old and afterward worked on his father's homestead at the stock business and on the Burke property in the Panama district. The present place of forty acres seven miles south of Bakersfield was bought in 1902 and Mr. Burke devotes it to raising alfalfa and a small vineyard of choice varieties of table grapes.

In Hot Springs valley, near Havilah, January 26, 1896, Daniel Burke married Miss Rose Palmer, who was born near Kernville, September 29, 1874, and they have a son, Palmer Burke. Robert Palmer, Mrs. Burke's father, was born in Christian county, Ky., May 7, 1823, and settled at Jacksonville, Ill., whence he came in 1850 to California across the plains on horseback and with pack mules. For ten years he was more or less successful in placer mining in different parts of the state, and in 1860 he came to the Piute mountains and made his headquarters there while he prospected and mined in Kern county. While engaged in his mining ventures he also carried on a stock business, establishing his home on the ranch in Hot Springs valley in 1878, and there he died in 1905, when he was eighty-two years of age. Fraternally Mr. Burke affiliates with the Knights of Columbus and the Woodmen of the World, politically he is a Republican, and with his wife is a member of St. Francis Catholic Church.

COL. THOMAS BAKER.—During the pioneer period of the history of California one of its foremost men was Col. Thomas Baker, the founder of Bakersfield and the original owner of the entire town site. For the difficult task of frontier upbuilding he was qualified by temperament and experience. He possessed in abundance the qualities characteristic of the progressive pioneer, the generosity that sacrifices its own needs for the welfare of others and the hospitality that finds a friend in every home-seeker. To an unusual degree he possessed foresight and sagacious judgment. When first he rode over the broad expanse of country where Bakersfield now stands as a commercial metropolis he pointed out the vast possibilities of the region and asserted that some day a large city would stand on this site. Further than that, he pointed out the line of a railroad and the exact point where it would pass through the Tehachapi mountains. When finally the railroad was built it was remembered by others that it followed the course of his prediction. In addition he predicted that some day oil would be produced in this valley, although it is scarcely probable that even his vivid imagination grasped the enormous magnitude of the industry in the twentieth century. With a broad and prophetic vision he united a kind-hearted helpfulness and unwearied hospitality. To strangers he was very hospitable, even when hard pressed for money himself and more than once he gave to newcomers a sack of flour when he did not have the means to buy another for his family use. Travelers were entertained in his adobe house and their horses were fed in his corral, nor was a charge ever made for feed or board. Although he had acquired large tracts of land he used these not for his own profit, but to induce others to settle thereon. Often he would donate to an industrious settler a quarter-section of land and many a time he gave away town lots to promising but poor young business men. Indeed, some of the best business locations in Bakersfield were donated by him without any pay whatever. In his intense desire to see the country settled he gave away all of his lands with the exception of eighty acres on O street and this after his death was sold in lots by his widow. When finally death terminated his activities, November 24, 1872 (a date memorable in American history as that of the demise of Horace Greeley) the success of the town was assured and Bakersfield proudly claimed a population of five hundred souls.

Dan Burke

The title by which Thomas Baker was known throughout all of his adult life came to him through his service as a colonel in the state militia of Ohio before he had attained his majority. Born in 1810 in Muskingum county, Ohio, he claimed as his birthplace the picturesque valley through which the Ohio canal extends and which was made famous in history on account of the identification therewith of the Rosecrans and Sheridan families as well as others of note. During youth he lived on a farm. Besides becoming familiar with agriculture he gained a practical knowledge of surveying and also studied law with the intention of making land law his specialty. Shortly after his admission to the bar he removed to Illinois, but in a short time crossed the Mississippi river into the territory of Iowa. During May of 1837 he was driven away by the Indians who burned his cabin, but in about one year he returned. In the autumn of 1838 he settled in the vicinity of the present site of Washington, Iowa. Without question he had reached a point further west than the location of any other white settler in that part of the Black Hawk purchase. Frequently he had befriended the Indians and finally, at the time of the Black Hawk uprising, they repaid his kindness to them, warning him of the coming trouble and thus saving the family while other white settlers were massacred.

The distinction of being the first United States district attorney of the territory of Iowa came to Colonel Baker, who held the office until the adoption of the state constitution. Elected to the first legislature of the new state, on the organization of that body he was chosen president of the senate, thus becoming ex officio the first lieutenant-governor of Iowa. Subsequently he was re-elected several times to the state senate. No man had a larger share than he in the early legislation of that great commonwealth. Many of the important laws still on the statute books of Iowa were devised and drafted by him. While he was becoming prominent and successful in Iowa, the love of adventure lured him to the western coast after the discovery of gold. During the fall of 1850 he arrived at Benicia, Cal., but after a few months he left that town for the vicinity of Stockton and during 1852 he removed to Tulare county, where he was one of the founders of the town of Visalia. There in 1857 he married Miss Ellen Alverson. Four children of that union lived to mature years. Mary E., who died May 24, 1894, was the wife of Henry A. Jastro, of Bakersfield, chairman of the board of supervisors of Kern county and one of the foremost men of California. Thomas A. is now sheriff of Kern county. Nellie, Mrs. Cowgill, died in Bakersfield May 6, 1887. The only surviving daughter, Charlotte E., is the wife of John M. Jameson and resides in Bakersfield, her mother, now Mrs. Tracy, being an inmate of her home since her second widowhood.

Elected in 1855 to represent his district in the state legislature, Colonel Baker gave satisfactory service in that capacity. During 1858 he was appointed receiver of the new land office at Visalia and held the position under the administration of President Buchanan. During the legislative sessions of 1861-62 he served as senator from Fresno and Tulare counties. About that time, in partnership with Harvey Brown, he purchased the swamp land franchise granted to Montgomery Brothers, including the odd sections of all the swamp lands extending from Kern river around by the lakes and connected by the sloughs, reaching northward to Fresno on the San Joaquin river. The original grant contemplated the construction of navigable canals through the entire length of this section of the state, but the plan was found impracticable and the legislature released the grantees from that part of their obligation. September 20, 1863, Colonel Baker arrived on Kern Island with his family preparatory to commencing the work of reclamation, remarking at his arrival, "Here at last I have found a resting place and here I expect to lay my bones." The country was neither new nor strange to him. Several years before he had explored it carefully and noted its possibilities. At a glance he had realized the peculiar advantages of the country and its natural resources. From the time of his arrival until his death, November 24, 1872, he was ever ready to promote the advancement of the country and maintained an intense interest in the village which bore his name. In the early days money was scarce and supplies not too abundant, but, forgetful of self, he was ever ready to aid newcomers. Acknowledging everyone as entitled to his consideration, he never allowed a man to leave his house hungry. The stranger always received a cordial welcome. So genial was his hospitality that his guests never suspected that the stores could be exhausted nor did they realize how he denied himself in order that they might have enough. Coolness of temper and uniform good nature characterized him. Nothing disturbed his equanimity. However he might feel to have his motive impugned and his friends unmindful, he did not allow such matters to disturb his disposition. When his favorite projects miscarried he retained his self-poise. His motto was "Time will always justify a man who means to do right." How true this statement is both ancient and modern history reveals. He considered that rational beings should not indulge in vain regrets or useless worries. Whatever ill he suffered (and he endured his share of hardships and misunderstandings) his friends could not see that he brooded over them. This quality of mind enabled him often to gain the mastery over adverse circumstances, but it also made him indifferent to frequent financial losses. Fortunes were made and lost with indifference. In owning land his sole ambition was to make it fit for the support of families. His absorbing desire was to see the vast tracts reclaimed and covered with the permanent improvements made by new settlers. In his gifts to homesteaders he displayed greater liberality than the government itself. Being the original owner of the town site of Bakersfield, he might have acquired great wealth therefrom, but instead he donated some of the best business locations and by his liberality secured the erection of a number of the first buildings in the village. While pointing out to these pioneers how they might attain wealth he remained indifferent to the allurements of fortune, but evinced the financial carelessness characteristic of many of the greatest pioneers of the west, losing sight of his own personal advancement in his patriotic devotion to the development of the country. His personal characteristics came to him as an inheritance from an honored old Virginian family of English extraction. His father, Thomas, was a soldier in the war of 1812 and his great-grandfather, Thomas, was a participant in the Revolution, while he inherited their valor and patriotic spirit, but when the Civil war came he was prevented from participation by reason of the California quota being more than full as well as by reason of his own age, which was beyond the limits of military service. However, he served his country loyally and well, although it was not his privilege to bear arms on the field of battle, but by the development of unreclaimed lands, by the building up of a community and by the advancement of progressive civic enterprises, he proved himself most loyal to the land of his nativity and the country of his adoption.

Rosa L. Yancey

Jeff Yancey

JOSEPH E. YANCEY.—The suburban community known as Broad Ripple, which then was adjacent to and now forms a portion of the city of Indianapolis, Ind., made an interesting environment for the early years of Joseph E. Yancey, who was born on a farm at that place March 12, 1860, being a son of Joseph A. Yancey, a Kentuckian, who became well-known among the stock-raisers in the vicinity of Indianapolis. In that city he was educated, and at the age of sixteen he started out for himself, working at various occupations until he came to California in 1880 and settled at Bakersfield. For two winters he carried on his studies in the Crocker school, while in the intervening summers he was employed as a clerk or farm hand. During the year 1882 he entered the employ of the Kern County Land Company, then known by the firm title of Haggin & Carr, and for three years he acted as superintendent of their Mountain View ranch, after which for two years he followed mining at the Long Tom mine. A subsequent experience lasting two years as roadmaster of the Sumner road district was followed by employment in teaming, general contracting and building canals for the Kern County Land Company and for the Southern California Construction Company at Barstow. The business of a contractor filled his time and kept him busily occupied until July, 1899, when he discontinued in order to become street superintendent of Bakersfield. In that capacity he served for twelve consecutive years or until after the consolidation of Bakersfield and Kern into one city. In addition to filling that position he also served as city health officer and plumbing inspector. In an official capacity he proved prompt, efficient, reliable and intelligent and the difficult duties of his responsible post were discharged with exactness and to the general satisfaction. Since resigning as street superintendent he has resumed contracting and building and now makes a specialty of general contracting and building. The supervision of his building operations consumes all of his time, although he is also interested in the McKittrick Oil Company and in oil lands in the Temblor and McKittrick districts.

Fraternal connections have been formed by Mr. Yancey with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically he votes with the Republican party. Some years after he came to Kern county he married Miss Rose L. Williams, who was born in Fort Scott, Kan., but came to California at an early age and received a superior education in the schools of this state. From an early age she has been a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and in the faith of that denomination she reared her adopted daughter, Lena, now Mrs. Harvey DeWar, of Bakersfield. Her parents, George and Achsah (Riggs) Williams, were identified with pioneer agricultural interests in Kansas, but left that state in 1875 to identify themselves with the Pacific coast country. The beautiful philanthropic spirit which throughout life has been a leading element in the character of Mrs. Yancey led her to take up work among the homeless children and waifs of Bakersfield, and in co-operation with Mrs. Coolbaugh she started the Kern County Children's Shelter, which from the first has proved a most important undertaking and has increased in size to such an extent that about forty-five children are now cared for by the organization. After the plan first became merged into definite form Mrs. Yancey officiated as superintendent of the shelter, having the movement in charge for three years during the building of the new Home, and when completed she resigned on account of a nervous break-down. However, it was largely due to her efforts and self-sacrificing and constant assistance that its success may be attributed.

J. B. CARTER.—As a trusted employe of the San Joaquin Light and Power Corporation Mr. Carter is associated with the development of the valley, particularly the West Side oil fields, where he serves as district manager and agent for the corporation. The distinction of being a native son of the great commonwealth belongs to him. He was born and reared in San Francisco, spending, however, a portion of the years of his youth in Fresno, where he completed the studies of the grammar school. His father, B. B. Carter, an Englishman by birth and family, for years held a position as steamship steward on a vessel out from San Francisco, but is now living a retired life in Fresno, where some years ago occurred the death of the wife and mother, Margaret (Gill) Carter, a member of an old family of Irish lineage.

Having been employed at various occupations in Fresno during early life, at the age of twenty-three J. B. Carter returned to San Francisco and secured employment with the old Market Street Railroad Company. In the capacities of conductor and motorman he remained with the same company for fourteen years. Meanwhile he made a record for fidelity, trustworthiness and efficiency. During 1902 he left San Francisco and went back to Fresno, where he engaged as a conductor on the Fresno city railway. The following year, when the Fresno Street Railroad Company was taken over by the San Joaquin Light and Power Corporation, he remained with the new owners of the property, taking with them, however, a somewhat different position from any in which he had previously served, viz.: that of collector of electric light and water bills. For three and one-half years he served as collector and then, in recognition of energy and ability, was promoted to the newly organized business and extension department. From there, January 15, 1910, he was sent to take charge of the corporation interests in Taft and the Midway fields. Meanwhile he had married in 1897 in San Francisco Miss Alice Ball, a native of Butte county, and she accompanied him in his removal to Taft, where he still maintains his headquarters. That his work possesses the highest importance from the standpoint of development and expansion of the corporation lines is indicated by the fact that from 1910 to 1912 he had charge of the building of more than sixty miles of distributing line in the West Side oil fields, a work involving vast expense and assiduous labor, but promising large returns in the increased business secured under his able management.

HERBERT ALLEN BALLAGH, D. D. S.—The Ballagh family, whose representatives occupy positions of prominence in Kern county and have attained enviable reputation for intellectual worth, possesses in Dr. Ballagh of Maricopa a member with the ambition and energy to add prestige to the honored family name. A lifelong resident of the west, he is a typical Californian in aspirations, impulses and loyalty. The fact that his father has been a Presbyterian minister and therefore stationed in different parts of the presbytery, gave to him in early youth a knowledge of various sections of the state and a familiarity with the general work of industrial, agricultural and commercial progress.

During the residence of the family at Red Bluff Dr. Ballagh was born May 7, 1886, being a son of Rev. Robert and Elizabeth (Götz) Ballagh, now residents of Bakersfield. After years of prominent service in the Presbyterian denomination the father to some extent has retired, but he still ministers to the congregation at Glenville and maintains a deep interest in matters affecting the work, both local and general. While successful in ministerial labors, he and his wife were no less fortunate in the training and education of their seven children and justly felt proud of the splendid mentality displayed by them. The eldest son, A. Scott, is engaged in the life insurance business at Fresno. The second son, Charles E., of the Kern river oil fields, is superintendent of the Four-Oil and Apollo Oil Companies; R. G. carries on a real-estate business in Bakersfield; T. E., city clerk of Maricopa, is also engaged in the real-estate business; C. S., of East Bakersfield, is a druggist and one of the proprietors of the Kern Drug Company; Herbert Allen was the sixth son; the only daughter, Ahlida, is a teacher in the Bakersfield grammar schools.

Although living in a number of towns during different years of his boy-hood, Dr. Ballagh was a resident for the most part of Portersville, where he attended the grammar school and took the first year of high-school work. Later he was graduated from the Fresno high school. From Fresno he came to the Kern river fields and worked as a pumper on the Imperial and 33 leaseholds, also on the San Joaquin division of the Associated Oil Company. Meanwhile he frugally saved his earnings in order to assist in the payment of his expenses while studying dentistry. September 6, 1906, at the age of twenty years, he matriculated in the University of Southern California, where he took the full course of three years, graduating in 1909 with the degree of D. D. S. Immediately after graduation he came to Maricopa and entered upon professional work. Soon after the Maricopa fire in 1910 he and his brother, E. E., erected a substantial concrete building, 50x40, on California street, centrally located, and divided into two store rooms and four offices, his own office being located in this block.

T. W. Nelson, M. D.

THADDEUS W. HELM, M.D.—Dr. Helm was born at Elkrun, Fauquier county, Va., October 14, 1850, a son of John G. and Pauline (Jones) Helm. In both lines of descent he came of old and honored Virginian families and in the paternal line he traced his ancestry to Wales. When he was yet but a boy he was taken by his parents to Blackwater, Cooper county, Mo. He was reared on a farm and when he was eighteen became a traveling salesman. Four years later he went to Texas and there became a school teacher and a medical student. Eventually he entered the medical department of the University of Missouri at Columbia, from which he was graduated with the degree of M. D. in 1877.

It was at Brookston, Tex., that Dr. Helm began his medical practice. After a brief experience there he removed to Ballinger, in the same state, where he practiced with much success for about ten years. Sometimes he traveled sixty or seventy miles on horseback to see patients, carrying his medicine and a few surgical appliances in his saddle-bags. As he attained prominence as a physician he won admiration as a man and popularity as a citizen and the office of coroner of his county was conferred upon him. In 1888 he came to Lemoore, Kings county, Cal., where he labored professionally until in 1891, when he settled in Bakersfield. His office was long located on Nineteenth street, but eventually he removed it to the Producers Bank Building. In California, as he had been in Texas, he was called by his admiring fellow-citizens to places of trust and honor and he filled the offices of coroner and public administrator of Kern county. In his political affiliations he was a Democrat, and was active as a member of the Fraternal Brotherhood, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Encampment and Canton, being captain of the last mentioned. He was an active member of the Kern County Medical Society, of which he was twice elected president and of which he was vice-president at the time of his death, which occurred November 1, 1910. He was long identified also with the California State Medical Association and with the American Medical Association. A believer in the evangelical religion and in the ministry of the church for the physical benefit of men, he was an admirer of General Booth, and his method of work for humanity.

In Paris, Texas, November 27, 1879, Dr. Helm married Miss Mollie Hathaway, a native of that town. She was a daughter of J. W. Hathaway and a granddaughter of William M. Hathaway, natives of Virginia and members of an old Southern family which traced its descent from English ancestry. Her father, who removed to Missouri, and thence to Paris, Tex., was a farmer and a well-known and popular merchant near Paris. In the course of events he removed to Ballinger, Tex., where he died. During the Civil war he was a gallant officer in the Confederate army. His wife, who before her marriage was Miss Naomi Yarnell, was born at Nashville, Tenn., and died in Texas. Her father, William Yarnell, a native of England, was a planter in Tennessee, and later in Moniteau county, Mo., where he passed away. Mrs. Helm grew to womanhood in Paris, Tex., and was duly graduated from Shiloh Academy. The children born to Dr. and Mrs. Helm are Lena, Thaddeus W., Jr., De Witt T., Homer H. and Francis. Thaddeus W., Jr., was educated as a mining engineer at San Francisco. Mrs. Helm is a member of the Rebekahs, of which she is past officer, is president of the Fraternal Brotherhood, and is an active member of the Salvation Army.

L. T. THOMPSON.—One of the most capable and enterprising citizens of Bakersfield, who has won a wide reputation for his exceptional capability in the execution of his duties as superintendent in the oil fields, is L. T. Thompson, who has supervision of the Monte Cristo Oil & Development Company and the West Shore Oil Company, both in the Kern river oil fields, and the Monte Cristo Oil and Development Company at Maricopa, as well as the Marion Oil Company at Taft. All of these are operated independently of the Standard and Union Companies, and are among the heaviest producers in Kern county.

Born at Roseburg, Ore., December 14, 1880, Mr. Thompson was given the opportunity of a good educational training, being sent to the public schools and then to business college at San Francisco, where was laid the foundation of his business knowledge. His first position was that of stenographer for Fink & Schindler; he also kept their books, and some time later he became private secretary for Lieutenant Ballanger, in the department of Quartermaster General, of San Francisco, where he remained for a year. Mr. Thompson's ambitions led him to look for a broader field of labor, and he was attracted by an advertisement of an attorney in San Francisco, Henry Ach, president of the Monte Cristo Oil Company, who was searching for a competent bookkeeper and stenographer for the work in the Kern river oil fields. He procured the position and came to the oil field in 1903 to take up the work there, at which time the Monte Cristo had forty wells.

Mr. Thompson's interest in the real work of the oil fields was immediately aroused and he became anxious to know more of the actual workings of the business. At the same time he knew that the only way to accomplish this was to begin practically at the bottom and work his way to the top by actually doing the work himself. It was at this time that his wife came to his rescue, for taking up his work as bookkeeper and stenographer she familiarized herself with all his system of work and the details of the business, in order that her husband might go to work as a laborer. He began as a tool-dresser and all 'round man for the company at Maricopa, then became driller there, and so well did he fill those positions that he was put on as drilling foreman, which he occupied until 1908. At this time he received the position of foreman of the Monte Cristo Company, but he soon after was given the superintendency, as he was then recognized as authority on the work. He is now the general superintendent of all their divisions, and his practical knowledge of the work has made him invaluable to his company. He is firm and just with his workers, keen and thorough in all his executions, and an upright, honorable man in all his dealings. The Monte Cristo's officers are as follows: Henry Ach, an attorney of San Francisco, president; J. L. Rosenthal, a wholesale shoe man of San Francisco, vice-president; A. A. Power, of San Francisco, secretary, and L. T. Thompson, general superintendent. The London, Paris & American Bank of San Francisco is their treasurer. The Monte Cristo employs fifty men, and its daily pay roll is $128; the West Shore twenty-two men, and its daily pay roll is $60; the Monte Cristo Company at Maricopa twenty-five men, and their daily pay roll is $70; and at the Marion Company, at Taft, there are two men. The Monte Cristo Oil Company has acquired six hundred and forty acres at Lost

Lucy A. Castro Domitilo Castro

Hills by deed, and one hundred and one acres in the Fullerton oil fields under lease, which will be developed in the near future.

Mr. Thompson was married in 1907 to Miss Mabel Crosland, and they are the parents of one child, Louis T., Jr. Their home is on the Monte Cristo lease. Mr. Thompson has proved himself to be a man of thrift and has invested in six houses in Bakersfield. He is a Mason and a Republican.

DOMITILLO CASTRO.—In Hermosillo, Sonora, Mexico, Domitilo Castro was born May 3, 1857, the son of Thomas and Concepcion (Coronado) Castro, both natives of Sonora, Mexico.

Thomas Castro, the father, was born in Banamichi, Mexico, and in 1867 brought his family to Kern county, Cal., where he started in the stockraising business, locating about three miles southwest of the present town of Bakersfield, on sections twelve, thirty and twenty-seven. He here pre-empted a hundred and sixty acres, and later homesteaded a like acreage in Mt. Breckenridge, having at the time a large number of cattle, horses, sheep and hogs. His death occurred January 14, 1900, when he was seventy-three years old, and he was buried in Union cemetery, where his wife had also been laid to rest. Mrs. Castro, also born near Banamichi, Mexico, was the daughter of Jesus Coronado, who came to California in 1877, soon returning to Mexico, where he passed away. Her death occurred in Bakersfield April 25, 1896.

Nine children, eight sons and one daughter, were born to Thomas Castro and his wife, as follows: Ramona, widow of L. O. Castro, residing in Kern City; Lee, a stockman near Bakersfield; Domitilo, mentioned below; Manuel, who died near Bakersfield; Thomas C., a farmer and stockman of this city; Perfecto C., who is in the hotel business at Lost Hills; and Luciano A., E. P., and Emilio, are farmers and stockmen near Bakersfield.

Domitilo Castro remained on his father's home farm and followed stock-raising for many years after he had left the public schools. In 1879 he married and bought an eighty-acre ranch in sections nineteen, thirty and twenty-eight, on Union avenue, about six miles south of Bakersfield. Here he engaged in farming, making a specialty of raising alfalfa, later raised cattle, hogs, horses and mules, and the land is now seeded to alfalfa. The ranch is under the Kern Island ditch. The homestead now consists of one hundred and sixty acres near the mouth of Ft. Tejon canyon, which he proved up and improved for a stock range. After proving up he leased the place and located in East Bakersfield in order to give his children better educational facilities. Since then he has been engaged in the cattle business on his father's estate in the Breckenridge mountains. The brand which he uses, DC, is being recorded.

In January, 1911, after renting his ranch, Mr. Castro built a home in Bakersfield on an acre of ground, at No. 1101 Brown street, and he also owns other property. His wife, whom he married September 6, 1879, in Bakersfield, was before her marriage, Lucy Cage. She was born in Berryessa, Napa county, the daughter of Edward Cage, who was born in Mississippi and served in the Mexican war. Mr. Cage came across the plains with ox teams in 1849, settling in Napa county, where he followed farming for a time, then removing to Los Angeles. Later he was a farmer near Bakersfield, but finally he returned to Napa county, where he died when over sixty years of age. His wife, Mrs. Macaria (Arenas) Cage, a native of Guaymas, Sonora, Mexico, came with her parents to Napa county, where she now makes her home. Of the nine children born to Mr. and Mrs. Cage five are living. Robert died in Kern county; John is a stockraiser living in East Bakersfield; Mary, Mrs. Swiggart, died in Bakersfield; Lucy is Mrs. Castro; Dixie is Mrs. Lee Castro of Kern county; Alice is Mrs. Barry of Napa; and Edward is a resident of Williams, Cal. Mrs. Castro's maternal aunt, Mrs. Antonia Rainey, was the wife of the late Andrew Jackson Rainey, who for many years was supervisor of Napa county, and through his efforts were built the mountain roads into Capell and Berryessa valleys, and it is the consensus of opinion that they are the finest mountain roads in the state. Mrs. Rainey resides in Napa with her daughter, Mrs. Reams. Mrs. Castro received her education in the public schools of Los Angeles and in 1874 came to Kern county with her parents.

To the union of Domitilo Castro and his wife were born nine children, as follows: Marguerite, who is a trained nurse in Oakland, Cal.; Domitilo Frank, who is in the oil fields near Fresno; Louis Alfred, who is an oil driller located in Bakersfield; Albert Hamilton, who farms the alfalfa ranch; Andrew Martin, who is an oil driller at Taft; Adlai Stevenson of Coalinga; and Lucy May, Felix Clarence and Amelia Gertrude, at home. Mrs. Castro is a member of the Native Daughters of the Golden West, her husband being affiliated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. They are devout members of the St. Joseph Church of East Bakersfield.

CLARENCE DENVER BENSON.—A native of California, Clarence Denver Benson was born in San Bernardino, November 1, 1878. His father, I. H. Benson, came from Illinois to California when a boy with his parents in 1852, crossing the plains with ox-teams to San Bernardino. In early days he followed freighting on the desert and later mining. In 1896 he came to Randsburg, where he has resided ever since. His wife, Etta Tallmadge, was born in Los Angeles county, the daughter of Frank Leslie Tallmadge, a pioneer of Southern California from New England.

Clarence was the second oldest of a family of eight children and received his education in the public schools of San Bernardino. When seventeen he entered the employ of the Santa Fe in his native town and continued with the company until 1898, when he came to Randsburg, engaging in mining with the Yellow Aster and in other camps in Kern and San Bernardino counties. In May, 1906, he removed to Goldfield, Nev., where he mined and was also proprietor of the Merchants hotel.

In 1910 Mr. Benson returned to Randsburg as foreman in the Consolidated Mines Company, and in 1913 was appointed superintendent of the mine, his experience making him well qualified to fill the important duties of the position.

In Goldfield, Nev., Mr. Benson was married to Miss Grace A. McCann, a native daughter of California and they have two children, Tallmadge Edward and Denver William. Mr. Benson's membership with the Native Sons of the Golden West is with Arrowhead Parlor No. 110, San Bernardino.

JAMES MONTGOMERY.—Randsburg has many loyal citizens who are generous in their support of movements for the betterment of their community, but none more so than Mr. and Mrs. James Montgomery. Mrs. Montgomery is serving acceptably as postmistress of Randsburg, while he is devoting his time to mining as well as assisting his wife in performing the duties of the office.

James Montgomery was born August 15, 1854, in Portadown, County Armagh, Ireland, where he was educated until sixteen years of age. He then made his way to New York City, where he remained for seventeen years, during which time he engaged in the grocery and tea business. In 1887 he removed to Omaha, Neb., where he was in the commission business. In 1896 he located in Randsburg, Kern county, and has since been engaged in mining. In September, 1896, he discovered and located the W. J. Bryan group of mines and with others he developed and worked them. These mines rank among the high grade ore properties. Aside from these he is also the owner of several other claims and mines.

In Genesee county, N. Y., occurred the marriage of Mr. Montgomery to Miss Josephine Gushurst, a native of Rochester, N. Y., whose education was obtained in the public schools and convent at Rochester. April 12, 1910,

A. B. Robinson

Mrs. A. B. Robinson

Mrs. Montgomery was appointed postmistress at Randsburg by President Taft and has served acceptably in that capacity ever since, being aided by Mr. Montgomery; and together they are well and favorably known.

ALONZO B. ROBINSON.—F. D. Robinson was a native of old Virginia, who moved to Missouri, from which state he enlisted in the Mexican war. After serving until the close of the conflict he was mustered out at Fort Leavenworth in 1848. In the spring of 1849 he came to California, crossing the plains with ox teams. Eager to try his fortunes in the gold mines he went to Eldorado county. Later he removed to Mendocino county and took up ranching, which he followed the remainder of his life. His marriage united him with Orpha Hackler, a native of Tennessee, who crossed the plains with relatives in 1852. They were married at Diamond Springs, Eldorado county, and of the nine children born to them five are living, Alonzo being the third in order of birth. He was born December 8, 1858, in Anderson valley, Mendocino county, attending school there until he was about seventeen years of age. Following the custom of many boys of that day he took up work on the home farm for a while, but he was ambitious to do for himself, and at the age of twenty secured employment in the lumber mills, leaving this, however, to engage in sheep shearing, and later again entered the lumber business as shingle sawyer. His experience in handling stock began in 1879, when he bought and sold stock for a short time, two years later, in the summer of 1881, taking a position as tree-feller, which he continued for some years. At the age of twenty-four, on December 6, 1882, Mr. Robinson came to Kern county, which has been the field of his labors ever since, and he began work for his father-in-law. Three years later he homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres on the west side, which is now part of his holdings in this county. In 1888 he went into the cattle business for himself, adding to his property from time to time in order to have a wide range for his stock, until he now owns and controls a large stock range in San Emidio district. His home ranch of one hundred and sixty acres eleven miles southwest of Bakersfield is well improved and under irrigation from Stine canal, and devoted to grain and alfalfa.

On December 2, 1882, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Robinson and Mary J. Rector. Her father was Bartley Franklin Rector, a large sheep owner in the county, who came to California across the plains in 1847 and followed mining. Later, in 1879, he came to Kern county and engaged in the sheep business, which he built up to a most flourishing state. Mrs. Robinson was born in Yountville, Napa county, October 2, 1861, and to her and her husband were born six children. Albert D., of Maricopa, married Lillie Denny, and they have one son, Byron D.; Minnie M. married W. E. Woodson, and they have one child, Mary M.; Stella D., Frank E., Archie W. and Dorothy B. are unmarried and living at home with their parents.

Along with his extensive ranching interests, Mr. Robinson has taken an active part in oil development, and owns an interest in several fields in Kern county. Withal, he has been active in politics, serving from 1901 to 1903 as deputy assessor under A. P. Lightner, and later being elected to the office of constable, which together with the office of deputy tax collector he filled for three years, and he has filled the position of trustee of the Paletto school board for sixteen years. He is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America and the Woodmen of the World.

LEON BIMAT.—While it may be a source of gratification to Mr. Bimat that he cast in his fortunes with those of the great western country, he has never forgotten the land of his birth and the home of his youth. On the contrary he cherishes a deep, intense devotion for France and particularly for the department of Basses Pyrenees, lying in the shadow of the lofty Pyrenees mountains, near the northern border of Spain. The memories of youth bind him to that peaceful farming country. There his parents, Edward and Marie (Merisou) Bimat, passed their uneventful but useful lives and there the former earned a livelihood for the family through the tilling of the soil and the raising of stock. The five children survive their parents and three of them have established homes in the United States. The fourth among the five, Leon, was born in the village of Preslion, Basses Pyrenees, November 22, 1859, and began to help on the farm as soon as old enough to work. Thus he learned to be industrious, painstaking and efficient. He can scarcely recall the time when first he decided to migrate to the new world. During July, 1878, he arrived in San Francisco, where he found employment as a gardener.

Coming to Kern county early in 1880 Mr. Bimat entered the employ of a sheepman, in whose interests he took the flock to Los Angeles county and from there to Inyo county, thence returning to Kern county. These various moves were made for the purpose of securing free range for the flock. Since 1881 he has engaged in the sheep business for himself and specializes with Merinos and Shropshires, the former valuable by reason of their splendid fleece, and the latter offering special advantages on account of their dual value of fleece and mutton.

Various interests in both business and residence property in East Bakersfield, where during 1910 he erected a substantial residence on the corner of Kern and Nile streets, bind Mr. Bimat to this place. Here he was married May 14, 1892, to Miss Malvina Rostain, a native of the village of Manse, department of Hautes-Alpes, France, and a daughter of the late Joseph and Marie (Cesmat) Rostain. For years before his death her father had engaged in farming and stock-raising in France. In a family of six children (only three of whom survive), she was third in order of birth and came to the United States during 1891, settling in Bakersfield, Cal. Her only surviving brother, Val Rostain, settled in East Bakersfield, as did also a sister, Mrs. Jeanne Bonnet, while another sister, Marie, Mrs. B. Bimat, made her home on a ranch near Bakersfield until her death in 1911. Since becoming a citizen of the United States Mr. Bimat has voted with the Republican party. In religion he and his wife are earnest members of the St. Joseph Catholic Church. Their family comprises five children, of whom the two eldest, Edward and Felsie, are graduates of the class of 1912 Kern county high school, while the three younger children, Leon Jr., Pascal and George, are attending the public schools of East Bakersfield.

JAMES H. PENSINGER.—There are to be found in the famous oil fields of Kern county operators who came hither from Canada, workers from the east and foreigners from other lands, but comparatively few of the large number of men identified with the development of the oil industry at this point can claim that they are natives of Kern county and lifelong residents of the same region. Such a statement may be made in regard to James H. Pensinger, formerly superintendent of the Colloma Oil Company on section 31, township 28, range 28, and now foreman of the Traders Oil Company's lease. Throughout all of his life he has been identified with this portion of California and his earliest childhood memories cluster around Kern county, where he was born February 16, 1878, and where he lived as a boy in poverty but in comfort and independence, helping with the maintenance of the family through his energetic labors on the home farm. The father, Jerry Pensinger, had been a gold miner in Nevada and a man inured to the hardships of frontier existence. When he came to Kern county in 1872 settlers were few, towns small and the future outlook discouraging, but with characteristic optimism he secured land and set himself resolutely to the task of supporting his family. As soon as the children were old enough to assist, they became assets of value to the family welfare. Since the death of the father the widowed mother has remained on the home farm of eighty acres situated southwest of Bakersfield. Of her seven children the sixth in order of birth, James H., displayed great physical prowess even in early life and his splendid constitution has enabled him to do the work of two men without injury to himself. All through his life he has been a hard worker and in boyhood was earning his own livelihood when other lads of his age were enjoying school advantages. In 1900 he married Miss Lulu Hunter, by whom he had one child, Bessie.

Upon discontinuing agricultural work in favor of other pursuits Mr. Pensinger finally drifted to the Kern river fields about 1904 and there secured employment with the Provident Oil Company. He was later with C. B. Colby and the Colloma Oil Company, and October 1, 1913, became lease foreman for the Traders Oil Company under Joseph Raney.

C. H. DAWLEY.—Born January 26, 1844, in Ashtabula county, Ohio, when ten years old Mr. Dawley removed with his parents to New York, where in Chautauqua county he was reared to manhood. He learned the carpenter's trade, and later took up well drilling, and it was at Scrubgrass, Venango county, Pa., that he first drilled for oil, beginning as a laborer. For five or six years Mr. Dawley continued this work of drilling, in the meantime becoming familiar with all the methods employed in the work, and then removed to Nebraska, near Lincoln, where he engaged in carpentering and building. This was his home for twenty years, but in 1904, learning of the new industry opened up in California, he moved to Kern county, where he procured employment on the well-working gang of the Del Rey lease.

The Del Rey has eleven producing wells, the production being from eight to ten thousand barrels per month, and they employ on an average from five to six men all the time. Under Mr. Dawley's able management it has proved a paying enterprise, and it is largely due to the close attention and well-informed acquaintance which Mr. Dawley has with the conduct of the business.

In 1869, before coming west to Nebraska, Mr. Dawley married Miss Hattie M. Bates, and for many years they made their home on the Del Rey property, where now Mr. Dawley resides alone, his wife having died August 24, 1912. Both of their children died in infancy.

W. W. COLM.—As superintendent of the Sacramento Oil Company and the Acme Development Company, W. W. Colm heads interests which represent the most active industry in this part of the county. He is a native of Butte county, Cal., where he grew up, and attended school at Sacramento, and later entered Bainbridge College, from which he graduated. He has proved himself to be a clever, sagacious manager of the firm he represents, and has brought it to a paying basis by his own efforts. The stockholders of the company reside mostly in Sacramento, and the officers of the Sacramento Oil Co. are, J. L. Gillis, president, Charles Robb, vice-president, D. W. Carmichael, secretary and treasurer, and W. W. Colm, superintendent; of the Acme Development Co., Charles Robb, president, Charles Richardson, vice-president, J. L. Gillis, secretary and treasurer, and W. W. Colm, superintendent.

According to experienced oil men, there is no lease in the Kern river field which has been better drilled or better managed or can show better results in general than the twenty acres owned by the Acme Development Co. under the efficient management of Mr. Colm. Drilling on the Acme was begun on April 1, 1907, and eight wells were put down with one string of tools. The deepest of these wells is nine hundred and fifty feet, and the shallowest is nine hundred feet. None of the wells is large, but all are uniform producers. The drilling was completed on October 5, 1907, with no dry holes, no spoiled wells, no poorly finished jobs and no breaks of any kind in a uniform run of clean, successful work. In connection with this record it should be stated that this section (twenty-nine) is probably the easiest and cheapest part of the field to drill, but even considering this fact the record of eight good producing wells in six months with one string of tools is one of which any superintendent may well be proud.

The product of the company has been exceedingly high, the receipts for which reached a large figure. The records show that up to May 1 of this year the wells have steadily increased in production, so that the prospects are that the Acme property will go on paying for itself many times over before its wells are pumped dry, which time is variously estimated from ten to forty years. This territory is underlaid with four hundred feet of oil sand, producing oil of fourteen gravity. Mr. Colm has been manager of the Sacramento Oil Company ever since it was started. This lease covers forty acres, and has ten oil wells and three water wells, and is fast developing to a highly productive point. Under his experienced management there is a splendid future success assured the company.

Mr. Colm married Miss Mary E. Flickinger, of Pennsylvania, and they make their residence in the Kern river oil fields, where they are surrounded by many warm friends.

JAMES HEROD.—On the bluffs above East Bakersfield commanding a most magnificent view of the valley stands an attractive country residence known as Plainview home, which with its complete equipment of modern conveniences, including a private water plant operated by electricity, offers every boasted advantage of the city, together with the many indisputable benefits associated with suburban life. An admirable adjunct of the home is the rose garden, while scarcely less attractive are the groves planted to trees of oranges, lemons and grape fruit.

The Herods come of a very old Kentucky family, whose first representative in Indiana, John Herod, settled on a tract of raw land near Greencastle and developed the claim into a productive farm. The next generation was represented by Baila Herod, born and reared on the Indiana farm, an agriculturist throughout his active years, but now living retired at Coatesville, Hendricks county, that state. His wife, who also has spent her entire life in Indiana, bore the maiden name of Harriet Minter and comes of an old and honored Virginia family, her mother having been a sister of John Clark Ridpath, the famous historian. There were ten children in the family of Baila Herod and all but two of these attained to maturity, while six now survive. Three live in California, Mrs. Scofield having her home on Chester avenue, Bakersfield, and Lester living on Cedar street in the same city. The next to the oldest member of the family, James, was born on the old homestead near Greencastle, Ind., October 24, 1858, and received a country-school education. Starting out for himself in 1880 he found employment on a ranch near Wellington, Sumner county, Kan., and there he worked for two years. In April of 1882 he arrived in California, and after a month in Los Angeles came on to Kern county during May. His identification with this county therefore covers a period of more than thirty years.

After having worked first as a day laborer and later as a foreman for Dr. D. O. C. Williams on San Emidio ranch for some time, Mr. Herod resigned in 1885 in order to take up ranching for himself. At first he engaged in raising stock in a general way, but later he drifted into the dairy industry, and in it he was very successful. The ranch in the Panama district which he still owns, comprises one hundred and twenty acres under irrigation and mostly in alfalfa. During November of 1911 he leased the ranch and removed to his present home in the suburbs of East Bakersfield, where he continues the dairy business as a retail dealer in milk. While living on the ranch he assisted in the organization of the First Congregational Church of Panama, and in it he served as treasurer and a trustee until his removal to East Bakersfield, when he and his wife became members of the Pilgrim Congregational Church. For several years he served as a director of the Farmers' Mutual Telephone Company of Kern county, which he assisted in organizing and steadfastly promoted in its important work of bringing telephone lines into the entire district. In politics he always has voted with the Democratic party. Fraternally he holds membership with the Woodmen of the World and the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

James Herod.
Mary Herod

The first marriage of Mr. Herod united him with Miss Nellie Crocker, a native of Gilroy, Santa Clara county, Cal., and a daughter of J. C. Crocker, a pioneer of Kern county. Mrs. Nellie Herod died on the home ranch, leaving two children, namely: Mrs. Stella G. Hastings, whose husband has leased the ranch owned by Mr. Herod; and Lester E., who is engaged in the stock business in Breckenridge district. In 1897 in Bakersfield occurred the marriage of Mr. Herod and Miss Mary A. May, a native of Healdsburg, Sonoma county, Cal., and a lady of education and culture. There are no children of this union, but with them lives an adopted son, Roy, born in 1900 and now a student in the public schools. Mrs. Herod is the eldest of the six living children of Frank and Amelia (Alexander) May, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and St. Clair county, Ill. During the Civil war Mr. May served as a volunteer in the First Virginia cavalry regiment. At the close of the war he removed to California and settled in Sonoma county, where he married a daughter of Charles Alexander, the honored pioneer of Alexander valley in Sonoma county. In St. Clair county, Ill., where he was born, Mr. Alexander married Achsah Smith, a native of New York. In 1849 he crossed the plains with ox teams. His family joined him in 1852, coming by way of Panama. After mining a while he located in the valley that was named for the family. In 1872 Mr. May came to Kern county with his wife and family, which then comprised two children, four children having been born in Kern county. Settling in the Panama district, he took up a claim and began to develop the barren tract into a productive farm, starting housekeeping in a box house 14x14. Largely through Mr. May's influence the Farmers' canal was constructed and it proved of great benefit to the early settlers. Until his death in 1892 he continued on the same ranch and engaged in the stock business. The ranch is still owned by his widow, who is now making her home with Mrs. Herod at Plainview, East Bakersfield.

FRED. P. BOLSTAD, D. D. S.—Born in Minnesota, March 20, 1878, Dr. Bolstad was educated in public schools of the east. After coming to California he matriculated in the dental department of the University of Southern California, where he took the regular course of lectures and experimental work and was graduated with the class of 1909. For a brief period following his graduation he had charge of an office in Covina. January 25, 1910, he arrived in Taft for the purpose of entering upon professional work and here he since has engaged in practice. September 15, 1911, he moved his suite to the Key building, where he now has pleasant quarters and every facility for the satisfactory continuance of professional work. August 22, 1911, he was united in marriage with Miss Grace M. Bursell, and they have established a comfortable home in Taft, where they are prominent socially.

A number of the fraternities receive the co-operation and assistance of Dr. Bolstad in their philanthropies and social functions, among these being the Woodmen of the World, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Camp No. 266, at Bakersfield. Interested in political problems and stanch in his allegiance to the Republican party, he has taken a warm interest in national issues and has kept posted concerning large governmental affairs. Particularly deep has been his interest in local matters. Any measure for the upbuilding of Taft receives his warm support, for he is an enthusiastic booster of the city. After the incorporation of Taft he was elected the first city clerk November 7, 1910, and at the expiration of his term he was re-elected April 8, 1912, since which time he has continued to give close attention to the duties of the clerkship, which office he has filled with credit to himself and satisfaction to the general public.

LEONARD HOPPER.—A native of Stuart, Guthrie county, Iowa, Leonard Hopper was born November 14, 1881, and was educated in the public and high schools in Iowa. When he removed with his parents to California and located at Fresno he was seventeen years of age. So well has he prospered in this country that he has adopted it as his permanent home, and is one of those who has only the best to say of the west and its environment. In Fresno he worked for two years as a steam engineer, at the same time taking a course in the International Correspondence School at Scranton, Pa. Coming to Bakersfield in 1900 he continued at his trade for two years, when he purchased the Gusher lunch counter. This was located on the present site of the Brower building and at the time he assumed proprietorship boasted only three or four stools. From this small beginning he built up a large business which he sold after three years. In 1906 he bought out the American Towel Supply Co. at Bakersfield, which at the time was doing a small business, the new proprietor increasing it sixfold. After taking a course in Heald's Business College, from which he graduated in 1908, he branched out in the laundry business on a large scale, starting the American Laundry, of which he is the sole proprietor. After starting the enterprise he purchased the site and erected the large and commodious building at No. 2125 I street, and has installed the latest and most modern machinery and other facilities that go to make it up-to-date in every respect. So well has the business prospered that today it is the largest one of the kind in the county. Mr. Hopper employs fifty people on an average, of whom sixty per cent are women, and his weekly payroll amounts to $600. Twenty thousand dollars were expended in May, 1908, by Mr. Hopper in the erection of this building and the business.

Mr. Hopper has become most popular in the social as well as the business world of Bakersfield. Fraternally he is a member of the Order of Moose, also the Woodmen of the World, in which he has taken great interest.

C. E. BALLAGH.—The superintendent of the Apollo, 4-Oil and Amaurot Oil Companies in the Kern river field, who is recognized as one of the able men of the business, claims California as his native commonwealth and is justly proud of the fact that he has spent his entire life within the limits of this great state. The ministerial duties of his father, Rev. R. Ballagh, caused the family to be residents successively of a number of flourishing towns in the interior of the state, and it was while they were living at Vacaville, Solano county, that C. E. was born, March 31, 1880, but subsequent changes made him familiar with different villages. During the sojourn of the family at Selma, Fresno county, he attended the high school there and began to earn his own livelihood upon the completion of his educational course. When nineteen years of age he came to Kern county seeking employment. The first job he secured was at McKittrick, where he learned the task of tool-dressing and where he worked with the Eldorado Oil Company for five months. Since 1900 he has been employed in the Kern river oil field in various capacities with different companies. For a time he was retained as field foreman with Green and Whittier, while he also held a responsible position with the San Joaquin division of the Associated Oil Company. During January of 1911 he became connected with the 4-Oil, and as the two other leases are under the same ownership he acts as superintendent of all.

The marriage of Mr. Ballagh took place March 3, 1909, and united him with Miss Myrtle Barker of Bakersfield, a niece of the late Congressman Smith, one of the most distinguished citizens ever identified with the development of the San Joaquin valley. Since his marriage Mr. Ballagh has occupied a substantial cottage provided by the company on the Apollo lease. Although still young in years, he is one of the pioneer oil men of Kern county and has not only a long, but also an honorable record in the industry.

Leonard Hopper

THOMAS WILEY BROWN.—The justice of the peace of the fifteenth township of Kern county, who likewise serves as city recorder of Maricopa, has been identified with the history of California ever since the '50s and for a number of years has made Maricopa his home, having come to this locality in order to fill a position as foreman for the Occidental (now the Sunset Monarch) Oil Company in 1900. An occasion not to be soon forgotten is a visit with Judge Brown, for he is an interesting conversationalist, possesses a remarkable memory and narrates incidents connected with pioneer days in a manner impressive and entertaining. Notwithstanding his advanced years and arduous life he is as active, whether measured physically or mentally, as many men of fifty, and not only is still an omnivorous reader, but a clear thinker, logical reasoner and forceful debater. The busy round of a frontier existence and the almost utter lack of educational advantages did not dwarf his fine mentality, but in the intervals of leisure on ranch or in mine he has familiarized himself with the best literature of the past and present, has thoroughly enjoyed the works of Charles Dickens and Walter Scott and has been a constant admirer of the brilliant poems of Edgar Allan Poe. With an exact memory that never fails he quotes classical poems in their entirety and shows a wide acquaintance with both English and American writers.

Both the paternal and maternal ancestors of Mr. Brown were living in America prior to the Revolutionary war. His grandfathers Brown and Slocumb were soldiers in the war of 1812. His father, John Hancock Brown, son of Thomas Brown, was born in Louisiana in 1808 and was named in honor of the illustrious signer of the Declaration of Independence. In lineage he was of Scotch-Irish extraction. Excellent advantages were bestowed upon him in youth and he was sent to one of the best schools in New Orleans. He was said to have been one of the best Greek and Latin scholars of his day. In his family there were three children, the eldest being Thomas Wiley, born at Fairfield, Wayne county, Ill., November 4, 1842. The second, George E., of Berkeley, this state, is interested in mining and oil lands. The only daughter, Julia, is the wife of John G. Knox, deputy county clerk of Tulare county. When the father came across the plains to California during the summer of 1850 he left wife and children in Southern Illinois and in 1853 they joined him, coming via Panama. The mother, Caroline, was an own sister of Judge Rigdon B. Slocumb, of Wayne county, Ill., and a native of Morganfield, Union county, Ky., being a descendant of English ancestors who settled in North Carolina in the colonial era of colonization. In the early part of the nineteenth century the family migrated from the Pedee river region to Kentucky and a later generation settled in Illinois.

Although about eleven years of age at the time of coming to the west Judge Brown had attended school only three months in his whole life, nor were his school advantages in California any more satisfactory, but fortunately he had the opportunity of learning from his father, who was teacher, preceptor and companion to him. The work of earning a livelihood was strenuous, but a little leisure was always found for study and of this he availed himself to the utmost. While still quite young he engaged in placer mining in Eldorado, Calaveras and Tuolumne counties. Familiar with both placer and quartz mining, he has devoted much of his life to the work, but never has met with the success his efforts justified. Besides mining all through the west he even went into Old Mexico. At one time he owned land now in the heart of Porterville, this state, and Phoenix, Ariz., but he sold it before its value was known; he now owns valuable residence property in East Bakersfield. Throughout his entire life he has been consistent in his allegiance to the Democratic party and since coming to Maricopa he has served as the first city recorder, having turned over to the city $2783.50 as fees of his office during the first year.

The marriage of Thomas Wiley Brown and Miss Cornelia Glass was solemnized March 11, 1867, and was blessed with two children. The sole survivor, Russell, of Maricopa, married Miss Stella Dunlap of Bakersfield and they have one child, Thomas Calvin Brown. Mrs. Brown was a daughter of Robert and Jane (Miller) Glass, natives respectively of Virginia and Alabama, but residents of Texas from childhood. The Glass family originally came from Ireland, while the Millers were of German ancestry. The parents of Mrs. Brown were married in Texas and lived there for many years afterward, her birth occurring in that state. During 1853 they joined an expedition composed of seventy-five families and crossed the plains and deserts through New Mexico and Arizona into California. When near the present site of Deming, N. M., the expedition camped to rest their teams. All around them were Indians and one of the braves seized Mrs. Brown, then a babe of eight months, and endeavored to escape with her in his arms. Evidently the intention was to extort a ransom. The dastardly act was seen by J. P. Ownby, who took aim and fired at the Indian, thus saving the life of the child. No other event occurred to imperil the lives of any and at last they safely landed in Los Angeles, where Mr. Glass bought ten acres one block from the present site of the Downey building. Having no thought of its future value, he sold it later for a small sum.

When Mrs. Brown was nine years of age the family removed to Tulare county and settled six miles south of Visalia, where the father took up land and engaged in ranching. Through intelligent and unwearied industry he became well-to-do. His death occurred in California at the age of sixty-nine. When the mother was about seventy-six she went to New Mexico to visit her daughter, Mrs. J. P. Ownby, and during the course of her sojourn there she was taken ill and died. There were seven daughters and two sons in the family. Amanda married J. P. Ownby and they were early settlers of Bakersfield, but eventually located in New Mexico, where Mr. Ownby engaged in raising sheep and also carried on a hotel business until his death; his wife also has passed away, leaving three children. Laura and her husband, Solomon Slinkard of Los Angeles, are both deceased and left nine children. Corley, of East Bakersfield, is engaged in contract teaming. Dora married E. S. Baalam, who has an orange grove at Lemon Cove, Tulare county. Cornelia, the fifth in order of birth, spent her girlhood principally in Tulare county and there married Mr. Brown. Sarah and her husband, J. C. Turner, formerly a carpenter in Bakersfield, are both deceased and left six children. Barbara Ellen, deceased, was the wife of M. C. Purcell, a sheepman living at Bakersfield, and at her death she left six children. William is a teaming contractor in Bakersfield. The youngest member of the family, Louisiana Beauregard, married Henry Muller and lives on a ranch six miles east of Bakersfield.

JOSEPH BENSON FRY.—One of the self-made men active in the recent history of Bakersfield, Kern county, was Joseph Benson Fry, who was born in Iroquois county, Ill., July 28, 1852, and died at Bakersfield, May 26, 1911. He was a son of Joseph and Elizabeth (Frazier) Fry. His father, a native of Ohio and a pioneer in Illinois, passed away in the latter state; his mother, who also was born in the Buckeye state, died in Indiana. His father's brother, John Fry, a member of an Illinois regiment which served in the Civil war, died in 1873 as a result of hardship and exposure in Libby Prison at Richmond, Va.

Twelfth in order of birth of his parents' fourteen children, three of whom are living, Joseph B. Fry was reared on a farm in Illinois and educated in public schools near his boyhood home. When he was about sixteen years old he went to Girard, Kans., and found employment on a farm near by. September 29, 1872, he married Miss Joanna Banks, who was born near Quincy, Adams County, Ill., the daughter of Willis Banks, a native of Kentucky, who came with an ox-team caravan across the plains to California in 1850. Later Mr. Banks returned east to bring out his family, but being fearful of Indian attacks he gave up the idea of coming to California and in 1861 located at Girard, Kans., homesteading land, a part of which is now within the city limits. During the war he was burned out by bushwhackers, who drove his cattle away and he was compelled to go to Marmaton to reclaim them. After the war he returned to his home in Girard and later located eight miles from that town. In 1880 he came to Bakersfield and in 1881 died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Fry. His wife, who was Miss Eveline Thomas, was born in Kentucky, a daughter of James Thomas, who removed to Illinois and later to Kansas, where he died and where his wife also passed away. Of their seven sons and seven daughters, six of whom are living, Mrs. Joseph B. Fry was the next to the youngest child and the youngest daughter. She was ten years old when her parents took her to Kansas, where she was educated in the public schools.

J. B. Fry

Until 1876 Mr. Fry farmed; then he came to Trinity county, Cal., where he worked six months in the mines. In July, 1877, he came to Bakersfield as foreman on Poso creek for the Kern County Land Company. After an unsuccessful attempt at farming at Fresno, he returned to his work as foreman for the Kern County Land Company at Bakersfield. Next he tried again to farm near Paso Robles, but did not win out and again returned to Bakersfield and engaged in general contracting and heavy teaming. In this business he was very successful and was soon able to build his fine residence at No. 925 Eighth street, on a property of one and one-third acres which was also his business headquarters. Eventually he acquired four other residences and a store in Bakersfield, all on Chester avenue, the store being on the corner of Eighth street. His business grew so large that he came in time to give employment to a large number of men and teams. He had the contract to lay the pipe line for the Standard Oil Company from the oil fields in Kern County to Point Richmond, which occupied a year in building. Since his death his widow has had his business interests in charge, and is looking after her property also. In politics he was a Republican. Socially he affiliated with the Elks and the Independent Order of Foresters. Mrs. Fry is a member of the Christian Church and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She has five children: Bertha, Mrs. W. W. Ramage of Bakersfield; Charles H., a well known rancher in Kern county; Hattie, Mrs. Freal Neighbert, of Bakersfield; Arthur Delano, a bookkeeper in the employ of a local concern; and Lola, Mrs. Floyd Busby, of Bakersfield.

WILLIAM ALBERT LAVERS.—David Lavers, pioneer, father of William Albert Lavers, was born in Nova Scotia, in January, 1831, and came to California in 1852, when he was about twenty-one years old. For a short time he was employed in the mining regions, but soon took up farming in San Jose and in 1855 settled at Glennville, Kern county, taking up a government claim on one hundred and sixty acres of land. The story of his success is briefly suggested in a statement that he is now the owner of three thousand acres of land, sixty acres of this under cultivation, three acres in orchard, and he is extensively engaged in breeding horses, cattle and hogs. For several years past he has been in practical retirement from active life and his business interests have been in charge of his son above mentioned. Miss Anna Cook, born in New Brunswick, March 6, 1848, became his wife. They had five children named as follows: Morton A., Mattie A., Minnie S., William A. and Fred D. The two daughters have passed away.

It was on the old Lavers homestead near Glennville that William Albert Lavers was born November 12, 1886. He was educated in the public schools at Linn's Valley and learned the carpenter's trade at Wilmerding school in San Francisco, graduating in 1905. After leaving school he returned to Linn's Valley to take charge of his father's extensive land interests, and so successfully has he handled them that he is recognized as one of the foremost of the younger business men of his community.

PAUL CHATOM.—Born April 4, 1863, in Canton Ticino, Switzerland. Paul Chatom is the son of Michael and Maria (Magnaghi) Chatom. Michael Chatom had varied experiences in the gold fields of Australia, where he made a small fortune, and upon returning to his native Switzerland, built up a tannery and butcher shop, which he continued to operate successfully until his death in 1868, when his son Paul was but five years of age. His widow still survives, at the age of seventy-three, making her home in Switzerland in the old home. Four sons and one daughter were born to Michael Chatom and wife, viz.: Albert, Paul, Michael, Jack and Fannie (who was a sister in the convent in Genoa City and is now deceased).

Paul Chatom attended the public schools of his native village and also St. Joseph's College at Locarno, Switzerland. In 1882 he came to California and was first engaged in the building of the Southern Pacific Railroad from Reading to Roseburg, Ore., and thence to Shasta county, Cal. The next year he worked in the Maison Dorée restaurant at San Francisco, where he remained for a year, going from there to Merced, where he had charge of a restaurant for Johnny Smith. After conducting the latter place for two years he went to Modesto, where he engaged in the same business on his own account, and here met with gratifying prosperity. Two years later he sold out and went to Santa Barbara, where he soon built up a fine business, but after five or six months was obliged to relinquish this interest because of poor health, and going from there to Phoenix, Ariz., he accepted the position of steward in the Commercial hotel. After six months he returned to Fresno and opened up The Reception, a fine restaurant there which he conducted for the next two years, in 1890 disposing of it and coming to Bakersfield, which place suited his tastes so well that he has ever since made it his home. For one year he ran the Mocha restaurant, and then leased the Monte Carlo restaurant for five years. During the panic of 1893 he lost about ten thousand dollars, which left him without funds and almost disheartened. Nevertheless he dauntlessly opened up a small place in the east end of Bakersfield, which he called The Klondike, in which business he was enabled to save a little money and his next move was to embark in the furniture business which he built up to a flourishing condition. Ill luck, however, seemed to follow him, for the last mentioned place was destroyed by fire and the loss was considerable. He then took charge of the Bakersfield Club for five years, during which time he exercised the utmost economy and his thrift proved valuable to him, as he was soon able to open the restaurant over which he is at present the proprietor, the Mascot, located in the old Berges building, on Nineteenth street, for which he obtained a three years' lease. He then purchased the Packard property at No. 1517 Eighteenth street, where he erected the brick building 30x65 feet, which is occupied by the New Mascot, also purchased the residence at No. 1521 Eighteenth street. In 1909 he erected the splendid Mascot Apartment house on Sixteenth street, and a year later the Chatom apartment on Seventeenth street.

In 1890, Mr. Chatom was married to Miss Laura Rose Wall, a native of St. Louis, Mo., and two children were born to them: Paul, a student in the University of California; and Virginia, who is being educated at the convent of the Notre Dame, at San Jose. In politics Mr. Chatom is a staunch Republican, always voting that ticket.

JAMES MARCUS HAYDEN.—A diversity of occupations and the various environments which have surrounded him in his work have contributed to James Marcus Hayden his wide knowledge of affairs, his broad business experience and his clear insight into affairs in general. The son of Capt. Marcus A. and Eliza (Proctor) Hayden, he inherited from these two sturdy children of Kentucky the many admirable traits of those countrymen. The father was engaged in the general merchandise business at Mayville, and during the war served as a captain in a Missouri regiment under General Price. After receiving an honorable discharge from duty in the war he resumed his mercantile pursuits, and both he and his wife passed away in Missouri.

Paul Chatom

Mr. Hayden, who was born in Lexington, Mo., March 26, 1869, is the only surviving child of his parents. Reared in Lafayette county, that state, he attended the local public schools and was later sent to the Wentworth Military Academy at Lexington, where he was schooled in the rigid principles of honor, courage and trustworthiness. His first occupation was railroading, as agent at Corder, Mo., for the Chicago & Alton Railroad, with which company he continued at various points for a period of three years. He then for six months filled the position of city agent for the Burlington & Missouri at Deadwood, and became interested in mining in the Black Hills region. Butte, Mont., was his next location and when the Rossland, B. C., excitement was reported he made his way to British Columbia, where he mined at different places for some time with varying success. An opportunity to return to railroading led him to return to the States and he accepted the position of agent at American Fork, Utah, for the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. In 1906 he came to California and entered the employ of the Standard Oil Company in the pipe line department at Corcoran, when he was transferred to Coalinga. Here he was bookkeeper for a short period, his ability being soon recognized by his promotion to superintendent of the Coalinga division, and in this capacity he served with splendid success for three years, and in 1911 was transferred to the main office at Bakersfield as chief accountant under J. M. Atwell. When the property at Lost Hills was purchased by the company he was sent there to superintend the division and as such opened the work and continued the supervision until July, 1912, when he resigned to enter the mercantile business for himself in Lost Hills, where he has already built up a good trade.

Mr. Hayden was married in Logan, Utah, September 21, 1905, to Thelma Johnson, who was a native of Logan. They have three children, Thomas, Marcus and James, Jr. The family make their home in Wasco, where they enjoy the friendship of a host of well-wishers. Mr. Hayden is a Democrat.

CHARLES MINER VROOMAN.—The genealogy of the Vrooman family is traced back to the old Knickerbocker stock that formed a most important element in the colonial upbuilding of New York. During the Revolution the family had representatives at the front and bore its share in the sanguinary struggles of the period. Joseph Brown Vrooman, a native of New York state and a land speculator through his active years, married Abbie Chapman, of Stonington, Conn., whose ancestors had served in the navy during the Revolutionary war and had been identified otherwise with the early history of New England. The only living son of this marriage, Judge Charles Miner Vrooman, was born in the city of Rochester, N. Y., November 29, 1852, and received a public-school education in his native town, later attending the University of Rochester, from which he was graduated, in 1873, with the degree of A. B. Afterward he held a position as teacher in the Rochester high school. Coming to California in 1877 and settling in the then sparsely inhabited county of Kern, he was duly chosen principal of the Summer (now East Bakersfield) schools, a position that he filled acceptably for five years. After having taught in East Bakersfield and other parts of Kern county until 1889, he then gave up the work of a teacher to engage in stockraising on Mount Breckenridge. From his advent in the county his summers were spent in the South Fork country and he has been a permanent resident of this section since 1905, meanwhile maintaining a close association with local advancement along every line of progress.

The title by which Judge Vrooman is familiarly known came to him through his occupancy of the office of justice of the peace of the first judicial township of Kern county, to which office he was elected in 1910 on the Republican ticket. During January of 1911 he took the oath of office and entered upon its duties, which he has since discharged with impartiality, efficiency and exceptional promptness. The judicial district is the oldest in the county and he has in his office the docket extending back into the '60s, when it was a part of Tulare county. His office is located at Isabella, it being the most central place in the judicial township. On the organization of the Bakersfield Lodge, Knights of Pythias, he became one of its charter members, and in addition he is a member of the Delta Psi. In the midst of his labors as a stockraiser and as a justice he has never lost his early interest in educational matters. The relinquishment of the work of teaching did not mean an abandonment of interest in the profession. In every way possible he has striven to promote the success of the public school system, which he believes to lie at the very foundation of all future prosperity and progress in our country. For eight years he served as a member of the county board of education and during part of the time he was honored by being chosen president of the board, in which capacity he was instrumental in promoting the welfare of the schools and advancing the standard of education in the county.

JAMES E. CHITTENDEN.—The state of Illinois has taken a place in the history of the development of western America as a stopping place for pioneers from the East and a breeding ground of pioneers destined for the far west. Among well known citizens of Kern county, Cal., who were born in the Prairie State none are better or more favorably known than is James E. Chittenden, of Glennville. Mr. Chittenden was born in Warsaw, Hancock county, Ill., May 17, 1839, and when he was old enough entered public school there and studied until he was about fifteen years old. His father, E. F. Chittenden, crossed the plains to California in 1852 and the rest of the family, the mother and four children, came to the state in 1855 by way of the Isthmus of Panama, and settlement was made at Calaveras, fifteen miles from Stockton. There James E. worked for his father until he was twenty-four years old, and then for six years he was a salesman in the employ of Bowen Brothers in Stockton. Taking up his residence in Sacramento he was employed during the ensuing six years in a produce house. For a time he was a proof reader on the Sacramento Union and assisted in the delivery of the paper to its subscribers. After his father's death he returned to Stockton in order the better to help care for the household. There he engaged in the notion and cigar business, continuing this for some time, besides which he was agent for and manager of the Stockton Theatre. Subsequently he became agent of the Southern Pacific road at Banta Station. His identification with Kern county dates from the year 1875 and soon after coming here he located at Sumner, where he established himself in the general commission business which ultimately grew to large proportions. In 1890 he settled on the property which has come to be known as his home place, on Sandy creek near Glennville. It consists of three hundred and twenty acres, of which about sixty-five acres are under cultivation, thirty acres in alfalfa and the remainder in fruit. His chief business, however, is the raising of horses, cattle and hogs. His buildings, appointments and implements are thoroughly up-to-date and his methods are modern and productive of the best results.

Politically Mr. Chittenden is a staunch Republican. In 1888 he was united in marriage with Mrs. Elizabeth (Clapp) Rigby, a native of Eldorado county, Cal. She passed away October 17, 1905, having become the mother of five children, of whom four are living, as follows: Virgil E., a rancher in Linn's valley; Justin L., who assists with the ranch duties; Julia F., who presides over his household; and Elbert F., in Porterville.

Mr and Mrs Christian Baptista

CHRISTIAN AND MARGARET BAPTISTA.—Among the enterprising citizens who have aided in the developing of farm lands in Kern county we find Mr. and Mrs. Baptista, who have been industrious, energetic and honorable in their effort to secure a competency, which they have accomplished and are now living comfortably on their twenty-acre ranch in the Buena Vista district, while they lease their other ranch for dairy purposes.

Mrs. Baptista was in maidenhood Margaret Wolf, a native of Canton Graubunden, Switzerland, and was the daughter of Peter and Mary (Solis) Wolf, both natives of that canton, where they followed farming for a livelihood. When Margaret Wolf was eight years of age there occurred a tragedy in the family. While her father and mother and three of their children were making hay on another place an earthslide occurred in which they lost their lives, thus leaving the eight-year-old girl and her brother Christ, ten years of age, orphans. The brother still resides on the old home place. Her girlhood was spent in the home of her grandfather, George Solis, a farmer in Grisons, where she attended the common schools. In early life it became necessary for her to learn habits of self-reliance, and these have stood her in good stead in her later years. Having heard very favorable reports from people returning from trips to the United States, she concluded to cast her fortunes in the New World and in 1889 crossed the ocean and came forthwith to Hastings, Adams county, Neb. The next year, in 1890, she came on to Bakersfield, Cal., where she found satisfactory employment.

February 3, 1894, in Mrs. Ellen M. Tracy's home, occurred her marriage with Christian Baptista. He was born in Iner-ferera, Canton Graubunden, Switzerland, July 25, 1865, the son of John and Minnie (Meule) Baptista, farmers in the Alps, where he was reared, receiving his education in the free schools of his native country. In 1887 he came to Kern county, Cal., where he was employed by the Kern County Land Company. After their marriage they engaged in grain-raising in the Old River district until 1896, when they purchased twenty acres under the Stine canal in that same district. This was seeded to alfalfa and later they added to it until they had fifty-six acres all in alfalfa and a dairy herd of thirty-five cows. They met with decided success and in 1909 leased the ranch. They now own and reside on their alfalfa ranch in the Buena Vista district, where they live comfortably and well. With them resides their niece, Augusta Piper, who has brought youth and joy into their home, and they take genuine pleasure in bringing her up and doing for her as if she were their own child.

Mr. and Mrs. Baptista are both Republicans in their political views. While Mr. Baptista is a member of the Woodmen of the World, his wife is an active member of the Women of Woodcraft and in religion is a member of the Baptist Church in Bakersfield.

H. GUY HUGHES.—Kern county has many citizens born within the borders of the state, not a few of them within her own borders, who are leaders in the various industrial and commercial movements which are rapidly making her great. H. Guy Hughes was born on the Hughes homestead at Glennville in 1887, a son of William B. and Fannie (McKamy) Hughes. His father, who was born in Missouri in 1849, was brought across the plains by his parents, leaving his native state when he was about nine months old. The family settled at Sonora, Tuolumne county, and there he passed his childhood and while yet but a boy began working in the mines. Such local advantages as were available were afforded him, however, and when he was sixteen years old he became a student in a business college at Stockton. After the removal of the family to Glennville he bought the old Hight place and engaged in stock-raising, which he continued until his death. Fannie McKamy was born in Stockton, Cal., June 7, 1866, and was married in June, 1886, when she was about twenty years old. She bore her husband two children, H. Guy and Florence. The father died January 4, 1897. Coming to Kern county in 1870, his life here embraced the era of small and crude things and he experienced many of the hardships incident to pioneer life in this part of the country. For a time he was in charge of a large bunch of cattle in Arizona and he often drove cattle to San Francisco to market, the round trip consuming three months. He was interested in education and long served as school trustee in the Wicher district. In many ways he demonstrated a public spirit which was potent in the advancement of worthy local interests. The grandparents of H. Guy Hughes, in both the paternal and the maternal line, were pioneer emigrants who came across the plains from the east.

H. Guy Hughes attended public school and high school until he was seventeen years old, meantime and afterward, busying himself on the farm. He was only ten years old when his father died and his mother came naturally, while he was yet very young, to depend on him in many matters of importance. He went to work in the oil field in 1908, but eventually returned to the home farm and devoted himself to general farming and cattle-raising. He was married to Miss Fannie Guthrie, a native of Tulare, Cal. He has from early manhood taken an active interest in public matters of importance, has been clerk of the board of education three years and is now filling the office of school trustee.

BARNEY A. ANDERSEN.—The father of B. A. Andersen, the late Fredrick Andersen, for years was a merchant in Germany, where the mother, Anke, still makes her home. There were nine children in the family, but the eldest, Barney A., was the only one of the large family to establish a home in California and he came to this country and state in 1881 after having learned the trade of a tailor under his father at Uhlebull, Germany, where he was born November 12, 1863, and where he had received an excellent German education in the national schools.

A brief experience in farming followed the arrival of Mr. Andersen in California. From the neighborhood of Los Angeles he went to San Francisco and learned the trade of dyer and cleaner, which he followed for some time in the employ of others. As soon as possible, however, he embarked in the business for himself. Coming to Bakersfield in December of 1900 he bought property and built a dyeing and cleaning establishment on the corner of Eighth and L streets. In a short time he had built up a large trade. Meanwhile he established his up-town office on Nineteenth street, later removed it to No. 2027 Chester avenue and eventually purchased a lot at No. 1669 Chester avenue, where he built a suitable structure for the prosecution of the business. Prosperity had crowned his efforts and the future looked bright before him, when suddenly he was stricken by the hand of death and passed away May 19, 1910, in Los Angeles, where his body was laid to its last rest. In his last days he had the consoling influences of a deep religious faith, for he was an earnest member of St. John's German Lutheran Church in Bakersfield and had served ably as president of its board of trustees, doing all within his power to enlarge the sphere of its usefulness as well as to exemplify in his own daily acts the inspiring and uplifting influence of its doctrines. After he became a resident of Bakersfield he identified himself with various fraternities, including the Independent Order of Foresters, the Modern Woodmen of America and the Improved Order of Red Men.

Surviving Mr. Andersen are his widow and daughter, Frieda, the latter now the wife of Martin Fechtner, of Bakersfield. Prior to her marriage in San Francisco in 1893 Mrs. Andersen was Miss Louise Van Goethem.

J. J. Darnall

Although born in Collinsville, Ill., she has lived in California since the age of four years and received her education in St. Paul's school, San Francisco. Her father, Frank Van Goethem, was a member of an honored old Flemish family, while her mother, who bore the maiden name of Bernhardena Keisker, was a native of Germany. After a residence of some years in Illinois the family came to California and Mr. Van Goethem secured work as a tanner in San Francisco, where the daughter was reared, educated and married. Being a woman of business ability as well as social charm, she has cared for her husband's interests with discrimination, has disposed of his business and now manages the property with discretion and energy.

JOHN JEFFERSON DARNUL.—As one of that illustrious band of pioneers who braved the dangers and endured the hardships of a new country in order that the way might be paved for the greater prosperity and the easier life of our great era of progress, Mr. Darnul occupies an enviable position in the regard of the people of Kern county. While his identification with this section of the state dates back as far as 1873, it by no means covers the duration of his residence in the west, for as early as 1855 he crossed the plains and became a permanent resident of the new commonwealth. He was at that time a youth of nineteen years, robust of constitution, industrious in habits of work, persistent in application and well qualified to succeed in the west, although he had received only scant educational advantages and had been deprived of all the opportunities considered so essential to twentieth-century progress. Since coming to Kern county life for him has meant a close association with local development.

The first nineteen years in the life of John Jefferson Darnul were passed in Arkansas, where he was born in Pope county October 2, 1836. His father, Cook B. Darnul, was born and reared in Illinois and there married Miss Petray, who died in Arkansas leaving an only child, John J. Later the father was united in marriage with Elizabeth Shinn. By that union eight children were born, but only two of these survive, viz.: Mrs. Pauline Petray, of Linn's valley and Mrs. Hannah Wiley of Calaveras county. The parents spent their last years in California and died in Calaveras county. During the five months spent in crossing the plains from Arkansas to California the eldest son of the family, then a youth of nineteen, proved an indispensable assistant in the capacity of driver of the ox-teams and in the other work incident to such an arduous undertaking. Arriving at Sacramento, he proceeded to the mines, but did not find the occupation of miner sufficiently profitable to induce continuance therein. With the exception of that early period of activity as a miner, he has devoted himself entirely to general farming, although he is now retired.

Settling in Sonoma county in 1858, Mr. Darnul there engaged in ranching. Later he was similarly occupied in Ventura county. Since 1873 he has made his home in Kern county, where he was the first settler on the north side of the Kern river, on the site of what is now Oil Center. From that neighborhood he removed to Linn's valley in 1894 and has since occupied and operated a farm comprising two hundred and forty acres. While owning a quarter section at Oil Center he decided to dig a ditch, in order that he might irrigate the land from the Kern river. During the prosecution of that work he discovered deposits of petroleum in the soil, being indeed the first to note the presence of oil in that field of later fame. Through his efforts the Kern River Water and Irrigating Ditch Company was organized and incorporated, thereby establishing the now well-known Beardsley canal. In addition to doing valuable work in the development of the canal, he was associated with another important enterprise in Kern county, viz.: the first street railroad in Bakersfield, for which he did considerable grading.

FREDERICK LAVERS.—Near Glennville, where he was born October 26, 1888, Frederick Lavers was educated in the public schools. Later he was sent to Stockton as a student in Heald's Business College and continued there until the completion of the commercial course in 1910, after which he acted as bookkeeper for a Bakersfield firm for six months. After a subsequent short sojourn at the parental home he removed to Hanford, Kings county, but in a short time he returned to his native county and purchased forty acres, comprising his present homestead. Upon this farm he has engaged in intensive agriculture. October 22, 1910, he was united in marriage with Miss Mary Engle, who was born at Granite Station, Kern county, and is a daughter of David Engle. The only child of this union, David, bears the name of both of his paternal grandfathers.

The discovery of gold induced David Lavers, the father, to come to the Pacific coast. Born at Windsor, Nova Scotia, in January, 1831, his was the childhood of poverty, the boyhood of self-sacrifice and the youth of privation. At the age of sixteen he accompanied his parents to Cumberland county, Nova Scotia, but work being scarce and illy-paid he soon went on to Massachusetts, where he was better able to earn a livelihood. During 1852 he sailed from the Long wharf at Boston on a ship bound for San Francisco via the Horn. The voyage occupied six months of tedious travel not altogether exempt from danger and privation, but in the end anchor was cast safely within the Golden Gate. For almost one year he worked in Stockton, but the great floods of 1853 caused him to leave that section and to secure employment at San Jose. During 1855 he came to Kern county and mined in the Greenhorn mountains as a day laborer, after which for one year he worked on the ranch owned by William Lynn, then for a while engaged in mining with Samuel Reed. However, he soon began to realize that the only avenue to financial independence was the securing of a farm and, having no means with which to make a purchase, he took up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres which now lies half a mile south of Glennville. As best he could with scanty means and no machinery, he began to improve the land. Later a stage coach made regular trips between Visalia and Havilah, the then county-seat. There was considerable patronage of the old coach and this gave him an incentive for a new enterprise. Building the first hotel in the northern part of the county, he started the first hotel in Linn's valley and from the first had a fair patronage. The hotel later was converted into a private residence and now gives him a comfortable home for his old age. For two years he engaged in mining on the White river and later mined the Ball mountain mine, where he met with gratifying success.

The year of 1859 found David Lavers joined by his father and mother, the former of whom aided him in stock-raising, while the latter acted as ranch housekeeper besides looking after the hotel. The assistance of his parents proved very helpful to him, while at the same time he was able to give them every comfort for their last days. Meanwhile he purchased railroad land as he was able and added to his holdings until now he has the title to three thousand acres, the larger part of which is utilized as a stock range. In the early days, when population was meager and money scarce, he had constant difficulty in meeting expenses and his life was one of labor and incessant self-denial. During the winter of 1856-57 he drove with three head of oxen and a wagon of potatoes through to Ft. Tejon and then made a trip through Tulare county from Porterville to Millerton, selling the spuds at high prices. As people began to settle in the region it became easier for him to dispose of his crops and existence became less of a drudgery, while the newcomers welcomed his advice and friendship with gratitude. From the first he was a local leader and his interest has continued up to the present time. The land for the Glennville cemetery was donated by him. He is an elder of the Presbyterian Church, has been a school trustee and is a Republican.

Peter Lambert

It was not until about forty-four years of age that David Lavers established a home of his own. October 30, 1875, he was united in marriage with Miss Annie Cook, who was born in New Brunswick, Canada, in 1848. The wedding occurred at Dorchester, New Brunswick, Mr. Lavers having gone east from California for the purpose of winning his bride. They settled in Kern county and successfully managed their farm in Linn's valley, so that eventually they became one of the wealthiest families of the entire district. Five children were born of their union. Two daughters, Mattie and Minnie, died at the old home farm near Glennville. Three sons survive, namely: Morton, of Bakersfield; William, who is assisting his father in the stock business; and Frederick, a farmer near Panama.

PETER LAMBERT.—The zeal, untiring effort and thrifty habits characteristic of the French race are conspicuously found in the life of Peter Lambert, whose birth occurred in the lofty mountains of Hautes Alpes, in the small village of Ancel, February 15, 1852. He was named for his father, who reared him in his native home and gave him the advantages of a thorough schooling, meanwhile teaching him the rudiments of farming in order to prepare him for the rugged road toward self-support and independence. He remained at his father's side until he reached the age of twenty, at which time he determined to visit an uncle, John Roux, who was a pioneer miner in far-off California and who had become a prominent sheep man in Los Angeles. In January, 1872, Mr. Lambert left his mountain home and came by way of Havre to New York City and from there on an overland train to San Francisco, Cal. Being held up in the mountains by the heavy snow storms he did not reach the latter point until March and he immediately boarded a boat for Los Angeles. His uncle took him into his employ and he was soon well informed in the sheep business, in April driving a flock across the mountains to South Fork, Kern county. Twenty-five months later he drove them into Gilroy, where they were disposed of to buyers from San Francisco. He then returned to Los Angeles to drive another flock, this time to the Mexican border below San Diego, where he remained until December. Riding a saddle horse to San Fernando, he took a stage to Bakersfield and then went by rail to Delano, where he entered the employ of Germain Pellissier, a prominent sheep man, remaining with him until June, 1875, when with his two brothers he purchased a flock of sheep which they ranged in the north of Kern county. The drouth of 1877 caused a loss of one-third of the sheep and one of the brothers dropped out of the partnership; in 1880 Peter Lambert purchased the other brother's interest and continued the business alone until 1884, when he sold his sheep. He had watched closely the development of the industry and the advancement in the method of handling sheep. He saw how the range was being fenced and realized that the safest mode of continuing in the stock business was for the individual to own landed interests, broad acres on which to range his stock. Accordingly, he in 1883 purchased a school section, two and a half miles east of Granite station, and he afterward purchased railroad lands adjacent until he had over eleven sections, or something over seven thousand acres of land. At the time of the oil boom, however, he was induced to sell seven sections, retaining two thousand and eighty acres which he still owns. This land is well watered by springs which afford ample water for the stock the year round. In the year 1895 he again embarked in the sheep business and continued it until 1898, when he again sold, owing to the drouth of that year; but three years later, in 1901, he purchased a flock of sheep in New Mexico and bringing them to Kern county, continued the business until 1908, when he sold his flock and has since rented his ranch for a cattle ranch.

Since 1889 Mr. Lambert has made his home on his present place in East Bakersfield, owning a valuable piece of property on Humboldt near Kern street. He was married in that year in Sumner, now East Bakersfield, to Miss Malvina Rambaud, who was also born in Hautes Alpes, France, and who came to Bakersfield the year of her marriage. They have a daughter, Marie. In his politics Mr. Lambert is a Republican.

HENRY LOUIS BORGWARDT.—An honored place among the California pioneers of the '50s is held by Mr. Borgwardt of Bakersfield, who has been a resident of Kern county since 1868 and meanwhile has contributed to the development of the agricultural and stock-raising interests of this portion of the state, as well as to the material upbuilding of his home city. Of German nativity and lineage, he was born July 30, 1832, in the city of Lubeck. By reason of the town being one of the principal harbors along the Baltic coast and therefore a headquarters for sailors and also through the fact that his father, Capt. Henry Borgwardt, was a pilot and captain on an ocean vessel, he himself early turned to the sea as affording a means of livelihood and at thirteen years of age shipped on the barque Luba which was engaged in the South American trade. For four and one-half years he remained on the same vessel and afterward sailed on other ships, at times from Lubeck and often from Hamburg. During 1854 he left Hamburg on the New Ed that sailed around Cape Horn, making stops only at Valparaiso, Chile, and other leading ports, and arriving at San Francisco on the 28th of November after a tedious voyage of six months.

A desire to hunt for gold led the young sailor to abandon his trade for the more uncertain occupation of mining. For some years he engaged in placer and hydraulic mining on the middle fork of the American river in Eldorado county. With the exception of a brief period, beginning in 1859, devoted to the dairy industry, he remained in the mines of California and Nevada until 1868, when he permanently retired from the work and took up sheep-raising on Poso creek in Kern county. At that time Havilah was still the county-seat and few settlers had identified themselves with the development of the region. Range was plentiful and the sheep industry, with favorable weather, offered large possibilities. Pre-empting one hundred and sixty acres on the creek and building a cabin for his family, Mr. Borgwardt remained there for thirteen years. Meanwhile he experienced the ups and downs incident to the business. His heaviest loss resulted from the drought of 1877 and four years later he sold all of the sheep and retired from the business.

At the time of removing to Bakersfield and acquiring eighty acres adjacent to the city limits, Mr. Borgwardt turned his attention to the raising of alfalfa on the tract. A portion of this he cut for hay and the balance was used for the pasturage of stock. With the growth of the city, he decided to lay out the land into lots and this he did in 1889, Union and California streets forming the beginning of the Borgwardt tract, from which a large number of lots have been sold and which has the advantage of lying twenty feet higher than Bakersfield. The supervision of the property naturally took the owner into the real-estate business and for more than twenty years he has given his attention almost wholly to such work as related to the development of his sub-divisions. Shortly after he arrived in San Francisco at the close of his long voyage from Germany he was united in marriage with Miss Caroline Peterson, who was born in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, and came to America in the same ship with Mr. Borgwardt. Their long wedded life of mutual happiness and helpfulness was broken by her death in June, 1903. Nine children had been born of their union, namely: Mary, who died in Bakersfield June 3, 1888; Henry, who for twelve years served as sheriff of Kern county and died here in August, 1904; Andrew, who died in this city June 10, 1878; William, a rancher near Bakersfield; Dora, who was taken from the home when only one month old; Charles, living in Fresno; Francis, a merchant at Mill Valley; George W., who follows the painter's trade in Bakersfield; and Morris, who is also a resident of this city, and his family make their home with Mr. Borgwardt. As early as 1872 Mr. Borgwardt became identified with the Bakersfield Lodge, I. O. O. F. In politics he is a Republican.

Jos Girard

Eva Girard

JOSEPH GIRARD.—Many of the men who have contributed materially to the development and upbuilding of Kern county have come here from the south of France and among these we find Joseph Girard, who is one of the old settlers of Delano, coming as he did to this vicinity in 1889. He was engaged in the sheep business up to 1909, since which time he has been in the cattle business. He was born in Ancelles, Hautes Alpes, France, January 4, 1869, being the son of Francois and Delphino (Jullian) Girard.

From a boy Joseph Girard made himself useful on the farm, becoming thoroughly familiar with the stock business, a knowledge that was of the greatest assistance to him after he came to California. In the local schools near his home he received a good education and training. When nineteen he determined to migrate to California, having an uncle, G. Jullian, and a brother, Emil, in San Francisco, and he accordingly left the old home to seek his fortune in the land of the Golden West, arriving in San Francisco in December of 1888. Here he remained for three months and in March, 1889, came to Kern county, where he entered into partnership with his brother, Philipp, and they continued together in sheep raising. Purchasing a ranch sixteen miles west of Delano, which was their headquarters, they introduced full-blooded merinos, thus bringing their flock to a very high grade. In 1909 they sold their flocks and began the cattle business, in which they are very successful, raising short horn Durhams for beef cattle. They continue using the same brand, a small circle within a circle and joined by a bar on opposite sides. Their ranch comprises about five thousand acres, all under fence, being well watered by springs and by a pumping plant; two sets of buildings have been erected, one at the Springs and the other at the pumping plant. With his family he resides in Delano, where he owns fifteen acres, adjoining the city, with a comfortable residence. In 1905 he visited his old home in France and there met the lady who became his wife October 18, 1905. She was Eva Chabot, who was also a native of Hautes Alpes, born October 27, 1887, the daughter of Louis and Marie (Marron) Chabot, who were both teachers and for many years engaged in educational work.

Mr. and Mrs. Girard have had five children, four of whom are living: Arthur M., Justin F., Marcel P., deceased, Emil J. and Josephine Marie. Mr. Girard is public-spirited and a Republican in politics.

JOHN KAAR.—Born in New Jersey in 1845, he traced his lineage to Germany through the Kaars, while on the maternal side he came from Scotch forefathers. At an early age he removed from New Jersey to Illinois in company with his father, George Kaar, and settled on a tract of raw land near Princeton, where he soon learned to be helpful in the difficult tasks connected with the improvement of a farm. Meanwhile he was permitted to attend the country schools during the winter months when his help on the farm was not needed. During young manhood he married Miss Emma LeFever, who was born in Pennsylvania and died in California in 1909. Having acquired a thorough knowledge of brick-making, he settled in Benton county, Ind., and embarked in the manufacture of tile and brick, but at the same time carried on a farm in that locality.

Bringing his family to California in 1894, John Kaar arrived at Kern

(now East Bakersfield) on the 5th of March and established a home on Central avenue. Immediately he became interested in the manufacture of brick. In connection with this industry he engaged in contracting and building. It soon came to be understood that he was an unusually skilled workman. Indeed, his reputation in that regard has not been surpassed. In Kern he erected a number of brick residences and cottages that are still owned by his children and it is said that they stand today apparently in as good condition as the day they were completed. People in a position to make authoritative statements assert that he built more residences and buildings in Kern than any other man in the town. Other enterprises enlisted his sympathy and co-operation, but it was to the building business that he gave his keenest abilities and most unwearied devotion and until his death in 1909 he ranked among the most proficient and successful builders in Kern. Surviving him are five children, all of whom are well-known residents of East Bakersfield, namely: Eliza, Mrs. O. F. Howell; Nellie, Mrs. David Sheedy; George S., manager of the Citizens' Laundry; Charles H., who is engaged in the automobile business as proprietor of the Studebaker Garage, at Eighteenth and L streets, Bakersfield; and Jacob F., a real estate dealer and rancher near Bakersfield.

J. FRANK FOX.—Among the revered and beloved pioneers of California none was more thoroughly grounded in the facts historical and geographical, political and industrial, pertaining to the state than the late J. Frank Fox, who combined with this knowledge the faculty of putting it into writing with that graphic ease and clever pen which attracted many readers. He was a member of a well-known, historic family, his maternal grandfather, Enoch Page, a native of New Hampshire, having seen active service in the French and Indian war, as well as the Revolutionary war. He held the commission of captain in the latter controversy, and he was with Washington when he crossed the Delaware and was present at the Battle of Bennington under General Stark. The Fox family was one of the oldest in Somerset county, Me., and Fox Hill was so named for the family. J. Frank Fox was born in Athens, that county and state, on April 2, 1826, and was there reared to young manhood. In 1851 he came to California via Nicaragua and made San Francisco his destination. His first occupation was aiding in the building of the first steamboat on Mission Bay. In 1853 he was United States consul in Old Mexico, where he remained for about fifteen years. He traveled considerably and was a newspaper correspondent, his natural bent being to accumulate knowledge and write down his ideas of conditions and observations, which always proved entertaining as well as instructive. He later spent several years on the frontier of Texas and in 1876 returned to California. After spending a few years in Oakland and Sonoma county in May of 1886 he located in Kern county, homesteading a ranch two and a half miles west of Delano. He improved a farm of one hundred and sixty acres and resided there until his retirement, and thereafter made his home with his daughter, Mrs. Martin, until his death, October 12, 1913. Mr. Fox was married in Mexico to Miss Lucita Benavidez, who was born in Pueblo, Mexico, of Castilian extraction. She passed away in Delano.

Six children were born to this union, of whom but two are now living. Mrs. Alice J. Fox-Martin, and Mrs. Emma DeSoto of Stockton. Mr. Fox was an ardent supporter of Republican principles, and was always well posted on current topics. He was an able historian, a clear and forceful writer, and was at the time of his death writing the history of National Presidential Campaigns, covering the period from 1828 to the present, drafting principally from his own recollections, and it bids fair to be one of the most interesting works of its kind ever published.

J. H. Fox
1871

RICHARD JAMES MARTIN.—Just west of the flourishing town of Delano is situated a ranch of eighty acres whose well-improved condition together with the fine cattle seen on the ranch evidence the thorough conception of the details essential in the dairy business which the proprietor, Richard J. Martin, has been able to give them. A member of an old family, Mr. Martin was born in Bristol, England, August 5, 1864, the son of Alfred and Ann (Garland) Martin of that place. The father was a merchant and shoe manufacturer. He brought his family to the United States, locating at Columbus, Ohio, in 1869, and two years later found him located thirteen miles southwest of Tulare, Cal., on a homestead which lay two miles from Tulare lake. It is interesting to note that at this time there was a steamboat plying on the lake. Alfred Martin followed the stock business until he was obliged to retire from active labors, and thereafter he made his home in Tulare, where he passed away at the age of eighty-four years. His wife passed away at the age of eighty years. Six children had been born to this worthy pioneer couple, four now surviving.

The youngest child born to his parents, Richard J. Martin was reared on the parental farm and received his literary training in the public school of the locality. He was married in Visalia March 5, 1890, to Miss Alice J. Fox, who was born in Monterey, daughter of J. Frank Fox, who was a pioneer in California and one of the first settlers in the vicinity of Delano. Mrs. Martin was educated in the public schools of Oakland and Santa Rosa, and later received a thorough musical training at Pacific University, Santa Rosa. For many years she engaged as a music teacher and her splendid talent was recognized and deeply appreciated by all her associates. After their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Martin resided in Tulare until 1893, when they located permanently in Kern county and engaged in the dairy business. On their ranch is a pumping plant with a capacity of sixty-five inches, and Mr. Martin is sowing most of the acreage to alfalfa. The dairy business is conducted on the most sanitary and carefully-adjusted plans, and the vicinity around Delano is supplied with its product, a portion being shipped to Tulare. Together with these dairy interests Mr. Martin owns valuable residence property in Delano and three hundred and twenty acres further west. He is an active member of the Woodmen of the World and affiliates too with the Modern Woodmen of America at Delano. Mrs. Martin is a member of the Women of Woodcraft at Bakersfield and the Royal Neighbors of Delano, of which latter she has been presiding officer for two terms. Socially active and popular they are prominent in religious and musical circles, and Mrs. Martin has been organist for both the Methodist and Baptist churches at Delano at different times for the past twenty-five years. As ardent Republicans the Martins take public-spirited interest in all local issues and unite with all good purposes for the common welfare.

E. H. LEIERITZ.—A feature of the modern building in Bakersfield is the development of the bungalow plan. When Mr. Leieritz came to this city in December of 1908 to make his home and to embark in contracting, he brought with him many ideas profitably utilized in Los Angeles, his former place of business, and in addition he evolved many original ideas of his own that added to the beauty and utility of these artistic structures. The first bungalow in this city was erected under his supervision. At once the popularity of the plan was pronounced. Since then over one hundred bungalows have been erected from his own plans and under his personal supervision, all of these buildings constituting a distinct addition to the attractions of Bakersfield as a city of pretty homes.

By virtue of his birth in Los Angeles Mr. Leieritz ranks as a native son. His parents, George and Julia (Meyers) Leieritz, were natives respectively of Alsace, Germany, and Kansas City, Kan., and are now living on a farm at Downey, Cal. The maternal grandfather, Ernest Meyers, born and reared in Germany, became a pioneer of Kansas and served throughout the entire Civil war as a member of a Kansas regiment of infantry. After some years in Kansas, George Leieritz came to California and settled in Los Angeles, where his son, E. H., was born October 11, 1880. There were thirteen children in the family and it is a noteworthy fact that all but two are still living. The fourth in order of birth, E. H., received his education in the Los Angeles schools and later served an apprenticeship to the trade of carpenter in his native city. Upon having gained a thorough practical knowledge of every detail connected with the occupation he began to work by the day, from that he gradually drifted into contract work. After three years as a contractor in Los Angeles he came to Bakersfield and here he has enjoyed a successful business experience and has also become a member of the Bakersfield Club. Accompanying him to this city was his wife, whom he had married in Los Angeles and who was formerly Miss Elizabeth Kennedy, member of a family that came to California from her native city of Burlington, Iowa. One child blesses their union, Francis Louis.

JACOB WALTER.—Since 1901 Mr. Walter has devoted his time to the management of his interests, which include the ownership of the Walter's hotel building on Nineteenth street, a ranch near Corners, eighty acres in the Weed Patch, forty acres in peaches and apricots near Beardsley school house and an alfalfa ranch under the Beardsley canal three miles northwest of Bakersfield.

The village of Lohningen, Canton Schaffhausen, Switzerland, near the border of Germany, was the childhood home of Jacob Walter, who was born there October 7, 1840, being a son of Johannes and Ann (Bollinger) Walter, lifelong residents of the same region. There were seven children in the parental family and Jacob is the youngest of the three now living. As a boy he assisted on the farm operated by his father, who being a practical weaver as well as a farmer taught the lad the trade of a linen weaver. At the age of twenty-five years he relinquished his work in Europe and came to the United States, in 1865, where he found employment in a factory in Chicago. From there in 1868 he removed to San Francisco and learned the trade of a baker and cook. The following year found him employed as a cook in Sacramento and in 1872 he went to Nevada, but from there in 1873 he came to Bakersfield as the first cook in the Arlington house. At the expiration of five months he bought out the City bakery on Nineteenth street and operated this in connection with a restaurant. Upon being burned out in 1889 he erected a brick block on Nineteenth between L and M streets. The structure, still known as the Walter's hotel, is 99x68 feet in dimensions, on a lot 99x115½ feet, and in addition to the hotel a grocery and a bakery also lease space on the first floor. Since the retirement of the original proprietor in 1901 the hotel has been rented and he has devoted his attention to the management of his large property interests. Upon the organization of the Security Trust Company he became one of the first stockholders and still retains shares in the concern, besides being interested in the Los Angeles Fire Insurance Company.

The attractive family residence at No. 1008 Truxtun avenue is graciously presided over by Mrs. Walter, formerly Miss Evelena Funk, whose native home was in Eldorado county, this state, but who had lived in Bakersfield for some time prior to her marriage. A lifelong resident of the state and a member of a pioneer family, she cherishes a deep devotion to the welfare of the west and with her husband finds pleasure in the reunions of the Society of Pioneers, to which both belong. Their family comprises four children, namely: Gustav, Mrs. Olive Grogg, Leo and Gertrude, all of whom make Bakersfield their home. The political views of Mr. Walter bring him into sympathy with the Republican party and he always has kept posted concerning problems of national or civic importance, his devotion to the city leading him to fill the office of city trustee for a period of two years.

Jacob Walter

MRS. ELLEN M. TRACY.—As a link between the deprivations of frontier existence and the refinements of twentieth-century civilization the life of Mrs. Tracy possesses a rare and permanent interest to the residents of Bakersfield, who appreciate the importance of her optimistic faith to the early upbuilding of the city and the value of her unfailing hospitality to the social amenities of the then frontier town. Rooted deep in her soul, a part indeed of life itself, is her love for California, whither she came during the '50s and to whose material progress she has given of time and physical strength and mental resources. Particularly has she been interested in the advancement of Bakersfield, the city named in honor of her first husband, Col. Thomas Baker, and dear to her not only for that reason, but also on account of her own long identification therewith. As the pioneer woman resident of the then unattractive hamlet, she and the Colonel, himself one of the few white male citizens, lived in an adobe cabin which he had built on the corner of Nineteenth and N streets. During the first three years they spent in the cabin it had no floor save Mother Earth. There was, however, in the hospitality extended by the mistress of this primeval home a graciousness, a warmth and a kindness that won the heart of every visitor.

Descended from Holland-Dutch ancestry, Ellen M. Alverson was born in Ann Arbor, Mich., December 21, 1837, being the daughter of a talented physician whose birth had occurred in Perry, Wyoming county, N. Y., in 1808 and whose remarkable professional attainments had led to his selection to serve as a lecturer in the medical department of the University of Michigan. After resigning that position he removed to Marengo, Iowa county, Iowa, where he engaged in practice for twenty years and became widely known for skill in diagnosis and accuracy in the treatment of disease. Upon his removal to California in 1874 he opened an office at Bakersfield and soon built up a practice that extended into all of Kern county, continuing in active professional labors until shortly before his death, which occurred in 1879 at Tehachapi. Prior to his departure from New York he had married in Genesee county Miss Charlotte Graves, who was born in Perry, that state, and in 1866 died at Marengo, Iowa. From her earliest recollections Mrs. Tracy was familiar with the frontier. During the '40s the now cultured and populous city of Ann Arbor was an insignificant hamlet whose one claim to distinction was its seat of learning, then as now one of the great educational institutions of the country. For a time she attended school in that town, but in young girlhood she came to California, where at Visalia in 1857 she became the wife of Col. Thomas Baker, one of the noted pioneers of the west. In all his work he had the benefit of her shrewd counsel and active co-operation. While he was acting as receiver of the United States land office at Visalia an occasion arose when he had $20,000 on hand belonging to the United States government and to be taken to San Francisco for deposit. When preparing for the journey an Indian smuggled to him a note written on a dirty piece of paper and warning him that Vasquez and his band were planning to rob him in the stage when he took the government money to San Francisco. The woman's wit of Mrs. Baker saved the day. She suggested that she accompany him, taking their infant son, Thomas A., (now the sheriff of Kern county), believing that by so doing the desperadoes would conclude that they were not taking the money with them. The ruse was successful. The money was packed in a buckskin sack and placed in the bottom of a carpet-bag, with baby clothes on top. On Monday morning they mounted the stage and departed from Visalia. By eight o'clock on Tuesday night they were in San Francisco and the money had been turned over in safety to the proper authorities.

After the Colonel's death his widow made her home in Kern county and took charge of his estate. During 1875 she married Ferdinand A. Tracy, a pioneer citizen and extensive stockman, whose demise occurred in Bakersfield January 9, 1908. Mrs. Tracy now makes her home with her daughter, Mrs. John M. Jameson, of Bakersfield. In this city she still owns real estate purchased by her first husband during frontier days. From all of his lands and possessions she saved eighty acres located in the vicinity of O and Twenty-second streets. On Nineteenth street she erected a neat frame house, but shortly after the completion of the residence it was destroyed by fire, July 7, 1889. The tract of eighty acres was mostly subdivided and sold off in lots. From it she donated the site for two public institutions, one of these being the Children's Shelter, where about fifty orphans are cared for. Under her supervision were erected a number of residences that were a credit to Bakersfield. She is a member of Bakersfield Chapter No. 125, O. E. S., and for the past fifteen years has been worthy chaplain.

AMBROISE VILLARD.—Near Gap, Hautes-Alpes, France, Ambroise Villard was born July 1, 1851, the son of Ambroise and Amiee (Rimbaud) Villard, farmers near Gap, where they reared their nine children, of whom five are living, Ambroise being the oldest. Educated in public schools in his native land, Mr. Villard lived with his parents till in 1872, when, having heard good reports of the Golden West, he came to California to try his fortune. Settling in Ventura county, Cal., he worked there for wages three years, after which he engaged in sheep raising for himself in that county, herding his sheep through the San Joaquin valley into Inyo county. In 1877 he made his first trip to Kern county, but he did not locate here permanently until 1881, at that time making his headquarters in Delano. By adhering steadily to the business which he had undertaken he finally made a success of it, bringing to bear in its fruition a good knowledge of affairs and a strong personality. In 1903, after over thirty years continuous experience, he sold his sheep in order to give his attention to cattle raising, a business which he has since developed to large proportions. Eighteen miles east of Delano Mr. Villard took up a claim to which he later added from time to time by the purchase of adjoining land until he became the owner of forty-eight hundred acres all in one body. All of his cattle and horses bear the brand which he has adopted as his trade mark, which is a "V" and "A" closely connected, "VA." All in all Mr. Villard's business career is one of which any man might be proud. Coming to this country with very little capital, he has won a place as leader of leaders in a great state. As he has found good opportunity he has invested in enterprises of different kinds, always with profitable results. He is a stockholder in the First National Bank of Delano and in the Delano-Linn's valley telephone system, in which he is a director, and is also interested in the Rochdale store here.

In San Francisco, January 29, 1887, Mr. Villard married Eugenie Marie Faure, also a native of Hautes-Alpes, France, born January 24, 1868. Upon coming to California she resided in Los Angeles until coming to Kern county. Mrs. Villard became the mother of eleven children, as follows. Ambroise, deceased; Albert, who in 1912 was married to Agnes Panero; and Adriene, Eugene, August, Joseph, Mary, Jule, Gabriel, Annie and Daniel, all of the last mentioned at home, and the older sons assist their father in the cattle business.

WILLIAM TYLER.—The honor of having recorded the first deed in Kern county belongs to this well-known California pioneer of 1859, who although of Canadian birth, is of American parents, and allows none to surpass him in devotion to the commonwealth of the Stars and Stripes. The old homestead where he was born June 20, 1836, stood in Napierville, Quebec, Canada, only a few miles north of the New York state line, and the later residence of the family, at Iberville, Quebec, was almost equally near to the United States. His father, Orange Tyler, a member of a colonial family of New England, was born at Thetford, Orange county, Vt., in 1801 and from there removed to the province of Quebec, took up land and acquired considerable property first at Napierville and later in Iberville, where he remained until death. In the same Canadian district occurred the demise of his wife, Mary (Poutr ) Tyler, who was of French extraction. After having been a student in the public schools of Iberville and an academy at Bakersfield, Vt., William Tyler went to New York City to earn a livelihood and from there in 1859 came via Panama to California, making the voyage on the Star of the West to the Isthmus and the Golden Gate on the Pacific. After he had landed at San Francisco May 17, 1859, he went direct to Amador county and began mining at Jackson, but was unsuccessful and returned to San Francisco in 1862.

Ambroise Villard

A brief experience during 1863 as a clerk in a general mercantile store at Santa Clara was followed by a return to mining, but this time Mr. Tyler went into Nevada and prospected at Aurora and also in the Montgomery district. From there in 1864 he and a companion walked across the country a distance of three hundred miles, down the Owens river, through Walker's Pass and through a valley where only three days before the Indians had massacred a party of white men, finally landing at Havilah, Kern county, after a perilous and wearisome journey. Shortly after his arrival the county was organized with H. D. Bequette as the first county clerk and he chose as his deputy Mr. Tyler, who in that capacity recorded in his own handwriting the first deed in the county. For several years he was employed in a mine owned by Dr. de La Borde. During 1869 he went to Los Angeles, then a picturesque but small and unpromising Spanish village. Returning to Kern county in 1870 he resumed mining and prospecting, but later gave his attention to boring wells in the interests of L. R. Hodgkins. Upon establishing a permanent home in Bakersfield he held deputyships under various county officers, including the position of deputy assessor under T. E. Harding. Later he held the office of county auditor for two terms of two years each, after which he engaged in the real-estate business for some years with his brother, Edmond Tyler, and since retiring from that business he has devoted his attention to the oversight of his personal interests. At this writing he acts as manager of the Tyler Timber Company of Delano, Kern county, in which capacity he superintended the planting of one hundred and sixty acres in eucalyptus trees and has a general charge of the two hundred and forty acres owned by the company in the vicinity of Delano.

Mr. Tyler is a widower and his home in Bakersfield is presided over by his daughter, Miss Louise Adelaide. His wife, whom he married in San Francisco and who bore the maiden name of Carrie B. Evans, was born at New Durham Ridge, N. H., and died in San Francisco October 24, 1902. The only child of the union, who possesses her mother's energy of temperament and charm of manner, is a popular guest at social functions and also a leading worker in the Eastern Star. Fraternally Mr. Tyler was made a Mason in Dorchester Lodge, F. & A. M., at St. Johns, Canada, and now holds membership with Bakersfield Lodge No. 224, F. & A. M., to whose philanthropies he has contributed generously and regularly for years. In politics he votes with the Democratic party.

W. W. KELLY.—Genealogical records attest to the Anglo-Saxon origin of the Kelly family and their emigration from England to Alabama, where occurred the birth of G. M. Kelly, a son of the original immigrant and himself a pioneer of 1857 in California. When a young man he had married Miss Sarah Henderson, who was born in Illinois in 1837, and the eldest of their children was an infant when they joined an expedition bound for the western coast. A brother-in-law, Capt. Bass Parker, acted as leader of the emigrant train and all went well until a shortage of provisions led to changes in the route. The party divided, the larger part going by way of Salt Lake in order to secure necessary supplies. A smaller body decided to proceed via Mountain Meadows and started along that highway without fear of trouble. The savages fell upon them and massacred them without mercy. Shortly afterward the larger expedition came along and first learned of the disaster when they found the dead bodies of their former companions. The bodies were given a Christian burial and the party then came on to California. Always afterward Captain Parker clung to the belief that if the smaller party had remained with them, they would have formed a force sufficiently large to withstand any assault made by the Indians.

Arriving at Visalia in the autumn of 1857 G. M. Kelly made a temporary home there, but soon went to Elkhorn in Fresno county for the purpose of conducting a stage station. In the fall of 1858 he again came to Visalia and bought land one mile south of town. The property still remains in the family. Immediately after his arrival he put up a crude cabin of shakes with a puncheon floor. Later he replaced this with a better house and eventually erected a modern house. The original tract of forty acres has been enlarged until the fine stock and grain farm now includes one hundred and ninety acres. Since the death of Mr. Kelly in 1884 at the age of fifty-three years the widow has continued at the old homestead and now occupies the third house built on the tract. Of her eleven children all but one are still living, W. W., the fifth of these, having been born in Visalia, this state, July 22, 1863. When the Native Sons of the Golden West organized a parlor in Visalia he became one of its charter members. During early life he assisted his father on the farm and at the age of sixteen clerked in a store. After the death of his father he remained at the old homestead for some time, meanwhile engaging in the dairy industry, general farming and the raising of alfalfa.

